“Chris just finished Bavarian tour, says Kathleen, and due in England in four months: will see him then without being seen — only the second time since marriage. What can he possibly think of me after that letter telling of second marriage? Does he guess motive? How did he take it? Would give the world to know. My complete ignorance of his mind now! But wait, all's quite well: death of Yvonne proves him my very own, in spite of all. No end apparently to his achievement: Kathleen says playing double harmonies in rapidest passages, whole melodies in harmonics, in Vienna ties and walking-sticks called after him, his last sonata all the rage everywhere, tours like triumphal progresses. Have a thought of writing to him in assumed name, just to see if he will answer: but wait till my love comes to England.”

CHAPTER XVIII

AFTER ANOTHER MONTH the diary becomes gloomy reading, where she writes of leaving the London Hospital. "Dismissal," she wrote, "for it comes to that. I'd rather they had said plain 'go' than say 'Please ask to be allowed to go.' It was like a thunder-bolt, I had so set my mind upon becoming staff-nurse — only eleven more months: now all dark before me again, nothing to do but stare at Foundling boys at drill in mornings, and moon with baby all day. Wherein hath she offended? Presentation-Bible from probationers at parting, everybody in tears because of my going, I inclined that way for same reason, yet going all the same, bewitched, not knowing why! Matron must have heard something somehow — about child? about second marriage? Seems impossible, but must be. Was down in Chelsea to my Willie yesterday, questioned him narrowly: no, had not breathed a word to a soul. Anyway, bitter and shameful enough. Oh, you could sit down and cry, Hannah, if you only would."

But scarcely two weeks had passed when she was out of this slough of despond, and once more in her brighter mood. It came about through a boy named "Ralphie," of whom she often wrote. She seems to have met him at a little meeting-house Sunday-school in the Euston Road, for she belonged to all the religious sects in the world, and wrote of them, "the more the merrier." "Ralphie's" mother fell ill, Hannah went to see her, and at the bedside met a little St. Pancras-Dispensary doctor who fell in love with her, and brought her into touch with more sick people. In all that part between Guilford Street and St. Pancras there is no lack of wretchedness and disease, and her days and nights, too, were soon as full of work and hurry as she could wish, though in an unofficial way. After only five or six weeks of it, when she had met several doctors, patrons, and influential people, she wrote the extraordinary words: "My own hospital some day perhaps," meaning that the little so-called "Medical Mission," now in Compton Place, which she helped to found, was already in sight. On the top of all this bustling activity came Chris Wilson, of whose first concert she wrote: "St. James's Hall yesterday afternoon: my same boy, a little bigger, hair worn a little longer. Some difference between yesterday and that first night at Queen's Hall, not the same thrill beforehand, but even greater emotion during, and ado after, concert. If I had had a veil, would have tried to shake hands like the rest, but hadn't thought of veil, and didn't dare. Not according to the plan, Hannah. Wait, only two years and a half, say two years, a man can't love the sweetest ghost longer, then he will take you. I love him as friend, as husband, as little papa, as sweetheart, and as workman: really wondrous tremolo use of left hand now, something like three octaves out of each string, twice changed pitch of G in height of last piece by turn of peg. See program gummed on other side. Came home 'sick with love,' and under strong impulse wrote letter straight away, signed 'Viola.' See copy, ," etc., etc.

"Hip! hip!" she wrote two days later, "answer to 'Viola' this morning from Chris! Never thought he would answer! Here it is:

"4 Gray's Inn Square.

"My dear Viola,

"I thank you infinitely for your letter, which I find no less than charming, and I have a perfect conviction that you are as charming in your person as in your writing. Imagine, then, my trouble, when, having sent my valet today to make inquiries at the address which you give, he brought me back the intelligence that none such as you lives there, since the place is only a little paper-shop. Let me beseech you, dear Viola, to place me at once in a better position with regard to you. The proof that I am seriously concerned is this letter, since it is well known that I am not fond of writing letters, and am daily compelled to leave missives from unknown correspondents unanswered. But yours has seriously fascinated my fancy, I picture you as a being endowed with every grace, and desire to see you. If you do not let me see you at once, I shall become lovesick and restless, my work will be disturbed, and you would certainly not wish this. Or perhaps you do not care to give me your address at once? but mean to wait till your modesty is appeased by time? In which case, let me remind you that youth is short, that the flowers of tomorrow grow for others, but today is Love's opportunity; moreover, my stay in England will not be long. Do for me, then, what you can in this, will you? For if my longings are balked, everything goes wrong with me. If you can't let me see you at once, pray let me have your photograph without delay. Long as your letter was, it left in me a kind of longing desire for more, rather than a satiety. Your hand-writing, though strong, I find thrillingly feminine; and you have scented the paper with a heavenly art. Why, by the way, do you so object to this word 'art,' and wish it 'left out of the dictionary?' Is it not too old a friend? But we will discuss your letter particularly at our near meeting.

"Sincerely yours, dear Viola,

"Chris Wilson."

"Was rather afraid," wrote Hannah of the letters, "that he might recognize my handwriting, for has seen it once or twice. However, all safe henceforth. Let two days pass, then wrote following:

“Dear Chris Wilson:

“I was surprised and glad to get your letter. Let me say at once that I shall be sorry indeed if your work is “disturbed” through me, but I can’t give you my address, nor even send you my photograph. Does it follow, because you are a great “artist,” that you may send such commands to a woman who merely wrote to express her liking for your fiddling? Just as all men are not fiddlers, so all women are not fiddles, sir! But you won’t go lovesick after a shadow? I happen to know that you once took to your bed through longing for some odor which you had smelled, or dreamt that you had smelled. I don’t call that virtuous. But you shall see me. That is a promise. Not when you order me, but when see fit, perhaps a good time hence, one day I shall certainly present myself before you. And I promise also that in that day I shall bring you in my hands a present worthy of you and me — a rich one — richer than a king’s ransom, cunningly made, richer than Koh-i-noor added to Le Messie, La Pucelle, and all the Strads in the world. That may sound rather wild talk, but I already have the thing by me, am keeping it for you, and you may rely upon my promise. Meantime, as I can’t send my photograph, I may tell you, to keep you going, that I am by no means an old woman, am tallish, no skin-and-bones, every tooth sound in my head, figure straight as a dart and strong in the back, not bad looking up above, nice country color, a little too much jaw perhaps, but laughing, deep blue eyes to make up. Not a bad lot altogether, well-meaning, but stumbling and purblind. That’s Viola. But what surprises me in your letter is your “desire to see” this unknown Viola only nineteen months after the death of Yvonne de Pencharry-Strannik. You see, I know things. Am I right or wrong in deciding that “Mortalite” was written with your eyes fixed on her beatified image? I am sure that that hymn is truly of God. You will let her memory fade with the tenderest slowness? I always think now of white violets when I think of her. These, too, must fade, though watered with tears, but with a lingering, sweet decay. Then I shall like you a lot, and do anything for you. As to my attack on the word “art,” I only meant that all meaning seems to have got rubbed out of it now. It implies artfulness, thought? yes, but was “Mortalite” a work of thought? No: so we have a word meaning thought used to describe works purely emotional and instinctive. I want to consult you about a viola which I have come across lying under a bed in a quite poor house in Islington, looking wondrously like a Maggini, with clear-cut bouts, short corners, and upright??’s, clover-leaves and trefoils on back. I could get it, if I chose, for — how much do you think? — £2, and am haunted by the possibility of its genuineness. Shall I get and send it you? Varnish orange and palest yellow, with dated label. Or will you not write again? I have a whole heartfelt to say to you by little and little, if you will hear.

“Your sincere Viola.”

This letter-writing between “Viola” and Chris Wilson was still in its earliest stage when Hannah’s quietness of mind was troubled by a little thing — the disappearance of “her” Willie. “Hadn’t seen him for four months,” she wrote of him; “began to get anxious, and went down . . . to his timber-yard in Chelsea. Not there, had left months before — without telling me a word! One of workmen said: ‘Dawe must have come into a fortune; saw him one evening five weeks ago at Charing Cross, dressed up like a lord, watch and chain and cane, with a young lady on his arm.’ Can’t be true! Wrote to Mrs. Dawe to ask, and this morning her answer that she doesn’t know where Willie is; says that Kathleen, too, has wanted his address, and she gave it; doesn’t think that since then she has got either money or letter from him; doesn't say why Kathleen wanted address. That must have been when Kathleen was in England and went down to Orrock about four months ago; she called at paper-shop address thinking to see me, about then. Anyway, my Willie gone, perhaps out of work, clothes shabby, and ashamed to come to me! But strange he hasn't written to his mother. Why did Kathleen want him? Don't even know where she is now — not at the Hill."

"Interview in drawing-room with Bailey," she wrote two days later, "and never was so utterly mystified. Something discovered at last: viol and box seen behind bureau in Hall library on morning of Sir Peter's funeral! If he had said, 'Man-in-the-moon seen playing cricket,'

I couldn't have been more hopelessly astonished. He heard it from under-housemaid Jane, who, when Hall-servants were put on half-pay, and some dismissed, went home to parents in Nottinghamshire; after endless bother Bailey found her down there in a coffee-house, and she is sure of facts: saw the things behind bureau— 'thing like a fiddle, a little larger, only without any handle, and cardboard box like a collar-box' — wondered how they had got there, didn't like to touch, next time she looked they were gone! Must be true, since she can describe them exactly. But the wonder of it! Who, and with what motive, could steal just those two things, and nothing else? Does any one know my secret, and how? Does this explain dreams about Sir Peter? But don't try to see through stone-wall, Hannah, take deep breaths, and possess your soul. Worry about this, however, that I must have left trunk open some time, and no hope for me, if I continue that sort of slovenly life. Only two days ago Drs. Lloyd and Herrick complimenting my 'powers of organization' 'would have been a general, if a man,' when I had the thought, 'but if you only knew some of the things I forget, the silly, childish mistakes and omissions in most important matters'; can't help it! a screw loose somewhere, the sex of the girl, perhaps. "Anyway, so the matter stands about viol and box, and now, with a clue, they may turn up any day. Gave Bailey new check, £11.15; then, when he was gone, the frenzy came upon me to be in the old place that very night! and if old Pat had got worse during absence would have served me just right. Several things forbade me to go that night; no good; had been hearing too much from Bailey about everybody down there, just wrote notes to doctors, was away by the 8.37, and now in a rage with myself for it, like drunkard's awaking. Impulse, and tearing, stumbling self-will. But enjoyed myself thoroughly; walked from Cromer, and between midnight and five a. m. ranged everywhere, saw everything, without being seen by a soul; cloudy, drizzling, with moon now and again a little; sat ten minutes on Woodside side-steps with Rover; at the grave half an hour in the dark o' the moon, boats out on sea at the pots; heaped it with clove-carnations, heartsease, tulip, harebell. Just over Scoble's Cave a bit of cliff gone like the wall of a house, debris still there at bottom, and a narrow slice, a foot thick, from south end of graveyard; makes me sad every time: no end to it. He gives, and He takes away."

The strange fact to what she refers here is to be seen more or less at work all round Britain. Yorkshire every year loses thirty acres; between Spurn Head and Whitby five feet a year are swallowed up; between Bridlington and the Humber a hundred yards are said to have vanished within fifty years. The lane where lovers plighted their troth may be gone before the wedding day, and "soon where late we stood shall no man stand," says Mr. Swinburne. It is rather a painful thing: timber and stones may prop the cliffs here or there, but the North Sea is an army with banners whose march is long and strong, England is being invaded, and where Napoleon faltered God will effect a landing. Ravenspur, once a great seaport, is no more to be found; Auburn and Hyde are where no one can trace them. In Norfolk, one Cromer is gone, the other going; Shipden and Eccles are “as Sodom and Gomorrah”; and Sheppey has lost three hundred yards within the memory of its people. At some points there is now a superstition against burying in the east side of the church toward the sea, so common a sight have out-sticking coffins become. On the west coast, too — in Wales, in Lancashire, at many points — the Atlantic with a still longer and stronger march is pressing to effect a junction with the North Sea, and it is said that in a certain number of years, which to the Eternal is as an hour, ships will reef their sails in a rough mid-sea where the dream of England was. It is not strange if the poor fishers and tillers of the soil upon whom such-like thoughts are daily forced have a certain sigh, a certain sadness of outlook.

CHAPTER XIX

AS TO KATHLEEN, she had all this time been as quiet as a mouse, and was to be found hobbling to church services. The death of Yvonne de Pencharry-Strannik had come upon her as one of those bullying thunder-claps which overawe all men, save heroes. It was with her as when a child touches a hot grate, and touches a grate no more for years. The little maid seems to have been troubled with a doubt whether that death of Yvonne was not in some way owing to her will; it is to be feared that she suspected herself: and at this thing Kathleen gave up Chris Wilson as utterly as Hannah had given him up during those three days between her second marriage and the death of Yvonne: nothing was left in Kathleen but awe of a universe in which there is room for such outbreaks and Gorgons.

But such awes little by little lose their power, and the snail dares to peep out afresh. Kathleen saw Chris Wilson here or there, each time with a renewed feeling of worldliness and enterprise; she began to be bitter again at Hannah's claim upon him, at Hannah's probable hopes and plans; it soon occurred to her that it might be a good thing to make Willie Dawe, Hannah's second "husband," her slave, by keeping him in clover; then she was to be found writing that "Chris is again madly in love, this time not with a woman, but with a dream: she calls herself 'Viola,' he has never seen her, but she has promised to see him some day, bearing in her hand some marvelous present which is to outweigh all the great diamonds! So he told me last night in the lobby of the Opera. What a boy! His romantic fancy dresses her in the rainbow. The correspondence has been going on some two years now, all about music, art, life, love. ‘She inspires me,’ he told me, ‘guides me, loves me, and in the oddest way knows all about me, Kathleen. Her letters are the very genius of good sense, and yet contain the essence of a certain materialistic mysticism which I can’t tell you of. Moreover, she is the very spirit of Woman, and always somehow about me: sometimes she knows how many glasses of absinthe I take at the cafe, and the next day writes to tell me of it. Yet I never see her; but I soon shall, for she has promised it.’ All cloud, cloud. Who can it be? Some Austrian landgräfin or Russian princess, old, no doubt, and hideous: she won’t send him her photograph — wise woman. I don’t see why I should be so haunted and agitated by it; but it is such a pang to be jealous of the unknown. He is so interested, that the quixote actually keeps copies of some of his own letters. After a lot of praying he consented to let me peep at the packet; he has it in the rue de Rome, and I am to go this afternoon at five....”

“It was well conceived, Hannah,” Kathleen wrote three days later, “but your patience has done for you, you have waited too long. If she had come to Chris, saying, ‘I am Viola,’ may be on the sudden he would have fallen to her; but if I tell him casually one day, ‘Viola’ is only Hannah,’ that’s another matter, the spell will be broken. After all, ‘Lady Wilson’ is an inappropriate name for Farmer Langler’s daughter, with all her talents. I have read the letters; Chris allowed me to bring them to the hotel for two days, read a few of them aloud to me himself: he is gone just daft over ‘Viola.’ Who on earth taught Hannah Langler to write letters? One must admit that she has a calm, strong brain, and some grace in writing which has grown with practice: four or five of the letters are worthy of George Sand, and two or three of Madame de Sevigny. I wonder that she ventured to write them in her own hand! Her second marriage letter was typewritten, but I suppose she thought it too much trouble to get these typewritten, and risked it. Oh, if I had her calm audacity! I am bold, too, but only in white-hot fits, and then all too bold, perhaps, little hunch. Chris must have seen her handwriting somewhere, if only in Orrock church, but, of course, forgot it. He provokes me with his simplicity, men have no wits. The moment I saw the writing I felt almost certain, and soon I came across this bit: ‘I know a countryman named Butt, who, sitting still in a place where every one was dancing, was asked by a certain squire, “Well, why don’t you dance, Butt?” “Lord bless us all, squire,” answered Butt, “if a man can’t jig, he can’t jig.” So ever since he goes by the name of Jig-Butt. Well, the same with fiddling: if a gel can’t scrape, she can’t scrape.’ Then, of course, I knew my Hannah: who else on earth but Lady Wilson cares what name Mr. Butt of Orrock goes by? She is essentially ‘of the people,’ but has got some finesse by dint of willing.

“I have spent two days over the letters, which would fill a volume, and it is to be hoped that Chris has been edified. She writes with enough aplomb! ‘I under-stand that you have a tendency to give up practise now, and are taking to a mute, and though I repeat to myself that you must know better than I can what you are about, I have searchings of heart as to this. Consider if it is well, beloved. In the sort of feverish life which you lead “the inner life” becomes doubly precious? . . . When thou hast entered into thy closet, pray: for “working is praying,” even when it is playing.... I myself am living a full, robustious life just now, and sometimes, after some sleep, can only just keep my feet from dancing all over the place. The last time I ran over to France, just to see your face, I did not once sleep for ninety-six hours afterwards, and some days, having only time for one meal, I carry pastry in my pocket, so whenever my envelopes reach you greasy you will know from what pit they have been drawn.’ Three whole letters are a discussion of the meaning of ‘virtue’! She had written ‘ladylike arid unvirtuous,’ and,

Chris not agreeing, she answers: 'I have been hunting down "virtue" today, and find that the Greek is from ar, a male, and in Latin the same, from vir, a male. So virtue means vigor? In which ease Tannhauser was merely unwell? and the Venusberg a slum? Virtue is health of mind? health is virtue of body? A burglar is in the room of a sleeping saint: which of the two is the more virtuous? the burglar? for "virtue," "vigor," "health," "life," "joy" are all one? You can choose any one of them you like, and throw the rest out of the dictionary.' If she had her way, not many words would be left in the dictionary, apparently: she wants 'art' to go, and elsewhere 'spirit.' 'God is a spirit,' she says, 'but what is a spirit? don't know, so look in the dictionary, and find that the people who wrote it had no idea either. As applied to Alicante wine, I know well what it means: and you, perhaps? But otherwise, it has no right to be about, since we don't mean anything when we say it, but thinking that we do, trick ourselves.' Her cocksure tone of 'having authority'! I wonder that it never occurred to me to enter into such a correspondence with Chris: I could have done it just like her, or better. Her phrases are, 'be ye therefore perfect,' and 'that ye may have life, and have it more abundantly'; twenty, thirty times these recur, her 'life' meaning mere 'health': au fond she is a materialist. Some of her little bits are not bad: 'The first duty of a modern man is to be modern, the second is to be modest, to know himself primeval, and feel the romance of Time'; 'health, like wealth, is the product of daily industry: happiness consists in martyrdom, torture, athletics, physical and mental; but oh, how easy is this yoke, and how joyfully light this burden!' 'I have found out that the "ma" of little children really means "food," but as food comes from mother, "ma" soon gets to mean mother'; 'health, I take it, isn't the mere absence of discomfort and sin — that's only a first step up Snowdon and Mont Blanc — but a choky lump of worship inside, tears in the eyes, and laughter all down below'; 'in the present stage of things there are existing together ape, underman, man, and over-man: the product of the extremes is equal to the product of the means'; 'a quick memory, and a certain two-eyed faculty, meaning the power of seeing one thing through the right eye at the same moment as one sees another through the left eye — a question of athletics — these, I think, are the makings of the saint, of the superhuman and divine man'; 'the most important part of the body is the soul'; 'I went to see Sandow perform last night: to me he is a true saint and holy one, or at least a true half-saint; if he were as good a Christian as he is an athlete, meaning that if he kept his nerve-matter, or soul, in as good form as he keeps his muscle-matter, he would be about four times greater than all the martyrs, seers, and prophets'; 'was Shakespeare Bacon? Bacon and more! Say Bacon plus Ham: and hence was the father of the little Hamlet;' I find that my head is a magnet, though a feeble one: if I put an iron hairpin gently on my forehead, it sticks, even when I turn the forehead downward'; 'athletics is about the most effectual form of prayer: the answer hardly ever fails'; 'a moral man would live two hundred years without a hole in his teeth'; 'the higher the animal the longer his life: some animals only live a few seconds; man will be living hundreds of years a little later on'; "'purity of heart" is a hearty preoccupation with hard fact, and impurity a preoccupation with soft delusion: most nuns and nurses are impure in heart, often preoccupied with "the world," though pure in life, while the poor Magdalens of the streets are pure in heart, preoccupied with the pretty hard fact of board-and-lodging, though impure in life'; 'I think, dear, that the air which we breathe is full of sparks of life and of the Holy Ghost: people lying dead are only dead because they can't breathe it, while most living people about are only half alive because they only half-breathe it'; 'when you have walked a long way, and begin to feel tired, give yourself a rest by running'; 'how excellent to be perfect! how perfect to be excellent!’ ‘to be happy every morning, and to attain to joy every afternoon, isn’t this the whole duty of man?’ ‘I am a great one for conscription, not, of course, the conscription which teaches people to kill, but one which would teach athletics; why the Governments don’t at least wash and drill each of its citizens, male and female, every morning, it is hard to say: even the horrid Continental conscription seems better than none at all’ — and so on. She sent Chris a Stainer tenor, I don’t know where she got the money to buy it, and Chris promptly replied by sending her — his Nicolo. After this, ‘Dear Chris Wilson’ suddenly changes into ‘Beloved,’ and ‘Dear Viola’ becomes ‘Adored’ and ‘Darling Viola.’ But all the thanks he got for his Nicolo was an elaborate eulogy of Mittenwald at the expense of Cremona: ‘There is something so much more Dorian in the mood of a Stainer than in all the Bergonzis, Storionis, and later Cremonese, to say nothing of the earlier. Plato would have played a Stainer, they are so wide-awake and virtuous, like Highland troops on the march with all the flags, drums, and bagpipes going; I’d rather even a Barak Norman or a Klotz than a Nicolo, though I love my Nicolo, since some of your passion still trembles in the sound-post? Last week, however, I came across a grand pattern Strad in a bishop’s house, and must admit myself fascinated; I cuddled the golden belly against my cheek; played from ‘Walküre,” and “Joy, O Joy!” When the finger-tips just brood over the strings, an electric thrill burns between, as with meeting lips, and the whole thing hums like a dizzy brain. I noticed, as you say, one of the??’s a thought lower than the other, and now have my own theory as to that.’ . . . ‘I find myself in communion with you,’ from Chris in answer, ‘in a transcendent way; I am but little a mystic, and do not know the ways of the spirit; but you are certainly, as it were, my wife, and with me; just now, in playing for my amusement “Du bist die Ruh,” I had an intimate sense of your womanhood and of your presence, like a vision. That will be interesting to have you accompany me on the piano: I am curious to know what will be the emotional outcome. I have a notion that still higher achievements in sensation will be mine when you are at my side. But how long? I invite you to be good to our youth.’ ‘It won’t be long now,’ is her answer, ‘it would have been sooner, if so many ties didn’t bind me here; I am like Gulliver bound — the threads can be snapped, but then the little ones would be hurt. Others, however, are being prepared to fill my place, and very soon I shall leave all to follow you.... You are my business in life and one thing needful.... Some women in my place would have a blue fright that you would unlove them at first sight: not I. I shan’t breathe any the quicker when we meet, but shall come carelessly into my own somehow, like blind kittens born into they don’t quite know what age or nook of the universe, but understanding that it is into their proper planet, to their own mother, and that they have a right to make a noise, and be kittenish . . . In my hand no price I shall bring, what I bring will be priceless, and brought not in the way of purchase-money, but as free gift; and in my face you will see the eyes of a friend: for no less than this, I believe, will be my pride when I shall come to review my life, that I, though a woman, was capable of friendship. “The ordinary sufficiency of women,” says old Florio, “cannot answer this conference, the nurse of this sacred bond, nor seem their minds strong enough to endure the pulling of a knot so hard, so fast, and durable, and this sex could never yet by any example attain unto it”; and he says: “So many parts are required to the erecting of such a friendship, that it may be accounted a wonder if fortune once in three ages contract the like. It is a great and strange wonder, for a man to double himself, their mutual agreement being no other than one soul in two bodies, according to the definition of Aristotle; they can neither lend nor give out to each other; and each doth as wholly give himself unto his friend, that he hath nothing left him to divide elsewhere, and is grieved that he is not double, and hath not many souls, that he might confer them all upon this object.” As for Viola, when she had only heard your name, before ever she had seen you, her heart quickened with friendliness, and was qualmish and fain for the altar of sacrifice. You speak of me as your “wife”? Truly, I am that: but if I were no nearer you, you should never see Viola.’

“It is a mercy,” continues Kathleen, “that I didn’t tell Chris who ‘Viola’ is, for a sentence in one of his letters to her has become an awful temptation to me. He says: ‘That will be interesting to have you accompany me on the piano;’ he feels that ‘Viola’ will do it well, but he already knows that I do, and there is no reason why he shouldn’t be made to think that I am ‘Viola.’ Only, my heart beats too madly at the mere thought: I could never do it for that reason alone. But since he knows my handwriting, I could hint that I naturally got some one to copy the letters out for me. I should come in for some at least of Viola’s spoils. All is fair in love, in war, and in everything. Not that it is pretty: but to be rich one must steal; all rich men are thieves, and all poor ones are would-be thieves. We are as alike as peas, the whole mass of pudding. Honesty is only a form of snobbishness, a means of looking down in turn upon one’s richer neighbors who look down upon one. Still, one goes horrid, really, if one does such things, one gets worse and weaker, till some day one does something ineffably outrageous. I hope I am not going to do this thing. And could I? It would be horribly dangerous for many, many reasons! Hannah will soon be coming to Chris with his child’s hand in hers; if the child is at all like him, she won’t need the proofs buried in St. Peter’s churchyard; even if the child is not like, Chris won’t doubt her word when she has once explained her motive for marrying Willie Dawe. But mightn’t I poison Chris’s mind against her in advance by making Willie Dawe tell Chris that the child is his, Willie's? Many things occur to me now, many; my head is rank with fraud; and something is going to come of it, for they haven't any right to tempt me, and make me mad. "Chris will be in England within a month," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XX

IT WAS, INDEED, just a month after this that the little maid drove one night from the Savoy Hotel, where she was staying, to Gray's Inn with a young man beside her, to whom she said on the way, "Well, you are looking quite smart and prosperous: have you a house of your own now?"

"Thank you, miss, I've taken the house in Camden Town," said Willie Dawe, a lank fellow, with a loose mouth.

"And I suppose you are not so foolish as to do any work now?"

"Thank you, no, miss; I'm taking it easy just for the present, thanks to you."

"Having a good time?"

"Thank you, miss, pretty fair, thank you."

"Well, you are a lucky fellow: it is only because I have known your mother so long on the estate. That's why. If I were you, I should thoroughly enjoy myself while I could, for suppose I were to die or anything, what would become of you? You could never go back to the old workaday life, after tasting ease and pleasure."

"Thank you kindly, miss, thank you," said Willie Dawe.

"But you could have been twice as well off, if you had followed my hints: for she would have been compelled to give you as much as you chose to ask for."

"Thank you, miss, I didn't quite like to do that, miss," said Willie Dawe with a blush.

"I don't see why not."

“I don’t fancy she has so over-much for herself, miss, begging your pardon.”

“Her father is a large farmer, with plenty of money laid by. But you are fond of her, Willie.”

“I, miss? fond of her! Not me, I’ll swear.”

“You are. You like her better than me for saving you that time from the sea.”

“No, miss, no, I tell you; don’t talk of that, miss, please, begging your pardon.”

“She only did it to show off her physical powers. She cared nothing about you.”

“No, miss, thank you.”

“Have you never once seen her since I came across you? Are you sure?”

“Miss Hannah, miss? Not I, miss!”

“I have told you not to call her ‘Miss Hannah’: say ‘my wife’; it is only the truth: you married her; she is your wife, and the mother of your child.”

“Well, miss, since you say so.”

“Didn’t you admit as much to me yesterday?”

“I did, yes, miss, in a way, thank you.”

“Well, all you have to do is to repeat the same tale to the gentleman. Don’t be abject before him, he can’t bite you. Just show the certificate, say all that I have suggested, and claim your rights as a father and husband. By the way, I have thought that you would like to see Paris, and am giving you an extra thirty pounds to-night: Paris is an awfully gay place. Oh, here we are.”

The carriage drew up in Gray’s Inn, where Chris Wilson still stuck to his old chambers. Kathleen and her companion, both of them pale and trembling, went up, were let in by Grimani, and went into the room where Chris was; Chris was half a minute before he could tear himself from his desk, then leapt up and rushed, with a murmur of “My own dear friend,” to Kathleen’s hand.

“Is that a letter to ‘Viola,’ Chris?” asked Kathleen, showing her pretty teeth in a nervous laugh; “you were so deep in it—”

He gave some little nods, meaning “yes.”

“This is the young man whom you are expecting, if you haven’t forgotten my letter,” said Kathleen. “I am afraid he has a grievance against you, and has brought it all to me. I have known him since I was a child; he is one of your own Orrock subjects, so I felt bound to be interested.”

“What have I done?” asked Chris meekly.

“You know that this is the — husband — of some one?”

“So you wrote to say.”

“Well, some busybody has been filling him with the notion that you intend to claim the child as your own.”

“I didn’t know that you had a child, my friend,” said Chris gently to Willie Dawe.

“Now, Willie Dawe, are you satisfied?” asked Kathleen. “I told you that Sir Chris probably knew nothing whatever of the matter.”

There was silence.

“What made her have him?” asked Chris, more with his eyes than his lips.

“Tell Sir Chris everything,” said Kathleen.

“I and my wife grew up neck and neck together down at Orrock, sir, begging your pardon,” said Willie Dawe, trying to remember what he had been told to say.

“But it is an incredible thing!” said Chris, his arms akimbo, looking down with disgust at Dawe, who was sitting at the last edge of a chair.

“Show Sir Chris the copy of the certificate,” said Kathleen.

“But have I not already seen one?” asked Chris: “spare yourself the pains, my friend.”

“The affair took place at the Clerkenwell Town hall, sir,” said Dawe, his eye-corners ever wandering round to where Kathleen sat.

“Let it be so,” answered Chris: “I don’t at all question the formality of your proceedings. One only hopes that you never play at cards, for certainly you are most lucky in love. Have you only one child?”

“Yes, sir.”

“A boy? a girl?”

Dawe did not know! His eyes swam round to Kathleen.

“A boy,” said Kathleen quickly at a venture, flushing.

“How old?” asked Chris.

“About — four years, sir.”

“But don’t be agitated. I have no thought of taking your little one from you; it is true that I once went through the marriage ceremony with your wife, but we parted the same evening, and I have never seen her since. Her son can’t be mine. I don’t know why you are agitated.”

“It isn’t that, sir, it isn’t that, begging your pardon,” said the unfortunate Willie.

“Why did she marry you, my friend?” asked Chris.

“My wife and I grew up neck and neck together, sir,” repeated Willie, with an eye on Kathleen.

“And still you are neck and neck under the same yoke. That is idyllic! though in the books of Moses it is forbidden to yoke the ox and the ass together. But did you dare to marry her, knowing that her first husband was alive? or did you believe that he was dead?”

“She told me—”

“Well?”

“That you were dead, sir.”

“She?”

“Yes, sir, and that she — wor — glad of it.”

“But the fellow is a traitor and a liar,” muttered Chris with a flushed forehead. “Go away now, go, go,” and he brushed Willie Dawe away with motions of his hands, following and brushing him out.

When he returned Kathleen was alone, with him, except for Grimani in another room, but the little maid showed no haste to go away, as would have been only proper. It was after eleven in the night.

“I hope you did not want him to stay for any reason, Kathleen,” said Chris; “he became intolerable.”

“It is all right,” said Kathleen. “I thought it would be a curiosity to you to see him, so brought him.”

“But I am grieved to the heart! How is one to explain to oneself this grotesque and beastly marriage, like Brunnhilda marrying Ghunter of her own accord? It can’t be the same Hannah Wilson whose pure eyes I knew — For that matter, ‘Hannah Wilson’ is a common name in England: why may not this man’s wife be another Hannah Wilson?”

“No, Chris,” said Kathleen, “don’t let us delude ourselves with any such hope: it is the same Hannah. Even Lucifer went wrong, and Hannah has gone so very far wrong, that even her parents and I are not permitted to know her true address.”

“Can all this be my fault?” asked Chris with opened arms.

“Why, what do you mean?”

“I was a mere boy then,” Chris muttered. “The good people should not have caused me to marry. God grant that it is in no way my fault.”

“Oh, Chris, how can it be your fault? People go their own way and nothing can stop them. And perhaps she is as happy in her sty as you in your heaven. Well, I suppose I ought to go now, and leave you to your ‘Viola.’ I dare say in your heart you are wishing me to the dickens.”

“Mmm, my own friend,” groaned Chris. “Grimani! — let me offer you a glass—”

“No, thanks, no wine: it is all right, Grimani. Continue your letter to darling Viola. Can I have a peep, I wonder, at this last one?”

Chris shook his curls, with a smile.

“I shall see it all the same,” said Kathleen suddenly: for though she had finally made up her mind not to pass herself off as “Viola,” the little maid now on a sudden yielded to the temptation, blind to all the hundred risks and difficulties of tomorrow, her mind in the presence of Chris was always in such a state of flurry and weakness.

“How will you ‘see it all the same’?” asked Chris.

“Never mind, I will,” answered Kathleen, looking up at him with a pale smile.

“But I don’t mean to keep any copy,” said Chris.

“I shall still see it.”

Chris looked at her, and said eagerly:

“Kathleen! do you know Viola?”

Kathleen smiled mysteriously, without answering.

“Do you know her? Tell me, my friend!”

“I know her very well; and so do you.”

“I have seen her?”

“Oh, Chris, how unconscious you are! She is nearer, much nearer to you at this moment than you dream; the girl who is nearest to you, now and always, is she.”

At these words Chris stood in pain: her meaning seemed plain; he was not given to doubting the words of women; and all at once he saw melting that whole cloud-cuckoo-town which the word "Viola" meant to his fancy. He could not speak, but stood looking at Kathleen in a pathetic way.

"Chris, are you sorry?" she asked, standing up, putting her poor trembling hand on his shoulder.

"No," answered Chris: "are you Viola?"

"I hoped in that way to show you — to win you," said Kathleen with pantings and passion, "and I have succeeded; if you don't take me now, the reason will be clear, you will insult me, you will be a brute without pity. I have not loved you as a man, but as a god above all Gods, for years and years; have pity—"

"Kathleen — my dear friend—"

"For years and years, mind you, Chris! I have dragged my soul through ignominy after you! Re-member that! But I will be a slave no longer; to-night — this very night—"

At this she fastened her lips to his; he, somehow, wished to get free: and at his effort, the little maid threw back her head, and piled scream on scream. Grimani ran in and bore her to a sofa, where she continued to utter screams and sobs and laughter, while Chris darted about in a flurry, seeking he knew not what. They had only liqueurs to give her, her furs and hat were taken off, her forehead sprinkled with water, and a doctor sent for; but before he could come she had got somewhat better, and while still in shameful agitation insisted upon being taken to her carriage. Chris parted from her with the words: "I will write to you."

When he went up again, he stood for a long time with his forehead resting on the mantelpiece; then, noticing the letter which he had been writing to “Viola,” tore it slowly into two pieces, which he threw upon the fire; then sat and wrote to Kathleen.

At that same hour Hannah’s other husband, Willie Dawe, was lurking in Guilford Street at a corner of the Foundling wall, hugging himself for cold, but watching without a movement a certain window which he oftentimes liked to come and watch. It was now after one o’clock, some snow was falling, the night murky, and no one to be seen, save a policeman, whose tread came and went like echoes in desolate Balclutha.

A faint light was in that second floor window which Daw watched. Behind it lay Hannah, sleeping, but hardly undressed, with a sick girl-child of the lowest class asleep on her arm. For some time nothing happened: Dawe shivered and watched, Hannah slept, the policeman strolled; but soon after the Foundling clock struck two a poor woman came hurrying southward, passed by Dawe, went to the house of the lighted window, and rang a bell which was so strung as to ring in Hannah’s room. At its first tinkle, Hannah was awake and up, settled the sick child comfortably, had on her boots in a jiffy, cast a glance at her little son in his cot, caught up a stethoscope, and ran down the stair, still dressing herself in her flight. Dawe guessed that the bell rung was hers, that she would presently appear in the street, and ran to hide himself: but he had hardly time to do this when she was down and hurrying northward into Brunswick Square with the poor woman. He followed some way, peering after her through the murk and snowfall, and presently saw that she had left the woman behind, and was running forward alone. Swift and happy feet, running to do well.

CHAPTER XXI

THE KIND OF night which the little maid passed after that scene with Chris may be guessed. She saw, for one thing, that she had put herself into a fine fix in pretending to be “Viola,” since the real “Viola” would soon be writing again to Chris, without saying a word about the scene! Miss Olivia and a maid watched through the night by her bed, each holding one of her quaking arms.

And the morning’s post only made things worse! Chris wrote, blaming himself for what had passed, and inviting himself to Kathleen’s suite at the hotel on the second evening thence, “in order that my dear friend Kathleen and I may better understand each other.” “Never shall I cease to remember ‘Viola,’” he wrote, “nor all the fresh flowers which you have sent me during two years in your charming letters.” All this was well enough, but in a postscript he added: “Shall we not have some music? My Bergonzi and your Nicolo will make our evening complete.”

He meant the Nicolo which he had presented to “Viola”! innocently meant it, but the little maid at once had the guilty feeling that he did it in order to test whether she was really “Viola”! and she was now, as it were, in fire. To tell Chris that she had not the Nicolo with her would, she felt, be most lame; nor are Nicolos to be got like hairpins; even if she could buy one, Chris would know it from his own at first sight, at the first note. She felt that she would gladly part with all things in life to have “Viola’s” Nicolo for two days.

Her first thought was to hasten to Hannah, and, somehow, to get the Nicolo; but she did not know where Hannah lived.

She had often asked Willie Dawe for Hannah's address, but Dawe had protested that he did not know it. That, however, was her only hope now, that Dawe had told a falsehood in some wish to keep Hannah's secret. And by eleven the brave girl had overcome her breakdown, and had had Dawe brought to her.

"I don't know where Miss Hannah is, miss," answered Dawe many times.

"Well, it is a pity for you," Kathleen answered, "for I have made up my mind to give you nothing more unless you can find out for me before mid-day."

Beads of sweat stood on Dawe's forehead; after some time he said that he knew where Miss Hannah used to live —

"That will do," said Kathleen; and Dawe then gave Hannah's address.

So by two in the afternoon Miss Olivia was at Hannah's door, Kathleen waiting in her carriage round the corner of Guilford Place. But "Mrs. Wilson" was not in.

"When will she be in?" asked Miss Olivia.

"Ah, now you are asking something puzzling," said Mrs. Reid, the landlady.

"I will call back about four."

"What name shall I say?"

"Well, perhaps I should prefer to surprise her: we are friends."

Miss Olivia came back to see Hannah three times that day before nine p. m., but always in vain.

By that hour Kathleen was in a high-wrought state, and had to be put to bed. But when it was near midnight, nothing would satisfy her but she must get up, and go to see if Hannah was in. Miss Olivia was asleep after her sleepless last night; and the little maid dressed and went out in a kind of stealth.

At Hannah's door she alighted from her cab. But her heart failed her when her hand was on the knocker. What should she say to Hannah? How explain her knowledge of Hannah's address? Hannah would think her wondrously eager to have the Nicolo, springing up at that hour of the night to borrow it! Would Hannah lend the precious gift? All these painful questions passed through the little head. There she stood, with a cowering heart, unable to knock, unable to go away. The door was a little open, as often in that kind of Bloomsbury caravansary, and she was peeping in when the sight of a man coming in the passage sent her skedaddling. He came out, slammed the door, and went his way. Kathleen now stood on the further side of the street under the Foundling wall, and thence watched the house. A light was in a window of the second floor, on which, as Dawe had told her, Hannah's rooms were, and her heart stopped to see on the blind a shadow like Hannah's: it was gone in a moment, came again, and was gone, flitting actively about. The quaint maid's soul was thrown forth of herself upon that window, as when on Hannah's wedding night she had watched the bride's windows at Orrock. For a minute or two the shadow was no more seen: then Kathleen was aware of Hannah herself down at the front door. Hannah came out, slammed the door behind her, and started northward into Brunswick Square, her face bent down, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left, almost running; her nurse's uniform could be heard brabbling in the north wind; she hardly left Kathleen time to run to hide under the tree-shaded west wall of the Foundling, when, on the other side of the street, she hastened past into the square. Kathleen had come to see her, and there she was, quite near, but the little maid dared not speak to her.

Hannah gone, the little maid went back a few yards to her former stand, and again watched the window. Though robed in layers of fur to her feet, she began to suffer from cold, for those were frosty days, the pavements were caked in snow and ice, and a half-moon in the clear sky looked like a traveler lost in a cold waste.

But still Kathleen stood where she was, doubly fascinated by the window now that Hannah was gone. Her eyes wandered between it and the front door. The door was now fastened, but it was not long before a girl came out with a jug, and ran to a near beer-house — in haste, for it was just when the beer-houses are shut up; she left the front door open, and Kathleen ran to it.

The trouble of her heart was great, for whichever way things might go, she foresaw shame: if she took the Nicolo from Hannah's room, the real 'Viola' might write to tell Chris of its loss! But her keenest care was the meeting with Chris on the coming evening, and leaving the further future to take care of itself, she hastened in. The passage was lit, but the stairs in darkness, save for a tin lamp on a window-ledge over the first landing. She met no one. On the second landing were two front rooms: that on the left was the lighted one; in the other, a smaller one, Hannah's nurse-girl slept. Kathleen tapped at the door on the left; there was no answer; she went in, and closed the door behind her without making a sound.

Her next task was to get her breath: the little mass of furs stood swelling and sinking, amazed to find itself there. Round she cast her eyes: the bed was rumpled, the gas turned down, a fire burning, and there on an easy-chair by the fire lay the pampered Nicolo, a soft silk handkerchief covering the strings. But the little maid's eyes were fixed on quite another sight now than the Nicolo — on Hannah's little boy asleep with flushed cheeks. He had golden hair, fairer than both his father and his mother. "He looked like a faint water-color of an angel," Kathleen wrote of him long afterwards: "I didn't know before that flesh could be so ravishingly lovely; yet the image of Chris." She stood a strangely long time, staring at the child in its cot, forgetting the Nicolo; and her face took on a look truly elfin, wannish, as it were of Mephisto or of Erl-king with sword and crown, one of her eyebrows pitched up beyond the other. Strange temptations, forecastings, wrought in her quick mind then, yet, as it were, in a dream, and all that she went on to do was in sleep-walking; for by living waywardly a long while the little maid seems to have reared up now within herself a second creature which in high moments arose, pushed her aside, and acted instead of her.

There was no fear of not being able to get the child down to the door without being seen: that could be done; the danger lay in his awaking on the way, and screaming! In the end, she turned the gas very low, threw her muff on the fire, took off her fur cloak, and with endless cares got it under the child; his clothes lay folded on a chair; she put them on his breast, his boots and socks into her pockets; on his clothes she laid the Nicolo with its slackened bow; and wrapping all in the fur, got the bundle in her arms. It was no slight burden for her, the child being nearly four years old! But that second Frankenstein self which was doing all for her was strong, and, in spite of stoppages on the stairs, the child was hardly shaken. But it was a journey! She seemed to be bearing a horse — with the eyes of multitudes upon her — during an age. But she met no one. Down in the hall she had to put down the burden on a table, run to open the door, and run back for the bundle — all in bright gaslight. But, like the defaulting lodgers who steal out trunks from such like places, she got out safely.

She hobbled toward Russell Square, and there was another waiting for a cab — another age in which she grew old. She met four people, but they took no notice of her bundle, the child was so hidden in the fur. When at last she was putting him into a cab, the little boy awoke, stared at her strange face, and began to cry. But all was well then.

She told her driver to drive to Hampstead, and thence drove back southward to the Hotel Metropole, by which time the child was weary of crying, and dressed. She took a suite of rooms; wrote to Miss Olivia at the Savoy Hotel that she would be away most of the next day; and lay all night with her boy in her arms.

Her first care the next morning was to get other clothes for him, to burn his former ones, to hire two good nurses; and she spent the day in bribing her boy to love her, till it was nearly time to go to meet Chris at her suite in the Savoy Hotel, when she set out with the Nicolo in a new case, leaving her boy with his new nurses....

CHAPTER XXII

“DON’T LET US try to talk here, Chris,” said the little maid that night in her Savoy Hotel salon; “there is something to be said between you and me, but it can’t be said in this garish place, with five of my enemies amiably bivouacked about us. If you can make time for me tomorrow evening before dinner, I shall come to you.”

“I am in your hands,” said Chris. “I shall try to be disengaged, but perhaps—”

“Oh, there is nothing outre in my going now to your place alone, and you have no fresh scene to dread from me. Our meeting will be too serious for that. In a wild moment I let out before the time who wrote the ‘Viola’ letters, but tomorrow I shall come more seriously to you as ‘Viola,’ bringing with me the precious gift which ‘Viola’ promised.”

“My own friend,” answered Chris with compunction, “it is I who should be bringing you precious gifts for your goodness—”

“No, I; but we won’t talk of it now: let’s play the Prometheus now, as you promised. Come, Olivia.”

With the Bergonzi and the Nicolo they played a two-fiddle overture, the maestro saying afterwards to Kathleen, “Your virtuosity is no less refined on the violin than on the piano”; he was eager to please her, for the fact of her quaint body and of her hopeless passion touched his heart; but the interview of the coming evening was most irksome to him beforehand, though his curiosity was stirred at the wonderful gift to be given him. However, he made up his mind to go through it with a good grace, and then, his London concerts being over, to fly from the quaint maid and from England.

But when Kathleen appeared before him at six the next evening, Chris uttered a cry and rushed with a murmur to embrace the boy whom she led by the hand, the boy was such a pretty picture in his sailor dress.

“Have I seen him before, Kathleen?” he asked.

“No.”

“How delicious a being! How dainty a traumbild of color! This is Eros himself, and his mother’s limbs could have sprung only from the sea-foam: cluck, cluck, kiss me.”

Chris sat on a sofa with the sulky boy on his knee, while Kathleen, sitting near in an armchair, said to her boy, “Tell us your name, will you?”

The answer “Chris” was got out of him after some coaxing.

“Chris!” cried out Chris the elder.

“And whom are you like, Chris?” asked Kathleen: “like this gentleman?”

The boy did not answer; Chris looked into his face with growing astonishment, for the likeness was indeed striking; then looked from the boy to Kathleen.

“This is the present which ‘Viola’ promised to bring in her hand, Chris,” said Kathleen, “and now she has brought it. Is it truly priceless? Are you fully satisfied?”

“A present! May I have the boy?”

“Yes, if you have the heart to take him from me.”

“But I am so wholly at a disadvantage, you see! Who are the parents of this wonderful child?”

“Can you not see your own image in him? Whose child should I bring you as a present but your own, Chris?”

Chris was pierced with laughter.

“My own?” he cried: “is this boy a son of mine?”

“Yes, Chris.”

“But are you certain, my friend?”

“Chris, can’t you see?”

“Oh, how splendid! He does, he does resemble me, if the celestials can resemble the autochthones. He is indeed my very self: what, can you play the fiddle, lad? You soon will, I can see: look, Kathleen, a blind man could tell that he has music in the breadth between the ears, blessed darling, kiss, kiss. But, Kathleen, are you quite sure? I must confess that you surprise me. Why have I never heard of his existence before? Who, then, is his divine — mother?”

“Chris, can you not guess that even now?”

“I declare I have no idea!” cried Chris staring, with one twinge of laughter; “let it suffice that he is mine, my own image and likeness! My own dear ‘Viola,’ you have indeed more than fulfilled your promise! But where, then, is his — mother?”

Kathleen moved shyly on her seat, and turned away her face.

“Tell me!” said Chris.

A blush overspread the face of the little maid, making her younger and prettier.

“Think whom he resembles, Chris, beside yourself,” she just murmured.

“I — have no idea!” said Chris at a loss. “Is it the Baroness Vescz — ? No, I am foolish.”

“No, not she,” murmured Kathleen, her blush deepening to red, as she added, “Is he not like me — a little — about the eyes?”

“Mmm, my own best friend,” groaned Chris, who, leaning forward, had just caught the little maid’s words, “yes — about the eyes — since you say so — he does distinctly resemble you.”

“Well, then.”

“But—”

“Don’t press me, Chris: I am only a girl.”

“Oh, but tears! — don’t cry, don’t cry. Forgive me: I don’t understand — I am so utterly at a loss—”

“Who but his mother could have brought him to you?” asked Kathleen through sobs, with a covered face, whereat Chris, though half-crying for sympathy, again had a throe of laughter.

“But don’t cry,” he said: “it is all right, I don’t know why you cry; at present you speak of a mystery, but all will presently be made clear.”

“He is yours and mine.”

“Quite so: don’t cry, don’t cry.”

“You don’t believe me, but it is true.”

“Well, I am most flattered: don’t cry.”

“You think me crazy, but did you never suspect that—”

“Well?”

“That I am—”

“What?”

“A little mother, Chris?”

“I didn’t know. It is the very highest dignity on earth.”

“It is sweet to be a mother, Chris, yes, it is sweet to the heart, Chris: little did I dream before, but now I know — to have something which is your very, very own, as that boy is mine.”

At this the little maid wept afresh, for for two nights she had been wallowing in the feeling that the boy was, really, her offspring, as little girls are their dolls’ true mothers, and as a hen will think a pheasant-chick truly hers because she has hatched it and it is under her wing.

“Is this divine child yours?” asked the simple, good Chris.

“Yes,” murmured the little maid, weeping quietly, without meaning to tell an untruth.

“I felicitate you from my heart! But—”

“Oh, Chris, don’t doubt my word.”

“If I don’t! I was only going to say—”

“You are his father, Chris: you can see it for yourself.”

“Precisely! But, my own best friend,—”

“Listen, Chris: I am only a girl, and it is hard to say, but it must be said. There is a night of your life which has passed out of your memory. It is the night when you gave your first great London recital, at Queen’s Hall. Try to remember it. After the concert you went to several places with a lot of men, and drank a good deal. I was in love, and followed you in a cab; then I was mad enough to come here, and you let me in.”

“Good God!” murmured Chris under his breath.

“Try to remember,” went on Kathleen: “that same night a burglar somehow entered your rooms, and stole from you a viol di Gamba, your watch and chain, and some other things—”

“I remember,” breathed Chris, with a look of horror.

“And do you remember sleeping till three or four the next afternoon? I was vexed with myself, and left you asleep about two in the afternoon. But I needn’t have been so vexed, for I see now that my only fault was in coming to your door, since something or other that we both drank took away our senses, our memory, and everything. This accounts for the late sleeping the next day.”

“Something that we drank?”

“Yes: isn’t it a fact that Grimani takes hashish?”

“Yes.”

“Well, you won’t remember, but I do, that just about that time you dismissed Grimani, and I have come to the conclusion that Grimani must have put some hashish into your Alicante that day, out of revenge; for I happen to know that he does take hashish, and I have lately found out that the symptoms of hashish are the same as mine and yours that night.”

“Good God, can this have happened?” groaned Chris to himself, with a hopeless brow on his hand.

At this point the unhappy boy, who had wriggled from Chris’ knee to the floor, and had been looking from Chris to Kathleen and from Kathleen to Chris, turned down his mouth, and began to cry, saying, “I want mama.”

“He means his nurse,” remarked the little maid: “come, Chris, to mama, come.”

It was while she was saying this that there was a knock at the front “oak,” and half a minute afterwards Grimani looked in, saying, “Lady Wilson to see you, sir.”

“Who?” asked Chris.

““Lady Wilson,’ she told me, sir.”

“Can it be Hannah?” asked Chris of Kathleen.

“Oh, God!” breathed Kathleen, half rising with a face of terror, “we mustn’t meet.”

“Tell the lady that I am not at home for the moment,” said Chris to Grimani.

“I told her so, sir, but she came inside, and said that she must see you at once.”

Instantly Kathleen caught up the crying child, and ran away with it into Chris’s bedroom.

CHAPTER XXIII

“DIDN’T I HEAR a child crying?” asked Hannah, appearing heatedly before Chris without being asked in (the crying was no more heard, for Kathleen had closed three heavy doors between).

“What do you want?” asked Chris feebly.

“I was almost sure — Was there a child here?”

“Yes; but what is the matter?”

“I thought I recognized — Oh, it is only my silliness,” she sighed, dropping into an easy-chair. “Every child I hear, I think — Bear with me a moment, I am so tired.”

She sat with closed eyes, and Chris stood looking at her with a wrinkled brow.

“I come to you in great trouble,” she said, “all that I had — a good half anyway — My child has been stolen: I come to his father; perhaps you can do something. Tried not to come, but my feet brought me.”

“Do you say that I am his father?” asked Chris, with half a laugh.

“Yes, then.”

Again on a sudden Chris was pierced with laughter, for every one wished to accuse him of fatherhood.

“This is sufficiently barefaced,” he said.

“Oh, well,” she sighed.

“Is it not really so? What can you mean? You wear the livery of an honorable profession.”

“I am quite worn out. Give me a few minutes, then I will tell you. You needn’t be afraid, you will believe everything I say.”

“Well, I hope so. Grimani I — let me get you some wine.”

“Yes, but not Alicante” — her eyes twinkled a little— “I have tasted your Alicante before.”

“But when?”

“Over four years ago, that night of your first recital at Queen’s Hall.”

“What, you, too? Grimani, a glass of — shall we say Chrypre, Muscat?”

“Yes, Muscat, and if you have any biscuits: I haven’t tasted since yesterday.”

“Quickly, Grimani, some mortadel sandwiches.”

“That’s right. He’s gone — somehow — somewhere. I went out night before last at half-past twelve to be at a deathbed; he was gone when I came back, vanished, don’t know how or why: God knows.”

“Your son?”

“Yes.”

“Have you communicated with the police?”

“Of course. No clue. No one to suspect. Oh, my soul is sorrowful unto death, Chris Wilson.

“Never mind, he shall be found for you: don’t cry.”

“Oh, I am not crying, but it’s a nice old wrench, you know, like having your jaw carried away. I was fond of him.”

“Don’t cry, don’t cry: he shall certainly be found for you.”

“You think so? But what will you do? What can you?”

“I can spend money, if that is any good.”

“That’s no good, I’m afraid. If the police can’t find him, no one will. Are you never to see him, I wonder? You would merely have worshiped him: he is the loveliest — and the picture of you, only fairer.”

“Ah?”

“He has your mouth, your eyes, your hands—”

“He might leave me my hands, to practise with.”

“There, he jests. Don’t believe, really? I almost forgot that I hadn’t told you. Well, I feel better now: you shall hear. On the night of your first recital, I came here to you” — she told the whole story of her entrance, of the wine, of the strange drunkenness, of her waking and flight the next afternoon with the viol di Gamba, etc. Chris listened looking out on the Gardens. Having just been hearing the very same tale from Kathleen, he could only assume that one of the two had heard of the escapade from the other, and was an imposter. Both could hardly be true.

“Were you and I alone here that night?” he asked.

“Yes; I didn’t see Grimani.”

“No other lady was here?”

“Lady? Of course not.”

By this time the little maid, who had now quieted the child, and left it in an inner room, was holding her ear at a keyhole, and undergoing the keenest strain of mind at what she heard.

“And as to the viol di Gamba, the watch and chain, and the other things which you took,” said Chris, “do you happen to have any of them with you at present?”

“No; I have lost them.”

“Lost them? Not all of them.”

“Yes.”

“But how?”

“They were stolen out of my trunk, I suppose. For five years I have been trying all the time to find them. No good.”

“So that what was purloined by you was in turn purloined from you?”

“I couldn’t purloin what was my own, you know.”

“No, I forgot: they were your own. But first your ‘proofs’ were stolen, and now the child itself? You are very unfortunate.”

“Yes; but don’t blame me for that.”

“I don’t blame you. But can one be so unfortunate?”

“Oh, there are worse things than that. The big woes happen inside. I’d rather that than a sluggish liver, or a cold heart.”

“Hannah,” murmured Chris, “how excellent you — have been.”

“Chris,” she said, “how flattering you — are.”

“I have the utmost faith in your liver, Hannah — though I think I should prefer a sluggish liver to the loss of my only child.”

“If your liver was sluggish, your very pity and grief would be sluggish, too. It is because mine is rather hot for me alone that I came here for your sympathy.”

“Well, I give you that, if you have lost your child, though I mustn’t pretend that my sorrow is paternal. It is the mother that interests me. I see that you are even more beautifully blooming than ever, and looking charming in that costume.”

“There, he is falling in love now. But not now, my friend, not now. Pity me now.”

“Well, you seem to suffer genuinely. Tell me if you have really lost a child.”

She started, saying gently, “Don’t believe, really?”

“Put yourself in my place,” said Chris in pain, “how can I possibly? It is most distressing. Do you still say that your child is mine also?”

Hannah’s eyes rested upon him, but she answered nothing.

“Don’t you see,” said Chris, “how impossible it looks? How long, for instance, after that night of my recital did you marry a second time?”

“About three months after.”

“And you married another man, knowing — ? You wouldn’t have done that.”

“Oh, Chris, you are cross-examining me.”

“Yes, in your own interests: you have made certain statements to me, and I wish you to know that I am more or less awake, so that you may make no more of the same kind. I don’t know what is your motive for saying such things, but I warn you that they are not credible.”

“Well, blessed are the wounds of a friend, Chris.”

“Yes, it is all very well to speak in that way, but drop the queer statements, and then we can truly be friends. What you say is really not credible: you would hardly have lost the viol and all the other things, and you would most certainly not have married a new man, if you had been about to be a mother. You admit that you did marry the man?”

“Yes: that was merely formal.”

“Now comes yet a new statement, you see, and if it were credible, I should rush gladly into belief. What could have been your motive for a merely formal marriage with this man?”

“I’m afraid I must never tell you that: I am forbidden to whisper it even to my own left hand; but it wasn’t a bad motive.”

“But the left hand knows, Hannah, being the ring hand.”

“Yes, but cynicism always runs a terrible risk of being unkind,” she said with a pout.

“My own dear friend,” said Chris feelingly— “yes, runs a terrible risk of being unkind, but put yourself in my place. For some five, six, seven years perhaps, we have not seen each other; during that time, though I have led a busy life, never a week has passed in which I have not thought of you with tenderness and longed to see you, in spite of your abandonment of me, for I have said to myself, 'Perhaps she abandoned me because I abandoned her.' Imagine, therefore, if I wish to be cynical rather than to be kind. I would give anything. But you suddenly appear before me with a number of statements. At one time, if you had said to me, 'The sky is made of paper,' I should have trusted you. But you admit your second marriage; and suppose I tell you that not four days ago your terrible 'merely formal' husband spoke to me of your child and his?"

"Willie Dawe?"

"I think that that is his name."

Hannah sat over the fire, her chin on her palm, staring.

"My own Willie?" she said presently, "spoke of the child as his?"

"Yes," said Chris with some bitterness.

"I didn't know that he knew that I have a child."

"That is yet a statement."

"They are all pretty true, Chris."

"Granted. But you see why I disbelieve them?"

"No, I don't. I never conceived that you would really doubt me. Let all the world doubt me, but you believe me, Chris."

"What, against my five wits!"

"Yes: I expect that of you."

"By Heaven, you will either drive me mad, or force me to press you to my heart. I love you, if only for your audacity."

"Believe me first, and press me to your heart after, my friend."

"It would be a costly embrace! bought at the expense of my reason."

"Never mind about reason: believe in Hannah."

"I — almost do!" laughed Chris, with opened arms.

"That's brave: make one rough effort against yourself, and then you will."

“You have the very accent and face of truth!”

“There, he’s coming round,” said Hannah, laughing with pleasure: “I shall soon have you all straight now.”

“Do you laugh at my simplicity?” asked Chris.

“No, I laugh for joy because we know each other inside like brothers, and our friendship is sealed up above forever. Everything proves me a liar, and yet you believe me.”

“But I don’t!”

“You do inside — you soon will: keep looking into my eyes, and, the moment you believe, you can kiss me, and be friends.”

“Have I a longing look?”

“Oh, one can see that you are hankering to regain possession: let’s be frank.”

“‘De Vaudace, et encore de Vaudace, et toujours de Vaudace,’”murmured Chris, smiling icily.

“Ah, now, that’s backsliding. No, I’d better go, since you are in this mood. You shan’t see me again for another year” — she sprang up so sharply, that Chris was taken aback.

“Are you going?” he asked rather ruefully: “in another year we shall both be older.” He was ever a miser of his youth.

“Oh, not I!” laughed Hannah, “there’s no need for anybody to grow a day older”; then, with a fickle change of face, looking upward with triumph, she said: ‘They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their youth: they shall mount up with wings as eagles. Good-by!’ she offered her right hand sharply, covering her moist eyes with the left.

“Mmm,” groaned Chris, “don’t cry,” and wished to come near to her, but she caught away her hand from him, and slipped away round the table, saying, “No, believe first.”

“I do, I do,” he said with a flushed face.

“Fully?”

“Yes.”

“There, I have won him!” running to him and kissing him— “and only by a trick” — kissing him— “a fiddler can’t stand tears, even half-crocodile ones” — kissing him.

“Amazing chameleon,” murmured Chris, kissing her, “have you tricked me?”

“Oh, no more backsliding,” said Hannah, dropping again with a fickle change and sigh into her easy-chair, “and no more kissing. Oh, you don’t know, Chris: my soul is exceeding bitter and sorrowful this day, God knows. Aren’t you going to give me my little boy back?”

Chris stood in thought for some time, and then said:

“Listen, Hannah: I will tell you now what was my chief reason for disbelieving your story: it was, that another lady declares that she spent here the very night that you claim; you can’t both be true; and she proved her case by showing me a child, a boy, which is certainly very like me: so I couldn’t believe you. But it occurs to me now that, in case she be false, and you true, then the child which she has may be the very one which you have lost.”

“It is, of course!” cried Hannah, springing up in a jubilee; “he is found! and I’ll never lose sight of him again. Where is he now? Was that his crying I heard—”

“No. Wait. Describe your son to me.”

“Curly golden hair, your eyes, but much lighter and larger, your hands and large mouth, but more like an angel than like—”

“Then it is very likely the same.”

“But where is he? When can I have him? He only likes oaten bread — must be suffering miseries—”

“No, don’t be impatient, wait, wait. I know now what I shall do. You shall see him here — tomorrow evening at this hour.”

“But why? Why? Where is he? Who is this awful woman? Am I to leave my child to her tender mercies till tomorrow evening? Oh, fair’s fair, Chris! Don’t rob me of my child for a whole night and day!”

“But I don’t understand your extreme impatience,” said Chris: “just now you didn’t expect to find him at all, and now you chafe at one day’s delay. You must wait, since I can’t do any better for you. Besides, he is in the hands of a lady who will pet him up, and keep him warm and nice.”

“Oh! he’ll laugh at any one’s petting!” “Still, you must wait: come tomorrow at seven, and I undertake that the child and the other woman who claims him shall be here, too. If he is your son, we shall know it in a moment by his conduct; then we shall be certain that your story is true, for there’s no doubt that he is my son.”

“But, Chris, you submit me to tests and proofs.” “Forgive me, will you? That’s not because I any longer disbelieve you, but as a formal justice to the other little woman, whom I fully believed up to the moment when you came in. Now I shall keep an open mind till your interview, and then I shall judge between you. It will be a cruel ordeal for the liar, but she deserves it.”

“But who can this woman be? I am perfectly bewildered! Some one came to my place four times on the day the child was stolen, asking for me, saying that she was a ‘friend,’ but I haven’t been able to identify her from my landlady’s description. I wonder if it is the same?”

“Probably not. I won’t tell you now. You will see her tomorrow.”

“But she won’t come to be proved a liar! She will hide my child!—”

“No, I undertake that she will come with the child. Woe to her, if she doesn’t. But I have some one waiting in yonder: will you go now? and come back in an hour to dine with me? Do you live far from here?”

“Ten minutes’ walk. But I shan’t come back: too tired and sad. Good-by.”

“Are you pleased with me now?”

“Whatever you do is well done for me: that’s all settled and done with.”

“What, still? Do you still love me, Hannah?”

“Let me go. I will tell you tomorrow night.”

“Why on earth did you marry that horrible man?”

“He isn’t horrible, only unhappy. Good-by.”

Chris just managed to steal a kiss askance from her cheek, and she was gone.

“To-morrow at seven!” he called after her.

“All right,” she said over her shoulder, but—

CHAPTER XXIV

A MINUTE AFTER Hannah was gone, Kathleen came out to Chris leading the boy, looking a picture of nervous flurry and unrule.

“I don’t know if you heard anything, Kathleen,” said Chris, looking at her gravely under his eyes.

“Yes, I did,” said the little maid with a breathless vehemence, with a twitching of the lips.

“Hannah, you see, claims your little one.”

“Base thing! I had told her everything — this is the result — You ought to be ashamed, Chris—”

“Of what?”

“Of being so miserably her dupe — of kissing her like a slave — I told you how low she had fallen — I brought you her husband—”

“He is not really her husband—”

“Yes, defend her, Chris, a woman of the middle-class — a farmer’s daughter — fallen to the dregs of society — I know that I am only a little hunchback, my word is not as good as hers, but not a soul knows me, I will show you all what I am, I am the greatest being that ever breathed, I defy you all—”

“Mmm, my dear friend, don’t—”

“Base thing! Didn’t she dare to claim to be ‘Viola,’ too? It’s a wonder! for I told her about that, too; she could have said that the Nicolo was stolen from her, as well as the child, but she didn’t dare—”

“Oh, but don’t—”

“Base thing! She wants money of you to support her husband, that is the cause of this elaborate acting — and her word to be taken against mine, and she to be kissed and worshiped, and sent away in triumph, and all the time the child is mine, my very own, and every word I say is true — true because say it — no other reason — that’s enough — because say it, you hear, Chris?”

“But, good God, do you wish to drive a poor man mad?” cried Chris with a sudden flush: “can’t you let me speak?”

“Oh, let me get out of here!” said Kathleen, moving sharply to hobble off.

“Stay! stay! Do you understand, Kathleen, that Hannah will be here at seven tomorrow evening in order that she may meet you and the child?”

“But do you imagine for a moment that she will come?” screamed Kathleen, turning upon him with a face of rage. “She won’t come! She knows that the child is mine!”

“She said the very same thing of you, that you wouldn’t come.”

“But I will! Whom do you believe, her or me? I’ll come, if only to punish you, but she won’t! Qui vivra verra!” and the little maid was off, with stamps in her hobbling, dragging the astonished child, while Chris chased her with “Don’t think that I doubt you! I keep a perfectly open mind till tomorrow; but perhaps if you leave the child, I could manage—” but she went out without a backward glance or answer, Chris looking after her with his foolish, meek look till she disappeared down the stairs.

The little maid drove thence to the Hotel Metropole, but, without alighting there, sent upstairs for the child’s nurse, gave the child to her, and said to her coachman, “To Scotland Yard.”

At Scotland Yard she had a ten minutes’ interview with an official, to whom she reported the fact of Hannah’s two marriages, with the dates, then drove back to the hotel, and spent the night there with her now doubly-dear boy. On the morrow she might be childless, but for that night at least she was a little mother, with her own offspring in her arms.

Most of the next day she spent at the Savoy Hotel with Miss Olivia, who was still in a state of wonder as to the where and why of Kathleen's nightly absences: and sharp at seven the little maid was at Chris's "oak" with the child, to keep the appointment made by Chris.

"Thanks infinitely for coming," said Chris, catching up the boy to his breast, "you are the first to arrive."

"But it is humiliating, Chris," said Kathleen, reproachfully.

"I see that; but bear with me, since it was my only way."

They sat down and waited for Hannah to come. Little was said. Kathleen toyed with her boy, who was now becoming tamer to her caresses. The lamp was not lit; the room, though inflamed by the firelight, grew duskier and duskier. Anon Chris peered at his watch; the ticking of a clock in the room filled the silence; Kathleen, pale at first, after a time brightened up, came out like the sun from all cloud and trouble, and said smiling, "Well, I seem to be last as well as first."

"She is late," remarked Chris.

"But this is tiresome. Do play something, Chris."

"No verve," said Chris with a pathetic smile.

"Til play," cried the little maid, starting up to the piano; she played a polonaise, anon calling out to the boy through the noise with lively glances round, "Dance, Chrisie!" Then she played the third Lied of the second book, and then, with flushed cheeks, a Brahms movement, "Guten Abend, gute Nacht," in the midst of which last Chris leapt up with a start which lifted his hair in a mass, and began to pace about with a red brow. It was eight o'clock.

The little maid stood up with a laugh.

“You won’t ever doubt me again, Chris?” — with her hands on his shoulders, and a happy light in her eyes.

“Forgive my unbelief,” he said absently, patting her back, “you shall be recompensed. Oh, I have been a dreamer!” he brought his palm to his forehead, and threw himself desperately upon a couch: Hannah did not come, and white was black to Chris.

CHAPTER XXV

THE VERY MORNING after that failure of Hannah to come to Chris's chambers for her child, Chris left England for the Continent. The little maid wrote of it: "He felt her non-appearance — keenly, too. Well, let him write a nocturno over it, as he wrote Mortalite over poor some one's dead body, and then he won't care any more, when he has once made 'copy' of his sighs. I got his note at two p. m., four hours after he had gone: 'My own dear friend, I find it necessary to leave England at once, but you will be kept always informed of my whereabouts, as I hope you will keep me informed of yours, so that the future of the close relation which exists between us may be fully discussed between us by letter; moreover, we are certain to meet either at Orrock or in some quarter of the globe. Meantime, you may be sure I carry "Viola" about in my heart. Kiss the darling boy for me, mentioning every day to him the name of his father. Ever yours sincerely, Chris Wilson.' He sticks to his 'Viola.' It is rather a mercy that Hannah in her interview with him never mentioned about 'Viola,' or about the Nicolo being lost: I suppose she was too full of the loss of the child to trouble about anything else; if she had mentioned it, that might have shaken Chris's certainty as to me being 'Viola,' for there are already things in the letters against it, such as 'Viola's' description of herself as tall, and the rot about 'joy,' 'health,' 'having life,' and so on. But the mere fact of my having the Nicolo must be to Chris an overwhelming proof that I am 'Viola,' and the fact of no more letters coming now from 'Viola' must be an added proof.

“At five p. m. on the day after the ‘ordeal’ and Hannah’s arrest I went to her place, for I was eager to hear everything; had a long talk with Mrs. Reid, the landlady, and got her to take me up to Hannah’s room, that I might look round the place in which I had trembled and dared. It looked pretty desolate, like a room from which the dead has been carried out. I was frightened, and didn’t go right in, or stay long up there. Mrs. Reid said that Hannah had told her the morning before that she would be giving up the rooms, since she was going to live with her husband thenceforth, that the child was found, and that she was going for it to Gray’s Inn at seven in the evening. ‘About ten minutes to seven,’ said Mrs. Reid, ‘she ran down the stairs, dressed to go out. I happened to be at the front door, looking out for the coalman, so I said to her, “Going for him now?” she smiled and said, “Yes, don’t be impatient, soon have more of him than is good for you.” She looked as bright as an angel, God knows, and an angel is what we all thought her, though I will say she did neglect her little boy sometimes, and made my life wretched about the blessed mice; most people are a bit nervous of a mouse, but not like her, I’ve seen her stand on a bed as white as a corpse—”

““But about the arrest,’ I said for the twentieth time; but it was another hour before I got it all out of the endless old thing. ‘Just as Mrs. Wilson got to the door,’ she said, ‘a boy named Ralphie, who follows her about like her shadow, ran up from the Medical Mission in Compton Place, to tell her that a man from the timber-yard named Giddins was taken worse; she looked rather taken aback, glanced at her watch, hesitated a bit on the doorstep, and at last said to Ralphie, “Well, come on.” She and the boy then ran off into Brunswick Square. Half an hour afterwards I was in the kitchen, when I heard a knock, went up, and found a constable and another man at the door. They wanted to know if Mrs. Wilson was in. “She is out,” I said. “No, she isn't," said the one in plain clothes, "for there she comes" — and so, true, there she was coming down the stairs with some papers in her hand, for, after seeing the sick man, she must have come in to get something, and now was just starting off again to Gray's Inn.'

"I shivered as she spoke: one minute's difference and Hannah might have got to Gray's Inn. There's some star in collusion with the little hunch. They had told me at Scotland Yard that she would probably be arrested by noon.

"‘She was passing out,’ Mrs. Reid said, ‘when the two men asked if she was Mrs. Wilson. She said yes. “Well, a warrant has been issued for your arrest,” said the one in plain clothes, and at those words I almost dropped — she that every one thought was so good! But you never know who’s who in London, miss. “What wrong have I done?” she asked, smiling with them. “You are charged,” said the officer, “with contracting a bigamous marriage with somebody at so-and-so on such a date.” “How can you know?” said she. “That’s neither here nor there,” said he; “take notice that your words are being taken down—” he had a note-book in his hand. “Well, what next?” said she. “You must come with us to the station,” said he. “Oh, not now,” said she. “Yes, now,” said he. “But do you know that I have lost my child?” said she. “We know nothing of that,” said he, “you must come.” “But listen,” said she. “We can’t,” said he, “you must come.” “For God’s sake, will you?” said she. “We can’t,” said he, “you must come now: if you have any statement to make, you can make it at the station.” “But listen, I am a poor mother,” said she. “Can’t help that,” said he, “you must come at once.” “But if any time is lost, a wrong will be done,” said she, “and you would not like it to be done through you.” “Very sorry,” said he, “but you must come.” “May I not even write a note?” said she. “Not now,” said he. “Well, then,” said she, “if you won’t listen to reason, I am sorry for you.”

“At this she turned and said at my ear, “Tell them at the Medical Mission that I had to go away, and don’t cry, it will be all the same to me a hundred years hence.” She kissed me, and walked away between them, with a little crowd of boys and girls following. I ran out into the drizzle, and whispered to one of the men, “‘Don’t be hard on her, now.’ They took a four-wheeler at the Foundling rank....’

“The old thing began to cry. I was listening to her till after six, then drove back full of pity and fear for poor Hannah, and joy at the awful dangers which I had escaped the evening before. It is a mercy that I didn’t stay at Chris’s later than eight o’clock, for undoubtedly Hannah told the police-station people that her lost child was then at Chris’s place, and some one may have been sent to see if it was true. I don’t suppose that much weight is given to a prisoner’s statements, but, if any one was sent, I was gone when he came; Chris must have been out, too, at that hour, and the next morning early was off to the Continent.

“I meant to go down to Orrock at once, so the next thing was to introduce my boy to Olivia; I didn’t mean to invent any story about having adopted him, for, far from being ashamed of it, I glory in being a mother. That night we had Charlie Podmore with Lady Roden and her Lillian and Aimee, so after they were gone I made Olivia sit at my feet in the salon, and I confessed to her all about the recital night, the drugged wine, the birth of the child — everything. She was amusing with her astonishment, didn’t know to what first to apply her boundless ‘but’s.’ ‘But,’ she said, and stopped, and then said ‘but’ again. I didn’t care; I was too happy; I shall have Chris now at last; I have become quite reckless and jolly; I defy every one and everything; there’s a little star somewhere that winks when I wink.

“‘But you slept with me on the night of that recital!’ Livie managed to get out at last.

“‘I got up while you were asleep, and came back while you were asleep,’ I answered.

“‘But — but—’

“‘Never mind, Olivia,’ I said, ‘reconcile yourself to facts as they are.’

“‘But which facts!’ she cried; ‘you are only acting a part to yourself and to me! — the whole thing is wildly incredible!’

“‘You won’t say so when you see him,’ I said. ‘You will simply sit down and cry for joy that I could be the little mother of such an angel. Chris called him ‘Eros’ — there never was such a child — I don’t say it because I am his mother; try to imagine what Chris’s soul must be under hashish, Olivia, like Uriel clad in the sunset; and I, too, was under hashish, remember: the child is a peg above other children—’

“‘It’s all play-acting!’ she cried: ‘where — when — ? I have always been with you except those three months when you were with Louise at Davos!’

“‘It was then,’ I said.

“‘No, if it is impossible, it is impossible she said. ‘I shall write and ask Louise.’

“‘Louise will deny,’ I said; ‘it is a secret between her and me.’

“‘It can’t be, it can’t be,’ she said. ‘But, Livie, why so?’ I pleaded. ‘Didn’t you think that I was capable of being the little mother of a sweet boy? I am just like everybody, Livie, and more so. It is sweet to the heart, Livie, to be a mother—’

“‘Acting, acting, all acting!’ she cried, shaking her head; and I got angry, saying, ‘Well, we will let the subject drop now, if you please.’

“‘Yes,’ she said, ‘get angry if you please, but have I no cause for anger? What kind of thing is this which you have brought upon me?’

“‘A pure honor,’ I said, ‘not even a hint of disgrace. Chris says that it is the highest dignity on earth to be a mother. And the mother of his child!’

Don't the haphazard sons of kings become dukes? But the world looks upon Chris as far above any king!

“‘But still, Kathleen,’ she said, beginning to sniffle, ‘it is hard on me—’

“‘But no one need know,’ I said to comfort her, and in the end worked her round to a state of mere curiosity to see the child: when I brought him the next forenoon she was as much in love as any one. To-morrow we go down, and shall stay at the Hill till Hannah’s final trial, when I mean to come up for two or three days at the beginning of the season; they say that things will be quite dull until little Teddy comes into his own: all the world is in purple mourning by command. I shall spend the whole season at home with German philosophy, botany, music, and my boy, without receiving at all, but living like a recluse. Perhaps Chris may come to Orrock,...” etc., etc.

“This place,” she wrote later, “is certainly haunted, and nothing could keep me here but Chris’s promise to come down at any moment; but I must reap what I have sown; there have been moments of my life, like that day of the hiding of the viol, when I have certainly danced mad. What could have possessed me to lift the face-cloth? Some hand took mine and did it: and it is now that I am really feeling the effects of it. Oh, the terrors which this scheme of nerves can divine and foreknow! Something lately seems to threaten me, I am conscious of it afar off, it lifts its head within me for a moment and just whispers of eyeballs staring and shrieks of madness ringing through deep vaults of the earth, which some day I shall hear, and there are times when somewhere far off at the back of me ten thousand thunders seem mustering themselves to hurry and burst upon me. What is the meaning of it? Every night now I dream of him, with his rigid face. I oughtn’t to have dared put the things into his coffin. But what else was left me to do? I am taking phosphorus, iron, and salicylate of soda; these last four days the rheumatic pains in the left leg, and the indigestion, have been worse than ever. Plato says that a healthy body will not make one virtuous, but a virtuous mind will make one healthy. I wonder? Perhaps I could have done better, better for myself. But what is virtue? Poor 'Viola' says mere 'vigor' of mind: but if you haven't got the vigor, you haven't, that's all, as when a man can't jig, he can't jig. If one's vigor of mind may be strengthened by practising goodness, as one's body by athletics, still you must have some vigor to start on. Everything is God's fault. People with heart disease can't do athletics. I shan't care about anything, except the physical pains, and the terrors. Life is about equally troublesome to every one, and I shouldn't change places with poor Hannah now. I have my boy, and some little day I shall be standing at an altar with a certain C. W. That's plenty to have lived for.

"Olivia returned last night at nine, after witnessing the trial. She has been away three days, staying two with Lady Roden; the coronation, she says, is already all the rage; she saw a return of mounted infantry through the Park, and on the second day Hannah in the dock. It has made poor Livie unwell, and I am glad now that I was too ill to go. She sat veiled with the common crowd in a gallery, kept an opera glass fixed upon Hannah, and was struck by Hannah's 'politeness' to every one — so she says. It didn't last long: Hannah pleaded guilty. She looked pale and ill. A lot of the poor in the gallery knew her, and their excited whispering among themselves kept Olivia from hearing much that was said below. She says that 'something about her forehead struck me that day as mulishly stubborn: though it is low, it would be overbearing, but for the kindly twinkling of her eyes, like a rock with bluebells. When she answered the judge or the lawyer she seemed to be treating them gently, like "patients.'" She made them all chuckle by telling the judge that "she tried bigamy because she found marriage a failure.'" They wanted to get the address of Willie Dawe, but she wouldn't, or couldn't, give it. What could have made Hannah Wilson do such a thing with such a creature surpasses mortal comprehension! Yet somehow I couldn't believe, while looking at her, that she had done any wrong; at one time I wanted to scream, it seemed to me that I was witnessing some piercing outrage, like the rending of a lamb, the harming of the harmless, the trampling of white robes in the mud, and the judgment of the higher by the lower. The name "Lady" Wilson didn't occur throughout the trial. When a doctor from some hospital spoke of the love of the poor people for her, Hannah wept passionately. When the judge was about to deliver sentence, she stood up by the side of her wardress, very pale and austere, and heard his long lecture with lowered eyes. The moment the words "nine months" passed his lips a howl of lamentation broke out a little behind me — a tall man with his head buried in his arms, howling for all he was worth. It was Willie Dawe:

I hadn't noticed him before. I saw Hannah's eyes lift and rest steadily upon him as he was being removed in a fainting condition.' Cutting of the trial is on third fly-leaf. Olivia brought down a heap of papers, but they all say much the same things. Down here not a soul knew a word about anything, till they saw it in the papers. Both the old Langers are ill, and all Orrock, they say, is mourning. This is great Babylon which I have built, ..." etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXVI

“LAST NIGHT,” CONTINUED the little maid later, “another quarrel with Olivia — just because I sent for Dr. Williams when my darling pricked his finger. She said that I am ‘exposing myself to the ridicule of everybody by my skittish extravagances with the boy.’ I wasn’t really angry, for I feel pleased au fond to have them all wondering at my adoration of him, but by pretending to be angry I became rather so. ‘I don’t seem to be any longer mistress in my own house,’ I said.

“‘The mischief is that you are too much so,’ she answered: ‘what has come over you of late, Kathleen? You didn’t use to be like this! That child has turned you into a perfect Donna Quixote!’

“‘Even if that be true,’ I said, ‘isn’t he sweet enough to turn any little mother’s head?’

“‘Let his sweetness be admitted,’ she said: ‘but. that is no reason, Kathleen, why the tongue of a lady should be heard scolding through her house every five minutes in the day for imaginary wrongs done to a brat—’

“‘You are not to call him a brat, Olivia,’ I said.

“‘Well, a pretty child, if you like,’ she said, ‘but still a brat, for a brat’s a brat, and what I have said I stick to. I am sure that everybody in the place does the very best for the boy, and to turn away old servants, servant after servant, in your late tyrannical manner for imaginary wrongs — the merest figments of your brain—’

“‘I am the best judge of all that,’ I said: ‘I wish my boy to be the one grand fact of life for every one around me, and whoever fails in the slightest degree to come up to this standard must go, that's all.'

Well, go your way,' she said, 'but I am only doing my duty to warn you, Kathleen, that your conduct is causing astonishment and ridicule; since the end of May it becomes every day more fantastic, and I won't hold my tongue any longer. Are there to be no bounds to your antics with this boy? I say nothing of his jewel-studded plate, his gold knife and fork, and his ivory cot — those may pass; but tell me if it is a sane thing for a young lady to bare her virgin bosom to a boy four years old, and invite him with tears in her eyes to take his nourishment from her? Look here, Kathleen—'

“‘Whose virgin bosom?’ I cried, the blood rushing to my head: ‘don’t you dare insult my motherhood, Olivia!’

“‘Well, let that pass,’ she said, turning pale with rage, ‘let us admit that you are his mother: but why publish it so? Wasn’t it agreed between us that he should pass as your adopted child?’

“‘Well, isn’t that what I tell everybody?’

“‘Yes, you tell them so! but you take good care that they shall think you his real mother by your mysterious perks, and smiles, and hints, and fantastic carryings-on! I never heard of such a thing! A lady of high birth going out of her way to fasten upon herself so awful a scandal—’

“‘Well,’ I said, ‘if they know that I am his mother, they will also know that Chris must be his father, so I don’t care. I am quite reckless and happy now.’

“She cast up her eyes and hands together, sighing, ‘But where is this grotesque frenzy to end? As to the kittens and the flies—’

“‘I caught no less than five by one sweep of my hand across the table this afternoon,’ I said, ‘and he screamed with joy! My skill is now simply absolute, and he is conscious that no one in the world can really catch flies but his mama.’

“‘But for a girl of your attainments, Kathleen,’ she said, ‘to devote whole days to nothing but catching flies—’

“‘I am not a girl, Olivia,’ I said, interrupting her, ‘I am a matron. Give the devil his due, and don’t eat out your poor heart with envy.’

“‘I!’ she cried, ‘if that’s what it is to be a matron, let me be as I am, thank you! Perhaps as an old maid I shall find some nobler occupation than catching flies. And I don’t know if you think it is a good thing for that boy’s character, Kathleen, to see half a dozen kittens drowned every morning of his life—’

“‘They would be fillies instead of kittens I said, ‘if that pleased my little prince.’

“‘The supply would fall short of the demand,’ she said spitefully, ‘and even the kittens, happily, won’t last, for lamentation and a voice in Orrock among cats can’t go much farther now—’ In this way she kept on, harping on the same old strings, and I let her, for I really like it au fond. I left her to go to watch over his sleep: he is never quite so ravishing as when asleep. How I love him! Sometimes when I first wake in the mornings I have a sharp pang, a feeling that he is not really my child, but by noon I am sure of him, and toward evening I seem to remember the night of my pains when I travailed and bore him; then I rock my love in my arms, and pour the sweet tears over him, and ask him if he, too, remembers. God of Heaven, it is dear and holy to be a little mother, have mercy upon me, and forgive me.

“‘I frightened him out of sleep at two this morning. I had a dream of some one who is dead, and started out of it screaming and sobbing for mercy; the three night lights were all burning: when I looked around there he was sitting up in his cot, staring at me.’”

CHAPTER XXVII

“CHRIS IS BACK in Paris from Moscow,” continued the quaint maid in July, “and makes the Opera-concert on Tuesday the excuse for not coming here at once. He can’t say that I haven’t been patient: but I won’t wait indefinitely; I must have a father for my child, and if I can’t get it by hints and sighs, I must get it by cries and insistence. It is two months now since he practically asked me to marry him — that was the only construction I could put upon his words; but he hasn’t once shown his nose at Orrock, in spite of all his promises, since he first saw the child. His very offer of marriage may be mere words, words; not written for my sake, or even the child’s, but to satisfy his French ‘honor.’ How I have longed and waited! It is scandalous that he doesn’t hunger to see the child. What would happen to me, if I didn’t see him for even an hour? I suppose I should go into a fever. Promises are easily made, my Chris, but they have no weight, and weight is what your little hunchback wants to make her a sweet, humble little wife. There’s one of my tenants on the further side of Shooen’s Clause named Joan Speight who has seventeen sons, all with straight backs. That’s the way, even if it racks you to pieces. Let’s be patriarchal: ‘travaillez, mes femmes!’ Sir C. W. is always ‘coming immediately’; but never comes! He writes to ask his own ‘Viola,’ ‘Will you marry me?’ or something very like it; ‘Viola’ says, ‘Yes: when?’ and he answers, ‘Immediately,’ meaning fifteen years hence perhaps, if then; but it must be within three months, for the dangers of all sorts that will threaten me the moment some one comes out of prison are too awful to think of. He still thinks of his Hannah, ca se voit; speaks in his last letter of ‘the extraordinary boldness of her statement that it was she who took the viol and trinkets out of his room, when she knew that she did not have them to produce, and when she knew that they were believed to have been taken by a thief. If this was lying, it was that most gallant style of lying which invites and defies disbelief.’ ‘If,’ this was lying! Aren’t we quite convinced, then, by her non-appearance to claim the child? What an obstinate infatuation! He wants to know if ‘the poor woman’ can’t be found by me, in order to see whether she is in need of ‘financial aid.’ He is a divinely unconscious old Chris. Who doesn’t know that Hannah Wilson is in prison? But not he: his head is up in the clouds. The rest of his letter is mostly talk about the different schools, says that he is fast acquiring a degenerate weakness for Italian opera, Giardini, Viotti, sends his last orchestral suite and sonata, longs to be again accompanied by ‘Viola,’ and says that during the height of the fuss and lamentation in Paris at the rumor of his death last month, he was abroad in the cafes with his friends, strangers speaking to him of his own death without recognizing him. I shall write immediately after the concert....”

“... Since he knows nothing about what has befallen Hannah, I wrote boldly yesterday to say that as he is causing me to suffer, and as it can only be Hannah who is at the bottom of his delay, my duty to my child has forced me to think of having Hannah punished by the law for her bigamy, unless something is done for my little one quickly. I wrote in quite a new tone, and I’ll wait and see what effect this has upon him....”

“... Hannah has been seen in prison. Yesterday morning Olivia ran to me in the rockery in a state of excitement, saying that a woman named Harriet Davis, who went to London two years ago, got five months’ imprisonment for neglect of her children, and has just come home again, was with Hannah in Wandsworth prison. We at once sent John packing to find and bring her, and in the afternoon had her by stealth a lions' time in Olivia's boudoir. But she is known as a liar. She makes out that Hannah is quite a privileged person: had at first to wash clothes and scrub floors, but now is one of the nurses in the prison-infirmary; 'almost fainted' when she saw Harriet Davis. Harriet asked her, 'Are you guilty?' 'Miss Hannah' answered, 'So they say.' One morning Miss Hannah hid the scrubbing-brush of another prisoner, 'just for a lark,' and the woman was going to beat Miss Hannah, but didn't after; another morning there was a riot, the women were going to set upon a wardress, if Miss Hannah hadn't quieted them; for two weeks Miss Hannah was in the infirmary ill. Livie and I sat with 'our chins on our hands, listening to the string of incidents — half lies; this is the same Harriet Davis that told Uncle Peter about a voice which said, 'Rest I cannot.' We gave her some money...."

"... My threat to inform on Hannah's bigamy has drawn a quick reply from Chris. I knew that he would be horrified at me, but I mustn't mind that now. My dream of motherhood may be drawing toward its close, for when she comes out I shall have everything to fear with regard to the child at least, if I don't then belong to his father. Suppose he ever were taken from me? I should be stripped of all, I should die of ignominy, I should be a maid again. I shall repeat my threat to Chris: he seems aghast at the notion of 'that poor woman being sent to prison, ...'" etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXVIII

“ . . . SO I am to be an autumn bride!” she wrote later, “if I don’t go wild beforehand. Livie says that I am ‘cracked.’ She cried on Thursday when she saw him on his little silver throne, looking every inch a monarch with his little scepter and crown, and his purple and ermine; I insisted upon her courtesying, while I knelt, and she burst into tears, saying that it was a shame to play such antics with a poor child. I don’t care, I am quite reckless and happy, but for the physical pains. When I look round my life and see to what a height I have brought it, I repeat to myself, ‘This is great Babylon which I have built.’ Last night I was amusing myself with reading over one of the old volumes” (of her diary), “seven years old, written about that time when Uncle Peter was supposed to be dying, and some one ran over from Paris to see him. I was only twenty then, Chris was twenty-two, some one was twenty-one, Hannah was nearly twenty-five. How time flies! and changes us. I must have been a perfect little goose; the diary is full of laments over my sweating palms and agitations in Chris’s presence. A shrinking little chrysalis I was, as unequal to the world as ‘the rath primrose’; whatever was said had a pang in it for me; if I fancied that a tenant didn’t treat me with homage on the road, I wrote it down, and suffered half the night. Now I am quite reckless and jolly: I want people to look upon me as a little mama, and to stand agaze at my adoration of my boy. But Olivia says that it is only another phase of the self-same sickness, and that ‘Dir kannst du nicht entfliehen.’ I don’t know why she is so surly lately; she forgets that, in reality, she is only part of my establishment. At any rate, I have changed, I am no longer a muling failure, I have accomplished something, everything; with these hands I have built great Babylon, and there's a trick in Nature that was in league all the time with little me. Seven years ago my highest ambition was to see some one take Chris from Hannah, and now, in a month's time, Chris is to be my own — husband! The quickness of the hand deceives the eye! Pick up your skirts, girls, and dance till you drop! There's a white dress making, and making for me; there's a plain gold ring forged somewhere, which is for me: its maker little thought, as he heated and polished it, that it was for me: but God thought, 'That one is for the little one.' Pity the pains are getting so bad: seven years ago I didn't have my left leg all in cotton wool....”

“... Everything isn't quite smooth. Now comes the news that Willie Dawe tried to hang himself on the third evening after Hannah's trial, but was found and cut down just in time. While I was wondering what had become of him, he was in hospital, and now, they say, is weak in the head. Why should he have hanged himself, when he had plenty of money to go on with? Heaven grant that he doesn't let out anything to anybody about me. Olivia says that his mother has written to him to come down, and I have no means to prevent his coming; but, if he dares blab anything, I shall have him charged and sent to Norwich....”

“... I always love this time of the year; the leaves are beginning to fall fast, and sometimes in the early mornings there are meanings in the winds with which I am so akin, that I could faint for bliss. I wonder if any other soul is ever so pierced to the very quick by their bleakness? It isn't over this earth alone that they sorrow to me, but over the despondence of moons that no glass ever spied. Like me they are forlorn, and they bear me echoes of wailings from worlds where I, too, once beat the breast by chill waters. It is when I hear them, and when I am weeping over my boy, that I am truly religious, truly pure in heart, and I worship, understanding that some day all my crookedness will surely be blotted out, and my sins will be remembered against me no more forever....”

“ . . . There have been two grand storms within three weeks, and from everywhere come lamentations of boats and houses and bits of coast-wall being washed away. This is a tempestuous, wet place, and somehow the presence of the sea is in all our lives. Some day perhaps the descendants of the hunchback won’t have any Hill to call their own. But they say that the salt in the air is good for rheumatism, though I have had sea-baths all the summer, and am worse than ever for it. Dr. Williams says that is the continual crabs and lobsters, but it is no good, I can’t give them up: I have tried, but ‘Set a hunch to pick a hunch,’ as ex-cook Bassett is said to have remarked. I am not going to break any habits now, I am twenty-seven, and perhaps in any case shan’t live very long. ‘Let us tax and stint and feed ourselves according to habit,’ says Montaigne, and not try to be heroes. I am frail in every part, but do very well as I am without athletics. There was a man whom the Spanish Inquisition condemned to sleep on blunt spikes for fifteen years, and afterwards he couldn’t sleep on anything else. To the average dormant person the familiar is better than the best, and so every one likes himself as he is. If I could only get the rheumatism and indigestion a little better before the wedding, I shouldn’t mind. Ever since that last storm the pains have been sharper. That was an awful night for me. I can almost say that I saw Uncle Peter, though I can’t swear that I was awake: but, if it was a dream, how vivid. I haven’t written the details, and shan’t now, it would make me ill. I woke up every one in the house; many a stronger woman would have died. They say that another storm is predicted by the coastguard next week.... “ “...I have advised Chris not to trouble himself about any divorce from Hannah, however slight the trouble, since there is a law that after seven years of such a marriage one is free. He has never come across her, except that evening when she went to tell him about the loss of the child, and that doesn't count: only he and I know of it; it would be a far-fetched sort of law that could regard him as in any sense her husband now. He wishes, apparently, to be very punctilious, and is quite 'on his honor.' But what his 'own friend' wants is his solid presence, and no more talk and delays. He is to be at Orrock, positively, on the 5th; on the 1st Olivia and I go to London for two days to see after everything, and will be back by the 4th to receive him; the wedding on the 10th; Hannah comes out on the 27th, when I shall be in Italy. I spent the whole of this morning with Mr. Bretherton, talking of the two estates, and the settlement...."

". . . A long talk this morning" (seven days later) "with Chris in Orrock Park, and I am far from flattered, in spite of his anxiety to be polite. He forgets that I have a pair of sharp eyes, and can read him like a book. I can see that his main motive for marrying me in a hurry isn't love for me, nor even his 'honor' toward the little mother of his child, but my repeated threats to have 'that poor woman' put into prison for her bigamy. If he only knew that I have done it, he wouldn't like me, I'm afraid. He may be making as great a sacrifice for Hannah now, if the truth were known, as she made for him when she married Willie Dawe. I wonder if it is so? If he really doesn't love me at all, there's plenty of poison in the house: I can take back the crooked back to Him that made it: perhaps He will comfort me and forgive me when no one else will. Anyway I feel that I shan't live long to strut in my Babylon; there's a pretty constant feeling now of something hanging over me, the fall of which will crush me. Some times in the mornings I can only lift my head by an effort, I am so weak and weary; and there's a crack running right through me somehow, which any shock might widen, and not one stone would be left on another. Perhaps it would be as well. C. W., too, is strangely grave: at some moments he looks quite broken-down and lost; then he will take my arm jauntily, and try to be boyish. If he doesn't love me really, I am sorry for him. Perhaps people who are not so accustomed to me as I am to myself see me in an uglier light: it may be so: may thunder crush me, if it is! He has only kissed me on the cheeks, everything strictly French so far, and this forenoon in the park he 'good Godded' me about Hannah. 'It is amazing,' he said, 'that a thought of harming that unfortunate woman could ever have entered your mind!' I answered, 'I believed that she was injuring me and my boy, Chris.' 'But good God!' he cried, 'why do you seek to madden me? I haven't seen or heard of the woman since that night in my London chambers! And, in any case, where is your regard for me to think of casting into the common prison a woman whom you know that I have already wronged and driven to despair?'

"'But don't be angry with me, Chris,' I said, 'I am not very well. I know that I have many faults, and have done many, many wrong things, but they have all been done through love of you—'

"'Well, well,' he said, patting me.

"'Will you always remember that?' I said— 'through love of you. Our parents made a compact before I was born that we should marry, and though some imp must have been grinning behind their backs, the compact somehow embodied itself with my embryo being. I worship you, Chris, and ask you to be kind to me while I live. I know that you don't love me—'

"'Mmm, I do, I do,' he said.

"'Then, will you let me be with you after we are married?'

"'With me! Where?' he asked, starting.

"'Anywhere — wherever you are. Promise me at least that for six months of the year Chrisie and I may live with you. Look, he is bringing you flowers’ — Chrisie was racing back to us with a lot of harebells and bachelor-buttons; his father patted his back absently, not thinking of him, saying, ‘I am such a wanderer: if you came with me, you would be wretched, and I shouldn’t be able to play, already I abhor—’

“‘On my account?’ I asked quickly.

“‘Oh, no, never think that, my own friend, just the contrary,’ he said. ‘But perhaps, if you will consider Orrock your home, then I could pay you long and frequent visits—’

“‘Chris, you mean to be the death of me, I can see,’ I said.

“‘Heavens!’ he breathed, throwing up his eyes: ‘then, be with me, be with me.’

“‘Is that a promise?’

“‘Yes, a promise.’

“‘It mayn’t be for long, Chris: I feel so frail lately.’

“‘Mmm’ — with a pat. ‘My presence won’t be irksome to you, Chris?’

“‘Not at all.’ ‘And may I accompany you sometimes, Chris?’

“‘Not in public?’

“‘If I may. You know, Chris, that no one can really accompany you but me.’

“‘That’s only the truth. You shall accompany me.’

“‘And Chris, will you love me just a little as your own little — Oh, pray! say yes! I know that I don’t deserve it, but the great God makes his sun to shine upon the just and upon the unjust.’

“‘I shall certainly love you,’ he said with apparent sincerity, ‘and at least take better care of you than of the first one.’ Just then Chrisie fell flat in moss twenty yards ahead, and I ran down the avenue to him; when I next looked back there was Chris sitting on a tree-trunk, with his face buried in his arms. I don’t know why he was like that on a sudden....”

“ . . . To-morrow evening is for the settlement of the estates and signing the marriage-documents. C. W., like all Frenchmen, is a stickler for form and nicety in money-matters, and I am instructed to invite friends to ‘assist’ at the ceremony, French-fashion: so it will be rather a function. Mr. Bretherton writes that everything is drawn up and ready, and Olivia is in a state of palish excitement. So much for Babylon, and my little star. But one star isn’t enough to make one happy somehow: perhaps one should be in league with all the stars. God help me.... “ etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXIX

ON THE SEVENTH of that month (November), about nine in the evening, while the marriage documents were being read before some dozen people in the Hall library, Hannah, for her part, was sitting in the churchyard a mile away. On account of good behavior in her late trouble she had been let out a little before the term of her sentence, had now been at large over twenty-four hours, and, as the people in London had not been able to give her any news of her child, she had made up her mind to go down to Orrock, to face old Mr. Langer, and to get some money for the further search, since her funds had run low. But, on going down, she shirked the shame of showing herself, shirked the questions, the eyes of awe and reproach, and went first to her old spot in St. Peter's churchyard, to rest and talk with herself.

She was there from half-past seven to nine, sitting in wet grass, with squalls of drizzle beating upon her, for it was a rough night. She habitually treated in this amazingly reckless way that "health" which she considered divine: and, indeed, she was hardly ever unwell. That night, however, a dark fit was upon her — partly a reaction from her flush of freedom the day before, partly a result of seeing round her the wreck of her goods. Her child was gone, her good name, her husband. She felt that to rebuild herself in England now was a hopeless matter, and meant when the child should be found, if ever, to fly to America, where she had some "friends." In this state of her affairs, she came to the Orrock grave to strew no flowers upon it as erewhile, but really to seek a sort of comfort from the dead, since among the living there was none. She made herself fancy that if Sir Peter were living, he, at least, would know her, would trust her soul, when her own father, mother, and every one were strangers to her. In her heart she called the old baronet "father," little dreaming how strictly true this was; she thought of the tender shyness with which he used to whisper at her ear, "Uglier than ever, I see," and this made her smile and moan: now, perhaps, hovering about her in the dark, or streaming upon the north wind's ravings, his spirit mourned of her, "Prettier than ever." She was somehow sure of his nearness and of his sympathy, and thinking still of him, recalling his ways and words, tears of love wet her eyes.

But even the old grave failed her that night: "East railings," she wrote of it, "standing on nothing, gone askew, only held up by horizontal bar; east half of slab hanging over nothing. Made me feel really homeless, a stranger, as if nothing solid was left. The whole coast transformed: old St. Cuthbert's tower perhaps five feet nearer cliff-edge, three yards gone from east end of Mailing's Lane, sea roaring in great breakers under spots where I have planted flowers when a girl; enough to make the geese and cows cry: hungry wash of the sea ever ravening with rough shout to wreck and bereave. 'Oh, earth, what changes hast thou seen!' Must have been some awful storms while in prison: fifteen of graves clean gone from St. Peter's; no longer the same place. 'Here have we no continuing city'; 'all flows,' changes; but thought to myself, 'the fleece of Gideon at least remains dry,' the mind 'invincible': 'therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea.' Things were pretty cruel, none on earth that I could really tell my heart to, the very night unpitiful, not a star, moon, nor light over sea, gusts coming shaky from northeast like flapping sails, no one in wide world, only me, the lighthouse, and the dead, old landmarks gone; but still something left inside, one last Gibraltar, and good old whisper, 'The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed, but My kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed.’ Through it all, felt strong curiosity to see his coffin, if visible; went to edge at last, and, clinging underneath to railings, poked head up between railings and slab, climbed on to slab, and lay on it, gazing down over east edge. Eyes could just guess out either three or four coffin-ends, five to seven feet down. Hoped eyes would get used to darkness, and lay on face perhaps twenty minutes, but still couldn’t make out anything. Lighthouse beam in passing didn’t lighten even a little the murk under there, and at last something creepy said, ‘Suppose slab tips over with you,’ so was off quicker than I went on.

But no sooner out in the grass again, than I felt myself bested, and thought of climbing down to see; the cliff-face now lay about half way between flat and steep up above, then twenty-five feet down came a ledge, then another, after which cliff-face went down steep; could see ledges and state of cliff-face during passage of lighthouse beam: cliff-face all white, rough chalk, not polished and hard and discolored as it soon becomes, so landslip couldn’t have taken place more than a week or two before; a Y-shaped cake had been taken off cliff from top to bottom, leaving plenty of rough footway up above. Peered along edge, till I came to likely spot about ten feet south of Orrock grave; as I stood there, something said, ‘Better not try it’: wouldn’t listen: but the moment foot was over edge, my heart leapt into my mouth; if I hadn’t been a coward should have turned back, but afraid of being called a coward by myself, so went on — a coward either way. Crept northward and downward toward Orrock coffins, wary step by wary step, clinging on with hands, wind blowing clothes about, white as a sheet, if truth were known, and every instant getting more miserably jumpy. ‘Go back!’ said reason to will; no go: will deaf and blind. In daytime should have felt quite safe, have done worse bits in Switzerland, but up another street at dark night — with fifty feet below. Was actually among Orrock coffins when foot slipped — or I fancied so, and utterly lost nerve; once a woman always a woman: caught wildly at coffin just above head, caught something, didn't quite know what, something pretty rotten which gave way, and next moment had said my prayers and gone tumbling. Whole rain of things seemed to come with me — had that fancy — like a thousand of bricks. Had caught inside coffin-rim, where lid may have subsided, or else by a handle, and so broken coffin. Didn't fall far, perhaps twelve, fifteen feet, to first ledge, and there lay feeling wronged, like child with cut finger, my hands bruised, face hot, dignity outraged; think I lost consciousness for some minutes, not sure. Ledge five feet wide, happily lower at inner edge than outer. Sat wondering how on earth I was to get back up, absolutely hadn't the nerve to climb; put out my hand to collect my dress, and touched tibia of leg — not yet bare! caught back hand and touched something cold lying on dress — man's watch and chain: seemed to be the one I had taken from Chris; I felt it all over, it certainly seemed to be no other; thought I must be stunned and dreaming, but the same twisted links, elephant guard, covered watch — the very same; was pretty scared: even in blessing, the Hand of God terrible; never was afraid of ghosts in my life, but was then, badly; seemed to stand face to face with that which cannot be named for excessive greatness, and the wind spoke monstrosly to me with human tongue; didn't see Sir Peter, but nearly did, waited, with my hair rising, on the very point of seeing him, breathing his name; at same time lighthouse-beam swept over shiny thing lying on ledge two yards away, the viol: couldn't doubt it the same — no neck, elaborate decoration all over back and belly, sloping shoulders, straight sound-holes long way from purfling — the very same. Understood that they had been buried with Sir Peter: and how awful! couldn't help crying after I had got over ungrateful terrors.

Looked about for cardboard box and ring and brush, but couldn't find: box may have got blown away.

“No difficulty now about getting back up to top: for state of the mind everything, and he that has faith, i.e., tip-top spirits inside, shall say to mountain, ‘Be thou removed.’ Couldn’t very well take up viol with me, started up without, but after some feet up, went back, tore petticoat into strips, tied string round side-grooves, and climbed with end of string between teeth. Got up all right to coffins, stopped and had a look, heart beating foolishly again, one of them all broken, and — no tibias! Climbed twelve more feet to top and drew up viol, which came bumping vocally, that old salt-seasoned pine belly and chrysolite varnish still sound as a nut. Didn’t stop to worry about how it had got into coffin: a haste to lay it before Chris within forty-eight hours had me; thought he was on Continent, and made up my mind not to show face at Woodside, but to go and ask Bentley at Hall where he was, and start off straight to him. Wanted to run, but wouldn’t; walked slowly. Heard something knocking about inside viol, stopped under lamp in Woodside Lane, and picked out through sound-holes with hatpin two folded parchments, copies of each other apparently; saw my name all about; they seemed to be will of Sir Peter: understood that in that case I must have offended some one, though always thought every one sweet on me, the old self-conceit wrong again. Went on past Woodside, Rover howling piteously after me (chained up); might have stopped, for not a soul anywhere about, but didn’t; passed down and on to Brookend, where I washed hands, then through Orrock gates, and by south side made for second inner courtyard, hoping to meet either Bentley or Mrs. Dene on the quiet, when I saw library lighted up.... “ etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXX

ON A SUDDEN Hannah, with a wet face and looking bedraggled, was standing in a corner of the library with the group of people who were taking part in the rite of settlement; Chris and Kathleen were seated at opposite sides of a table, the others seated round it. Though six crowds of candles hung in a row from the ceiling, their light was somehow local about the chandeliers, and still left a gloom in that old hall; extra candles in smooth old candlesticks were on the table, which reflected their light in its surface; the little crowd of people who were gathered round the table with the candlesticks on it looked lonely and local in the bigness of the place; a butler and a footman in yellow stockings hung mutely upon the scene; all were more or less mute and stiff; Chris Wilson had the smile of a saint who is being led to the stake.

“I didn’t know that visitors were here,” said Hannah to him, “I saw your back through the little courtyard door—”

Chris leapt to his feet with the whisper, “What is it?”

“I’ll wait till another time,” said Hannah: “good evening, Kathleen, how are you, Mrs. Horsnel — ?”

She was stopped by Chris pointing and crying out, “But isn’t that my viol di Gamba?”

“Yes, then,” said Hannah, “you may as well hear now before everybody. Some one in the Hall wished me ill six years ago, and hid the things which I took from your rooms. Here is the watch and chain, too. Can’t find the ring and nail-brush. They were buried in Sir Peter’s coffin, and the sea has rendered them back to me, the hammers of God, pounding doggedly — . Ah, don't mind my weakness — it seems a pretty dreadful thing, and I'm only just out of prison—”

“Prison!” breathed Chris, his mind flitting helplessly from one astonishment to another.

“Oh, you didn't know,” said Hannah.

“You out of prison?” cried Chris with a flush of anger on his brow, “then, why am I going through — What dreadful thing is this, my friends?”

“Nothing very dreadful about it,” said Hannah, drying her eyes, with a broken laugh: “everything nice and clean, and all found. Nothing is dreadful, except — one thing. But how came you not to know, when everybody must know?”

“I seem to have been the victim of some conspiracy! You must all be seeking to drive me mad! Bentley, why have I never been told that this lady was in such a case —

“First of all, Sir Chris,” said old Bentley, “I assumed that you knew; secondly, I had instructions not to grieve you by referring to the matter.”

“Instructions! But from whom?”

“Oh, don't trouble about that now,” said Hannah. “Look here; I found these two parchments inside the viol—”

A guttural voice stopped her with the words, “It is all a lie”

All eyes had been mostly fixed upon Hannah, but now turned to Kathleen, decked that night in many jewels and flowers; they beheld her standing up, leaning forward, her right palm pressed upon the table, her left pressed against her left temple, as though there was pain there, her eyes staring toward Hannah, yet not somehow at Hannah, but at something, it seemed, beyond; when she said in that strange, low voice, “It is all a lie,” every one was hushed: two or three glanced behind Hannah to see whom the little maid was talking to; but before any one could say anything, Hannah's little boy, dressed in black velvet and gold, ran toward the table out of a recess where he had been playing with one of his nurses: he was running to Kathleen, but catching sight of Hannah, stopped midway between his two mamas, both of whom he loved very much, staring from one to the other, while his father looked to see what he would do, and his mother's eyes danced merrily at him; and presently, as his memory more awake, he moved toward Hannah, took hold of her skirt, and, with his head thrown back, murmured half to himself, "Mama." Hannah just rumbled his hair, and pinched his cheek. "There he was again," she wrote of him afterwards, "like a bad penny, prodigal son come home weary of the world." She did not kiss him before the crowd.

"So, Chris," she began to say, "you had my child—" but was interrupted by a cry from Chris and from all, for the little maid had fallen forward over the table, and at once the rather stiff gathering which Hannah had startled became a noise of tongues. "She has fainted!" "It is a stroke!" "Some water quickly!" "Make room — let me hold her head back!" "Quickly, Thomas, Dr. Williams!" — every one was moving, crowding, crying out something, while Chris, whom the sight of suffering always pierced to the quick, rushed from place to place, calling out what no one heard. In the midst of it Hannah said to Mr. Millings and the butler, "You two take her up," and soon the little maid was being borne away; but when she struggled midway, Hannah took her from the men to her shoulder, and ran up the lobby-stairs, the little boy still clinging to her skirt, the crowd following. Above, Hannah went into her old room whence the viol and box had been stolen, and shut out every one, except the boy and Mrs. Dene, with whose help she undid Kathleen's clothes, wet her brow, lit a lamp, did all that a nurse could, awaiting the doctor, then lay on the bed, almost over the dying girl, whispering at one moment of the gospel, and at the next pleading with Kathleen to make an effort, and not die. Presently Kathleen, who was breathing hard in the strait and article of death, said in a gross voice, "I buried the things." "Yes, yes," said Hannah, "but make an effort, will you? Summon all your powers—" "I stole him from your room," said Kathleen with fixed eyes. "Yes," said Hannah, weeping, "but Jesus cares nothing about that." Presently again Kathleen said in a feebler voice, "I was his little mother" sinking every moment. "Were you?" said Hannah, "and you always shall be, I promise you that; here he is, if you will only live; it is a question of will, just say, 'I won't die, life is mine' — Oh! if I could do it for you!" "Too late," said Kathleen, "my will is weakened." She smiled in saying this, and laid her right hand on Hannah's arm: it was like a caress. A minute later she reared, fell back, and the room was suddenly still and rid of her death-rattle, as when a clock stops, and a death stillness is heard where a ticking was heard. Hannah's fingers shut down the lids over the sightlessness of the beautiful eyes.

As she was getting down from the bed, a tap was heard, and the voice of Chris, calling, "Mayn't one come in?"

"Tell him I'm gone to London," whispered Hannah quickly to Mrs. Dene, catching up the child, and hurrying away through a side door.

"You can come in," said Mrs. Dene to those at the door: "the doctor will arrive too late."

Some of them went in, and looked at the still face on the bed. Chris, who could not stand such sights, just glanced round the room, and asked, "Where is Lady Wilson?"

"She is gone to London," said Mrs. Dene.

Chris looked dumfounded. He hurried down again to the library, gazed at the viol and watch and chain, read the will, which Hannah had left on the table. No one was there. For some time he sat with his head buried in his arms. Then he rang for old Bentley.

“You know, Bentley,” he said in a low voice, “that Lady Wilson contracted a second marriage?”

“Yes, Sir Chris: hence her imprisonment.”

“What on earth was her reason, my friend?”

“I have no idea: all the world has been amazed at it.”

“Can you remember the man’s name?”

“William Dawe, Sir Chris.”

“That’s the name! Now, how could this man be found, Bentley?”

“Why, he is at present living with his mother at Woodside, within a mile and a half of the Hall, Sir Chris: he attempted suicide after the conviction of Lady Wilson, but was saved, though they say he’s rather weak in the head now.”

“Could you contrive to have him here to-night?”

“I think so, Sir Chris.”

“Try, then, quickly, will you? Go yourself in a trap—”

Old Bentley hobbled off at his fastest gait; and Chris paced the library with quick steps, till in half an hour Willie Dawe, looking scared, was before him.

“Now, tell me, my friend,” said Chris: “how many children do you say that Lady Wilson has had?”

“Only one, sir,” answered Willie.

“But since I am the father of that one, why did you tell me that you were?”

“Miss Sheridan told me to say so, sir, begging your pardon.”

“Well, let that pass. But might you ever have been the father of a child of Lady Wilson?”

“Oh, God help us! Miss Hannah, sir?”

“I am sure that you tell the truth. But why on earth, then, did she go through a form of marriage with you?”

“As far as I could make it out, sir, she did it for your good.”

“Mine! But in what possible way?”

“She heard that you were going to get married in France, sir, and was afraid that you’d get taken up for bigamy, unless she got married first.”

At this Chris gazed at Willie Dawe without saying anything, then began to pace the library quickly with a flushed brow, till, dropping into a chair, he said to himself, “But it is pitiful,” and buried away his face, shedding tears.

Presently he sprang up, saying, “Bentley! is it true that Lady Wilson is gone to London?”

“I heard Mrs. Dene say so, Sir Chris.”

“But what for, my friend?”

“I have no idea, Sir Chris.”

“But where is she to be found? You, Dawe, do you know her address in London?”

Willie Dawe gave the Guilford Street address.

“Bentley,” said Chris, “tell Grimani that I start for London at once, and find out for me the hour of the next train.”

By 10.15 Chris and his valet were in a train, London bound.

CHAPTER XXXI

NEAR 1 A. m. Chris was knocking up the house in Guilford Street; and presently Mrs. Reid, the landlady, appeared in little more than a shawl.

“I am sorry to have had to disturb you,” said Chris, “but my business is most urgent. Is Lady Wilson here?”

“There never was any Lady Wilson, sir; there’s a Mrs.—”

“It’s the same. Is she not here? Don’t say no.

“She was here earlier in the night, but she’s gone to France.”

“France! What for?”

“That’s more than I can tell you.”

“But it is impossible for her to have gone to France to-night, since she was in Norfolk at 9.30.”

“That’s what she told me: that she was going to France at once.”

“And she left no address?”

“Yes, she did.”

“Ah, good news.”

“She said that if any one called, I was to give him an address which she wrote.”

“Good news. So that was why she came to you?”

“Yes, and to get me to cash a check for her. I’ll run and get the address.”

Mrs. Reid soon returned with a piece of paper on which was written, “Hannah Wilson, chez Madame Brault, 14 rue Boissy d’Anglas.” Chris, looking at the writing, wondered why it struck some fond chord in his soul:

it was because it was “Viola’s” writing; but he was as when one recognizes a face, yet forgets where one saw it.

“This will do excellently,” said he; “thank you very much.”

He then drove to Gray’s Inn; paced his sitting-room in a heat for the morning to come; slept for some time on a couch; and by the first train was off to France. By 5.30 p. m. he was on a fifth floor in the rue Boissy d’Anglas, at that door of Madame Brault’s to which the quaint maid had once come from Chateaubrun, in order to tell Hannah that Chris was going to marry Yvonne de Pencharry-Strannik.

“Is Madame Wilson here?” he asked of the pension-boy.

“No, sir, not here.”

“Is she expected?”

“Not that I know, sir. I’ll ask.”

It turned out that Hannah was not even expected, and Chris drove away in very low spirits. Stopping his carriage at the first post-office, he sent a telegram to one Rowland-Jones of Cavendish Square, London, saying, “Am in the greatest trouble. Pray come at once to me in rue de Rome.”

He passed a wretched night, seeing no one; but when he opened his eyes the next morning, there was Rowland-Jones, a naval officer, a man of square brow and strong eye, at his bedside.

“Oh, thank Heaven, here you are, Jack! How splendid of you,” said Chris; “now I am safe”; and he poured out the whole story of Hannah to Jack.

“But where’s the trouble?” asked Jack: “how could you expect to find her in Paris at five yesterday when she couldn’t possibly have left London the night before?”

“I had forgotten that,” said Chris meekly.

“She’s probably now at the rue Boissy d’Anglas,” said Jack: “heave your old carcase overboard that dream-ship, and let us be there before she goes out.”

“Had any breakfast?”

“No, and no particular appetite: I am in love with your wife, Chris.”

“Isn’t she splendid!”

“There seem to be other sorts of music than the ‘octave and perfect cadence,’ Chris.”

“I shall have her today, Jack!”

“Perhaps: and she you tomorrow. Look alive now.”

“Grimani!” shouted Chris, hastening out of bed, and before long the two friends were driving to the rue Boissy d’Anglas. At Madame Brault’s Chris asked if Madame Wilson was come.

“Come and gone, sir,” was the answer.

“Gone!”

“She arrived at nine last night, sir, slept here, and went away this morning at half-past seven.”

“What is one to do, my friend?” said Chris, half crying, to Rowland-Jones.

“Did she leave no address?” asked Rowland-Jones.

“An address in Normandy, sir, for letters to be sent.”

“Let us have that address.”

“She did not leave it to be given to any one, sir.”

“Oh, but we are exceptions,” said Rowland-Jones: and a battle began between him and the boy, ending in a British victory at a cost of ten francs. Hannah had left the address, “Villa des Lilas, St. Pierre-les-Elbeuf, Normandy.”

“We must be after her instantly,” said Rowland-Jones, as they stepped into the carriage.

“But we have had nothing to eat!” said Chris.

“We must eat train food.”

“Let’s stop and wire to Grimani to follow with—”

“Ah, let’s not mind about Grimani; we mustn’t lose an instant: I’ll tell you why presently.”

But at the Gare St. Lazare they had to wait ten minutes for a train, and during that time Chris wired to Grimani to follow with the fiddles and mute. They then set out.

“Look here, Chris,” said Rowland-Jones over breakfast in the train: “one of two things, either she doesn’t want you—”

“But can any love be like hers for me?” groaned Chris.

“You are thinking of five years ago, Chris; five years is more than a lustrum in the story of a woman’s heart—”

“Oh, she despises women.”

“But we only despise what we are in peril of resembling, lad. We worship the cow, but scorn the coward. Lady Wilson, be sure, is dimly conscious of her nether half, which duly exists. Let’s be in no doubt as to her sex, Chris. Either she doesn’t want you, or — she’s playing a game: quite possibly the latter. Why else should she scurry through Normandy, spend one night in Paris, and then be off to Normandy again in this way? I’ll bet that the woman is only playing tit for tat; you once ran away from her, and she says, ‘Now it is my turn, let him catch me, if he really wants me.’ It’s feminine because simple. Women, of course are just so elementary as the mastodon. I hope that I am right in this case. If so, our plan is to catch her quickly — to pounce upon her by mere grimness of forced marches, or she’ll lead us a dance over half the globe, until funds fail her.”

“It is cruel, my friend,” said Chris.

“It is anything but amusing: and it would be no use our sitting down somewhere, waiting for her to relent and turn up of her own accord. She evidently means to be won by eagerness and strategy, and will never give herself. Ah, I’d rather like to have the permanent handling of this particular gamy lass.”

“My dear Jack, don’t desire my wife.”

“Oh, after you Chris: gamy and bigamy are unrelated, to say nothing of trigamy. We’ll soon see what Elbeuf has in store—”

Ninety minutes from Paris they arrived at Elbeuf, got a trap, and drove two miles to St. Pierre, to find the Villa des Lilas on the top of a hill in the middle of pine forests. But Hannah was not there. “Madame Wilson,” said the proprietress, “after an hour’s stay, left for Gournay-en-Brey, messieurs”: and to Gournay-en-Brey the two friends hastened.

CHAPTER XXXII

AT THE END of three days' hunt after the flights and dodges of "an Englishwoman in blue nurse's costume with a child," Chris gave up, saying:

"I can't Jack — I must have a decent night's rest — I am utterly done for with the damned trains — I am not made for this kind of work—" and he threw himself down wearily. They were now at an old inn in the romantic country round Domfront, in William-the-Conqueror land. They had just been told that Hannah was no longer at the inn. It was about nine in the night.

"But doesn't she ever sleep?" asked Rowland-Jones: "she must have the strength of three mules; and that boy with her — how on earth does she do it? She must have reared him on lioness-milk, the splendid wretch."

"I, for my part, couldn't keep it up to-night, my friend," said Chris. "To-morrow morning we will resume operations—"

"That's as you like, Chris, but never say that Jack Rowland-Jones was beaten by this lady. I am prepared to go on now, and to go on till I am no more; give me carte blanche to act alone, and I even say that I shall have her here within twenty-four hours, if she have the cunning of the devil and the vigor of a cart-horse."

"Do so, if you like," said Chris; "but when are they going to bring us something to eat — ?"

"Just get up now, and write me an authorization to act for you," said Rowland-Jones.

Chris got up, and was in the act of writing out a statement that Mr. Rowland-Jones was his friend, when from behind the old wainscoting was heard the call, "Papa!" and he leapt to his feet.

"That your child's voice?" asked Rowland-Jones excitedly.

"I think so!"

Rowland-Jones darted to one of the two doors, only to find it locked, caught up his hat, and rushed out of the other. Though solidly built and of a certain age, he was nimble, and could run.

Chris awaited his return eagerly. But he had to eat his meal alone, for Rowland-Jones did not come. He sat, nodding with sleep, till one o'clock, but his friend did not appear.

All the next day Rowland-Jones did not come. Chris was like a lost man: had no idea what to do now, did not know where Grimani was, had no fiddles: he could only stroll about and moon, with a forlorn movement of the eyebrow.

And like that first day a second passed. Chris was now in purgatory. But on the third morning he received three letters: one was from his friend, and this he tore open first. It told of Rowland-Jones's adventures during the past two days, and of his failure to catch Lady Wilson. "I actually saw her," he wrote, "at the station at Bayeux. As I rushed upon the platform, I distinctly caught sight of her head in the velvet bonnet looking out eagerly of a window of the train. She drew in at sight of me. The train was already moving; and I just had time to pitch into the nearest compartment, without a ticket. I felt that I had her safe now: we were in the same train — a through train to St. Lo. Imagine my disgust on reaching St. Lo. to find that she wasn't in the train. I can only conclude that, as a signal was against us at one place, she must have leapt upon the metals on the off-side when the train stopped. That's the only hypothesis: the night was dark. I'm sure I don't know what to do next: she is quite lost, . . . " etc.

Having read this Chris tore open the second letter: the handwriting struck him as familiar: he glanced first to the bottom, and saw— "Viola"!

"Beloved," he read, "it is a long time since I have written you. There have been reasons, apart from the fact that it is you who owe me a letter. But let there be no more letter-writing between us henceforth: for the long-loved day will have come, even as you read this, when Viola will be ready to leave all to be with you. Meet me, then, at the Gare St. Lazare tomorrow at 2.15 p. m., under the clock. I shall have in my hand the gift beyond price which I have so long promised you.

"Yours till death.

"Viola."

Chris was so accustomed to the notion of "Viola" knowing of his doings in mysterious ways that he hardly asked himself how she could know of his stay in that little inn. He had again the old thrill on reading her letter. Already he had guessed that the quaint maid could not have been "Viola," and here was the real "Viola," the romantic, the high-minded, about to show herself, to give herself, at last. He was all at once eager to set out, curious to see her, to see her gift. But into his eagerness stole an awkward thought of Hannah. That Hannah might be "Viola" never entered his head; if for no other reason, because the Hannah whom he had married at Orrock couldn't play the violin.

He was so flushed by Viola's letter, that he hardly had the patience to open the third letter: he did so, however, glanced at the bottom, and saw— "Hannah"!

Hannah had written this letter in a round hand very different from “Viola’s,” and she said:

“Dear Chris:

“If you really wish to see me, I shall be on the sea-cliffs above Barc-la-Forêt tomorrow at 2 p. m. sharp. Barc-la-Forêt is a village two miles north of Coutances. I hope your friend, Mr. Rowland-Jones, continues well?

Your wife,

“Hannah.”

On reading this, Chris was in the greatest joy and the greatest trouble at the same time. One of two ladies, he felt with bitterness, would wait in vain for his coming that day: for he could not be at the coast to meet Hannah at 2 p. m. and in Paris to meet “Viola” at 2.15. He must therefore choose between them the one that he liked the best; and he was so torn by this trial, that, at one time, pacing about the old flagstones of the inn-kitchen, he threw his arms up, crying out that all the world must be in a conspiracy to drive him mad.

However, he had to make up his mind, so, having sent a telegram to Rowland-Jones where to join him, by 1 o’clock, an hour too soon, he was walking about the sea-cliffs above Barc-la-Forêt. In the village itself a fete was going on, and very faint tones of music were caught by his ear among the noises of the wind. It was a boisterous day, but very bright and warm for that time of year. The ground up there was hard, grown in patches with grass and scrub; and pretty far away down below was the sea, a lovely sight, as it were a very great host jogging northeastward on a gay pilgrimage. Chris had to hold on his hat against the puffs of the wind, and presently, tired of its power over him, he lay with his back to a rock, gazing up at the clouds and blue of the sky: all was large-minded beyond wonder — the sky, the sea, the earth — the whole a-move as at some heyday and fair, and soon he had a feeling that the pillars of all that Walhalla tottered upon him, that the very cliff under him was adrift with the rest of the dream-stuff and pageant; his spirit seemed to swoon into that awful revelry of the Most High; he became It; and no longer knew if he was on his head or on his heels. Scrambling in a scare to his feet, he walked about again with the winds in his ears, eager to hold Hannah in his arms, but grieved to the heart, too, for “Viola.” It was % o’clock. At that hour “Viola,” he thought, was already perhaps on her way to the Gare St. Lazare, and she would be waiting for him in vain, with the gift in her hand, she who had for two years been his spiritual wife, to whom he had sworn many oaths of love. There, however, was Hannah coming up over the bend of the hill, with her legs expressed, and her face held sideward to it, as when a lady is shy, and blushes; and in her hand was the little boy’s. Chris hurried to meet her.

“Oh, you did come,” she said laughing.

“Is it surprising?” he asked.

“It is, a little. What about ‘Viola’? Did you send any one to meet her?”

“I had no one to send. How on earth do you know about ‘Viola’?”

“I know very well. If you had gone to meet her instead of me, you wouldn’t have met her, and you wouldn’t have seen me for another year.”

“Why would I not have met her? Hannah! Are you ‘Viola’?”

“You would have known it, if you had known the handwriting and mind of your wife, as a man should. As for the gift, I’m afraid it’s a little stale to you now, but here it is, such as he is. See, I give him a kiss to give to you.”

Chris took the boy to his breast, saying, “I love him almost as much as I worship his dear, dear mother.”

“You do love me now?”

“Oh, Hannah.”

“Well, it’s nice to hear. Tell it me once secretly in my ear out here on this lonely hill, so that even our child mayn’t hear, and then I’ll never forget.”

“With a joy as deep as being,” whispered Chris, “with a most fresh and wonderful ravishment.”

“All right, that’ll keep Hannah going for some years, like everlasting bread to feed upon in the heart by faith. Here’s my hand, Chris, ‘with my heart in it.’”

Chris took and kissed the hand, and was about to kiss more, when Hannah said, “Look!” and he saw Rowland-Jones and Grimani coming along the cliffs from the north.

“That man and I will remember each other,” said Hannah, with fun in the corners of her mouth.

“Lady Wilson, I think?” said Rowland-Jones when he came up.

“Mr. Rowland-Jones?” said Hannah with a grave face: “surely we have seen each other before?”

“I have had the honor of seeing part of your ladyship,” said Rowland-Jones demurely.

“And not the best part either, I think!” cried Hannah: “I am strongest about the feet!”

“I kiss them with sincerity,” said Rowland-Jones.

“Well, no, don’t take it so abjectly,” said Hannah: “it was only a chance — if I hadn’t beaten you, you would have beaten me. I happened to overhear you in the inn at Domfront when you vowed to Chris that you would catch me or perish, so thought to myself, ‘Well, then, now for it.’ But it was only a chance — My husband’s two best friends are equals, and can shake hands.”

A hearty handshake was exchanged, and they went down the hill, till they came to the village fete, where all kinds of merriment were on foot; and here it came into Chris's head to give himself to Barc-la-Forêt that one day in Time, and play. He had not handled a fiddle for days, and the spirit came upon him. He caught his Bergonzi from Grimani, and struck in with the other fiddles on the green, nor was it long before he alone was playing. Never was the ear of Barc-la-Forêt tickled by the gospel of such a mirth; every one forsook all else, and crowded to jig round the frivolous seraph dropped down among them, wondering that out of that staid monsieur such riches of fun should gush: there he stood — stout, respectable — in his frock-coat and top-hat; the top-hat, however, was rather cocked back, one leg cocked forward, and, if one looked closely, there was a certain butting and instigation of his brow which was in the very spirit of revel and godless company. They all came and jigged, Hannah jigging with Rowland-Jones, till he was out of breath, then with the village-lads, then with Rowland-Jones again, letting slip side-glances at Chris, her legs plying in a stubbornness of glee, answering still to the unrelenting spur of his joy, while still the brook of his improvization flowed on, and the dancing grew ever larger and crazier round the giggle of his G and the skittishness of his tittering chanterelle. It was near five o'clock when he tossed the fiddle to Grimani, smiled with Hannah, and said to Rowland-Jones, "I am hungry, my friend."

They three, with Chrisie and Grimani, then drove in a cart to high-set Coutances, dined there, and went on to Caen, from which Rowland-Jones took train to Ouistreham, the port of Caen, so as to get back to England; while Chris and Hannah went to Rouen; from Rouen they started the next day for Orrock.

THE END

The Yellow Wave (1905)

The Yellow Wave was first published by Ward, Lock & Co in London in 1905. The novel draws on the Russo-Japanese War of 1904-5, which resulted in a decisive Japanese victory, much to the surprise of the dominant international powers of the time. The war undermined the prestige and strength of the Russian Empire both abroad and at home. The humiliating defeat and loss of Russian life during the war further exacerbated the anger and frustration at Tsarist autocratic rule and contributed to the 1905 Russian Revolution. This mass uprising of social and political dissent led to constitutional change and revealed the deep and ultimately unsolvable tensions of the Tsarist regime.

The Yellow Wave is to some extent a continuation of Shiel's racist ideas about East Asians that he first voiced in The Yellow Danger. One part of the plot is a sinister plan to create a pan-European conflict that would then provide the opportunity for East Asian dominance of the continent. Although Shiel once again exploits the xenophobic fears of white Europeans, the primary focus of the novel is a Romeo and Juliet style love story between a young Japanese man and a Russian woman, who are on opposing sides in the war. The romance increasingly dominates the narrative as the novel progresses, resulting in a richer and more complex book than one exclusively based on exciting the racially prejudiced anxieties of the time.

The first edition'

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I

CHAPTER II

CHAPTER III

CHAPTER IV

CHAPTER V

CHAPTER VI

CHAPTER VII

CHAPTER VIII

CHAPTER IX

CHAPTER X

CHAPTER XI

CHAPTER XII

CHAPTER XIII

CHAPTER XIV

CHAPTER XV

CHAPTER XVI

CHAPTER XVII

CHAPTER XVIII

CHAPTER XIX

CHAPTER XX

CHAPTER XXI

CHAPTER XXII

CHAPTER XXIII

CHAPTER XXIV

THE YELLOW WAVE

By

M. P. STEEL

AUTHOR OF "THE YELLOW PERIL" "THE EVIL THAT MEN DO"
"LORD OF THE SEA" "COLD STEEL" ETC ETC

ILLUSTRATIONS BY HENRY AUSTIN

LONDON

WARD LOCK & CO LIMITED

1905

The first edition's title page

"The man held my left sleeve, walking at his ease." (Page 211)
The Yellow Wave [Frontispiece]

The original frontispiece

CHAPTER I

THE TIGER-HUNTERS

THIS NAME OF “Tiger-hunters,” taken by the well-known Society started in Tokio four months before the war was borrowed from a gang of Korean bandits with whom the Japanese society had nothing to do. There are no tigers in Japan, but there are in Korea; and the Japanese have a saying that “to fight with Koreans is to fight with tigers,” because all the Koreans run away, and only tigers remain to be dealt with.

These Japanese “Tiger-hunters” (Tora-gari) were a half-secret body, whose aims seem to have been at first social rather than political: for, as we know, Japan seethes with the thoughts of our Western Socialists, and is big with change. However, as the war went on, the “Tiger-hunters,” remaining social, became political also, like the “Boxers” of China. With that upstartness of all young Japanese things, the “Tiger-hunters” took upon themselves to have their say even in the strategy of the war; no interest of the nation remained beyond their meddling; and like that “Jacobin Club” which started as a debating-society during the Revolution, but soon became the voice of France, so with the “Tiger-hunters.”

Among them were men of all classes, from Daimio’s son to seller of straw-sandals; they spread into branches as a gourd grows; formed vigilance-committees, correspondence-committees; admission to membership was made with a rite; their headquarters came to be an old temple-grove among the hills round Nagasaki; and the meetings there were often at night.

Seven “Tiger-hunters” met in the Japanese restaurant in London on the night of the nth of January, when the war was a year old, among them being Baron M — , lately of the General Staff, and now President of the Nagasaki branch of the “Tiger-hunters.”

Hardly a reader will know this restaurant; just where it is one may not tell: but it is in a residential block in Bloomsbury. One passes down a corridor, through a courtyard, up a stair, and knocks at a door on which are painted some Japanese words. It is kept by a French girl and a hobbling old Jap. There are two bare rooms in which one sits and in which one eats; and the electric light over the eating-table looks down upon the oddest way of dining — as it were the grimace of a dinner, dinner and light together making a symbol of New Japan, East and West met at last, and jiggling together to the tune of the funniest ominous yankee-doodle-doo.

Six men — four Japanese, one English, one American — sat round the table. Snacks of raw fish were before them, with a sauce which somehow “cooked” the fish; then came six pans of raw meat and onions on six spirit-lamps, and they cooked the meat, mixing sugar with it, deftly snatching out hot tit-bits meanwhile into their mouths with their chopsticks, like long-beaked birds: for I take it that whereas forks are instead of the claws of beasts, chopsticks are instead of the beaks of birds: but forks are better than chopsticks, for beasts are better than birds. Before the meat was cooked there was a knock, and in came Baron M — , who made the seventh man. The six bowed themselves, o’jigi, before him; and the baron ate with them.

At that date there was much talk of peace everywhere — in fact, a sort of armistice had been on foot for two weeks.

It was not that the two peoples were “knocked out,” but that it was now seen everywhere that whichever of the two won the duel, the “balance of power” would be upset: if Russia, that might mean a Slav Asia; if Japan, that would be the Yellow Danger come: either way might be followed by more war, till the fire became a globe of fire.

The hope was, that the issue might be an “as you! were” for the two Powers; and toward this most people were now working.

Peace, however, was hardly the thought in the mind of the yellow races at that moment; nor the aim of the “Tiger-hunters” in especial; nor of Baron M — above all men.

The baron stirred his mass of meat, sugar, and onions over the spirit-lamp, and snatched out hot tit-bits into his mouth like a hungry bird. He sat on the edge of his chair, one leg under it, the other cocked forward, with something very nimble in his air, as though he was on the very point of springing at someone. He was a man of “a fierce countenance.” His paltry body, clad in rough European clothes, his great head, with its scowl and its scanty hair, gave him somewhat the look of a yellow, or rather dark-brown, Napoleon.

Now cups of tea were brought in by the French girl, tea clear as water, with a greenish tint in it. The Englishman, Mr. Paul England, and the American, Mr. Allan Petersen, talked together in low voices. The others were silent.

Dessert came — pickles — improbable tit-bits of salted vegetables; for whereas we others eat salt with meat, they ate sugar, but whereas we eat sugar for dessert, they ate salt.

Suddenly Baron M — leapt with a sort of fierceness to his feet, and his face grew black-red, in the manner of the tragic actors of Japan. He said in French:

“My friends, the time Seems come for us to make the move which was long ago foreseen by the honourable society, led by me, to which we belong. It was foreseen that when our arms began to spread westward, then would come the white ‘intervention,’ this talk of ‘peace’: for we know of a fear in the heart of Europe, lest our struggle with first one and then the other shall become a struggle against all together, and lest all together prove like sea-froth in the Whang-Hai when the autumn typhoon begins to blow.”

“Hear, hear,” muttered Mr. England, rocking backward on his chair; Mr. Petersen, too, said: “Vive le Japon!”

“Meantime,” went on the baron, “the war must go on to its end. This talk of ‘peace’ seems serious, but we here are fixed upon other things. The proposed wrecking of a Russian supply-train by us is good; but I say now that I do not think this enough. I say that each nation should be afresh inflamed by an outrage done by the other; let us so contrive, therefore, that an outrage shall be done, not only by Japanese upon Russia, but by Russians upon Japan also. Suppose I say, let a Japanese be assassinated by a Russian in the streets of St. Petersburg? I offer myself as the Japanese to be assassinated.”

“You, baron?” cried everyone round the table.

“My friends,” said the baron, “I, too, know that in my head I carry the future of Asia. But am I alone in this? Japan is the breeding-ground of heroes, the mother of all unbridled greatness. In many beside me the seed of Change has been sown; many will press forward to fill my place. Moreover, in this one respect I am unique, that I alone may be fairly certain of assassination, if at the present moment I stay only four or five days in St. Petersburg.”

“But why so?” asked several voices.

“Because General Prince Devriloff is at present in St. Petersburg,” said Baron M — .

“But for what reason does Devriloff so specially hunger for your life?” asked Petersen.

A struggle seemed to take place within Baron M — ; he sat again on the edge of his chair. After a minute he said:

“You have all heard of the tragic death of my wife, the Baroness Umé (Plum-blossom). I will tell you now how it was.

“But for this Devriloff, and for me, this war may not have been just yet. We could hasten it, he being a son-in-law of whom you know, and I being whom you know; and he longed for it in the hope that I might die in battle, as I longed for it in the hope of seeing him a prisoner in the dungeon of my yashiki.

“It is now nine years that Prince Devriloff has lived in fear of me, knowing that some day a dagger of my race will not fail to find his heart. Once in Tokio, accordingly, twice in Kioto, once in Paris, his agents have attempted my life. Thrice I have attempted his.

“Nine years ago Devriloff was a military attaché in Tokio. My wife’s name was Umé. Devriloff first saw her at the Imperial Birthday-ball. This is a man of maniac passions. Devriloff became enamoured of my wife, Umé. But the women of our country do not sympathise with these intemperate sicknesses of the affections. When Devriloff declared his passion to the Baroness Umé, Umé declared to him her passion for her husband and for her boy, Yoshio, then nine years old. The Russian, however, looks upon us as a race nearly allied with the ape, and the rebuff of my wife was to Devriloff no more than the prank of a foal. He had patience.

“Of all this Umé, who must have suffered much, said nothing to me: she was afraid for my life, and afraid that, if she told me, my danger would be still greater. I only know the pitiful details of the persecution which was brought to bear upon her by some leaves which she left behind her on her death. I was away from the seat of Government for three months at the Yokosuka Naval Station, and during that time Devriloff often threw out threats to have me done to death unless the baroness departed from her duty to me. My poor wife was brought to such a state of terror by this foreigner, that, as I now know, She once attempted in my absence to take her own life in order to preserve mine.

“She was still a young woman, tender-hearted and timid. During three days after my return to the capital I noticed in her manner a good deal of agitation, and reproved her for it, a reproof which she received, alas, with a cringing submission to her husband. She would pray me not to go out alone. In the early mornings I would see her prostrate with tears at the household altar; but I did not understand any of these signs; and since, as you know, much piety is looked upon as a fault among the women of our people, I too often chided my lady for her prayers and tears.

“On the third day after my return to Tokio, Umé was forced to meet Devriloff in the grounds of my palace. She then told him that, since he was fixed upon having his will, or upon killing me, let the deed be done that night; immediately after my death, she said to Devriloff, she would be found less hard-hearted. Devriloff must have been a fool to understand so little the temper of the women of our people: but he believed her. Umé described to this fiend a spot in which she wished him to believe that I slept; she told him that she would find means to persuade me that night to let down my hair before I went to sleep — for I still stubbornly wore the old samurai queue — so that he should know by a touch in the dark that it was I. Devriloff was to cut off my head, and take it away, in order that the crime might have the look of having been committed by one of our young soshi for Conservative-political reasons. This having been arranged, Umé endured the embrace of the Russian, and they parted.’

“All these details I have in the writing of my wife herself.

“That night before we lay down to sleep, Umé spoke to me of our son, Yoshio, dwelling upon his beauty, his good and gentle conduct, and his love of the fine arts; she said that he would be an honour to his country and to his father, My wife then bade me a tender and reverent good-night, and I was soon asleep. I calculate that she must have risen from my side very shortly after this. She went and lay down in the spot where she had told Devriloff that I would sleep; and she awaited the assassin’s knife in her own throat. Honourable friends, I do not know how long she lay there waiting, what prayers she said for her boy and for me, nor what thoughts about the life and death of us mortal beings passed through her spirit during those hours. But in the dead of the night her head was removed from her body. She must have died dumbly, for if there had been any outcry or very deep groan, I, who sleep lightly, must have heard it; but I heard nothing.

“The assassin, on going outside, must have seen by the moonlight whose head was in his hand. Was the assassin Devriloff himself, or an agent of Devriloff? I do not know. Whoever he was, he must have been pierced with some feeling of terror or pity at that sight, for he dropped the head on a bridge in my garden, and there, half-buried in lotus-blossoms, with the hair loose, it was found the next morning. My friends, my companions—”

The baron was forced to stop, though his face still showed no sign of feeling.

“Such,” he continued after a minute, “was the fate of my wife.

“The same day Devriloff fled from Tokio. He has thrice escaped me, and four times I have escaped him. But between that man and me there remains a point to be settled.

“I have little doubt, therefore, that if I go openly to St. Petersburg while Devriloff is away from the seat of war, my death may follow. In the hand of Yoshio, my son, it will remain to avenge his mother; and my death should raise an outcry in Nippon that will end this peace-talk.

“As a matter of form, I had to put this proposal before you Tiger-hunters, and I await your honourable reply.”

Before anyone answered, the other four Japanese hurriedly laid their heads together with whispers and noddings; then one of them whispered with Messrs. England and Petersen, who also nodded their heads with energy; and finally one of the Japanese said aloud to Baron M — : “We agree to this.”

They soon afterwards left the restaurant, and drove in cabs to the Embassy in Grosvenor Gardens; the next day, these seven, together with Yoshio, M— ‘s son, a young man of eighteen years, started with passports for St. Petersburg.

CHAPTER II

THE PAVLOVNA BALL

THE PEACE-PARTY IN St. Petersburg was fairly strong, including most of the Cabinet and Asiatic Committee, the Tsar himself, the Duchesse Marie Pavlovna, and “Miss” S — , the celebrated agent at the court of Korea before the war. On the same side were also the merchants and middle-class; while the enthusiasts for war were such as Cienkewitz, Alexeieff, Devriloff.

The Japanese party of eight had therefore no sooner arrived than the New Year festivities took on a tone of added gaiety on their account. They did not appear at the Winter Palace itself, but the semi-official peace-party entertained them at a round of functions. As for Devriloff, he kept to his house on a pretence of illness.

Meanwhile, the one person in St. Petersburg who realized the danger to peace which lay in the Japanese visit was Miss S — , for she knew the story of the blood-feud between M — and Devriloff; and she feared that one or the other would be done to death.

St. Petersburg wore its usual winter aspect of jollity, like a city of children at a Christmas party.

Shops and public offices were closed, and all classes were giving themselves to New Year calls. Snow was on the ground, the droshky was no more seen, and the streets were wild with sledges full of rosy-red beauty in all its furs.

On the fifth morning after the arrival of the Japanese, Miss S — , one of the busiest intriguers for “peace,” paid a visit to the Devriloff Palace in the Great Morskaia. She wished to know how Devriloff was filling up his time in bed, and lavished caresses upon Nadine, the General’s daughter, whom she found in a boudoir. “Dear child,” she said several times, “you grow more beautiful every day; there is no longer any doubt that you are about to be the belle of Petersburg society.” She kissed the cheeks of Nadine with warmth.

Miss S — was a lady past middle-age, a stout, motherly type, but with strong eyes which made likely the story that her power over the King of Korea had been due to hypnotism.

As for Nadine, she was a girl of sixteen who had only just made her début, but formed like a Venus, hairy with black hair, a shade of moustache on her lip, and blazing eyes that betokened passion.

“Are you going to the Pavlovna ball to-morrow night?” asked Miss S — after some talk.

“Yes, my aunt,” replied the young girl; “the duchesse herself is to chaperone me.”

“It is such a pity that your poor papa will not be able to go, Nadine, since the ball is the event of the New Year. He still keeps to his bed, then?”

“Yes, my aunt,” answered Nadine; “he has a fever caught during the campaign. But I think that he may still be able to go to the Pavlovna ball, for he said something to me in that sense when I visited his bedside this morning.”

“Ah, he said that,” thought Miss S — . “He “foresees, then, that he will be well by to-morrow night... Well, Nadine, that will be charming to have with you your papa, who must be doubly dear to your heart after his exposure to this terrible and wicked war. I suppose, Nadine, that for the present he receives no one — attends to no business?”

“No, my aunt,” answered Nadine, sipping her chocolate with ennui, “I do not think so; the doctor... Oh! but do you remember old Ivan Shtcherbakoff whom you saw at our Kharkoff palace last year? This dear old Amurski Cossack nursed me in his arms—” the lovely girl’s palms met in a clap.

“Well, what of Ivan Shtcherbakoff?” asked Miss S — .

“Papa has had him come up to the capital to nurse him, and Ivan Shtcherbakoff is here!”

“To nurse him!” breathed Miss S — ; and at once she thought: “Then it is by Ivan Shtcherbakoff’s hand that M — is to die! for the prince is not really ill, and needs no one to ‘nurse’ him, least of all an old Amurski Cossack like Ivan Shtcherbakoff; and since he thinks of going to the Pavlovna ball to-morrow night, therefore he must have arranged that the deed shall be done between now and then.” But before Miss S — could pump anything further from the young girl, General Prince Devriloff himself stood in the doorway, robed in a dressing-gown barbaric with gold and crimson.

Miss S — leapt up to receive his kiss on her cheek, and, congratulating him on his getting up, led him to a chair.

A laugh came from the General’s throat which seemed to utter the sound “gol, gol, gol.” He was a gallant, huge figure of a man, hairy with flying sheaves of beard, and a great black head flat at the back.

“So, then, as I hear, you are for the Pavlovna ball, General?” said Miss S — .

“It is possible,” answered the prince.

“The Japanese are to be present.”

“What, the monkeys? Gol, gol, gol!” laughed the prince.

“Oh, papa, I like them, the Japanese!” remarked Nadine, her cigarette-smoke paying out from her lips like incense from a thurible of coral; and, in fact, the young girl’s penchant for the nation which her father so hated was to be seen in the style of her boudoir, which was crowded with Japanese art, Kyoto silks, and lacquer of green, crimson and gold. Nadine’s morning-gown itself was sashed with Japanese work, and in her hair were two of the flower-pins which they call kanzashis. Over everything were strewn masses of violets: these, however, were not there because they were liked, but for another reason which may perhaps be told later on.

“Here is a cosmopolitan young lady,” said Prince Devriloff, “who admires the enemies of her country and displeases her father. What? Gol, gol!”

“Well, that is the whim of a child,” said Miss S — . “And admit, General, that the Japanese have their good points, too. They die with éclat — they die bravely.”

“Don’t apes?” asked the General. “Apes are brave! What? And it is no more to kill one of them than to kill an ape.”

“Oh, papa? c’est trop fort,” cried Nadine.

“The General is not serious,” said Miss S — .

“I am. This war against them is only a hunting expedition,” said Prince Devriloff. “It is like shooting big game in Transcaspia.”

“But the big game are rather capturing the men, aren’t they?” said Miss S — with some spite.

“What!” cried the General; “they are only defeating themselves! It is not a war, it is a hunting expedition! As to you, young lady, I desire you to be careful lest one of those creatures touch your hand at the Pavlovna ball. Their national disease is leprosy: the monkeys all have it more or less, I think. What? Gol, gol!”

The morning's tittle-tattle went on in this way for some time. Miss S — seemed in no hurry to depart. She turned the talk upon Ivan Shtcherbakoff, the Amurski Cossack whom Devriloff had brought up from the country; and she went away sure that this Shtcherbakoff was to be the agent in Prince Devriloff's hand of the death of Baron M — .

As she stepped into her sleigh, all her show of leisure before the prince and Nadine gave place to the greatest eagerness. The sleigh flew from the Devriloff palace toward the suburb of Novoya Derevnnya, a quiet quarter of the town, all gardens and villas; but she went thither by a roundabout road, and alighted some way from the house which she wished to go to, namely, the villa in which Baron M — , together with his son and two of the Japanese, was staying.

She was led up to a drawing-room, and soon the baron joined her with his cold bow.

From a room near by came a sound of music — the twang of the koto — made by the young man, Yoshio, who was a poet, a musician, a master of several arts; and, as Miss S — and the baron spoke together, outside one of the two doors stood one of the two Japanese listening, and outside the other door the other.

“But, monsieur le baron,” said Miss S — after some beating about the bush, “you cannot be called a friend of peace.”

“I am sorry, if that is so,” answered Baron M — .

“Is it not so?”

“It is well known that your judgments are always correct,” said the baron with a bow.

“The Russians are famous for doing private injuries to citizens of the countries with which they are at war,” said Miss S — ; “yet you and your party come here. It is discouraging to the workers for peace, monsieur.”

“I am here by the courtesy of the Russian authorities—” began Baron M — blandly.

“But you stay with us; you linger five days. It becomes excruciating, monsieur le baron!”

“What! you wish me away — I who am your guest? That seems little hospitable.”

“But let us be sincere. You expose yourself to such terrible dangers!”

“Do you happen to know, then, of someone who wishes to assassinate me?” asked the baron.

“Ah, that smile of you Japanese, which would defy the lightning itself!” said Miss S — . “But the danger is nearer than you may think, baron. Whatever were your real motives in coming to St. Petersburg, everyone may not believe them to be so harmless as I do; and others may seek to do to you beforehand that which you are believed to wish to do to them. You will, I think, be at the Pavlovna ball to-morrow?”

“I hope so.”

“I have heard that Prince Devriloff, who has been ill, foresees that he will be well enough to be there.”

“Ah,” answered Baron M — , “the prince and I have met, I think. Nine years ago it was, in Tokio; three months ago we almost met again near Liaoyang, when I was the guest of an officer who was occupying a position with only 1,000 men, while the prince, with 9,000, was hardly ten versts away. If he had attacked, we should have been undone; but we plied his spies with false information as to the strength of our supports, and he forewent the pleasure of meeting me. He did not know that I was there, and fate was against the meeting then. But perhaps at the Pavlovna ball we may meet again?”

“I doubt that... Look here, there is a man called Ivan Shtcherbakoff,” said Miss S — suddenly, “who is a — fanatic. I have this news on good authority, and you may rely upon it. This man is sworn to take your life between now and to-morrow night.”

“Yes! What kind of man?” asked Baron M — with a show of alarm.

“A peasant: tall, raw-boned, sallow, with a long beard, a soldierly carriage, and a scar across his brow. Beware of him, baron.”

The baron smiled, storing up Shtcherbakoff’s appearance in his mind, but for the opposite reason to that which Miss S — wished, namely, in order to expose himself to a man with this appearance.

But at the same time that Baron M — stored up her description of Shtcherbakoff, the two Japanese listening outside the doors were also making a note of that description for their own ends.

Miss S — went away satisfied that she had done a good stroke for “peace,” and that Devriloff would be baulked in his designs upon M — this time. As for M — , left alone, he paced the room twice with quick steps, then, looking out of one of the doors, called “Yoshio!”

Yoshio hurried in with a brush in one hand and a painting in the other, which he looked at even as he ran. This must have angered the baron, for he caught the painting out of the young man’s hand and tore it into four pieces, muttering the words: “Too much girl’s-work.”

The young man stood with a modest air. He had a touch of pink on the cheeks, was slim, and really beautiful, as some Japanese are in youth.

“Yoshio?” said the baron.

“Yes, father,” breathed the boy.

“You are almost a man now.”

“Hai, chichi uyi (yes, father).”

“Have you forgotten your mother?”

“Iya, chichi uyi (no, father).”

“Yoshio, when nations are in a state of war, many an act which at another time no civilized man would do in certain ways or places becomes legitimate in just those ways and places. The time is now come for you to avenge your mother’s death; and, in doing so, you will be avenging your father’s also, for I am about to die at the hand of the Russian, Devriloff.”

“Father!—” the lad stared at his father.

“Remember that you have been trained to suffer with an unmoved face, Yoshio. Is death more terrible than life? — you are not to feel, much less to show, any distress. That is why I am in this city, in order to die, so that my death may rouse our country to break off this talk of peace; and it will be for you to avenge my death and your mother’s in one stroke.”

Yoshio stood with a redness in his eyes which betrayed his excitement.

“The night after to-morrow,” continued Baron M — , “the attempt upon the Russian train takes place — I have this morning received a telegram from Messrs. England and Petersen to that effect; on that night, therefore, our party should be well on its way southward. I shall no longer be alive; the guidance of our little band will devolve upon Kotohito, and you will obey him as if he were your father, supposing that you are not then in a Russian dungeon: for to-morrow night at the Pavlovna ball you will avenge your mother with this kokotana (dagger) of the Choshu samurai, and it may be that you will be seized by the Russians.”

“But at a ball, father?” asked Yoshio.

“Yes. In an alley of the Pavlovna grounds, which are dark with trees, stands a greenhouse full of tropical greenery: I know it well of old. In this greenhouse you will take your stand, and will wait till Devriloff passes. Devriloff will be at the ball; he will know that I am dead; he will fear nothing; and he will pass just there by the greenhouse alone, since Kotohito will induce him to pass there by a ruse which I have already planned. That ruse does not concern you; all you will have to do is to stand in the greenhouse till Devriloff passes; then act promptly, deeply, surely, like the son of your father, whose spirit will watch you, and your mother will be comforted, Yoshio. When the deed is well done, you will drag the body of Devriloff into the greenhouse, where the greenery will give you abundant opportunity to hide it, and where, if you are lucky, it may remain undiscovered some days. On the night following, the supply-train will be wrecked by our two white friends, and Kotohito will then at once fly southward with you and the others beyond the Polish frontier, where the two whites will meet you all at the agreed tavern in Kônigsberg.”

“And you, father, die?” said Yoshio with a tremor in his voice.

“Do not refer to that again, Yoshio!” answered the baron.

“All that I had mused upon — the poetry of life — the perfume of women — will be nothing to me henceforth,” murmured Yoshio; “but to hear is to obey... I only suggest that, as I step from the greenhouse, I shall say to the Russian, ‘Defend yourself!’ A son of the Choshu blood is not afraid of a Russian sword, and I shall be sure to lay the slayer of my mother and father at my feet.”

“But will the boy be silent?” cried Baron M — .

“Without making one sound you will strike to the heart of him who without a sound cut off the head of your mother in the night.”

Yoshio bowed himself before his father.

For two hours after this talk with his son the baron was in talk with the two other Japanese in the villa with him; he spent some hours more in writing, and went out alone on foot as the shades of evening began to fall.

But the moment he had passed out one of the Japanese, whose name was Kanin, was hurriedly dressing himself in a disguise in which he left the villa four minutes after the baron, looking like a bearded merchant-Jew of Astrakhan in a fur cap and coat. This disguise was done with a minuteness so Japanese that Kanin's own wife would not have known him; and Kanin dogged the steps of Baron M — , who little thought that he was being shadowed by one of his own people.

The night deepened, till the full moon rose in the sky.

Those streets of Novoya Derevnya were empty at that hour. It is the Bayswater of Petersburg in tone, and the Highgate in plan, with its villas and gardens. Everyone was dining, and then from the villas came the genteel sound of the piano. Hardly a sleigh dashed along the white, broad streets.

Baron M — strolled a long way with the deliberate aim of exposing himself to the knife or pistol of the man Ivan Shtcherbakoff, who, he felt sure, must be on the look-out for him by that time; and Shtcherbakoff was indeed tracking him, but with such skill that the baron was on his way home again before he spied Shtcherbakoff lurking under the shadow of some trees in a garden.

Baron M — now stood still in the middle of the road, admiring the moon with a poetic face worthy of his son Yoshio, awaiting meanwhile his death-blow.

The Russian thereupon stole from his hiding-place, and came so near to M — , that M — was able to assure himself that the man was really the agent of Devriloff, as described by Miss S — . But hanging quite near to the baron was still the merchant-Jew of Astrakhan, who was Kanin in disguise; so that Shtcherbakoff, who had long been cursing this inconvenient witness, and waiting for him to walk away, did the baron no harm.

In the end Baron M — , surprised at the Russian's backwardness, but glad of another night of life, returned home, certain that the man would be chidden for his delay by Devriloff, and that the next night, the night of the Pavlovna ball, the hand of the assassin would not fail to act.

CHAPTER III

THE SUPPLY-TRAIN

MEANTIME, MESSRS. ENGLAND and Petersen had got their permits de séjour transferred from St. Petersburg to Moscow, and from Moscow had taken the short railway journey to Vladimir.

In all these provinces of “Great Russia” — Vladimir, Nijni Novgorod — the peasantry was on the brink of famine; reserve battalions of the 13th corps had been called out, and some of the fields were without winter-sowings; in Moscow the mind of rulers was taken up with a certain new Liberalism, and with the roar of the hungry; at Vladimir Messrs. England and Petersen saw shoplooting by moujiks, and a march-past of a unit of the 2nd ban, with old and weak men in it.

All this unrest made the movements of the friends freer. On the third night, soon after sunset, they started out of Vladimir on horseback by the highroad that leads north-eastward toward Myt, having with them all that was necessary for the mining of the railway.

Both were Japanese citizens, though Western by race, both seasoned “Tiger-hunters” and Orientals.

Mr. Petersen had done many a mile of railwaymaking for the Chinese Government, and had begun a Chinese dictionary. Once an engineer, he had lately come into wealth, and had struck work; but he remained what he had always been — an adventurer.

Mr. England, also a man of means, had long ago gone out to Japan to study the nature of the light given off by fireflies, which he found to be the same as the X-ray. He had wandered over Nippon and Kiu-siu on foot, clad only in the blue-cotton yucata, and was more Japanese than the Japanese.

He was a pundit, and also a dreamer, but his dreamings were always hard-headed. He lived in the future, saw it full of surprises, and would often say: "To-morrow will have no more likeness to to-day than a son has to his father. Heaven is paved with good intentions"; anon he cried out: "Three cheers for everything!" And Mr. Petersen was always to be found by the side of Mr. England, because he liked to hear Mr. England tell these dreams.

Both were mere onlookers, wondering how the fifth act will be. Once in a way, as now, when they had to, they took a hand in the acting; but mostly their interest was that of onlookers, keen enough, but as people on one world might look on at the burning of another.

Mr. England was a small man with a big head, a tiny, rather crooked mouth, and a quiet smile. Mr. Petersen, on the contrary, was a large Yankee, who loafed through life with his two hands in his trouser-pockets; but he had an energetic way of spitting and of dashing the ash from his cigar which seemed to say: "If I were roused, I could act." He and Mr. England had passed through much together, and had become "Tiger-hunters" on the same night.

"What do you think M — : — will really do?" asked Mr. Petersen that night of the going out from Vladimir.

"Eventually, you mean?" said Mr. England.

"Yes."

"I never had any doubt that M — is the man of destiny," answered Mr. England; "his fate is to write the word 'China' over all Asia. And, of course, his Asia will be a Socialistic Asia."

They were lying on their elbows in cavalry-cloaks and Astrakan caps in one of the oak-forests of central Russia, with their horses knee-haltered in thicket half a verst behind them, and with the railway in a cutting a hundred yards yonder before them. The thermometer was at — 19° F., yet they were not cold, so dry was the air; the moon wandered in a cloudless sky; not a hut nor a bell-tower was to be seen on the broad landscape, only snow, moonlight, and forest. They waited for the supply-train which they knew to be coming on her far journey northward, that they might hear and see that which was to happen to her. Mr. Petersen's cigar-smoke lingered in the air unrouted by a breath. It was eleven o'clock. The two "Tiger-hunters" spoke in a low murmur of chat which was like an accompaniment to the moonlight.

"But don't you think that there's a really serious danger that M — may be killed in St. Petersburg?" asked Mr. Petersen.

"Oh, I think that Kanin may be depended upon to get himself killed instead of M — answered Mr. England. "Kanin is as sharp as a weasel. Nor is it of any importance who is killed, as far as stopping the peace-talk is concerned, so long as it is a Jap killed by a Russian; and when M — sees Kanin dead he will begin to look after his own life. I don't think I have any real fear for M — ."

"Still, it's ticklish," said Mr. Petersen. "I shall be relieved to hear that M — has got through. I say, what a purpose, after all, is carried in that little man's head."

"I believe I know the very night when it clearly arose there," said Mr. England, "and perhaps it was partly through me. We were sitting on the verandah of the British Embassy in the Imperial City, M — , Prince Ch — , and I.

A State function was going on inside, but we were alone, smoking, with moonlight on the lotuses in the court. M — had lately been appointed Brigadier-General in the Northern Chinese division through Ch — 's influence, and we were talking about that. Ch — said that M — was driving the Chinese soldier too hard; M — replied that the Chinese soldier needed just that driving to make him the best fighting-machine anywhere; 'but,' he added with a touch of despondency, 'when he does become this, Heaven knows whom he is to fight with. The yellow races seem to have no destiny. Here we are sure enough, but nobody can guess for what far-off purpose we are here.'

"I then put in my oar and said something which made M — look at me. I said that in a crowd of a thousand people there are not a thousand present, but a thousand and one; that not only is each man an animal, but human society, considered as a whole, is an animal, a living creature, an 'organism'; that every animal, or organism, is made up of organs — the heart, the liver, and so on; and that so, too, human society, being an animal or organism, is made up of organs, the organs of this huge organism being the different nations, each having its special function, as the heart and liver have in a horse; but, I went on to say, all the organs of an animal are not at all times in a state of activity, and I gave as an instance the organ of love, which lies asleep in a child up to the age of — eighteen sometimes. It lies asleep, I said, but when it does wake, how much interest does it add to the individual's life, touching everything with poetry, spurring the noblest organs, and making life seem worth the living!

"I then went on to compare the yellow race as an organ in the organism, Human Society, with this organ of love in the individual, and to compare the long sleep of China and Japan with the sleep of this organ during the individual's youth; and I said that the wake-up of China would have similar effects upon the animal, Human Society, which the wake-up of love has upon the individual. I saw M — glance at me; you know those Jap aristocrats, they would not betray an emotion if they saw the moon falling: but he glanced at me, and three years later he reminded me of what I had said that night.”

“Yes, that’s bully,” said Mr. Petersen; “but how? You mean through Socialism, perhaps.

But is it quite certain that Japan must become Socialist all through in the near future? and if so, why so?”

“It seems to me a biological law,” answered Mr. England. “What does Japan since ‘68 remind one of? Here is a people racing through in forty years the whole political growth of the rest of men in as many thousands of years. That, you know, is the same phenomenon as the racing through by the embryo in the months before birth of all the stages of evolution, from jelly-fish to man, which life as a whole has taken millions of years to crawl through. Japan, therefore, is to the world of nations what the coming of an individual, and he a great! man, is to any given nation. A great man races through the mental evolution of his race, catches it up, and goes yet a step beyond his age; so Japan is bound to catch up the most evolved ideas of our age, and going yet a step beyond, realize them. Now the most evolved idea of our age is social equality. Therefore it is a biological law that Japan must realize this idea. She would have done it without this war with the country that stands for all the darkness of the past; the war only makes it doubly sure.”

“I guess it will be shooting the rapids, though, for poor little Nippon,” said Mr. Petersen, half absently, with his ears cocked to listen for the coming of the train.

“But Japan is the land to do it! — with or without M — and the Tiger-hunters,” answered Mr.

England. “It needed just such a people, mobile and hot with zeal, to pioneer our western nations with their Mammon-worship and heavy-baggage social crawl. Think of that scene thirty-seven years ago when the daimios in a body laid their lands at the feet of their country, and try to imagine that in England! Always when it has become a question of touching the land, the nobles have threatened civil war. In Japan they did it of themselves. What a Pentecost was there, Petersen! Never, surely, did the gods see so bright a sight among men. The nation in which it happened can’t be conquered. By herself she is strong, and she has the might of China to wield. Japan is the head, China the body, that head and body making Hercules. Hence I look forward to the near portent of an Asia Asiatic and Socialistic from the Frozen Sea to Ceylon.”

Mr. Petersen began to reply, but stopped short with a “Hist! here she comes!” as the sound of a train arose upon their ear. A minute later they saw far away through the moonlight haze a tarpaulined line of trucks coming over the large-gauge metals. She bore a load of compressed forage, with messbeef, coal, ammunition and other war matériel. Messrs. England and Petersen held their breath as she grew louder upon them out of the distances of the plain, drawing toward her doom; she passed them, went still fifty yards beyond, and at a junction with a loop-line, meeting with what awaited her, broke out into noise: there was an explosion, a scream of steam, a huddling of lorries and wagons, then wreck and silence.

(This matter was reported by two fanciful newsagents as an “attempt upon the Tsar”; but, of course, it was nothing of the sort.)

The two Tiger-hunters lingered long enough to hear the shouts and talking of a few men, then, seeing that their help was not needed, stole away to their horses, and galloped back to Vladimir.

CHAPTER IV

NADINE

BUT IN ORDER to follow what happened to Baron M — and the other Tiger-hunters who were being lionized by the peace-party in St. Petersburg, we must go back a night to the Pavlovna ball.

It has been told how the evening before the ball-day, the baron had gone out in order to expose himself to the knife of Devriloff's agent, the Amurski Cossack, Shtcherbakoff, who, however, had hesitated to strike on account of an inconvenient witness, a merchant-Jew of Astrakhan, who was Kanin, the Tiger-hunter, in disguise, Baron M — returned home for that night; but, sure that on the next night, the ball-night, the blow would be struck, he would not go to the ball in the sleigh which took the others, but decided to walk, dressed for the ball, all the way from the suburb Novoya Derevnja to the Prospekt, believing that during the walk that for which he had come to Petersburg would happen to him.

But neither did Kanin go in the sleigh to the ball:

Kanin declared to M — toward evening that he was unwell.

“What is the matter with you, Kanin?” asked the baron.

“I have pains in the limbs,” replied Kanin; “my head aches; I have also a rheum of the chest.”

“All that is only a weakness of the mind,” said Baron M — . “Better rouse yourself, and go to the ball with Kotohito and Yoshio.”

“I should like to,” answered Kanin, who, in truth, did not look quite well, “but I feel too ill. I am about to go to bed.”

“It is a weakness of the will,” said Baron M — with some contempt; “believe me, I have noticed lately, Kanin, that you tend toward an effeminate way of life.”

“Well, perhaps that is so, baron,” said Kanin meekly. But he would not be moved, and effeminately went to bed.

As for Kotohito and Yoshio, having made ready for the ball, they bid adieu to the baron. Tears sprang to Yoshio’s eyes, in spite of all he could do; a lump was in his throat, he could not utter a word: for he felt that this was his last farewell to his father; but not even a softened look came into Baron M — ’s eyes. Yoshio stepped into the sleigh, having about him the dagger which was to strike Prince Devriloff in the greenhouse allée; and Kotohito and Yoshio dashed off from the villa.

Baron M — was already dressed. He turned inward from the door after seeing his son and Kotohito drive off, and started to go up the stairs, with the thought of bidding farewell to Kanin in bed; but he was offended with Kanin, and, changing his mind, turned back, put on his hat and coat, and walked away.

But if he had gone to Kanin, and had by chance drawn off the bed-clothes, he would have seen Kanin strangely dressed in the disguise of a Russian isvostchik (cab-driver); and the moment the street door shut after M — , Kanin leapt from bed, threw on a full-skirted fur coat and fur shapka, such as the droshky-drivers wear, and hurried out after the baron.

They two then walked four versts through the city, Kanin dogging the steps of M — , so that at first M — thought Kanin a new agent sent by Devriloff to kill him; but later on the baron’s keen eyes became aware of Shtcherbakoff, some minutes after Kanin, too, had spied Shtcherbakoff.

It was after midnight, and the same full moon by which, the night after this, Messrs. England and Petersen were to chat by the railway-cutting, rode in the sky, shedding a blue light over the city of snow.

But in one of those unlighted slum alleys behind central St. Petersburg into which M — had led the walk the darkness at some points was deep; hardly a brawler was abroad in it; the tumbledown houses on either side showed here and there a light, but were mostly still. M — was on the left side; ten yards behind him on the right side stole the Amurski Cossack, Shtcherbakoff; and about fifteen yards behind M — on the same left side came the isvostchik who was Kanin in disguise: suddenly, with the tread of a cat, the Russian, who had on straw-shoes, ran obliquely across the road upon M — , heaved up his blade, and struck deep.

"The isvostchik in disguise . . . had received the assassin's knife in his own heart."

The Yellow Wave

[Page 47]

Instead, however, of striking into a back, he struck into a breast: for with an utter sureness, the isvostchik in disguise had dashed himself against M — in the nick of time, causing him to stumble forward, and had received the assassin's knife in his own heart.

It was done very quickly, with hardly a sound. Only, on his quick-panting breath Kanin gave up the word "M — !" and, even as he dropped a corpse, was tearing the false beard from his face.

"Kanin!" breathed the astonished baron; the next moment he had caught a revolver from his coat-pocket to send a shot after the Russian. But Shtcherbakoff escaped.

M — bent over the body. Kanin, to whom he would not say adieu that night, was no more. The warrior allowed his face to soften in that secret spot and moment. Several times he groaned the words “brave” and “Kanin.”

As a matter of fact, from the moment when M — first made his announcement in the Japanese restaurant in Bloomsbury that he meant to die in St. Petersburg, it had been settled among the other Tiger-hunters that Kanin should die instead. Here, in this alley, as the clocks of the city chimed one, Kanin’s undertaking was fulfilled, with no word but that one pant, “M — .”

But the shot fired after the Russian by M — had been heard, several men were running up and M to avoid delay, made off from the spot, after putting Kanin’s false beard into his own coat-pocket.

M — knew the city well, having been a military attaché there ten years before. He first directed his steps to the office of the Novoye Vremya, and dropped the news that Kanin had been assassinated; he then went on to the Viedmosti in order there also to drop the news; but now nearly an hour had passed, and it was already known at the second office. It was known at many points; it had reached the Pavlovna ball. Prince Devriloff had whispered to his own heart: “M — is dead.” M — made for the Pavlovna ball, a late guest, wondering how Yoshio had fared.

Yoshio, at the moment when M — arrived at the Pavlovna palace was in the greenhouse with his kokotana, awaiting, as he had been told to do, the coming of Devriloff.

The young man was in a strange mood, at once excited and sorrowful. An hour before this, about the time when Kanin fell, he had been walking sadly about the halls of the ball, thinking that it must be nearly time for him to go to the greenhouse, when he saw two bright eyes dwelling upon him with a thoughtful look. They belonged to a young girl of sixteen, who was sitting in a nook made all of palms and mirrors, so that she was seen in many places at once, far and near. The young poet's fancy likened her, so multiplied among the palms, to the fireflies of his native land lighting up their green home with coloured lights. These little creatures the Japanese women shut up in cages, and sell under the name of "Princess Glory."

Yoshio walked away down the length of the malachite hall; it was narrow and long, and looked like a Corinthian temple; but, as he went, he seemed to have eyes in the back of his head to see that multiplied brightness which was behind him. The strains of a Russian waltz, to which a host of couples were dancing, made the lad sad. When he reached the far end and turned round, he saw that the young girl was supporting her chin on her palm, and that her eyes still followed him. She seemed weary, as if weary of an old life, and thinking of a new.

Yoshio went back toward her, not straight, but with a roundabout stroll, so that she might think that she was the last thing in the world of which he was thinking; and at last, after looking at his watch, in order to assure himself that he had no time left for dancing, he came to her and asked her in French to dance with him. Miss S — , who was sitting by her, touched her hand with her pince-nez, wishing her to say no, for she remembered Prince Devriloff's command to the young girl the day before not to let a Japanese touch her, on the ground that all Japanese have leprosy. But the young girl (who was Nadine, Devriloff's daughter) stood up briskly at Yoshio's invitation, saying quietly, "Je veux bien, monsieur," and she waltzed with him, though she knew that her father's eyes might be near about her.

During that dance little was said between Yoshio and Nadine. The light steps of the young girl hied after her partner's drawing as faithfully as shadow waits upon substance; for a time her eyes were closed; to Yoshio she was like something in some dream of midsummer-night which chased him whithersoever he reeled, plagued him with delight, and made him dance. These were new feelings, and the poet thought how, when he was next alone, he would pour this thing out in a river of poetry. When the dance was over, he could not thank his partner, his thanks were so deep. It was only when she said to him, "If you wish, I will go with you to the string-band ball," that he started as from a sort of dream, looked at his watch, and said: "I have a rendezvous with — a man...."

He led her back to Miss S — , hurried off, and made his way through a lot of halls, till he came to a balcony from which a stone stairway led down into the Pavlovna gardens. Only a few people were on the balcony. Down in the garden Yoshio turned first to the left, the greenhouse being toward his right, then dodging, stumbled through a dark cross-path till he came to the spot which his father had described to him. From the moss-path before the greenhouse the light of the moon was quite shut out by leafage; and behind one of the glass doors Yoshio took his stand to await the passing of Prince Devriloff.

The warmth in the greenhouse made him languorous, and the young man became very sad: for he thought that his father was very likely dead; also, the thing which his father had sent him there to do was against the grain; moreover, he thought with an ache in him of the bright young girl whom he had danced with. There is a notion among others that the Japanese know nothing of "falling in love," and in truth, passionate sexual choice, or "love," is rare in Japan, as in England and France; but, being a human hap, it happens everywhere; only, as the Japanese see no need for making a show of having it when they do not, the myth has arisen that they do not have it: whereas Yoshio, waiting in the green-house, so felt it, that tears swam in his eyes.

But soon after one o'clock one of the causes of Yoshio's sadness was removed, for Kotohito, coming to the greenhouse to see that Yoshio was duly there, soothed Yoshio's mind by telling him that his father was not dead, but that Kanin was.

"It is true that I am not quite sure of this, Yoshio," said Kotohito; "but I am almost sure, for I have just heard that one of us has been killed, and now that the affair has ended, I may tell you that Kanin had arranged to die for your father, nor is it very likely that he has failed; so you may take that to comfort you while you wait here. I see that you are quite on the alert, for you nearly stabbed me. Well, keep on like that, and I undertake that in less than an hour the murderer of your mother will present himself to your dagger."

Kotohito then stole away, and Yoshio was again left alone in his lurking-place.

CHAPTER V

THE CHAPEL

ON RETURNING TO the halls of the palace, Kotohito at once sought out Prince Devriloff, in order to assure himself where he was; he spied the prince talking in a group of officers, and next sought out Miss S —— who, he knew, was chaperoning the daughter of Devriloff that night for their hostess, who was Nadine's chaperone en titre.

Kotohito, sitting by Miss S — , entered into talk with her in Japanese about the “murder of M — ,” while Nadine sat near, toying with her card, till an epauletted man came up to claim a dance. She rose with an absent-minded air and had gone some steps when Kotohito suddenly went after her, and asking her cavalier's pardon, said in a low voice at her ear:

“I have to tell you, mademoiselle, that in the gardens just now I happened to see standing outside the gate of the greenhouse allée a man named, he told me, Shtcherbakoff. He has pressing intelligence to convey to your father. You should therefore tell your father this, but not as coming from me, since there is a difference of opinion between us.”

“The difficulty will be to find him,” said Nadine.

“I suggest that he may be found in the augite room to the left.”

“Well, then. Will you take me in search of my father before we dance?” said Nadine to her cavalier, who bowed, and led her away through the suite of halls to the left.

Kotohito now went back to Miss S— ‘s side, and took up again the thread of their talk: Miss S — did not show her anxiety about what Kotohito had whispered to Nadine, but she feared further mischief to “peace” that night, feared that the Japanese might try to avenge the “murder of M —”; and the instant she found the chance, she was up and gone in search of Nadine, to find out what was toward.

She met Nadine coming back, and, taking her aside, said in an eager whisper:

“What is it, child? What did the Japanese whisper into your ear?”

Nadine told what Kotohito had advised her to tell her father.

“And you have told him?” breathed Miss S — with a face aghast.

“Yes.”

“And he has gone into the gardens?”

“Yes.”

“Nadine — quickly — go after him! Stick by his side — I have a meaning — try to get him back—” she gave an impulse to the girl’s shoulder, and at once her flurry changed to smiles, as she made a thousand excuses to Nadine’s cavalier.

Nadine, meanwhile, made her way as swiftly as she could to the cloak-room suite, threw on her hooded cloak, and sped down the balcony-steps and along the greenhouse alley, peering into the gloom for her father.

But, even if she had gone to the end of the alley, she would not have found her father, nor, of course, would she have found any Shtcherbakoff, whose presence outside the gate was a fiction told by Kotohito in order to lead Devriloff past the greenhouse. Prince Devriloff, on hearing the news that Shtcherbakoff wished to see him, had, indeed, started off to go to him, without waiting to ask Nadine who it was who had told her this; but the prince had not gone twenty steps when he saw a sight which turned him pale — the face of Baron M — , who had just entered the ball after his visit to the newspaper offices.

Devriloff was so sure that M — was dead, that for a minute he believed he saw a ghost; panic struck him: he now felt that Nadine's message might be a Japanese ruse to get him into the gardens: and within five minutes the prince was away, in order to lock himself into his own room in his own house.

Meantime, Nadine, hurrying along the alley to find her father, came to the greenhouse, and was passing its middle door, when a figure sprang out in her path: and it nearly happened that the doom which was meant for the prince fell upon his daughter.

“Oh, pardon,” breathed Yoshio... “it is you.”

“Is it you?” asked Nadine.

She had not seen the kokotana, but by peering in the dark they could just make out each other's face.

“It is you?” breathed Yoshio again.

“You here? All alone?”

“I am here to meet — a man.”

“Then, I will go on.”

“Within the door here it is as warm as in the palace. One hears a sound of dripping waters among the trees.”

“But I must go on. I am looking for my father, who has passed this way.”

“No one has passed this way. I was here alone, thinking, and very sad.”

“Of whom were you thinking? or rather, of what?”

“I have been sad ever since I saw you, and danced with you.”

“What is your name?”

“Yoshio M — .”

“M — ? Is it your father whom my father hates?”

“Who is your father?”

“Prince Devriloff.”

“Ah! Prince Devriloff! Yes, they hate each other, your father and mine; and you and I have to hate each other also.”

“Why so?”

“Because there is vendetta between us.”

“Not on my side, then. You kill me, and I will die quietly, and not tell any one who did it.”

“Yes, I should like to, and then kill myself after, so that I might fall near you, and be with you.”

“Ah, but do not speak sweeter than you mean, Yoshio M — . ‘Men’s vows are made of the wind,’ the Russians say in a proverb; and when the wind is gone past, a girl’s sighs cannot overtake it.”

“But men’s vows to girls? I have not made any. You seem to me to be Sayori, our goddess of love and mercy, who has come into the world at a ball. I should only like to throw myself down and pray to you, without saying anything, and perhaps your heart would hear mine, and would feel for me.”

“What would you pray for?”

“I should only pray, without any words, not knowing why.”

Nadine laid her hand on Yoshio’s arm, saying, “and I also, for from the moment when I first saw you in the malachite room, seemed to hear God calling in my heart in a wonderful voice, and it is the good God to whom I come in you.”

The young girl drew Yoshio’s head to her, and their faces lingered in a wonderful joy together, till Yoshio started on hearing the sound of a step. It was some one passing a good way off through the garden, but it reminded him of what he was there for — to remove out of life the father of her who hung on his breast. This thought, however, lasted only a moment, he led Nadine by the hand within the greenhouse, and there forgot Devrilloff, his father, the war, and everything, in his wish to tell the young girl of half the fondness which burdened his breast.

“But how unhappy we are!” murmured Nadine; “you will go away, and it would have been better if I had never seen you: for what will be the end of it for us?”

“I am not afraid,” said Yoshio; “if even I have to die, I shall think in dying that I have seen you; and I shall not go away; nothing has any power to take me; I shall not go; they could not make me; they have not the right: they daren’t: I’ll die first.”

“Sweet, but, you see, my father hates the Japanese, sweet.... Even if you stay, could we be married?”

“But I do not ask for any marrying, only to see you. Your eyes... they are like lamps of life shining upon me in this darkness. How good of you even to look on me, and be conscious that I am alive! Yet you touch my face.... Oh, I would have rushed upon all the guns of this war to win a little of what you lavish upon me for nothing like this...”

“So fond of me? so soon? poor boy!” murmured Nadine, moving her palms down his face; “and yet it is not so soon, is it? for I think that I have dreamt of you some night in a land full of almond-trees, under a strange moon, and I knelt to you, feeling the good God near in my heart, and called you my Tsar, my poet, my own boy, my sweetheart Yoshio. But as to my father.... Hist! I hear a step coming...”

They started, both thinking that it was Devriloff, and quickly Nadine whispered: "Come to me at four — the Devriloff gardens in the Great Morskaia, the third gate as you pass down the little alley at the palace-back. I shall be there to let you in." She kissed him hurriedly, and slipped out through the greenhouse door.

Coming along the alley was, not Devriloff, who had gone home, but Miss S — , who had come out all anxiety to find out the reason of Nadine's long disappearance.

"My child! have you found your father?" whispered Miss S — .

"No, my aunt."

"Then, where have you been?"

"I have been listening to some music."

"Whereabouts?"

"In heaven, I suppose, it was."

"Oh, fanciful child! So you haven't met your father? Have you seen any of the Japanese in the gardens?"

"Yes, one, my aunt."

"Which one?"

"He is called Yoshio M — ."

"Did he speak to you?"

"Yes, my aunt, he spoke to me."

"Yoshio here? Did he ask anything about your father?"

"He spoke only of myself."

"Well, but where, then, is your father?... And you, what is the matter with you, my child? You seem quite tired."

"It is not weariness."

"Let us return to the ball, and see if your father is there...."

Miss S — was so taken up with the father and her beloved “peace,” that she had no eyes to guess the secret of the look of rapturous experience in the girl’s pale face. They searched for Devriloff together, till they learned that he was no longer there; and Nadine then prayed to be taken home, on the ground that she could no longer bear the ball.

It was then after three in the morning.

Half an hour afterwards Baron M — got free of the political crowd who kept him in talk, and bethought him of going to the greenhouse, in order to tell Yoshio that his watch was useless, since Devriloff had gone home. But when M — went, Yoshio was not to be found in the greenhouse.

All the Japanese then began an organized search for Yoshio. Yoshio could not be found. Kotohito had seen him for a minute in the greenhouse near midnight: that was all that one could be sure of about Yoshio.

The morning grew toward day, and at last the Japanese had to leave the ball among the last of the crowd, without any Yoshio. Baron M— ‘s face wore a dark look. He had the thought that Devriloff may have found the means to do the boy to death — unless Yoshio had taken it upon himself to go home alone.

All this time Yoshio was in a summer-house behind the Devriloff Palace with the furs which enwrapped Nadine: and the conference between the lovers was long and earnest. Nadine said that the only way was for them to defy everyone, and risk all; she knew a “pope” — one of those “white” (or secular) priests of the Greek Church — named Paid Kraszewski, who was devoted to her, and, for the sake of gold, would do all that was needful for the marriage of her and Yoshio that same midnight. She would go to bed at an early hour, and near midnight steal from her room to the church. She proposed also to let into the secret her maid, Anna Pochowski, and her old man-nurse, the Amurski Cossack, Shtcherbakoff, who would die for her, if necessary, and would have a sleigh ready to drive her and her maid, Anna Pochowski, to the church.

As for Yoshio, he would return home for the present, but would escape and hide from his friends some time before ten in the night, when the Japanese were to take a southward train. Yoshio knew that the Japanese party were bound to leave St. Petersburg that night, since that night at eleven the supply-train was to be mined by Messrs. Petersen and England, and Russia would thereafter become a place for the Japanese to hasten from. If, therefore, Yoshio could hide beyond the hour (ten) fixed for their departure, he would be safe. Yoshio felt his honour and duty wounded by this plot, but love was stronger than all; and so it was settled before the lovers parted near daybreak after many goodbyes.

Yoshio walked in a dream all the way to Novoya Derevnnya, and did not reach home till the sun was high. He found his father pacing the drawingroom of the villa.

“Come here, Yoshio,” said Baron M — ; “where have you been?”

“I have been walking in the august city, chichi uyi,” said Yoshio, with a hung head.

“With what object?”

“I have examined the august monuments of the city, chichi uyi.”

“Have you accomplished that which you were placed in the greenhouse of the Pavlovna Palace to do?”

“No, chichi uyi. Prince Devriloff did not pass that way.”

“Did you abandon your post without knowing whether he would pass that way? Or did you know that he would certainly not pass before you abandoned your post?”

Yoshio hesitated, and then answered:

“I did not know for certain that he would not pass; but I guessed that he would not, the hour being late.”

M — looked at the young man piercingly.

“But why did you go away?” he asked after a minute...”

“I have examined the honourable monuments of the city, chichi uyi.”

“Go from me.”

Yoshio went to his own room.

M — touched a bell, and when Kotohito came in, said to him: “Yoshio has got entangled with some lady at the Pavlovna ball. He harbours, moreover, some bashful purpose. Keep your eye on him during the day. I am now going to sit by the body of Kanin.”

M — , who could pass several nights without sleep, soon after this went out, and spent the day with three of the other Japanese by the body of Kanin at a morgue; he also passed an hour in talking over with some officials the arrangements for the funeral, which was to be magnificent, for the crime had already roused much feeling.

The Japanese, however, intended to be gone before the funeral, and after the baron had gazed for hours on the face of the murdered man with fond mutterings of his lips, he set out for the commissariat of police, and gave the hour (ten) of his train of departure, so that the Japanese passports should be at the station at that hour to be given back to his party. He dined at a restaurant near the Liteinyi Bridge, and did not return home till nine, in order to start with Kotohito and Yoshio for the station.

But, to his astonishment, neither Kotohito nor Yoshio was in the villa; the trunks of the party lay ready on the lower floor; but Kotohito had not left even a line to explain his absence.

Baron M — waited on, inwardly raging, till ten; at that hour his train started without him; and still Yoshio and Kotohito did not appear. At the railway-station three of the six Japanese, and a police-official with the passports, were waiting in vain for M — , Kotohito, and Yoshio.

At last, near ten-thirty, a thought struck the baron, and he went out, peering as he went down the street at the gates and walls on either side; and soon he came upon what he half-expected — a cross marked with chalk on a gate; sixty yards beyond, in the next street, he came upon another chalk-mark; and now he knew the truth: Yoshio had fled, and Kotohito, on the track of Yoshio, had left these pateran-marks to show M — which way he and Yoshio had gone.

But the tracking of the marks through St. Petersburg at that hour of the night was a slow matter, and only the toughness of M — kept him to it. It was some minutes after midnight when, in a dark lane behind the Mikhailovski Theatre, M — came upon Kotohito, who, with his back leant against a wall, was breathing heavily.

“He has just escaped me,” panted Kotohito; “found out that I was tracking — runs like a deer.”

“Which way?”

“Yonder.”

“Come.”

The two men trotted forward.

At that moment, in a chapel of a church not fifty yards from the theatre, Yoshio and Nadine were kneeling at a lighted altar, with them being the young woman named Anna Pochowski, also the “white” pope, Kraszewski, also Shtcherbakoff, and the officiating priest. The little party seemed lost in the gaudy and gloomy vastness of the church. Yoshio was married with a heaving chest, for he had been running hard. By the time the rite was over, he had, indeed, got back his wind, but still his heart throbbed awfully at his feeling of guilt, at his uncertainty as to the future, at his daring behaviour. However, he led out his little ruddy bride to her sleigh with a bold face, and parted from her with a promise of meeting her two hours later in the summer-house behind the Devriloff Palace.

He left the church alone. Having nowhere in particular to go before the rendezvous, he went strolling anywhere, little dreaming that his father was now fearfully and wonderfully near to him, and seeking him at a run. And precisely before the façade of the theatre the ill-fated lad butted on a sudden in the dark upon Baron M — and Kotohito. Before ever the boy could run, M — , without saying a word, had Yoshio's wrist in a grip of iron.

Yoshio's head bowed, and, as he walked along by his father's side, stifled sobs were heard going all down the length of the street. He remembered that Nadine would wait for him in the summerhouse in the cold morning, and wait, and wait, with a sob in her throat.

The Japanese party were able, after all, to set off that night by a later train; for the three at the station had got the giving-back of the passports put off by the commissary to that later train; the luggage at Novoya Derevnja was telegraphed for; and by one-thirty the party, including Yoshio, were en route southward.

En route also at that hour from Vladimir were Messrs. Petersen and England. And two evenings later all the seven Tiger-hunters met at the agreed inn in Kônigsberg.

CHAPTER VI

IN THE TEMPLE OF THE SUN

THE RESULTS OF the Tiger-hunters' visit to Petersburg were soon seen. The murder of Mons. Kanin, who was an ex-editor of the Ji newspaper and a well-known politician, caused a dismay even in St. Petersburg, and in the Eastarage; while as to the mining of the supply-train, though the Japanese party could not be pointedly charged with it, it furnished fuel to the fire on the Russian side: the ministers who were working toward peace threw up the cards; and the war went its way.

But for a month no action of striking greatness took place in Manchuria.

Meantime, be it noted, China had been neutral, except for some Manchu bandits (Chunchuses) and "Boxers," whom the Japanese were using as scouting groups, etc. However, ever since the war began 15,000 rifles and 10,000,000 rounds per month had been pouring from Japan into neutral China.

And one night, six weeks after the Petersburg events. Baron M — sat with Prince Ch — in a room of that Temple of the Sun where the Chinese Foreign Office is in the habit of sitting. They were alone in a black-and-red apartment, a place in whose gaudiness of bronze, lacquer, and painted josses lay some hint of dark deeds and the torture-cellars of grisly queens who have drunken themselves with blood through many an age of romance and intrigue; and so close was the talk, that some of the coloured lights burned out without being marked by the two men.

Ch — , as is well known, was a man of sense but weak in action; and for hours that night Baron M — bent his brow upon the prince with the strain with which one bends a bow, still talking in the tone of a man upon whose words all things are hanging.

“A European war,” said the baron, “is necessary to the yellow race, and, since it has to come, may as well come. We have it in our hands, prince, to bring it about in one of three ways almost whenever we please.

“Ah, you well say ‘almost,’” answered Prince Ch — ; “you are a man made to persuade persons against their will, baron; you fly the world like a kite — it is nothing to you. But how long do you think it would take to wake up and prepare the Chinese in the manner you all are wishing — ?”

“Much of the waking up is done,” said the baron, “for from end to end of Asia the rumour has run that the yellow man has beaten the white in war. When the Chinese coolie thinks of this he looks up into the air and screams out laughing; the Hindoo is glad; the worshippers of the sun far off are ready to help.”

“But the preparing,” said the prince with a troubled brow; “remember that it has taken Japan forty years.”

“In China I could accomplish much of it in forty days. Reform first, then conscription, then the European war, during which we proclaim that at least Asia and Russia in Europe are our claim. As for the money, a governor in China with a sword in one hand and a rope in the other will soon give that.”

“It shall be done what you want, baron,” said the prince, tapping the ashes out of his pipe, “and you shall do it. I have listened to you for fifteen years.... But of the three ways in which you say that a European war may be brought about by us, only one of them, in my opinion, should ever be employed by China.”

“Which one?”

“That one by which Japan so crushes Russia as to force France to fight Japan, and so bring on a European war. Then China would act.”

Prince Ch— ‘s eyes smiled a little at this cautious speech of his, while Baron M — frowned, and was silent.

“What have you to say, M — ?” asked the prince.

“But it was my hope to see a battalion of Chinese Imperial troops start in two days to operate against the Russians,” said M — dryly. “I thought that that was settled.”

“Oh, baron,” said the prince with a weakness of expression, “you are a man made to have his way. I should say to you to-night: ‘Take your seat at the head of the Council, and do as you like’; but, to tell the truth, I am not sure — yet — of the way this war will go. Are you so very sure that the Japanese will beat the Russians?”

“I think that they have beaten them.”

“Well; but still, I can’t help liking to feel the ground under our feet; why not wait and let us see the Russians driven back to Mukden before we bring China into any trouble?”

“Is that the only condition which you demand?” asked the baron.

“Yes; let us see that done.”

“You shall see it, I hope, before this day week. Meanwhile, I see no reason why we should not employ a body of Chinese troops against the Russians, with the object of precipitating possible trouble in Europe—”

“Oh, I am afraid of this,” said the prince, standing up. “You first get the Russians dislodged from Liao-yang, and you have the word of a prince that your seat shall thenceforth be at the right hand of the throne of the Hsus.”

Baron M — now bowed to the ground, saying:

“I myself, I hope, shall send your highness the news of what you ask for, for I start for the front early to-morrow, and thenceafter, prince — you have said it — no more waiting, but loud action and large. But now, I declare, you look sleepy.” The two politicians soon after this left the temple, waited on by six men with lanterns of white and yellow silks; and saying “since it must be,” parted before the court of the Imperial Palace.

CHAPTER VII

AT THE SEAT OF WAR

THE NEXT MORNING at dawn Baron M — took the Pekin-Newchwang train, and from Newchwang passed northward to Talisu, where the headquarters' staff were. He was alone, for both Messrs. England and Petersen, as well as Yoshio, were at the front.

As to Yoshio, the baron had done an extraordinary thing; he had enrolled the boy as a common soldier in a line-battalion at the front, a harsh step meant partly as a punishment, and partly as a training in the school of reality. At the inn at Kônigsberg where the Tiger-hunters had met after the St. Petersburg happenings, M — , having taken Yoshio aside, had said to him: “Now tell me for what reason you wished to abandon your father and your country, and to remain at St. Petersburg.” Perhaps if Yoshio's bride had been any other than Prince Devriloff's daughter, he might have told; as it was, he had not dared; and from that day the baron had kept a grim silence on the matter. But the moment he reached the Far East, before even going to Pekin, he took care to see Yoshio with a musket on his shoulder.

M — then went to Pekin, spent a week of activity there, and, after his final talk with Prince Ch — which has been sketched, hastened north ward again, with the object of “reporting” to the prince a battle which was about to take place. His share in that battle, which happened ten days afterwards, was much more than that of an onlooker; but when it was over his son Yoshio was wounded and a prisoner. Yoshio was presently taken to the hospital at Irkutsk, where, in his long idle days, he wrote a letter which was rather a soliloquy than a letter; and from this letter an account of what befel at the seat of war, both before and after Baron M — reached it from Pekin, may be given in Yoshio's own words.

“My dear lady,” he writes to his young bride, Nadine, “I wrote you a letter from Kônigsberg, giving you the history of my arrest by my father on the night, of our marriage, and again I wrote from Marseilles, in each case hoping that our party would remain long enough in those places for me to receive a reply from you: but before my letters could have reached you, my honoured father, who is ever a restless man, took his departure, and we others with him.

“I now write, Nadine, far removed from you, doubtful if what I write will ever meet those eyes into which it was once given me to look — years ago it seems, though it is only weeks. Shall I ever feel that joy again? You are so far beyond my reach now, that I do not often allow myself to hope.

“But I am not without a hope that this letter may reach you, for three days ago several of the Russian wounded here were taken to the railway to be carried back to Russia; one of them was a bugler of the Kuban voisko, whose bed was the next but one on my right, and though we could not converse, he was friendly with me, and if I had had anything written when he left, I might have sent it by him. However, if a similar drafting of the sick to the railway again takes place from this ward, I shall certainly find my chance then. Meanwhile, the railway is closed to the post, the telegraph is in the hands of the military, and I am writing secretly with this pencil and soiled paper which the baggage-master has got for me at the spur of a bribe, for we are not allowed by Major Hartmann, the surgeon here, to do any writing.

“You will see from what I have said that I am in hospital here in Irkutsk, with a wound in the right shoulder, and an experience of war which I hope not to renew. I belong to the old Choshu clan of Japan, a set of people who have always been fighters on land, just as the Satsuma clan are those who do the fighting on sea; consequently, my honoured father, who seems to have a love for the sound of guns, is determined that I shall be a soldier like my ancestors, whether I like it or not; and, since he is displeased with me, he has introduced me into the army in such a fashion, that my messmates before I was taken prisoner were a common clog-seller, two carpenters, and a lantern-maker of Tokio.

“I did not know before that Japan had need of her artists to fight her battles, and be shot down by guns; but so it seems now, and I must not say anything, since it is the august will of my honoured father.

“I love my country; but this was not the sort of glory that I wished to gain for her.

“I will tell you something which I heard some one say the night before the great battle of Liao-yang: it was one Mr. England, a friend of my honoured father, and he was speaking to a Mr. Petersen, an American who has become one of our Tiger-hunters. As a general battle was sure on the morrow, they two had ridden from the village of Sintao to see me, having heard that my battalion had been posted in that part of the country. I was one of the inlying sentries when they came upon me at about one in the morning, and glad enough I was to talk with them, for I was frozen, and had a sure feeling in me that that was to be my last night in this world. After giving me a message from my father, they sat in the snow on a knoll, and were talking there a long while about the coming battle.

“I heard them say many things that night about events that are preparing for the whole world, though they may not have thought that I understood, for they spoke in a low voice in English; but I know English well enough, and I heard Mr. England say, among other things, ‘What is needful for the great men in China is a change of heart. First, the conceit must go from them. The inferior yellow race has been beating the white in war, and everybody is crying out, “It is no longer inferior!” But it is because it is somewhat inferior that it beats; because it is in that stage of development which has a genius for war, whereas the white races are now getting into the stage which has a genius for the arts of peace. At an early stage in development every one could bring down a bird with a stone, and at that game of throwing stones a black Marutse or Batlapan boy can now beat us all, not because he is better than we, but because we are better than he. In the same way the Japs beat the Russian with the machines which he invented for them, not because the Japs, or the Boers, or the Prussians are better men, but because the greatest white nations are just getting past that stage of development which has a genius for war.’

“I was struck by this, because no one likes the Japanese more than Mr. England, and it only shows that there are more glorious things than war, such as painting and poetry.

“Mr. England then went on to say: ‘Now, what follows from this? That the yellow people should know themselves for what they are, and should also know when to act. What are they? They are “the barbarians” — like those that overthrew the Roman Empire, and they are the last lot of barbarians that will ever overthrow the rest. And when should they act? Now, because, if they wait, they, too, will cease to be “the barbarians,” will get beyond the stage to which the genius for war is proper, and, in the universal peace that will soon be, they will be trodden under the white man with his much more developed genius for the arts of peace, unless they spread and establish themselves by war, now that they can.’

“From this, and from many things which I have heard, I fancy that greater matters than one thinks must now be going forward in China, and that my honoured father may be the mover in much of it.

“But I think that if those sort of people only knew the miseries, especially for the common soldier and the common people, of all this business of war, they would try to mend matters. I can’t help thinking that this time the country of my dear lady is not quite in the right, for Japan is fighting for her life, as I have been brought up to believe; but they should all have managed to settle it somehow without this rain of blood.

“In this town of Irkutsk things are very bad. A Frenchman, named Tombarel, who was a marker in the 5th East Siberian Frontier Battalion, and now lies there opposite me with a bayonet-wound in his stomach, and his sheepskin cap hung up over his head, has told me that it was always the wickedest town in the world; but now the police have ceased to care, and there is no longer any decency; a dozen murders take place every day; wagonloads of wounded continue to come, there is not room in the military quarters for them all, and I heard yesterday from Madame Krastalinski, my nurse, that three have been foully murdered by the folk upon whom they were billeted. The town seems to have gone wild. As I write, I can hear the hospital-yard full of uproar, the rumble of wagons, whips cracking, shouts, laughter, dogs barking, and a drum beating the recall outside.

“It is five weeks now since we arrived at Taku in a steamer from Nagasaki, where we only stayed one day on coming from Europe. The Japanese whom you saw in St. Petersburg parted from us at Nagasaki, and only my father, Messrs. England and Petersen, and I came on to Taku. I understood that we were going to Peking, but, instead of that, from Taku we went northward to Newchwang, and thence on to Talisu. I hardly knew why, but a fear was on me, Nadine. My father did not speak to me, and I saw Mr.

England smile sometimes upon me, as if to pity or to cheer me. This made me feel that something dreadful was about to happen to me.

“And all the way to Talisu what was to happen was clearly foretold me in dreams, for every time I closed my eyes I dreamt that I was on the battlefield, a soldier; I saw wounds dealt, and wondered how I could escape; I saw my comrades cut down before my eyes, and felt the call of honour to join in the fray and help them, but I would not, and skulked to save myself from the injuries to men’s flesh which I beheld on every hand, and the shame of my flight would cause me to awake.

“These images of fear so filled my fancy, that by the time we reached Talisu I was in a state to be pitied. On the afternoon that we left Newchwang, Mr. England said to my honoured father: ‘I’m afraid that Yoshio is not quite well’; whereupon my father’s eye dwelt upon me, but he made no answer. It was clear that he had some purpose in his mind concerning me, and I almost guessed what it was.

“And the scenes which met my eyes only deepened this sick hue of my mind, for the world seemed given over to war; at some of the most rural places there was something to remind one of the powers that were seeking to overthrow each other; companies of soldiers were in cantonment on the villages, or bivouacked about them; columns were on the march, all making northward, with lumbering regimental and divisional baggage, and squadrons of cavalry and of horse-artillery and, coming the other way, wagonloads of sick men, whose bandages were spotted with blood. Outside Talisu I saw a sight which I think I see again now: it was a Manchu fruit-seller, with a child in her arms, standing by the long culvert which the train crosses before coming to the town; her blouse of blue cotton was more red than blue, and the child was without any head; she held it up for us to see with a screaming sort of laugh.

“Her grief may have been owing to one of those Chunchuses, or Manchu bandits, who were then thronging in the town, for these are a very ruthless sort of people.’ In fact, I could not have pictured to myself such a sight as was to be seen there. We entered it about nine in the night, and found it given over to noise, gloom and lawlessness. Many sorts of troops were here — Chinese Imperial troops guarding the palace, with Chunchuses, Japanese, and Russians with crutches, their arms in slings, or bandages round their heads; in the drink-places were crowds, and the streets were alive with crowds, some peering in the half-dark at notices posted in two languages at the town hall, half of which was in ruins, having been shattered by the shells of our army. Companies with bands of music passed at a quick march towards unknown ends. I saw a squad of troopers gallop suddenly into a screaming crowd without the least care. Regiment after regiment, too, must have come into or left the town during the night, for every now and again I was startled from sleep by the réveillée of trumpets, drums beating the tattoo, the tramp of feet, the neighing of horses, shouts, calls, words of command, and the racket made by trains of baggage and artillery rumbling over those rough streets — all which did not tend to quiet my mind, you may be sure, nor to make me in love with that pit of death into which I now felt that my honoured father meant to hurl me alive.”

CHAPTER VIII

PRIVATE YOSHIO

“I WAS INTERRUPTED in my writing yesterday afternoon, dear Nadine, by Major Hartmann coming into the ward, and causing me to hide my letter hurriedly. After a night full of dreams of you — for I have few dreams in which you do not play a part, especially since I have had this feverishness — I now go on with the tale of my sorrows, having just taken some good Russian tea and a bowl of rice and barley mixed, a dish which the Russians have copied from us others, though they prepare it in a less tasty manner, I think.

“On the morning, then, after our arrival in Talisu, I was called to the presence of my honoured father in the barracks where we had slept, or rather where I had slept, for my father, who is a very hard man, and can go without food or sleep for days, had been awake all night. I believe it to be a fact that he is now without any status in the Japanese army, yet one might imagine him one of the Genro, if one were to judge by the stir and observance which his presence causes among the military people. When called to him, I found him sitting at a table covered with maps and plans, with a crowd of staff-officers standing all about him, while beads of sweat stood on his brow. I, for my part, was shivering, for it was very cold, and nothing had been offered me to eat that morning.

“Every one straightened himself from bending over the maps as I bowed myself before my father, with the table between him and me, and I saw by the way in which the officers silently smiled upon me that whatever doom overhung me was known already to them all.

“The thought came into my head that, whatever was to happen, I must show none of my feelings before these men and my honoured father; but it was hard, for I remembered that I was not alone, but had a young wife, whose happiness hung upon my continued existence.

“‘Yoshio,’ said my father, without looking up from the map before him, ‘I am given to understand that a company of the second regiment of the third division is being filled up. Thirteen men of the reserve are about to be led from Talisu for this purpose; how would it be, if you volunteer to make the fourteenth? The honourable colonel here accepts your service beforehand.’

“I made a plongeon before my father, with the reply, ‘As you will, father,’ while everything seemed to swim before my eyes.

“My father now looked up at me, and from something in his eyes I think that he approved of my manner, for I ought to know the meaning of his glances by now.

“‘Very good,’ said he. ‘I am leaving for Peking to-night; but if you be lucky and victorious, we shall meet again some happier day. Sayonara! Fight well.’

“‘Banzai’ (Bravo!), said one of the officers, with a smile.

“That was all. My father is a man of few words. One of the officers handed me a billet, which I took as it were unconsciously, for I was only dreamily conscious of anything, save of a hurtful lump in my throat. A non-commissioned officer, who must have been waiting there for me, then touched me on the shoulder, and I followed him out of the door. But I had hardly got beyond it, when my father was again with me. He put his hand on my shoulder and pressed it tightly, murmuring close to my ear:

‘Remember the heroic spirit of your mother; remember your father, who — loves you. Good-bye.’ I could no longer keep from breaking out into bitter weeping, but my honoured father was gone even while I sobbed, ‘Yes, father,’ to him.

“I was led by my guide downstairs and across a courtyard to an apartment where a few soldiers were grouped round a kotatsu, or fire in the floor, making rice-cakes; these were the men of the subsection with whom I was to march to join our company. In a large store-room beyond this I was given a grey doth suit, a yellow-braided cap with a star on it, boots, a sheepskin muffler: in short, the kit of a common soldier. After dressing myself in these things, I received a receipt for my other clothes, and returned to the apartment where my squad sat round the kotatsu. I now felt myself so weighted, that I wondered how I was to take long marches in such a state; but the whole, which then seemed to me at least a hundred pounds, turned out to be under sixty, and in a few days ceased to weigh upon me.

“As I sat on a bench at the side of the apartment, no longer keenly suffering, but in a state of idle hopelessness, one of the squad who were at the fire brought me some food and tea, called me comrade, asked what was the matter, and began to cut some capers, pointing his musket at imaginary Russians. This fellow was a clog-seller named Markino, with whom I afterwards became friendly; but at that time his antics could not win a smile from me.

“Soon afterwards in came Mr. England, and sat with me. He has a kind heart, and did his best to console me, dwelling on the wisdom of my honoured father, and saying that, though war is a terrible thing, the human mind is such that it quickly becomes acclimatized to every state of being, and will feel at home amid flaming worlds. After my first battle, he said, I should be wanting to fight my second; he did not know, Nadine, how much stronger than any other being's is my motive to live. He made an effort to get from me the story of what he called my 'escapade' in St. Petersburg, saying that, if my father only knew the truth, that might lessen his anger. But I would tell nothing.

"Toward noon a quarter-master-sergeant stepped briskly into the apartment; I stood up to the roll-call, and when the words 'Yoshio M—' passed his lips, took my stand with the rest. We fifteen then shouldered our muskets and passed through a courtyard full of limbers, soldiers in undress, and hurrying orderlies. We went out into the streets, and as those barracks stand near the northern part of the town, we were soon marching along a country road.

"Two miles north-west of the town the sergeant, whose name was Kenchio — he is now dead — pointed out to me the trenches on a slope where the Russians made their last stand in this part of the country. These trenches were galloped by a regiment of Japanese sabres, but with terrible loss to the victors. At the bottom of the hill is a long mound of earth — the grave into which the conquerors, the conquered, and their horses, were cast together after this bloody affair.

"We halted that evening at the village of Mingu after a cold, but not unpleasant, march of twelve miles, for as I can both run and walk long distances, I was not weary, in spite of the weight which I carried. Manchuria is a charming land, even in its frozen winter, and may some day become one of the world's chief centres of life; the scenery is varied, there are many streams, now hard with ice, with mountain-ranges, and valleys with happy villages in them, and vast stretches of millet that grows far above one's head, and fruit-trees of every kind. At Mingu we found billets for the night, I staying with a Manchu woman like a giantess, who told me that her younger son was hanged in Talisu by the Russians for giving information, and that the elder has since taken to the mountains as a robber, swearing vengeance upon every one.

“The next morning the sergeant put tis through some drill-book movements, chiefly, I think, for my good on some hint from my father, for all the others had gone through the training usual for reserve-men. But I had been forced to have it all in my head from the time when I was a young boy, and though a poor shot, I had no need to be a better, for I am now convinced that all the fuss which is made about the marksmanship of land-forces is a needless fuss, since no one ever shoots the man he aims at in a battle, and whenever a man is shot it is always by a bullet aimed at some other man, or not aimed at all: so that all one need know is how to fire off one’s gun, and then leave the rest to chance.

“We set out again on a north-westward road, leaving the railway on our right, and for three days marched in a leisurely way, with stoppages at lonely villages, the weather being bright and cold, and the snow hard under our feet; and passing by those hamlets in the clefts of the mountains, I would often think to myself how well it would be to live there, giving myself to painting, music and poetry, with you, Nadine, by my side; but another fate than this was given me at my birth. My comrades, for their part, took things more lightly than I, singing on the march, and making merry at the villages, so that I was sometimes amazed at their freedom from care, while to the tricks of my clog-seller there was no end; but I think that the Chinese brandy, samshu, had oftentimes something to do with this lightness, for I have also seen them stare like men in despair, and my dog-seller confessed to me that his nights were full of dreams of blood.

““Are you not afraid of being shot, Markino?’ I said to him one night when we lay in the dark in the same room.

“‘It is not only that,’ he replied, ‘but I am also afraid of shooting any one. It seems such an outrage to take aim and shoot a human being, one, too, who has not hurt you.’

“I had myself the same shudder at the thought of wounding the flesh of unknown men, and of having mine wounded by them; the whole thing was altogether an abomination, which it was as irksome for me to go into as for one to hold the eyes in smoke, and I do not know what kept the strain of mind which held me to it from snapping, and from rushing back into the easy course of flight.

“However, we fifteen passed on from point to point during six days, witnessing on our route a movement of armies making in the same direction as ourselves, for no day went by that troops of cavalry, mounted infantry, artillery, and battalions on the march did not come up with and pass us, without paying any heed to us. Sometimes we heard of skirmishes taking place at the front between outposts and sharpshooters, with small ambushes, surprises, or night-attacks on one side or the other. At both the villages of Sinno and Chentao we found regiments bivouacked, and from both we learned that a great battle was about to take place. This rumour, in fact, seemed to be everywhere in the army.”

CHAPTER IX

YOSHIO IN ACTION

“AFTER ANOTHER INTERRUPTION, dear Nadine, I again take up the thread of my tale of misfortune. Our squad joined its company on the seventh night at the small town of Ta-mien-leng, in the great barracks built there by the Russians; in fact, it is surprising how much in a few years the Russians have built in Manchuria, for everywhere one comes upon raw blocks of brick like warehouses, with blockhouses and other works, near which sometimes a new, or partly new, townlet has sprung up.

“My squad entered barracks at eleven in the night, when I was dropping with fatigue, and already half-asleep. We were led into a room in which a young-looking officer was sitting in undress at a table, turning over the leaves of a Britannic magazine, The Graphic.

“‘All right,’ he said, after looking at the billets, ‘the company starts out to rejoin the battalion at Huamit to-morrow morning at five o’clock,’ and he directed Kenchio, the sergeant, where to seek our quarters. We passed upstairs through a great building, and in a room full of sleeping soldiers I threw my rifle with the rest upon the rack, and myself upon a bed, where I was at once asleep.

“The next morning I felt myself for the first time a soldier in the ranks of an army. I was roughly awakened at the réveillée, and hastening down with the rest, answered to the roll-call in one of the barrack-yards, where our company assembled by lantern-light. That early-morning scene, with half the men yawning and coughing, with the coloured lanterns reflected on the snow, and with only one lonely light in the barracks round us, is still present before my mind. We numbered two hundred and forty men, and the name of our captain was Kansura, who, unlike your Russian infantry captains, was mounted. He gave the command of 'Quick march!' the drums rolled, and we set out toward our destiny with all the dogs of the town barking after us in the dark, but I with a new strength in me at the feeling of being backed by all that crowd of brave fellows who surrounded me.

"Not two hours, however, were to pass before this new courage of mine was to be put to the test. It was about seven o'clock, when the darkness of a terribly cold night was gone; my right-hand neighbour, a Socialist veteran who had fought in both the Satsuma and Chinese wars, and had been telling me the story of his feats and escapes, had just said to me, 'It won't be long now before we bivouac,' when my heart jumped into my mouth at the sound of firearms, and not mine alone, I think, for no one had any thought of meeting an enemy so far south, and we were marching without having sent out any scouting-party.

"It was at a part of the very rough road where the country was flat, but pretty wild with rocks and patches of bush, all white under snow. About three-quarters of a mile on the left front of us was a rough mound or hill; and it was from there, I thought at once, that the fire came.

"Halt!' shouted Captain Kansura.

"As we halted, a sprinkling of bullets took place among us, while everyone darted his eyes about. I could see neither smoke nor enemy; but my eye caught sight of one of our men three yards before me bending his head and shoulders, like one making a bow in the Western manner. I did not know why he was doing this, till on a sudden he snatched up some grass with passion in both his hands, as he dropped sharply to the ground. At the same time our advanced guard hurried in; behind I heard a pattering upon our company ammunition-cart and our two baggage-waggons, caused by a shower of bullets: and my heart fainted in me, Nadine.

“Happily, our little captain was a man of nerve; he spurred forward and spoke hurriedly with two under-officers, and a moment afterwards the mot d’ordre ‘extend’ went forth; nor did it come too soon, for I was aware of men dropping here and there around me, and of a weird noise, like strings of the koto, in the air. I cannot describe to you my feelings at this thing. I said to myself:

‘Yoshio, this is the day on which you were predestined to die from your birth, and it is a hopeless case with you’; but at the same time a feeling of resentment against the enemy, which I had not felt before, was mixed with my despair, for it seemed to be against me that their undeserved malice was being aimed, and I hated them, and wished to be revenged on them, and at the very same time I was elated with a busy and high sort of feeling, like a wild man enjoying a storm, and thinking to himself, ‘This is the day of days, and the moment of moments.’ Meantime, we were most of us running sideways for our lives, forming in a double line, with ten feet between man and man; now I saw that the fire, which had grown heavier, was passing mainly between and over our heads; and now my Socialist veteran remarked to me, ‘We are going to storm that hill in small details with short rushes from under cover.’

“Almost at the same moment that he said this, I saw the man on my left clutch at the air with both hands, step slowly backward, reel, and drop on a sudden upon his side; at the same moment, too, I heard coming towards me from far away on the left the cry, (Retire!’ repeated from man to man, while behind me I heard Ihimoto, my squad-commander, crying out, ‘Forward! Charge!’

‘Retire!’ I shouted at the top of my voice, for the cry from the left had come to me, and in my flurry of mind I did not know where I was nor what I did; but immediately afterwards I saw Captain Kansura galloping toward me and toward the left, with his shako on the back of his head and a very excited face, howling out, ‘Who said retire? Forward! forward!’ Then I was aware of our right flank going forward at the double, and before I knew what I was doing, I was myself running toward the enemy.

“In less than a minute after this our company had disappeared from the surface of the plain, and I found myself hiding behind a rock with only six others, among them being my clogg-seller, my Socialist veteran, and squad-commander Ihimoto. ‘It is no good wasting cartridges yet, men,’ said Ihimoto; ‘we will make a rush for those three maple-trees, and then for that bush ‘; but all the other details of our company were not of the same opinion, for firing was going on far and near over the plain, like terrible kettle-drums tattooing a little, and leaving off, and beginning again somewhere else, while over our own heads whistled a few of the enemy’s shots. ‘They have no artillery, no more than we have,’ said my veteran; ‘they must be some small party, and our men on the right will very likely outflank them — banzai (a thousand years)!’ But I thought to myself that this unseen destroyer had all the better of us in his mysterious trenches, and might be there in his thousands for all we knew, only waiting for us to come up with him in order to kill us all.

“After staying a minute behind the rock to recover our wind, we again ran forward, and you may be sure that we ran fast. On either hand I saw several other groups of our men rushing forward, bending, like men making way against wind and rain, then lying behind the cover of rocks, bush or folds of the ground. As for us, we were under cover again in ten or fifteen seconds, before we could have been struck by aimed fire; and I thought to myself, 'If all goes like this, and we once get at them, let these butchers look out for themselves.' "Again we six rushed forward; it was a longer distance this time, but we had all reached some bush in safety when a rushing was heard in the leaves, and one of us six, a small fellow who wore spectacles, fell dying. We said nothing at this, hardly noticed him, our minds were so set to the work before us, and our minute under cover seemed to me too long, for the rolling of the musketry raised a heat in my brain, and I wished to come at my enemies.

"At the next cover Ihimoto, who was all out of breath, panted to us, 'Now aim to the left of that dip in the hill; let them have it,' and while the thunder-clap of our rifles was still crackling down in our ears, he howled out, 'Bayonets! Charge!' We were almost at the foot of the hill, with little more cover left us, and within a hundred yards of the enemy; we scattered and ran toward the hill, our attack being almost frontal, and it was a case with us at that moment. But we did not go alone, for almost at the same time as we, ten or twelve other groups broke from cover far and near, most of them looking remote and pigmy, forming a straggling line of poor men running forward to save their lives, and seeming a paltry enough crew on the large white landscape before the large hill; but we had hardly reached the beginning of the rising ground, when from far away on my right I heard through the din a sound, a shout, which my ears made out to be 'Banzai!'

"'Banzai! Banzai!' I shouted in the joy of my heart, and all down our line that shout went: for, away to the right, some forty of our men had scaled the flank of the hill, and were 'rolling up' the enemy's trenches with an enfilade fire. Before me on the top of the hill I saw several heads in black forage-caps appear a moment and vanish as we darted after them; but by the time we reached their trenches all that was presented to our volley was the backs of some thirty-five or forty riders in blue trousers and black tunics, leaning over their horses' necks, flying northward, and followed by a riderless horse; and not one of the hundreds of bullets which we sent after them touched one of them.

“They were a squadron-section of Crim Tartar rough-riders, who had picketed their horses on the yon side of the hill and made three short trenches with loop-holes and covered retreats, so that they had been well covered; but in the middle trench we found a tall, bearded fellow who had received a wound in the jaw, he being their only loss. As for us, we found that this affair had cost us nine dead and seventeen wounded.

“How these Tartars had got into that part or into touch with our company we did not know, for the Manchus and Mongols are on our side, and will not give true information to the Russians.

At any rate, so this matter turned out; and it was a sad thing afterwards to see our dressers and stretcher-bearers searching among the bushes for the dead and wounded.

“We camped in that place, having brought down the wounded Tartar, and when I sat to my breakfast, with leisure to think of it all, I could hardly believe that I was myself. I had been under fire, and had come out of it alive and whole; the thing was not such a nightmare of blood as I had dreamed, and I felt in my pride that I might fight a hundred battles and come through victorious. But at the same time something whispered within me, ‘It would be better not to try it.’

“We broke up camp in a sudden blizzard, after having... I have to stop...”

CHAPTER X

YOSHIO'S MARCH

“AN HOUR AGO, dear Nadine,” Yoshio’s letter continues, “I heard from one of our nurses that a batch of six from this ward will be sent back to Russia by the railway in three days’ time, and I shall then undoubtedly find the means to get this letter to you, for the departures will include my friend Tombarel, whose volost (district) is not far from St. Petersburg. This overjoys me to think that we are not utterly parted, for you will hear, as it were, my voice in this letter, you will know where I am, you will write to me; I shall then be afresh assured that you still live on this same earth with me, that you still think of me, and I shall be filled with satisfaction.

“Nadine, I have a thought, now two days old in me: the fact is, I am now getting better; I begin to feel my new health, and I have wondered whether I could not get to Russia and to you by the Siberian railway. It is a daring thought, but if I can escape from the hospital, I believe that I could find means to disguise myself.... No, I will say no more of that yet; I should be shot perhaps; I have not thought enough on it; but if I see even the least chance of doing it, I tell you truly that I should venture down a lane made by the five million rifles of Holy Russia and all her cannon pointing at me, when the prize at the end is the little bright daughter of General Prince Devriloff. Meantime, I will think and watch, though I doubt that so good a fate as this was predestined me at my birth.

“The nurse who has told me of this coming removal of wounded men is, I now hear, one of the great ladies in St. Petersburg Society, and knows your father well. Her name is Madame Krastalinski, and she is one of the volunteer nurses under the Red Cross, in which your Empress is interested. She is friendly with me, and winks at my writing; in fact, I have given her a hint of that happiness and misery which befel me in St. Petersburg, without letting her know who my bride was; and this seems to have touched her kind heart.

“But now I shall not have time to write much more of my experiences of this war, though it pleases me to write it to you, and I could go on a long while without weariness. You must hear, however, how I came to be here, wounded and a prisoner.

“After the skirmish with the troop of Crim Tartars north of Ta-mien-leng, of which I have told you, our company marched a long way over some hilly country, not without scouting this time you may be sure; and we arrived safely near the townlet of Kong-kai-tien, where we came up with our battalion.

“From that time my ears began to be filled with nothing but rumours of a coming battle; we spoke about it, and of our probable share in it, at night in our tents, round the rice-kettle in the morning, and when drowsy men were coming in from outpost. It seemed that a great army of our troops had concentrated in that part of the country within forty or fifty miles; some said that we were as many as 230,000; our major had had one of those poles by which wireless messages are received rigged up, and this became a sort of centre for the subalterns to meet at in the afternoon, in order to talk of the future; the sutler men and women of the country who brought us things to sell were keenly questioned by us, so were our own reconnoitring parties when they came in. On the fifth morning an orderly rode in in haste from beyond the mountains on the north with a despatch, and half-an-hour later, as I was being marched in frozen from sentry-duty, our major, whose name is Suyematsu, called me and said, 'Your father has just arrived at the front, private, and now perhaps we shall see things quicken a little.'

"I was in no way keen for any more battles, as some of my comrades were, but this put a feeling of warmth and safety in me to know that my honoured father was at hand, though I did not understand the major's talk about things quickening a little.

"It turned out to be true, however, for that very afternoon we broke up our camp, and thenceforward to that fateful morning when I was awaked from sleep by beating drums and cannon booming in the distance, all was movement and bustle for every one of us.

The division of which my battalion formed a part was the third, under General O — , and was made up of 12,000 men, with some squadrons of cavalry, and thirty-six quick-firing field-guns, besides engineers and other such people, and one night, the fourth of March, I saw the whole of these encamped in the snows by the banks of a tributary of the river Hundari to the south of the branch-line of railway to Perm. My company was camped on rising ground to the west, and before I went to sleep I saw the fires of the whole division reaching far away into the night, battalion after battalion, with their guns and their sentries in greatcoats, like a picture in a solemn dream; and I wondered in my heart what fate awaited all this power of men, animals and guns. Yet this great army was only in some sort the outpost of a far greater war-host that occupied the country; and hidden away in the northern night was the war-host of the Russians, as great a one as ours, it was said.

"The next morning I saw column after column of our division march away to the sound of the drums, two of them passing quite close to my camp, and I felt a thrill to see them, for our little men march very nimbly, as if shod with something pneumatic, and a column of them, swaying from side to side in step to the roll of the drums, puts one in mind of a clicking machine at work upon the road.

“Near noon that day, after I had spent the morning in breaking river-ice for drinking purposes, our company, too, received marching-orders, crossed the river, and at a place near the village of Sintao was digging trenches and making parapets in the frozen ground at the foot of a hill, with a gun-emplacement at the top of it, till near ten in the night. We then set up an entanglement of barbed wires, and scattered a lot of old tin cans about to make a noise in case of a night-attack. By then I was very cold and weary, but my squad was next on the roster for outpost, so I had to go on. I stood leaning on my musket for about an hour after outpost had been taken up, looking at the country, which was fairly level, and lay spread out before me in a dull moonlight, all white and still, but with several points of fire shining through the mist afar off, whether fires of the enemy or of units of our own army I did not know. I gazed upon this scene with a foreboding in me that after the morrow I should nevermore gaze upon any earthly scene, for I did not know where my honoured father was, no longer felt protected by his nearness to me, and I experienced a somewhat bitter satisfaction in thinking that, if I were killed the next day, that would wound my father’s heart, and would serve him right for making me a soldier, a thought that caused my eyes to fill with tears of self-pity; just then I heard one of the other outlying sentries behind a hill to my left call out, ‘Who goes there?’ and presently I saw Messrs. England and Petersen coming towards me, leading their horses. They had ridden from the village to bring me a message of good cheer from my honoured father, who, they said, was with the Headquarters-Staff at Kwang-chang-tse, but was coming further north that same night; and I have already told you, Nadine, how, as they sat near me on a knoll, I heard them converse of great matters which are going forward, or soon will be, in China, and also how I heard Mr. England praise such things as painting and poetry rather than war. They stayed there till I went off duty, and then I saw them canter away over the snow and into the mist, till they disappeared far off like shadows down the further side of a hill.

“The next morning I was awakened while it was yet dark by my cloggseller, who shook me by the shoulder, and at once I was aware that the day of the battle was really come, for I heard in the west beyond the far hills a booming of great guns, and in the face of every one in the camp was to be seen an air of business and ado. We ate that morning one of the emergency-rations of cooked rice which we carry in our aluminium mess-pans, then, as the sun rose, each one was given his place in the two-tier trench which we had made the night before, only a small scouting-group going out on the horses northward.

“My Socialist veteran, with whom I stood at about the middle of the front trench, told me that we should be immediately attacked, for that Captain Kansura had got information of this. I felt that we should give a good account of ourselves to any body of troops that came within the zone of our fire, for our narrow, standing work was made in rather a Z-shape, so that we could not well be rolled up by a flank fire, our parapets had a waving top so as not to look like a work of man to the enemy’s eye, and we had covered the raw earth with snow shrubs and branches, so I thought that it would take a sharp pair of field-glasses to spy out our position; and away out on the plain we had placed some biscuit-tins, one at five hundred yards, two at a thousand, to mark the range, for the sunlight made them glitter. But the cold was bitter, and we waited, but no enemy came. The men were all making guesses about what would happen to the two armies around us, and how each was disposed; my squad-commander, jumping into the trench near me, said with a smile, 'Well, Yoshio, are you prepared to kill the bear?' then, with his back against the trench, began to tell me about the armies, whereat five or six of the men gathered round to listen.

"I was amazed at the vastness of the plot which he unfolded, and said to him, 'But can all that have originated, or even be carried, in any one man's mind?'

"'Yes,' he answered with a smile, 'I believe that it has originated in one mind, one that you know very well, too, and I am sure that it is being carried in thousands of minds this morning. If each little pawn in the game, like our company here, only does what is entrusted to it in its isolation, beyond a doubt the scheme as a whole will come off with flying colours and the drums beating.'

"'But how long do you think that it will last?'

I asked.

"'We hope to see it all over within two days,' said he.

"'Is that the main battle going on where we can hear those guns booming?' I next asked, with my teeth chattering.

"'Why, no,' he said, smiling at me; 'that is only a brigade of the 5th posted near Lei-ta-che, making one of the feint attacks of which I told you upon some unit of the enemy's centre. Between Lei-ta-che and Fuhai the enemy's centre is occupying positions on a front some thirty miles long, while our army, if you try to imagine it largely, is a hollow square with a side of about fifty miles, with the mass of its guns and transport somewhere about the centre near Kwang-cheng-tse, and with its back upon Chan-chung. The idea of all this is as simple as it is sweet: the enemy await our attack, hoping to get all the advantage to be got out of defence, and we are going to attack along their centre, but it is really a feint attack, for we mean to retire in detail all along the line and make them follow us.'

"'But what a butchery of our men during these retirements!' I exclaimed.

"'Yes; there will be some butchery,' he answered carelessly; 'but our troops, as they retire, will fight rear-guard actions, no doubt, so the butchery will be local. Meantime, the real fighting will be in the flanks, of which we here, acting as outpost to our battalion, form part of the right. It is expected that in the heat of victory the enemy's centre will order its flanks to attack ours, thus giving our flanks the advantage of defence. If, having this advantage, our flanks manage to drive back theirs, we shall be able to make flanking movements round their main body in the centre, surround their centre, cut it off from its base, force it either to attack or to surrender, and so, perhaps win the day.'

"'But what a number of points it must have been needful to think of beforehand!' I cried out, 'and what a terrible lot of fighting must at this moment be going on!'"

"' Yes,' he answered; 'and in the carrying out of so mighty a scheme, there are sure to be many blunders, but it has come from the mind of one of the greatest of men, and I dare say the end will justify it.'

"' And where, then, is my honoured father at present?' I asked.

"'I hear that he is somewhere not far to the east of Lei-sha-tse, in our right flank with Baron K — and part of the Guards' Division,' said he, adding with a smile, 'and therefore not very many miles from his son.'

"' And who,' I next asked, 'commands the enemy's left flank with whom our right will have to fight?'

"' Devriloff,' he answered, 'and Prisyrewski, the ex-Deputy Governor-General of Warsaw, each of whom commands a division. Devriloff has under him the Guard Rifle Brigade, including the celebrated Preobragensk Regiment, while Prisyrewski has two of the Grenadier Regiments with some line-infantry regiments; both have also a force of regular and Cossack cavalry, including two battalions of Guard Cuirassiers; so, you see, there should be some fighting in our right flank.'

"'Is our right flank as strong as their left?' I asked.

"'It is to be hoped so,' he said, 'for at our right is really the critical point of the whole battle, in the opinion of most of us: namely, the Fanchu bridge. It is the bridge spanning the Fanchu ravine which extends east and west some five miles; the enemy's left are sure to hold this bridge in force, and, unless we take it, we shan't be able to surround their centre as we intend, so there is bound to be a massacre just thereabouts.'

"He had hardly said this, when I saw three riders dash round the foot of a hillock two thousand yards away, and a minute afterwards about twenty others, Cossacks in busbies, came chasing them, the three in front being part of our reconnoitring group. They hardly seemed to move at that distance, but from the stretching of their horses we could judge that it was a keen enough race; there was an echo of carbine reports, but no one seemed to be hit, and we waited, all of us greatly excited, while they grew larger and nearer, till I seemed to hear the drumming of the hoofs in the snow, and now down our trench I heard the command "Fire!" I did not fire; I was so uncertain and excited, it seemed to me so sure a thing that we should shoot our own three; but a racket of musketry broke out round me, and the next thing I saw was that the enemy's troop had turned tail, leaving three of their men and two horses in the snow. Our three-had not been touched by our fire, for the trajectory of our bullets had passed over their heads, but as they galloped in one of them fell off his horse.

"Nor was any time given us to go to care for this poor man. I believe, in fact, that that troop of Cossacks had only been sent out to 'feel' for our position, for immediately after the two scouts had come in with the news that the enemy were in force three miles off, guns began booming from somewhere, and I could make out infantry, with cavalry on its flanks on the northern horizon: a minute later shrapnel was bursting upon our hillside.

“From that time I no longer felt cold; I forgot that it was winter.

“For an hour both shrapnel and common shell kept on falling around us, but without doing the least harm, except to the ground and to a finger of Kenchio, my sergeant, which a splinter cut. We stood snugly under cover, for we had a parapet, and though there were no loopholes in it, there were notches like battlements through which to look and point our muskets, and it is likely that the enemy’s gunners did not quite know our position, for some of their shells screamed a long way over our heads; but still, it made us feel rather small and queer, this cannonade; I suppose it was the sound more than anything, the large-minded wrath of their guns against us, vaunting itself through heaven. Kenchio laughed at his cut, but it was a rather jumpy sort of laughing, and I felt relieved when their infantry began to march upon us.

“We had chosen our ground pretty well, with a dear field for our fire, and very little to cover them, except small rocks embedded in snow, and though they had perhaps a thousand men for each hundred of ours, I shuddered for them, and for us, too, for it is an outrageous thing, Nadine, to shoot down men, whose teeth the dentist stops with so much care, every one of whom one would pity with a pang in one’s bosom, if one only knew him well, his home-life, his temptation, and all the tale of his undeserved sorrow and tragic plight in this world. However, one has to defend one’s own life, you see; it was they who were wilfully attacking us, and when the word ‘Fire!’ rang upon our ears, we shot at them, shot at them, with a growing spite, each for himself, fully ten rounds a minute, our gun booming and their four also, our musketry pouring masses of fire over the zone which they had to cross, and theirs rolling too. Ah, I think I can see them again now, lying down or running, with their dark-green knickerbockers and knee-boots, struggling towards us by extended groups in a loose sort of line to take our lives, but one by one throwing up their arms in despair and failure in the midway.

“They had left their cavalry with some infantry in reserve beyond range, in order to gallop our position no doubt when the time should come, but it was no good; we had orders to concentrate fire on their central units, and these, when they were well within six hundred yards of us, wavered and broke. Men are not machines, but bundles of nerves, and those who were still alive saw death so busy among them that they could no longer stand it, but each for himself, struck by a sudden eagerness to get out of that heat into which he had rashly ventured and to save his skin, began to retire, whereupon all down the line, which must have been three miles long, the rot spread. Yes, they fled. I could have shouted for joy. On the lips of our men I saw a smile of malice such as only my countrymen can show. Kenchio, the sergeant, shouted through the musketry din, ‘the cranes!’ which is a very scornful word with us; he little thought that I was to see him drop dead before me that day. And as they fled, our men massacred them, taking a cooler aim than before, and firing into the middle of groups; and the moment they were beyond range, and their bearers were seen moving out from their advanced dressing-station which had a Red Cross flag on it, we formed up in column, ready for pursuit. Only two of us had been wounded in the trenches, and one killed; nor had our gun even been touched behind its epaulement.

“Meantime, by the telegraph on the other hillside, a message had been sent to our battalion four miles in our rear on the Kirin railway, telling it that we were about to give chase; a group of four had been sent on ahead to cut down a tree in the enemy's road, so as to keep them back, and we others set out, not following the enemy's rear, but marching first eastward, then northward parallel to the road which we knew that they must take, meaning to head them off at a mountain-pass near the village of Huarin, for Captain Kansura knew the country like a scroll, and as our small unit was very mobile, we covered the ground fast enough.

“By two p.m. we were ambushed in a wood on a steep hillside, covered with rocks and bush; Kansura then sent two young soldiers to scout over the mountains on foot, and twenty minutes afterwards I saw them dropping down the opposite cliffs from point to point like monkeys, so that I wondered how they did not break their necks. They brought the news that the enemy were coming at quick march, and we had not to wait more than an hour when down the opening of the gorge southward we saw their advance sub-sections coming in double column, with flags embroidered with saints, and with their drummers, markers and sergeant-majors stepping out in front. They had not the least thought of our being there, and on the whole this is a hard war for the Russians, because none of the people of the country, except the Tonghaks, will give them any information. At any rate, only a few of them escaped us that day, for while they were squeezing themselves through the gorge, we opened fire, and after the first dozen rounds their white flag went up, but not before one of their random shots had laid poor Kenchio low. We had killed 157 of them that morning; we now took their four guns, their baggage and arms, and by five o'clock had them marching back to Kintao under a guard of our battalion which had come up after the surrender. That, then, was a good day's work for a company of 200 men.

“The faces of those prisoners an hour or so after their surrender actually wore a look of relief and quietness, like men taking their ease at night after a day of storm and stress. As for me, I felt sleepy all that afternoon: my musket was a burden to me, and I shivered with cold. I suppose it was the strain of my mind for hours during the action that made me feel like this when it was all over, though I had not been conscious of any strain while it lasted: but such is war.

CHAPTER XI

YOSHIO'S DEFEAT

“OUR BATTALION MARCHED five miles in a northwesterly direction after that surrender, a march in which I never ceased to hear the booming of guns — in all directions, as it seemed to me, though far away, so that the very air seemed morose, though it was a fine night, with the moon in the sky; and there came into my head a clear vision of Time that night and of the fleetingness of all living things, for this sound of great guns all in the air set me thinking of those great beasts of past ages, big as houses some of them were, which made their roarings heard in their day, but are dead and gone now; and now it is man’s turn to roar and boom in his own way, till he, too, passes away to give place to yet other shapes, who will make their own sorts of noises under the moon, and will vanish like ghosts in their turn; but the moon and the earth will remain, without any inhabitants, and will smile at them all alike.

“Toward the end of our moonlight march we came upon three burned villages, one after the other, and from most of the others in that part the villagers had fled. I was sent out in a foraging-group to one of these villages in a gorge on our left to look for an ox or two, and one of us had the money in his pocket to pay for what he might find, but not a soul nor an animal could we see. Half an hour afterwards, also on our left, we passed a field in which were two wagons and a tent with the Red Cross, and people with lanterns crawling in the moonlight over the trampled snow in search of the wounded, and forlorn enough they looked there; and a little before we bivouacked we came upon four mountain-gun carriages, with their guns and artillery-store waggons all overturned and shattered, the horses dead, and a gunner sitting against one of the carriage-wheels with his head bent down to his knees, he, too, dead, and you could not think how lonely he looked sitting there in the middle of the moonlight country, with his dragoon-sword and revolvers at his belt, and his brow on his knees; there were parts of the country just there where this gunner sat that were quite sown with shell-splinters, and looked as if they had been ravaged.

“Meantime, the talk among us was all about how the day may have gone for the two great armies, and the word ‘Fanchu Bridge,’ ‘Fanchu Bridge’ was in everyone’s mouth, for it had got to be known that this bridge was the critical point for the right flank of our army, and, in fact, in a certain way, for the whole army. I heard the next morning that some Japanese irregulars and Chun-chuses had ridden into our camp with news and despatches during the night, and thenceforward everyone seemed to understand that the day had not gone badly for our side.

“During that night also, a unit of our men left us to march ten miles northward where a regiment of the enemy was posted, and I was told that this tiny body of ours thrice roused the enemy’s camp, making them all start to arms by firing shots among them at such a rate that they fancied themselves surprised by a large force. This was to break their rest and demoralise them for the next day’s work, and no doubt it succeeded, for there are few tricks of this kind which our little men are not up to.

“I only heard this bit of camp-news the next morning, not that I had slept much, for though I was very tired, a pretty steady movement westward was going on over the road near us, making a great row, a movement of baggage, troops, artillery and wounded — toward Lei-sha-tse, I suppose; and though I was no longer very much afraid of anything, I heard these sounds of war even in my sleep, and I had nightmares every time I slept, seeing again the faces of the wounded, those white faces and the glaring stains on their bandages, their maimed humanity, their sighs, and the look of death in their eyes; for I had been helping to lift some of them that afternoon, and this must have infected my sleep with such like shapes of woe.

“Well, by the next evening I was a seasoned soldier, Nadine, for that day we fought two actions; one at noon, when we attacked, losing a fourth of our men, and having to retire under fire till the three other battalions of our regiment came up, whereupon we rushed the enemy’s position at the point of the bayonet. At one moment bullets were falling thickly about me, and I seemed to have a charmed life, so that I no longer thought that I could be shot, and wondered at myself; and near sunset again, on our march to the Fanchu Bridge, the whole brigade being then together, we had another action, for hearing that the enemy were awaiting us in entrenchments three miles ahead, our brigadier decided to make a détour, telling the two Manchu fellows who had brought us the information of the enemy’s gun-emplacements to ride back and let them know which way we were going. The enemy fell into the trap, for hastening across country to take us in flank on our new road, they found us under cover and facing them; they had then to attack, and it was not long before we had them driven back, and were on the march again.

“But as this is the Tuesday on which the draft of wounded from this ward are to start for Russia, I cannot write much more; they leave at three-thirty, and, mon ami, Tombarel, has faithfully promised that you shall have what I entrust to him. But I must tell you before I finish how it was my lot to witness some of the carnage about that awful Fanchu Bridge before I was myself done for. This carnage had been going on, I heard, since five in the afternoon, and it lasted to eleven in the night, regiment after regiment of our men getting cut to pieces all the time, counter-attacks by the enemy, long-range pompoms and heavy field-guns on both sides vomiting tons of metal six miles into the air, mixed with cracking Maxims and musketry. I felt awed when I was still three miles from the outskirts of this great business, for I seemed to be entering upon the region of an outburst of nature; the earth could be felt to quake, and while still far away we saw the redness of it in the air of the night.

“The bridge is at the back of a chain of hills which run along a plateau; over this plateau passes the road from Tsinchan to Fuhai, which then goes on through a sort of rock-tunnel in the hills, and comes out at the bridge. The bridge, a light iron one, could not be destroyed by any high-angle fire of ours, for it was too close under the hills, which are steep on that further side, and the hills themselves were held by the enemy, who were ever anew reinforced from Fuhai.

“When our brigade came up with the fighting line about 8.30 p.m., none of us were fit for any more action that day; a breeze blew a bitter little hail over the wintry plateau, though it could not blow away that smell of powder with which all the air was thick. As for me, I ached throughout my body; I could no longer feel my feet in their broken boots, and I was ready to drop dead and give up everything. ‘Ah, Yoshio, my man,’ said my clog-seller wearily to me, as we stood two hundred yards behind a wood into which shrapnel was bursting, ‘it is a bad case with us this time.’ I did not answer him, for my spirit was dead in me; the wood was on fire in one part, and the icicles about there were crashing down in detail, but the rest of it stood all stiff and dry still, and we felt none of the warmth, though the light of the flames was showing up our line of rifles stretched out all across a shallow valley from one hillock-top on the right to another on the left; and I thought to myself that this plateau was a new sort of hell in which fire, ice and din, all the three together, were placed in order to wring men's nerves.

“But it seemed that all this was nothing to my honoured father and to Generals O — and K the first and last of whom were at a windmill under which our brigade had passed on its way to the plateau, while O — , our own general, was on the field; they were pouring out men's lives like water upon these terrible hills, for the sake of that one little bridge. Nor did the coming of night much lessen the slaughter, since the moon was bright at most moments, and since the plateau offered little cover for great masses of troops.

“The thought came into my head how good that would be if I were an orderly, and were sent with one of the messages that were passing to and from that windmill some miles behind us, then I should see my honoured father, whom I longed to see once more before I died, and on my knees I should pray him to beg the two generals to spare their poor troops till the next morning; but this was not to be, and there we all waited, shivering to our souls, while every few minutes a long gun which lay between our rear and the town of baggage-wagons behind us sent a shell howling like a devil in flight over my head.

“Foredone as I was, I was glad when the order came to move, and it must have been on a front of at least four or five miles that the brigade moved; we had to support the centre of the firing-line which, for the fifth or sixth time that night, was giving way; our company started toward the wood, and what we had to do, Kansura said, was to fire, no matter whither, to lie down and pour, each man for himself, his hundred and twenty cartridges over the hills, as soon as we came within range.

“But the wood almost choked us: it was smoky and dark in there, and some fifteen of us lost touch with the rest, so that when we came out we saw the backs of our company a good distance on in front just disappearing down a hill-side. ‘Come on!’ we fifteen cried to one another, and we started running, but for some reason those in front had started running, too, for when we next sighted them they were as far off as before; we must have hurried on in this way with short stoppages fully two miles, when we saw those before us entering a village-street, whose burned walls stood out as black as ink against the snow and sky; this village was in a shallow valley with some wood on the slopes, and down we ran to rejoin them.

“Before this, some rifle-bullets from the enemy’s position had begun to dash into the snow around us, and I thought that, being now within range, our company was going to use what was left of the village as cover, and thence pour its fire upon those spouting hills, over which swept our searchlights. But when my group of fifteen and I were half-way down the slope to the village, I suddenly saw several groups of our soldiers rushing wildly back out of the village-street, and the next moment I heard as it were a flood of galloping hoofs, a rushing noise rising in power, made by cavalry of the enemy, but drowned in a few seconds in a crash of our musketry. Some of the group with me paused to run back; ‘on! on!’ I shouted to them, for I must have gone wild and desperate, and the blood of my father and of my mother surged up in my veins. I guessed that a counter-attack of cavalry from the hills must have been made upon the centre of our firing-line at the moment of its wavering, and that, having driven back part of it so far south as this village, the enemy’s cavalry were now sabring our company in the village-street; and I ran down calling upon Hachiman, the god of war, to the affray, leading my group of fifteen with their bayonets fixed, whereat some of the fugitives running up the slope from the village turned back to join in the fight.

“But I had not yet reached the village when I was aware of a new sound of galloping hoofs, and glancing up the slope to my right, I saw a full squadron of our own cavalry rushing down like a sharp shower with drawn sabres upon the flank of the village. At the same time I saw a shell arrive and burst among their front ranks, throwing light upon the faces round the hole made by the shrapnel in their midst; but these grim little men were at once galloping in a body again, keen to spring upon their enemies, and thenceforward I can remember little that happened: for the two bodies of cavalry were all mixed with infantry in a scrimmage in the three or four streets of the village. I myself was mad with rage, I suppose; we stuck our steels into one another’s flesh in silence; the dead were all underfoot, and our boots slipped on them in a slush of blood and snow. I seemed to be struggling in darkness, the moon seemed to have gone out, or else I seemed to have gone blind; I got a cut from a sabre across my brow, but did not know it; I was buried under a horse and a heap of men, but I struggled out, gasping, in order to fight again, in order to look round me and see whom I could wound. I had no longer a bayonet, but a sword in my hand, and I did not know how this sword had got there; when a rider leaned down over his horse and glared at me I gnashed at him and pierced him; meantime, only a little clashing of steel here or there was to be heard throughout the ruins of the village, the rest was done without any sound. It was horrible.

“The enemy must have been in greater force than we, perhaps were reinforced; anyhow, I am certain that at the last our men fled in all directions. I found myself stumbling up an alley of the village over dead bodies, flying from a fierce-eyed man with a moustache, who chased me, and I can see him again now in his crimson trousers and green forage-cap, for he remains as grisly as a spectre in my fantasy, and I have often since dreamed of this man running all soaked in blood after me to take my life, like a wild beast. He was a hussar, one of those, I think, that they call Grodno hussars, quite a giant, some forty years old; I could hear his laboured breathing behind me, and I ran aside from the alley to a hut for cover; the hut stood rather alone, was not burned out like most of the rest, though scorched, and before it lay the body of a peasant-woman with two goats standing by her; if I had had my musket then, I could easily have shot my hussar from behind cover, but I had only a sword, and he, strange to say, a bayonet, which he held awkwardly poked out before him. He ran me round the hut, and we kept running round, I dodging him this way and that for quite a minute or two; at this game he never would have caught me at any other time; I even thought of killing him at a rush with my sword, but I knew that I could not do this then, nor even dodge him long, for I felt myself fainting. At last I leapt up and caught the sill of a little window in order to climb and hide within, for the hut-door was still whole and was closed, but he was just in time to seize my leg, making me as cold with horror at his catching me as if he had been a ghost. I murmured something at him in Japanese, with my face twisted round to him in an intense fright; I think I murmured: 'Why, man, are you mad to-night?' I also kicked a little the leg which he had seized, and this may have maddened him, for he grasped at me, tore me down, cast me upon the snow, fleshed his bayonet in me, and I remember seeing him running away from me like a shape in a dream.

“After this I lost my senses for I do not know how long; there were forms moving near me at one time, and I tried to call, or did call, to them. Whether it was they who picked me up I am not sure, but I know that at eleven or twelve that same night I was in a Russian field-hospital wagon on a spring bed, crawling along the downhill road which runs from the Fanchu bridge northward to Fuhai; yes, there I lay in the dark, alive, a very astonishing thing to me. I felt stiff all through, as if my soul as well as my body was frozen hard, and was aching at it. I was conscious of a bandage tied aslant round my head, so that my left eye was covered by it, also of a sickly hospital-smell of wounds and carbolic acid in the air about me, and of the wagon's movement, and of groans and sighs within it, and of the uproar still of that endless war round the bridge; and, as I lay, many pleasant pictures of my boyhood, above all, the midnight scene of our marriage, dear, passed in a strange light before my sight: for these things did not seem to have happened in the same world of ice in which I now lay, but to have happened to some other person than myself in a world farther than the moon.

“And presently, as I thus lay musing, I was aware of a shouting a long way off behind the wagon, the shouting of a very great host of men, who, it seemed to me, were shouting ‘Banzai!’ for only a shout of joy could have burst out so suddenly, lasted so long, and rung so heaven-high; and I somehow understood that it was a shout made by my own people. Nor was I long in any doubt about that, for fifteen minutes later a squadron of Russian cavalry came galloping from the direction of the Fanchu bridge, and after them came squadron on squadron; my wagon and three others full of wounded men drew out of their way into a roadside field, and there stood still, while I, by an opening between two flaps, could see through my right eye the moon floating in the middle of the sky, and whatever was passing on the road.

“The field-hospital men, standing by the four wagons, shouted out questions as the troops galloped past us, but no answer was given them, for the stare in the eyes of those riders was that of men in flight; and on they came, reaching out towards Fuhai, a boundless caravan of cavalry, horse-artillery, transport, pressing upon one another's heels, and casting glances behind them; then came infantry in a scattered march over the road and over the fields, lashing their baggage-horses, body after body of them, in urgent haste to be on, while from the battle-field behind them one could still hear a booming of guns which seemed reluctant to let their wrath die out, even when all was over.

“Leaning against the outside of my wagon were three wounded wretches who had been following it, for there was no more room inside for them; two of them had arms in slings, the third had his jaws in a bandage, and I understood that they would never reach the next village, but would fail on the road, they looked so frail and woebegone in the face of all that world of winter which was against them. Something made me try to lift my head to ask them what had happened, though this was very foolish, for they would not have understood my language, and were too weak to answer me; but I could not lift my head, and I smiled to myself and lay quiet, watching again the teeming procession pouring itself across the country, with now a group of staff-officers cantering neck and neck in a glum silence, and now a staring team of runaways that had been too much lashed, throwing a whole halfmile of the retreat into uproar and disarray.

“What a medley of scenes and sorts of people were in that retreat! What an impression of mass it gave, like a nation migrating with all its belongings! I saw Turkoman troops in their red gowns, horse-grenadiers with epaulettes and lace, sapper battalions, Terek cavalry, and even a troop of Kalmucks, all making a mixture of the rainbow-hues in which the Russian army is dressed; I knew each class of troop by its uniform, for I had been made to study all this years before by my honoured father; and on they all poured lumberingly, with some wounded faces among them, and prancing chargers, and sudden alarms and shoutings from the rear; I saw heads bandaged with coloured handkerchiefs which peeped out under their caps, while some heads were bare to the drizzle of small snow-bullets which the wind blew aslant; one Caucasian rifle-infantryman passed close to my wagon with a bloody left foot without any boot on it, though the upper part of the long boot was still round the leg, and I knew that long before he reached Fuhai that foot would be eaten by frost. Then at last I saw a face which I knew, even though I had never before seen it, but I had often seen its photograph, and he to whom it belonged had been well described to me from my boyhood by some one, dear; he came leisurely on horseback with another man, a general, by his side, both of them in the midst of a troop of Guard-cuirassiers; and, as he passed by me, I heard him chuckle a little — bitterly, I thought. It was your father, Nadine.

“On he passed with the rest, and then came more infantry, another mass, a great mob of stragglers spreading over the country-side, and then suddenly into my sight there dashed a squadron of our little men, smiling, but without any look of triumph on their hard faces; they took no notice of the Russian stragglers in the fields, but cantered on past them, and past me; then came more, several squadrons of them, one after another, I with their calm canter; and between two squad-rons of them came a small troop cantering, in the middle of which I saw, Nadine, my honoured father. Yes, there he rode between the two generals, with a terrible smile, whose meaning I knew, on his lips — a smile was on all their lips; my father was dressed in a rough tweed of European cut, without any cloak or coat that glacial night, and the little hail which the wind swept beat upon his face.

“When he came quite near, not fifteen feet from me, I found strength, I lifted my head: ‘Father!’

I called out, but my voice was as thin as that of a very old man who is dying, and he did not hear me, he was far from hearing me, he did not know that his son lay frozen and wounded in the dark of that wagon which he was passing. I saw him lift a night-glass to his eyes and search the distance in front, looking for I do not know what or whom....

“Nadine, I must stop now.

“I was taken to Mukden, where I first heard of the retreat of the Russian centre, which happened nine hours after our side took the Fanchu bridge in their left flank.

“At Mukden your father visited the hospital; he saw me; he stood over my bed. Ah, if he had but guessed who I was, I should not perhaps be writing to his daughter now. But he could not see in a common soldier-of-the-line the son of Baron M —

“Three days later I was removed from Mukden; all the hospitals of the land were crowded, the more slightly wounded had to make room for the more gravely, so on the 8th of the month I was taken with seventeen others to the railway, and placed in a train crowded with troops; then came for us the treeless waste of Northern Manchuria, and the mountains on the Siberian frontier. I thought that we were being taken to Khabarovsk, whither many of the wounded are taken by river-ambulance steamers; but Khabarovsk, too, was full. We had to cross the ice of Lake Baikal. Ah, that was a journey for wounded men to take! You would weep bitterly if I had time to tell you even a little of it; nine of our seventeen perished on the way, and at the end the rest of us were crazy....

“I must stop instantly: Tombarel, who is dressed, warns me.

“Nadine, I remind you of our marriage. All the fathers, all the wars, in the world are weaker than that. You have allowed me to be your husband. Nothing can alter this for ever.

“Good-bye! Oh, Nadine, let us meet....”

CHAPTER XII

NADINE DECIDES

YOSHIO'S LETTER TO Nadine was duly put into the young girl's hands on the night of March 29 by the Russo-Frenchman, Tombarel, who got for his pains a handsome present. The motherless child was no longer in her father's palace in the Great Morskaia, but was living under the care of the Duchesse Okhta (a grey-haired lady, a relative of Prince Devriloff), in a palace on the Gagarinsk Embankment, almost overlooking the Field of Mars and the Summer Garden.

In the Okhta Palace Nadine had with her her maid Anna Pochowski and the Amurski Cossack, Shtcherbakoff, her old man-nurse and playmate, the same whom Prince Devriloff had set on to do Baron M — to death during the Japanese visit, and who had witnessed the young girl's marriage.

Beside the devoted Shtcherbakoff and Anna, no one, even now, had the faintest suspicion of that headlong marriage at midnight, except the white "pope" whom Nadine had bribed, and the priest who had performed the rite: and these last, for the love of their skins, kept a still tongue in their heads.

And so it was that when, four days after her receipt of Yoshio's letter, the young girl disappeared, no one knowing of anything to account for it, this affair caused a feeling of pity and wonder in the city, even in the midst of the national upheaval. It was believed that the daughter of Devriloff, with her maid, Anna Pochowski, and her old nurse, Shtcherbakoff, had been drowned, or in some way killed; and so strong was this belief, so certain were the police that the missing three had not gone out of the city, that the police of other cities were not even set to unravel the affair.

Meantime, this young girl, who was only just sixteen years of age, who had been brought up in luxury, who had a love for jewels and gaudy costumes to suit the swarthy hue of her face — this young girl was braving the rigours of the Siberian winter, going to Irkutsk, where she believed that her young husband was.

The terrible news of her disappearance was, of course, at once wired to Prince Devriloff, who was somewhere on the eastern borders of Lake Baikal; but it was some seven or eight days before the almost maddened father could dare to leave the seat of war. After this delay he set out westward to seek his daughter.

Meanwhile, on her journey, the young girl wrote a sort of narrative or letter, perhaps finding a pleasure as Yoshio had done, in as it were speaking to Yoshio in that way before their meeting; so that what happened to her may be given in her own words.

“My little one!” (mon petit) she writes, “I received the History at ten o’clock in the night of the 16th of March” (she means the 29th in our “New” style, not used in Russia).

“I was at à soirée in a salon of the Okhta Palace, when I was told that Anna Pochowski wished to speak with me. On going to her in an ante-room, I found her very pale: a soldier, she said, who had been wounded in the war, had asked for her by name below, and, on seeing her, had whispered her that he had a packet for me from a Japanese youth named — Yoshio! That very name was in my heart.

“I bid Anna Pochowski to find means to introduce the soldier into my private salon by an escalier de service. I then returned to the soirée where I had been playing bezique; I finished the game, and I do not think that anyone saw in my face what was in my heart.

“I then whispered to the Duchesse Okhta, my guardian, that I was indisposed for any more society that night; she wished to leave the salon with me, but I put her off, and was soon running towards what awaited me in my apartments.

“I found the soldier, Tombarel, with Anna Pochowski there, and, after giving him some wine, made him sit by me and tell his story. I kissed his pale, hard cheeks, got from him an oath of secrecy, and sent him away.

“Still I did not open the packet. When Anna Pochowski returned to me, I caused myself to be undressed and put into a de chambre; only then, having dismissed her and locked my boudoir door, I sat to read the packet.

“Oh, but how I was able to read in it the sincere soul of my Yoshio, his meekness and — !

I cannot describe to you how well I know you! It is the soul of a boy of whom I have always been conscious, of whom I have always dreamt, who has been my playmate in meadows bathed in a light which was not that of our sun or moon. And how I laughed! you were so frightened at first! and what a warrior you became—’ mad with rage!’ And then the hussar with the moustache, and the wound.... It makes me shudder.

“When I had read it all through twice, when it was nearly morning, the will to go to you had grown up in me without my knowledge, and had become a settled thing in my mind; having finished the reading, I found that I willed.

“I felt, from what the soldier Tombarel had said, that you were more seriously ill than you wished me to believe, and that my duty was to go to my husband. I should have gone to you long before you were wounded, if I had known whither to go! I received your letters from Königsberg and Marseilles, but, knowing that you would leave those places soon after writing, I did not dare to risk a flight from home without knowing where I should join you. Irkutsk is the first settled address which I have had of you since the terrible night of your marriage.

“Ah, Yoshio, what a man of iron your honoured father must be! I, however, am not in duty bound to be afraid of that gentleman monsieur-là), and am even prepared, if necessary, to argue a point with him.

“By break of day, I say, I was resolved to go to you. But how? Civilian passengers are no longer carried on the railway; there was the question of passports, the risks of being found out and stopped, and a hundred difficulties. I saw this much at once; but in mazes of this sort I think that a Russian girl with a will will always find a way out, for it is said that if Eve had been a Russian girl, she would have deceived the serpent instead of being deceived by him. Moreover, in Russia everything that one wishes for may be bought, if one has the money, and I had not only my jewels, but a sum of 7,000 roubles in my strong-box. I went to bed to think of it, and presently fell asleep in the full light of morning.

“After a short sleep I woke to find Anna Pochowski with me. I said to her, ‘Hasten and bring Ivan Shtcherbakoff to my bedside.’

“When he came Anna Pochowski was about to retire, but I said to her, ‘You stay, too.’

“I then told them that I had formed the plan of running away to my wounded husband at Irkutsk.

“Upon this Ivan Shtcherbakoff fell to his knees stretching out his hands to me, and Anna Pochowski began to weep silently.

“‘It could not be done, it could not be done,’ said Ivan Shtcherbakoff with tears streaming over his cheeks.

“‘Ivan Shtcherbakoff,’ I said, ‘it can, and it shall, be done.’

“‘Well, well, it was ever a hard-necked race,’ he said, ‘and evil has always tracked them. But not this one, oh, great and good God, save this one.’

“When Anna Pochowski heard him say this, she turned white and fainted away on the divan, and for some minutes my own heart, too, almost failed me, for, in truth, the children of my race have not led happy lives, Yoshio, nor died happy deaths, like other men and women, so that your too honoured father might well soften a little his ill-will (whatever is the cause of it) against mine, who is unfortunate enough already. Did you know that I once had a sweet little brother? He was burned to death at the age of five, dear; and so it has been with most of us — violent, untimely deaths, disasters, separation; in every land our blood has been poured out. Everybody in Russia knows this, and speaks of it. My father’s younger brother, Sergius, fell off his horse and broke his neck on the Kirghiz steppes at the age of thirty; my aunt Catharine was killed in a collision near Paris when I was nine, and I remember it well, it made me so ill, though I had disliked her; my grandfather Alexis was stabbed by a Nihilist in Odessa; my cousin Nicholas, who was to have married me, was killed in a duel at Vladivostock. When one of us dies on his bed people say, ‘He was not a Devriloff’ — I could not tell you; but that is what Ivan Shtcherbakoff meant, and why Anna Pochowski fainted.

“‘But how could such a thing be done?’ asked the old Cossack when Anna Pochowski had been brought to.

“‘Do you not know,’ I answered, ‘that nurses are being sent out by hundreds to the war since the last great battle?’

“‘But you! you would be known.... It could not be done, it could not be done.’

“‘It can,’ I said.

“‘But would she go alone? Would she leave my old soul in misery?’ asked Ivan Shtcherbakoff.

“‘Anna Pochowski will come with me, and you also, Ivan Shtcherbakoff,’ I said.

“‘How could I? I could not! The military only are now carried—’

“‘Are you not still in the Reserve category?’

“‘What, an old man like me? The Reserve category! This only shows her innocence!’ he cried out.

“‘Still, it can be done, Ivan Shtcherbakoff,’ I said, ‘if you but wish it. Are you not still liable to be called upon for the levée en masse of your voisko? You can therefore volunteer, and volunteers are being caught at for the new levée.’

“‘Oh, she’s the devil,’ said he, shaking his head with sorrowful eyes at me.

“‘That is settled then,’ said I.

“‘What!’ he cried;— ‘settled! Prince Devriloff would shoot me like a dog, and have my poor old body thrown to the other dogs, if such a thing came to pass!’

“‘And do you dread Prince Devriloff more, or do you love Nadine Devriloff more, which of the two, Ivan Shtcherbakoff?’ I next said. ‘I should like to know this, so just let me know it at once, that I may be sure for the future.’

“‘ Oh, she’s the darling of all the blessed saints and angels!’ cried out the old Cossack, coming to me, and wetting my cheeks with his tears.

“‘Anna Pochowski,’ I next said, ‘weep no more, for it is to Japan that we are going, a land that is just like heaven compared with Russia or with any other land; my husband will take you thither with me when we reach

Irkutsk, and in the end you will marry a high personage among the Japanese.'

"'You see, she is only a child, with her dreams,' said Anna Pochowski to Ivan Shtcherbakoff, 'and it is you and I, Ivan Shtcherbakoff, that will have to pay the piper, if this happens, for it will be a life's imprisonment in gaol for us. But what can we do? for it is useless trying to go against any of this family when their minds are made up, and it is like father like daughter.'

"I now put an end to the discussion, sending away Ivan Shtcherbakoff with the warning that what he had to do must be done at once. I then laid the plan which I had formed before Anna Pochowski; and two hours afterwards the thing was being done.

"At the Anitchkoff Palace there now meets daily a committee of great ladies, presided over by the Tsarina, who receives the offers of other ladies to go out to the war as nurses. Now, Anna Pochowski has a sister whose name is Marie Paldoff, a married woman living on one of the islands; she had been a nurse before her marriage, and my plan was to make Anna Pochowski and Marie Paldoff volunteer as nurses in the character of ladies of fortune. After they had been accepted, I could take Marie Paldoff's credentials and passport, and go out in her place, with Anna Pochowski and Ivan Shtcherbakoff as my protectors.

"By half-past eleven o'clock, accordingly, Anna Pochowski having gone to fetch her sister, I had both the sisters in my bedroom, and was dressing them richly in my jewels and furs; the rest of my jewels I gave to them to pawn for me, since I had no more ready money than some 7,000 roubles; I taught them how to bear themselves and what pretensions to make before the committee; and they then set off by a back stair in a very fluttered state for the Anitchkoff Palace.

“It happens that war-nurses who will bear their own costs are now being freely welcomed — scores depart from St. Petersburg every week — so that I ate déjeuner that day with Madame in a fairly quiet mind as to that part of my scheme. Madame chided me for having dark circles under the eyes, but when she spoke of calling the doctor to see me, I laughed so heartily that she had to laugh too, for I was full of glee and had wings half-spread for my flight over the continents and the oceans.

“When Madame wished me to go sledging with her to pay the calls of the afternoon, I pleaded against this, and escaped to my apartments. I there waited for the sisters, and I cannot tell you of my impatience. They were long, and I began to fancy all sorts of mishaps, even as I knelt before the Holy Mother, beseeching her good graces to me, a virgin-wife; but the moment I saw the smiling faces of the sisters peeping into my boudoir at 1.30 p.m. I knew that all had gone well.

“They were highly pleased and fluttered, these two; Anna Pochowski had forgotten for the time being all her fears, for what girl can help being carried away by the entrain of a secret, a plot, and a sudden long voyage all in one? For a time I could catch only a chance word of what was being said, for both were breathless and spoke at the same time.

“‘We have been face to face with the Tsarina!’ cried Anna Pochowski, kissing my cheeks, for in Russia, you know, everyone kisses everyone.

“‘As we were going down the Prospekt to the Anitchkoff Palace,’ said Marie Paldoff, ‘she dashed in her sleigh from the Dvartsovie Plastchad, passed by us, and was quietly seated in the committee-room at the palace with a crowd of ladies when we arrived.’

“‘And she gave us these with her own hands!’ cried Anna Pochowski, showing me two ikons of St. Nicholas and two red-cross ribbons; ‘and I think,' she added, 'that tears were in her blessed eyes.'

“‘I gave my true name and address, as you bid me,’ said Marie Paldoff, ‘and in the morning our passports, certificates, and a paper which they call a correspondance will arrive at my house without any trouble, as though we were grand-duchesses!’ “‘I gave my name as Anna Paldoff,’ said Anna Pochowski, ‘and made myself out to be the sister-in-law of my sister — that was laughable! The Duchesse Pavlovna — she was in heliotrope silk with an ermine toque — the Princess Prisyrewski — everyone was there! The Duchesse Pavlovna said to my sister: “Have you no children?” “No, madame,” replied my sister. “Are you not married?” said she to me. “Not yet, madame,” I replied. She smiled, and said: “It is noble of you to wish to devote yourselves to your country.” And when it was all over and we came out again into the sunlight, I seemed to have had a dream. The commissary of police himself, in his long grey coat, led us out, after verifying the address of my sister from a great book in the ante-room, and we stepped into our sledge with the disdain of ladies of the Court.’ “In this way they went on chattering a long while, describing to me and reminding each other of every detail of their morning’s excitement, and I let them talk, hearing and not hearing them, for now that my plan had come off well, I was rather burdened in mind, for I had a pang when I thought of my father, Yoshio, and when I thought of the boldness of that which I was about to do, and of the terrible fates that have followed the steps of the children of my house. But this Anna Pochowski is a flighty being at bottom, given to fits and ecstasies, and from the moment when her mind became accustomed to the idea of the flight she has never had one arrière-pensée, but has been eager for the escapade. As for me, I spent nearly all the rest of that day on my knees in prayer.

“I thought at first that we should be able to leave St. Petersburg the following night, but as I was going in to dinner that first evening Ivan Shtcherbakoff whispered me in a corridor that, though he had been accepted as a volunteer at the recruiting dépôt on the English Quay, the draft of Opolchenie troops in which he was to be sent out would not start for three weeks or a month, since every train was being crowded with troops of the regular army. I could not wait so long, and I would not go without him. I therefore ran back with him to my apartments, and there put into his hands the whole of the 17,000 roubles for which Anna Pochowski had pawned some of my jewels that forenoon, in order that he might bribe with it the sergeant of recruits to give him a correspondance for an early train; he opened his eyes, saying that not nearly so much would be needful, but I would have him take all, lest there should be any risk of failure. He stole in upon me that same midnight while I was at prayer, handed me back more than three-quarters of the money, and said that all was arranged for the train which left the Nicholas Station at 11.30 on the third night thence.

“I could not tell you, dear Yoshio, of my tortures during the next two days, of my impatience on the one hand to set out to you, and also of the sudden pangs and chills in my heart, causing me to shrink back from this undertaking; at one moment I was in the lightest glee and at another in the deepest sadness. One by one these moods preyed upon me, or rather all of them together, though now one and now another was uppermost; for even when I could have danced for joy, I was aching under my joy, and even when I was in gloom, I could still smile, for a ray of light seemed to fall upon the face of my sweetheart: I saw you before me, and you seemed to call me to you. Oh, you should love me well when we meet, for I have suffered, Yoshio, and am suffering now.

“Anna Pochowski called me ‘a passionate young lady’; many times a day this was her word, ‘but you are far too passionate! ‘Madame la duchesse Okhta said that my eyes were ‘burning like black moons,’ and it was true, I could not help it; I had no rest, I was like one writhing in a fire, and was forced by Madame at the last to be seen by the doctor.

“That was at eight in the evening of our departure; by nine Anna Pochowski was taking to the station, by way of the garden, the handbags and the excess of our furs which we did not need for the moment. When she returned, I was writing a letter of farewell to Madame, but I tore it up, wrote another, tore that up, and at last thought that it would be safest to go without a written farewell at all. The time passed faster than I had thought that it would; Madame came from the salon about ten, chided me for not being in bed, covered me in a shawl, bandaged my head with vinegar, gave me my medicine, and so on. Her face wore a strange look, and I almost fainted for fright when she told me that she had scented violets that evening; for this is the token of trouble in our family. I hung upon her neck with sobs when she was about to leave me, but made her promise not to give herself the pains of coming back to my apartments that night. An hour later I was hasting with Anna Pochowski through the alley of the garden which leads to the gate near the Field of Mars. It was a windy night, piercingly cold. We passed into the Nevskiy Prospekt, and there got into one of the public sleighs, our faces being well muffled up. I felt Anna Pochowski, who cringed close to me, trembling violently, and I, too, shivered. At the Nicholas Station we found Ivan Shtcherbakoff waiting in his old busby and great-coat...”

CHAPTER XIII

VIOLETS ON THE SNOW

“I STOPPED WRITING, dear Yoshio, because of our arrival at one of the Ural villages, named Olba, where a draft of local reserves and recruits with correspondances for this train had to be taken in, so, you see, I am this much nearer to Irkutsk, this being the 24th at three in the afternoon. I am coming to you!

“At these stoppages it is always the same thing: reserves and raw recruits, and the rush from the train to the great samovars of hot tea. Anna Pochowski and I and Olga Zaleski usually go out to the little platform at the end of our car to watch it all, and Ivan Shtcherbakoff steps stiffly out of the train, and looks at me, and tries to smile. He makes my heart bleed.

“‘Ivan Shtcherbakoff will be a dead man long before we reach the river Obi,’ says Anna Pochowski always; ‘it is pitiable that he has no stove in his car.’

“‘Cheer up! cheer up!’ says Olga Zaleski, laughing.

“‘But who would treat even their cattle so?’ tas says Anna Pochowski angrily. ‘Forty of them in that car, and no stove, when the very horses are perishing.’

“Then Olga Zaleski begins to hum a tune, and to play the piano on her left palm. She, too, is going to Irkutsk as a nurse, and at first I was cold toward her, even when she confessed that she madly loved me, for she makes no secret of the fact that she is a Nihilist, and approves of dynamite; but afterwards I had to like her, her spirit is so gay, so patient of our sorrows in this train, and so helpful to others. When things are at the worst she hums a tune, and plays the piano on her palm, though she has been three years in a political prison, which was enough to have broken another girl's spirit.

"She and Marie Cienkewitz, who also is to be a nurse, quarrel every hour, for if I show more friendship to one than to the other, the other pouts and is jealous. We seem to have been living together in this car for years, and to have known one another since we were born. I cannot imagine anyone but just them taking this voyage with me, and my father and home-life are mere shadows of memory to me compared with the reality of the voyage and of their presence.

"It is always the same thing at these stations: reserve-men, who are farmers and tradesmen of middle age, looking grave or sulky in their uniforms, and recruits, still clad in their peasant-dress, looking wretched and fierce; sometimes a woman faints at the last embrace; always there are tears and crowds, and the samovar of tea, and the rush from the train.

"We seem to have left the Urals now, and the next big thing is Omsk. There will be no more stopping for troops, for the cars are crammed with four hundred men, and I do not know how many horses, with military baggage, and a gun on a truck behind; we are going fast, and the train rocks like a ship that lacks ballast. It is cold, yes, it is cold; they say that there never was so late a winter. I shudder at the thought of Ivan Shtcherbakoff in his car, with thirty-nine others; it is only a horse-box of boards, painted in great black letters on the outside with 'Forty men or Eight Horses,' and its one little window is hardly larger than this note-book. Some of them have stoves, but that one has not. How should we here exist without our stove? Oh, may God and St. Nicholas succour the unfortunate!

“I am lying on my face on my shelf writing this, but the compartment is fast darkening; the glass is opaque with icicles; the night will be black; I can only just write, the train rocks so much, and I can hardly see any more now. We are going out into a wilderness of winter, and the engine shrieks out in a sad voice amid these solitudes. I also am sad, and could weep bitter tears....

“Anna Pochowski, Olga Zaleski and Marie Cienkewitz are round about the stove. I hear Marie Cienkewitz say tartly to Olga Zaleski: ‘You have had so much experience of the world, Olga Zaleski! You have run through the whole gamut of the emotions, so that your attractiveness for a child like Nadine Devriloff may well be greater than mine — if it is greater.’ Oh, it is, it is greater!’ cries Olga Zaleski with a gay laugh, ‘but do not be jealous because I have lived, while have been wearing night-caps.’ These two ladies seem to have nothing to do or think of, except to quarrel about me.

* * * * *

“The 25th. Oh, Yoshio, I am very sad! In this frozen land, for the third time in my life, I have scented violets.

“It happened two hours ago, and I am still trembling.

“When I show you what I now write, in order that you may see what I underwent on this voyage, and when you read this about scenting violets, you will not at first understand how much this means to me, though you will not doubt the truth of what I say, that I did really scent them. I hasten, therefore, to explain to you that at the moment of scenting them I felt sure that some trouble was happening, either to myself or to some Devriloff somewhere. This is no fancy, Yoshio: it is true. Everyone at home knows that I am a sceptic about many things, but this is true. Nearly all the ladies of my race, and some of the men, have for ages scented violets when any disaster was happening. All my father’s sisters, one of my grandmothers, my father himself, the Duchesse Okhta have scented them within my own memory; and I myself have scented them twice before to-day. I have no explanation to offer of this, for I am not sure that I myself believe the explanation which is given, namely, that a lady of our race in the sixteenth century, whose name was Martha, who was a saint, and who may have an odour of violets in the other world, comes to us to warn us of trouble; but what is certain is the fact that we do scent violets where no violets are — not a mere whiff of violets, but a powerful fragrance of which one can have no doubt.

“My aunt Catherine, who died in a collision near Paris, would not have had a violet in her house or gardens for all the kingdoms in the world. My father, on the contrary, fills the house with them, so that whenever he scents them he may be able to say to himself that the scent comes from the flowers about him.

“The last of us to scent violets, except Madame Okhta, who scented them on the evening of my flight, was my aunt Nadine in Shanghai. She had then been married only two months to her cousin Grigory, and they were on their wedding-tour. On the other side of a river, at a place called Hongku, they had some friends, and Grigory rowed over the river one night in a Canadian boat to see these friends. He did not return the next morning, but my aunt Nadine was not anxious, for he sometimes stayed away. That night, however, on going to bed, she scented violets; the next morning Grigory Devriloff had not returned. My aunt sat to breakfast, and was reading in an English newspaper that the body of a man, half eaten by fish, had been found in the river, when she was overpowered by a scent of violets: only nasturtiums were on the breakfast table, she says. Two days afterwards the skiff of Grigory Devriloff was found bottom-upwards. But some time before the drowned man was proved to be my aunt's husband, she had a third scent of violets.

"I scented violets when I was nine years old — all the ladies at our Summer-palace scented them that day — when my aunt Catherine was killed in a collision in France. I scented them again when I was thirteen, when my cousin Nicholas was killed in a duel at Vladivostock; and I scented them again to-day.

"We had arrived about one o'clock at Omsk, where the train stopped for the usual outrush to the samovar, and the usual uproar. I and my party left the train, found out Ivan Shtcherbakoff in the crowd, and took him in with us to eat something, for in the middle of the day only black bread is served out to the troops. When we had had some soup and a glass of tea, and were returning to the train, I heard one of the station-men say to an officer, 'You will not get far this afternoon, for there are two snow-drifts on the metals.'

"This turned out to be true, for we had hardly gone on eight or ten versts from Omsk, when we came upon a hill of snow, with about thirty men about it, working to clear a way for the train. Snow with flakes as large as my hand was falling, choking all the air, and turning the day into twilight, so that the men of the excavating-party not far away looked like the shadows of gnomes. I had gone out on the platform at the end of the car to look out at them, for usually I do not feel the winter so keenly as most people, and the terrible atmosphere in the car with its stove is often worse to me than the parching cold outside; and I was standing there alone, well wrapped in my furs, looking into the snow-fall as far as the thirty or forty feet limit where the country became blotted out, and hearing the roar of imprisoned voices which came from some of the troop-cars, when on a sudden I scented violets. Ah, Yoshio, what, then, has happened to your poor sweetheart? My father may have been killed...

I was almost fainting, but would not stay there alone another moment; I found the strength to rush back into the car, where I fell into Olga Zaleski's arms. They all prayed me to tell them what was the matter, but I would not, and for fully a quarter of an hour, while I lay on Olga Zaleski's lap, I thought that I could continue to detect whiffs of violets, though that may have been my fancy; then I had to laugh, for Marie Cienkewitz, whom I like very much, too, began to say cutting things to Olga Zaleski; but a sob hiccupped in my laugh, dear, you may be sure.

“Presently Anna Pochowski, taking me aside, whispered me: ‘You have scented violets, have you not?’ And I answered: ‘Yes.’

“Half an hour later the train was on its way again.

CHAPTER XIV

NADINE'S HAPS

“THE 27TH. I have been feeling very unwell; yesterday I did not rise from bed. At nine in the night of the day when I scented violets two dead bodies were removed from the train at a station. I saw their faces in the light of the lanterns, and all the night they haunted my dreams. Another of the men went mad this morning, and it took a crowd of them to get him from the train — a lank young peasant, a Pole, and his eyes seemed once to rest on me — such eyes! We shall all be mad, I think.

“I had no idea before what cold is. Last night our stove went out, and this morning Anna Pochowski, who was up early, happening to put her hand on the metal, took it away all raw, and we all got up in pain. I and Marie Cienkewitz bathed together in hot water, and now the pains are gone; but I feel as if I had been fighting against something a world too strong for me, which at last has crushed me.

“We do not speak much now; even Olga Zaleski says little. At first, at the dinner-table, there was much talk among the twelve ladies, but not lately. The old train-guard, who goes about with revolvers at his belt, tells me that the cold is even worse than in other years. It is too unfriendly to life, several of the horses even have given in; we see from here the press and noise round their bodies when they are being taken away. When I think of the men cooped up in their boxes, cold, unwashed, ill-dad, and breathing a foul air, my heart pities them. At the last station a Uhlan was carried from the train, hdd up between two others; he seemed to have lost the use of his legs, and I do not think was brought back.

“There are at least four more days of it before Irkutsk — four days, if we meet no snow-drifts; others will be dead or maimed by then, and if I had had any dream of it, I should never have brought Ivan Shtcherbakoff with me.

“And I have another misery, Yoshio, within the last two days — fears that when I reach Irkutsk I may, for some reason or other, not see you. If this should happen, mon ami! But it is only the depressing power of this voyage that brings such a thought before my spirit: always the same sound, the clack, clack of the engine, like something gone wrong in one’s brain; always the same scene, a blank of whiteness, with a belt of firs on the horizon, and lonely stacks of firewood: it is depressing, and lately I am haunted with all sorts of terrors. You spoke in your letter of a thought which you had of escaping from your hospital, and I say to myself, ‘Suppose he has really escaped, and has gone to me in St. Petersburg, while I am going to him in Irkutsk?’ But that would be too hard, the gracious God would not allow it to befall us. Or again I say, ‘Suppose he has tried to escape, and has been captured and shot?’ or, ‘Suppose he has got better of his wound, and has been taken to a military prison in some other town than Irkutsk?’ I imagine many things all the day and most of the night; when I sleep the noises of the train turn into words, and speak of fresh woes to my brain. I am indeed very sick, and have nearly always pains in the head; but my hope is in the good God, who brought you to St. Petersburg in order that I might know you and lavish my sold upon you, and in order that we may be together and have offspring, as is usual among married couples.

“The train is now slowing down to enter a station; they come every two hours, and at this one we mean to get out, to escape from the train, and to give Ivan Shtcherbakoff some mid-day soup and a glass of tea. The armed attendant is going down the corridor, calling out a word which sounds like ‘Bers.’

***”

At all these stations it is the same set of scenes that happen again, but at this Berski we have been delayed a long while, and something fearful has taken place, for there has been an emeute, two men have been shot, and we have all been very excited.

Here, as usual, the officers in their furs were swaggering among the miserable men, whose ikons of St. Nicholas and St. Vladimir are their only wealth, and, ah! I never thought to witness such sights: it is obscene! I have made Ivan Shtcherbakoff give them three thousand of my roubles; but what is that among four hundred, when everything is sold at high prices? for there is a famine, and the peasants whom one sees near the railway-track look starved. Ah, it is a terrible war, and my country has suffered, but God will uphold her cause, for you should not have said in your letter, Yoshio, that you think Russia ‘not perhaps quite in the right this time.’ Yes, Russia is right, and Japan is wrong; and this I will prove to you when we shall have met, when we shall have settled happily in our home, and when we shall have found time to talk of such matters.

“But I was speaking of this Berski emeute. Though all is over, and the train is again on its way, I can still hear the last quiet sobs of Olga Zaleski, who sits with her face in her hands, weeping at the shooting of the two men. It was horrible, though that was the greatest blessing that could have happened to them, to put them out of their miseries.

“Eight or nine of us ladies were at the buffet, the men were in rank on the platform, and a ration of black bread was being given them. I had noticed anew the stare of some as I went in, while some looked drowsy, like hibernating animals. All were most sallow, and as unkempt as rubbish. Some blinked at the daylight. I could not write of the odour of them, nor of the hardening of their hearts; they growl remarks as the ladies pass, for they have seen their comrades die by inches, and have lost the feelings of pity and respect; indeed, some of the faces were those of dying men, with tainted noses and ears. One elderly Ural peasant, with whom I have spoken, coughs in a manner that I could not have pictured to myself; his eyes haunt one's sleep. Ivan Shtcherbakoff is very hale and hard, and has had better food than the others, but each time I see his face I again have to vow my life to the care of his old age.

“Little did I think that so sad a crew were about to make such a noise. We others were at the buffet, drinking tea, and listening to an excise-officer of the village, who was telling the news of the war movements since the last great battle, when we heard a hoot of many voices, and Olga Zaleski remarked to me: ‘An officer must be flogging one of them again; I can’t stand it any longer!’ Almost as she said this, there was heard a cry of freedom and wrath which struck into me a feeling of awe. That instant Ivan Shtcherbakoff leapt to my side, and I found myself caught up to my nurse’s breast in his left arm, while he ran with me to the door of the buffet, brandishing a large knife in his right hand. We were met by, as it were, a crowd of furies. The men had broken loose, and were making for the buffet in order to loot it, having trampled upon one of the officers; some other officers were among them lashing with knouts, like drowning men struggling for life; and the din! for every one seemed to be shouting at the top of his voice. I saw down their throats, and their eyes were like mad people’s; but the onset upon them by Ivan Shtcherbakoff with his knife was so threatening, that he got through safely with me, and close upon his heels came the ladies, so that none of us were much hurt; indeed, the men were thinking of other things than of us.

“They at once filled the buffet, many of them still crowding outside the door for lack of room. We others ran back to the train, and stood on the little ledge, looking on at the riot; there were several noises of woodwork and glass splintering; then, after five minutes of it, there were two pistol-shots.

“But it was an hour before the men were drawn up again; even then some of them would not stop dancing in twos and threes, for they had been drinking vodka.

“Olga Zaleski could not be kept from going to see the two bodies in the very middle of the trouble.

I did not see them, but one was a student whom I have noticed, the other was an izvostchik of Moscow.

“Two days more —

* * * * *

“The 28th. Two more men dead this morning, though it is said to be no longer so cold. Anna Pochowski has not risen, and I made my own toilet. She has flutterings of the heart.

“It is not long now, yet I feel very sad. Is it - that my father is dead? I know that something has happened.

“I ought to be gay, for Olga Zaleski has told me — what I had an instinct of before — that if a Japanese, wounded and taken prisoner, can show that he is the husband of a Russian lady, he would be set at liberty on undertaking not to fight again in this war. All will therefore be well to that extent. But why did Madame Okhta scent violets on the night of my going away? I wish that we were at Irkutsk.

“The 29th. I cannot write anything to-day, I am too near to you! Even the country is looking different, with more woods and hills, and at the last two stations some Mongolian sorts of people in padded clothes. They say that there will be no more snow-drifts across the metals. Anna Pochowski is going through our clothes, brushing the furs, counting the money and jewels, and making ready. Marie Cienkewitz says that I am as wild as a bird, and, in truth, my skin burns. Olga Zaleski has tied up my head like a peasant’s in a handkerchief steeped in eau de Cologne, and, touching it anon, says, ‘Poor little head!’ Tomorrow at this hour you will have been in my arms...

* * * * *

“The 4th (of April). I have crossed to side of Lake Baikal. The name of this little town is Pirin; here the new train which took us in on the east side of the lake stops three hours. I shall be able to go on in her as far as a place called Dinskaya, up to which point the railway is still in our hands. From Dinskaya I do not know by what means I am to go on still farther, but I shall go on, if I have to trudge barefoot through snow for a year till I come to the Japanese; and I shall claim my husband from them. God only grant that no report of me may reach my father meantime.

“He is alive somewhere about this country, and this comforts me, for I had felt sure that he was dead; but I see now that my scenting violets had nothing to do with him, but with you: it was on the 25th of March that I scented them, and that was the day on which you left Irkutsk.

“Both I and Anna Pochowski have been sick: I suppose that the journey across the lake has been too much for us. She can hardly any more hold up her head, poor girl, but mourns all the time, and foretells for us all sorts of trouble. I try to put courage into her, but she will not hear, and answers always: ‘I told you beforehand how it would be.

“We crossed the Angara river and arrived at Irkutsk at eleven in the morning of the 30th of March. Olga Zaleski had with her the address of a hotel in the avenue called Roitshaya Ulitsa, and to this we drove in a droshky through streets teeming with soldiers, Jews, Buriats, students in their uniforms, priests, nuns, and many sorts of people. Every one seemed to be in the streets and in a hurry, so that the town was like a hive. This pleased me highly, for I was feverish and like one let out of prison; the voyage seemed a nightmare from which I was now at last awaked. Olga Zaleski smiled to see me chattering and pointing at the people with their strange costumes and faces. It was a bright morning, and the cold no longer seemed to us a foe, but a wine. We came to our hotel, which overlooked a church called the Church of Gregory of Nyssa, and I think that I shall never forget this church, it is associated in my mind with so much grief.

“After we had had déjeuner in a room on the second floor opening upon a balcony, Olga Zaleski went out to report herself to the Red Cross people, whereupon I sent Ivan Shtcherbakoff to find his way to the military hospital, there to ask about you.

“He had hardly gone when I again began to feel sorrowful. For the first time something seemed to tell me clearly, ‘You will not see Yoshio, since that would be too good to happen to Nadine Devriloff.’ I sat out on the balcony, looking out for the coming back of Ivan Shtcherbakoff.

“Ah, Yoshio, when he came I read my lot in his shy eyes. He said with a mock gaiety that my father was alive and well somewhere on the yon eastern side of the lake; but of you he said not a word.

“‘But what about Yoshio M — , Ivan Shtcherbakoff?’ I asked.

“‘There never was such a person in the hospital, then,’ he answered shyly, shifting his feet, and looking away at the Church of Gregory of Nyssa.

“‘That is nonsense,’ I said; ‘there certainly has been, and there is.’ But now it struck me that you may have given a false name at the hospital, through fear of my father.

“I therefore sent back Ivan Shtcherbakoff to the hospital, telling him to ask after a Japanese boy of eighteen years in the ward where the Duchesse Krastalynski, of whom you had written me, was a nurse.

“Hope had again risen in me. While he was gone, I pictured to myself so clearly the foolish look on my sweetheart’s face when he should hear the words, ‘Nadine is in Irkutsk,’ that at one moment I laughed aloud, so that Anna Pochowski called out to me: ‘What is it now?’

“When Ivan Shtcherbakoff came back he told me that he had seen the duchesse herself, and she had said to him that there had been such a young man of eighteen years in her ward, but that he, together with a number of other Japanese prisoners, had been sent to Liao-yang on the 25th of March, in exchange for some Russian prisoners set free by the Japanese.

“When Anna Pochowski heard Ivan Shtcherbakoff say this she let herself fall upon the rug and fainted away. Ivan Shtcherbakoff fell to his knees, kissing my hands, saying again and again, ‘It will turn out bravely, do not be afraid, it will yet turn out bravely.’

“I did not say anything; I looked away at the façade of the church, with its many pear-shaped cupolas, and somehow I shall never forget them. I grew as it were older in looking at them, for it seemed strange to me that things should be so hard.

“Anna Pochowski soon came to, and now that everything was against me, she, too, turned against me, seeming to find out suddenly upon how laughable an adventure she had been duped to set out with me, calling herself a fool, and calling me a magpie, a trapped bird, while I looked away at the church without saying anything, and Ivan Shtcherbakoff washed my hands with his tears, beseeching me, saying a hundred times, 'It will turn out bravely, do not be afraid.'

"'But what shall we do?' cried Anna Pochowski. 'We are lost! We cannot return to Russia, for no train will take us, nor can we live here, for most of the money has been given to those wretches in the train, and it is ill to travel in the same sleigh with those who do not look before, as the saying is. Or else Prince Devriloff will catch us, and Ivan Shtcherbakoff and I will be done for; but I was ever the most unlucky child of my mother.'

"'I am going to the Japanese to seek my husband,' said I, 'and I shall be glad if you will come too, Anna Pochowski.'

"'See! she does not despair, the darling!' cried Ivan Shtcherbakoff in a glow; 'she is braver than a lion. But is that a settled thing?'

"'Yes,' said I.

"'We shall have to cross the lake, on the ice. Are you not afraid of the voyage, and of the Japanese?' he asked me.

"'No,' said I.

"'Bravely! bravely!' he cried out. 'But, then, we shall have to be quick, or we shall lose this train, and our correspondances will not serve for another.'

"As he spoke I was on my feet.

"In five minutes we three were in a droshky, and twenty minutes afterwards I was again in the train, in my old apartment; yet it was not the same, for the presence of Olga Zaleski and of Marie Cienkewitz was no longer there, and "all was desolate about me. It seems to be the will of Heaven that we of my race should meet with troubles, but I had come far on a long voyage through many snows, and when I thought in how different a frame of mind I had left the car that morning, I could not help casting myself upon my shelf as the train moved out, and I gave myself to the bitterest tears which I have yet shed.

“Soon after this a nurse who was being sent from the military hospital at Irkutsk to the yon east side of the lake came into my apartment, saw that I had been crying, and entered into talk with me. I asked her if she had seen you at the hospital, but she said no. She told me that fighting between small parties had been going on ever since the last great battle; that some daring Japanese patrols had pushed on far north of Mukden, and had exchanged shots with our garrisons, while, on the other hand, our troops were skirmishing even beyond Liaoyang, which is held by the Japanese. It seems that the Japanese cannot follow up their victory until they have ‘made good’ the ground behind them; but they worry our troops while we add to our army to drive them back out of Liaoyang.

“I asked her if she knew where General Devriloff was, but she could not tell me.

“We reached the village of Baikal on the west shore of the lake soon after four in the afternoon; it was misty, in spite of an east wind, and already the shades of evening were gathering. On either hand I saw mountains like shadows, and before us the lake, with the hull of a ship out on it a little to the right. All was shadowy; the ship, leaning on the ice without any masts, looked as if she had been left there in loneliness for ages; she was the one which breaks the ice and carries the trains across when it begins to thaw: but at present the ice is still three feet thick.

“It was as much as I could do to cheer Anna Pochowski and give her heart for the crossing when, having stepped down from the train to the landing-stage, she looked abroad on the bleak plain of the lake, and heard the noise of the wind. Yes, it indeed blew cuttingly, so that we all flinched from its touch: far into it we could not see, but in what lay beyond the mist we knew that sickness, pain, and perhaps death were awaiting our coming.

“Meantime, we three could hardly get near the crowd of basket-sleighs, for the troops had made a rush down the flight of stairs to the ice for them, and there was a scrimmage which lasted a long while, each man seeking to be among the next to depart. I saw sleigh after sleigh start off, the jingling of their bells borne to us on the storm even after they had become hidden in the mist, while darkness fell ever faster; till at last I, too, was leaving the white cliffs of the western shore behind, and was off down the rows of poles that mark out the ice-track throughout the fifty versts of its breadth.

“The wind blew against us with as steady a motion as that of a sea in flight; we went forward with the top of our heads turned to it, but it seemed too much for us. Anna Pochowski wailed, but her words were drowned in the noise of its rush past our ears, and very soon she no longer said anything. But mixed with the noise of the wind I heard the voice of our old driver, an old Amurski Jew clad in sheepskins, crooning some dirge or hymn, as all these drivers do throughout the voyage. After an hour or so we had become very drowsy, and I think that this crooning had a deepening effect upon our drowsiness, it was so bleak and strange, for it was like a lullaby crooned not by a man but by the elements of the storm, of the ice, and of the darkness, in order to charm us into the slumber that never awakes.

“Another long hour passed somehow. Anna Pochowski seemed to have lost consciousness, for when I spoke to her she did not answer; she sat with her head drooping, and I put one of my own wraps about her, for the girls of the people cannot be expected to bear up against extremes of hardship like those of noble blood. Sometimes she fell against me, or we all fell against one another, for the ice is not very smooth. We three were alone in our sleigh, but the troop-sleighs carried five or even six packed together. Anon Ivan. Shtcherbakoff would rouse himself, break our silence, and try to laugh, saying, 'Not much further now, bravely, bravely!' or suchlike words.

"After yet another hour I was aware of a light and of a crowd of sleighs standing still before a house; it was that which is called the 'half-way house.' We managed to rouse Anna Pochowski, and got out, while the troop-sleighs which had been just behind us went on past the house without stopping. This curious little place, built mainly of felt, was full of officers drinking, one of whom called Ivan Shtcherbakoff a dog, and got from me a look which he may remember. There were also a few nurses in the other half of the room. We drank shtchee (cabbage-soup) and tea, and I have never eaten so eagerly; the warmth was nice, and made what we had passed through, and what we had still to pass through, seem the more dark and awful.

"'It was for this that I was born,' said Anna Pochowski, with her forehead on the table, 'in order that I might die in the snows.'

"'Let us trust in the good God, Anna Pochowski,' I said, 'and we shall yet reach the other side of the lake safely.'

"'It is the good God who has sent the cold and wind upon us, and many, many a one of us will never see the end of this matter,' she mourned.

"Upon this I heard the sleigh-drivers outside shouting and dapping their hands, and I said, 'Come, Anna Pochowski, for when there is only one thing to be done, one must do it.' So she rose and came with me.

"But there was a look on the face of Ivan Shtcherbakoff which I did not like: it was pinched and at bay like the face of the dying, and I had fears for him. When we were in the sleigh again, I wrapped him up thickly. As we set off with the wind in our faces and the bells jingling, our old Amurski Jew began to croon to himself the same dirge again.

“All before and behind us were the lights of sleighs like funeral torches, and on a side-track also were the lights of those sleighs which bore the military stores, for some of these heavy four-horsed ones had caught us up while we were at the halfway house; otherwise nothing was to be seen, it was so dark, and the ice had hills and holes which jerked us this way and that. What made it worse was that one of the officers, a major with a dark beard, a rather handsome fellow, must have told his driver to keep by us, in order that he might make eyes at me in the light of our two sleighs, so that for half an hour I was kept in terror of a collision. He little dreamt that I, so young, was already a bride. Twice he spoke to me from sleigh to sleigh, but at last my fierce looks caused him to disappear.

“When we reached Tankhoi on the other side I was torpid, Anna Pochowski was again insensible, and I thought that Ivan Shtcherbakoff was dead. He had to be lifted out of the sleigh, but I got leave from the train-officials to have him in my compartment in the new train. His face was blue, his ears and nose were frost-bitten, and he lay for two hours with his head on my lap, breathing in a terrifying way; I could not tell you what I passed through then. But he is now lying on the rugs in the room where I write this, and is looking better.

“We are now at Perin, as I said before, where the train arrived this morning, and stops three hours. It will soon be time for us to go back to it.

“Between here and Dinskaya, beyond which our trains do not any longer go, there is only one long stoppage, at Karinsk, where we stop two hours. Thence we go on to Dinskaya; and from Dinskaya I hope to find means to travel toward the Japanese, till I come upon some one who will direct me how to get to my husband.

CHAPTER XV

THE PRISONER OF WAR

“THE 6TH. AH, Yoshio, when you know what befell me two days after I wrote the above you will die of pity, if you do not shake with laughter.

“After departing from Perm, where I last wrote, we arrived at Karinsk at about four in the afternoon. It was at Karinsk that Ivan Shtcherbakoff was bound to join the ranks of the Opolchenie battalion for which he had volunteered; but inasmuch as I had not found you, he had made up his mind not to give himself up at the barracks, but to come with me to the end.

“We saw, however, that the risk was great, for notice of his coming must have been sent to headquarters here from St. Petersburg, and Karinsk is not a large town where one may hide oneself. When, therefore, he had come with Anna Pochowski and me to the inn, he left us in order to walk about the country, till the train should be about to start again.

“We two others went into the inn, a house with a far-Eastern look in the middle of a court; the eaves were low, and some of the windows had bars of iron across them, as in prisons. We were led by a stout Mongolian woman, who could speak some Russian, into a room at the back, on the ground floor, and soon were eating a stew of rice and meat. While we were paying the woman for this, she entered into talk with us, telling us that a skirmish had been fought an hour before among the hills not two miles from the town, over twenty men on our side having been killed; also that one of the Russian generals had just arrived in the town, and some rooms had been taken for his staff in the inn.

“When the woman left us, I looked at my watch and saw that we had an hour and a quarter yet to wait. Our room was small, with one door, one barred window, and no furniture, only a mat and some cushions. We were seated on two of the cushions: and presently Anna Pochowski began to nod, the afternoon to darken, and I also to feel drowsy, for we had not even yet got over our night on the lake.

“But on a sudden I started, I found myself wide awake and listening; I had heard a deep voice say in the room beyond the door: ‘I want to see the quarter-master-general, also the roll of today’s contingent. My train starts at eight, so that our time is precious.’

“Yoshio, I felt myself undone! it was my father’s voice.

“He was the general of whose coming into the town our hostess had told me! And he was travelling — perhaps to Russia, to seek for me. If he had but opened that door, he would have found me! I sat with a quickly-beating heart, quiet as a mouse, shrinking even from the hard breathing of Anna Pochowski’s sleep.

“After about ten minutes I covered her mouth with my hand, and whispered into her ear: ‘Wake up and listen!’

“My father was still talking, giving orders, and I could tell that a good many people were about him. The thought in my head was, ‘Suppose he comes in here? or suppose he remains there an hour, how shall I get through to our train?’

“If we missed our train, we should not be taken in any other; we could not get through the window, even if we could have reached it, for not only was it too small, but it had a bar across: our only way out was the room in which my father was.

“Anna Pochowski sat staring with her mouth open, and I thought to myself, ‘Now she may well call me a trapped bird, a poor little foolish magpie’; and I lifted up my eyes and prayed as I had never prayed.

“Meanwhile, the time was flying, the evening darkening. I looked often at my watch; it became 5.15, then 5.30; our train started at 6. When Anna Pochowski wished to whisper to me I would not hear her, but pushed away her mouth with my hand, flinching from the least sound.

“I did not know what to do; I could only pray from my heart and make vows to every saint.

I went near to the door, and whispered: ‘Papa, be good to me, and go away.’

“Then I thought I must see where he was, what he was doing, though I died for it, and after some minutes, in which my fears struggled with this wish, I very slowly opened the door a very little, and peeped. He was sitting with his back to my door at a table on which was a lamp, a spy-glass and a cup of water, with papers, large books and maps, and round the table were seven or eight officers on stools, with other men standing near them. They were all busy, and looked as if they might be there for hours.

“While I was peeping at them, my heart leapt anew into my mouth, for I heard a sound behind me, a voice which uttered the one word ‘take.’ I closed the door with a slight noise, I was so startled, for it was not Anna Pochowski’s voice. Only she was in the room, I could see nothing to account for the voice; but I saw her staring at the barred window, and when I, too, looked there I saw something being pushed in from the outside: when it fell to the floor we saw that it was a pair of the green knickerbockers which our soldiers wear.

“I was anew amazed at this, not having any thought what it could mean; we were staring at it, when again we heard the voice say ‘take,’ and at once another pair of knickerbockers was seen coming in.

“But now all at once I was no longer puzzled, for in that second ‘take’ my ear had caught the voice of Ivan Shtcherbakoff.

“The things now began to come fast, I could not dream whence Ivan Shtcherbakoff had got them — two double-breasted blouses, sheepskin coats, greatcoats, muskets, long-boots; then a crowd of smaller things dropped to us as fast as we could catch them — mess-tins, belts, forage-caps, two of each; last of all came a pair of scissors. When nothing any more came, I darted a glance at my watch, and with my soul on my lips I whispered into Anna Pochowski’s ear: ‘We have ten minutes in which to dress in these,’ for it was fifteen minutes to six, and I knew that it would take us five minutes at least to run to the station.

“Happily, I knew very well the dress of our soldiers: I knew that the kit-bag is hung over the right shoulder and not over the left, that the bandolier with its cartridges goes over the left, and not over the right; I had been too much mixed up with army-people all my life not to know how to wear the belt with its pouches, or not to know where the aluminium water-bottle was to hang; and Anna Pochowski watched me as I put mine on.

“I noticed a little blood on both the blouses, but what dismayed me was the growing weight even without the bayonet, for I felt that we could never run with all that. Everything except the cap, was too big for me, but this the more hid our figures, and as all Russian soldiers wear loose things, except the Guards, the bagginess was a blessing, for only the boots were markedly big, and these the foot-bandages filled out. The instant all was done, I had Anna Pochowski’s hair dropping in flocks of gold under the scissors. While she was doing the same to mine, I glanced again at my watch: it was four minutes to six.

“We threw on the greatcoats and the caps, caught up the bayonets — mine reached a foot above my head when the butt was grounded! Then I whispered, ‘For heaven’s sake do not forget to salute — like this,’ and I showed her how; then, without losing a moment, I opened the door and passed out, walking like a man, but seeing nothing: for my heart on a sudden went weak, and everything swam before my eyes.

“Anna Pochowski followed behind me...

“The group of officers in the room must have wondered where we sprang from; I fancy that some of them glanced up with some surprise, and how I found the courage to salute, and how Anna Pochowski managed not to faint, I do not know; she was trembling long after it. However, I stopped in the middle, and with ‘eyes front’ saluted, taking care not to turn my face toward my father. Whether Anna Pochowski saluted or not I do not know; I do not think so.

“All at once we were running down the court, free and safe, out into the street, Ivan Shtcherbakoff with us, and we ran hard, the dear old Cossack a little ahead, making the pace, and glancing back at us. We had to pull up once, for Anna Pochowski could run no more, but while she got back her wind we walked fast, then ran again, and such a heat to reach the train possessed me, that in the end I was before them both, Anna Pochowski having now been left well behind; but when I ran upon the platform all I could see of the train in the half-dark was a bull’s-eye light moving away from me, and a truck bearing away a gun which pointed at me.

“We might well have been in time, if that would not have been too good a thing to happen to me: for if we had only cast away our bayonets on leaving the inn, that would have lightened us; or if we had not troubled to put on the foot-bandages and some of the other things which were useless to disguise us, that would have saved time; but we had been in too great a heat to give anything a thought, for the heads of two poor girls in a flurried state are not worth much. I can only think that so it was to be: but when the truck at the end of the train vanished with its gun behind the bush of the plain, everything seemed to be over for me.

“The train took with her nearly all our money and jewels, and those of the furs which we had not cast off at the inn: for I had left the hand-bags in the care of one of the train-stewards.

“Anna Pochowski ran upon the platform gasping out, ‘Are we in time?’ I did not answer her. We sat on the bench on the platform drooping and silent, she trembling, but unable to weep. No one but us was there. The moon rose in the sky over a plain without any trees, but covered with bush, which lay before us. Ivan Shtcherbakoff did not dare to speak to me, feeling how far I was beyond his comfort; I had not the strength to live any further, there was nothing, I thought, to live for; even Anna Pochowski shrank from speaking to me.

“After a time she said in a low voice, ‘Where did you get these uniforms, Ivan Shtcherbakoff?’

“‘I got them from two dead soldiers,’ said he; ‘there was a battle here late this afternoon, and I saw these bodies in some bush while I was wandering outside the town. I returned to the inn about five o’clock to ask after you, for I was anxious, having heard at a drink-shop that the General was in the town; when I questioned the woman of the inn she told me that the General was within, told me in which room he was, and in which you were. I saw that nothing could be done, except to disguise you, so I ran back to where I had seen the bodies, and I stripped them. It has turned out nastily, and it is my doing only, for my legs are no longer young ones, though I ran hard, too, and she sits there like a stone and says nothing to me.’

“‘Ah, it is well enough with her, but it is ill with you and with me, Ivan Shtcherbakoff,’ said Anna Pochowski; ‘the jewels and money are gone in the train — everything: do not talk to me of hope. In an hour we shall be in the Prince’s hands, I in this costume, with my hair cut close to my head, holding a soldier’s bayonet, and it was for this that I was born.’

“At this moment, when she mentioned my father, the thought that he would depart ‘at eight o’clock’ came into my mind, and with it the feeling that, he being once away, everything might still be hoped for: since, if I could not hire a cart to go whither I wished, I could walk, were it across the world; at which feeling I stood up, and was about to tell the others to come with me out of the town, till my father should be gone, when I saw three soldiers talking in low voices and looking at us. I had not noticed them before, so that they must have come upon the platform stealthily, and a fear struck to my heart that they were there to seize Ivan Shtcherbakoff.

“They moved slowly toward us. I saw that they were non-commissioned officers.

“‘What is your name, my friend?’ said one of them to Ivan Shtcherbakoff.

“My old nurse turned sallow, and gave a false name.

“‘When did you arrive in Karinsk?’

“‘To-day, my sergeant.’

“‘By the train from Russia?’

“Ivan Shtcherbakoff hesitated, then said yes to this.

“‘Then you admit you are a soldier?’ asked the sergeant.

“Ivan Shtcherbakoff did not answer.

“‘But, then, why are you not in your barracks?’ asked the sergeant.

“‘I am not for Karinsk, I am for the detachment in Dinskaya, but I have missed the train, my sergeant.’”

““ Of what arms are you?” asked the sergeant.

““I am an old Amurski Cossack who has passed through the reserve category, and I have volunteered for service in the Ural voisko, my sergeant,’ said Ivan Shtcherbakoff in a pleading voice.

““But, then, that is a foolish kind of lie which you have told,’ said the sergeant, ‘seeing that no Cossacks are quartered on Dinskaya. Show me your correspondance’

“Ivan Shtcherbakoff had to show this, the paper shivering in his dear old hand. He had not a word to say.

“Meanwhile, one of the other two sergeants had been peering at the divisional number on the shoulder-straps of Anna Pochowski and of myself, and at the regimental number on our cap-bands; and all at once this man cried out: ‘But what in heaven’s name are these two fellows doing here?’

“At that terrible moment I could hardly keep from laughing when I saw the foolish face which Anna Pochowski turned up to the man; and this throe of laughter did me good, giving me as it were a fresh start in life. I managed to whisper to her, ‘In the name of God do not betray your sex, whatever happens’: for what I dreaded most of all was to be found out by my father.

“The men then began to question us two, and I found an answer to most things, for all my wits were on the qui vive. They asked if we had taken part in the skirmish that afternoon; I answered, ‘either we or our doubles.’

‘Then, why,’ they asked, ‘had we not returned with our companies to barracks?’ ‘Having been touched by lead in the battle,’ I answered, ‘we thought it within our right to enjoy ourselves a little.’

““But did you ever hear of such a thing?’ they asked one another, chuckling.

““You look pretty green. Are you one of the new recruits?’ one of them asked me. I nodded.

“But still, you know enough to be aware that you are skulkers, and that you are about to pay for it with a dozen cuts of the knout, and at least fourteen days in the provost-cells. As for you’ — he said this to my old nurse— ‘you are known, my man; you have been looked for all the afternoon, and it may be that your captain will have a word to say to you. It is not strange that things turn out nastily, if this is the stuff of which the army is made. Come along.’

We went with them up a steep street and beyond the town toward some barracks on a heath. What lay before us now I could not guess, but I rejoiced that these sergeants, though they had taken upon themselves to arrest us, were not of our own regiment, and evidently did not know the faces of the men whose clothes we wore; and I found the chance to whisper again to Anna Pochowski: ‘Stick to me this once more, do not betray your sex.’

“The walk was long; on the top of the heath we could see far off the lighted windows of the barracks, like those of some palace in strange lands, but no living thing, except a few camels and cattle browsing. Only the sergeants spoke. My old nurse strode by my side with a straight neck, like a man being led to the guillotine and having no remark to make about it, only knowing that so the matter stands. I was weary when we reached the barrack-gate, weary of my misfortunes and of the musket. As the two sergeants passed the sentry into the quadrangle, one of them said to Ivan Shtcherbakoff ‘this way’; my old nurse then caught my hand in a secret grip that hurt me, whispered into my ear the words: ‘forgive the old man,’ and strode away after the sergeant. I have never seen him since. He may be dead.

“Anna Pochowski and I were led another way to a small door near a corner of the courtyard, and thence through the building to a room in which a piquet of six soldiers lounged in their undress round a stove. Our sergeant spoke a few words to them, then looked at the matricular numbers on our uniforms, and left us standing there. A yard or two away I could hear the tread of a sentry whom I could not see.

“‘Ah, Anna Pochowski,’ I now said, taking my poor Anna aside, ‘we are in a fix now, we two, and this is what your love for me has brought you to. But will you be brave still, and not let me fall into my father’s hands? Think how, if you had a sweetheart, you would wish to be with him, for you know a girl’s heart and the hunger that is in it, and think of our confusion of face if we are found out: so let us be women, equal to anything, and more than equal. Whatever is about to happen to us, it may not be for long, for my father is going away, and in a few days, when we see our way, we can say what we are. Promise me not to scream, not to faint.... You do not hold the bayonet well, Anna Pochowski’ — so I kept on pleading with her, kissing her cheeks behind the men’s backs, while she stared upon the ground; till an elderly man with a sword at his belt came in and stood looking at us over the rim of his spectacles for some time, as if we were strange sheep. I think he was a provost-marshal, and with him was the quartermaster-sergeant who had brought us there, and an army-gendarme in a light-blue tunic.

“‘Well, Alen Blinow, and you, Martin Alexandrow,’ said the elderly man at last, ‘what fly has stung you, that you have taken leave of your senses?’

“We did not answer. I understood that he had got our names from the register by means of our matricular numbers reported to him by the sergeant; and I rejoiced that he had no inkling of the truth.

“‘Well, put them in the guard-room till tomorrow morning,’ said he, whereat we went after the gendarme to a near door, at which a sentry was pacing. We entered, our muskets were taken from us, and the door was locked behind us.

“A sloping bench as broad as the length of a man ran round the walls, with three prisoners lying asleep on it. We sat there, and on laying my hand on Anna Pochowski’s, I could feel it ice-cold through her two-fingered cloth-glove and my own.

“There I sat all the night, shaking with cold, yet as it were not feeling it, I was so lost in greater woes. It seemed to me strange that things should be so hard on a young girl who had not meant to do any harm.

“But, as I sat — it was near morning then — a key turned in the lock, the door flew open, and a voice cried out: ‘Martin Alexandrow, come to the roll-call of your company.’

“I knew that I was Martin Alexandrow, for I had been so addressed during the night. I stood up. Anna Pochowski was fast asleep. I could just see her face in the faint light, and gave it a lingering look, for I understood that it must be something important which caused them to bring me out of prison before my trial. Then I followed the gendarme who had called me.

“That was three months ago, and from that moment I have never seen or heard anything of Anna Pochowski. Ah, Yoshio, what fate have I brought upon those two loving hearts that came over the world with me? You should love me well, — mon ami.

“The gendarme gave me my bayonet, and then walked so fast that I had to run to keep up with him. We went out into a courtyard, and there I saw a company drawn up in column of sections, with a young captain and his subalterns moving about. The morning was still dark.

“I was led toward my rank, which was forward near the drums; at the left end of it was a space for a small man, for we dress by sizes from the right, and I fell in. It was the place of the man whose clothes I wore, who also must have been a small fellow for which reason no doubt, Ivan Shtcherbakoff had chosen him to strip from among the other dead. The men of my squad evidently knew that Martin Alexandrow was dead, for they took no notice of me, taking me for one of the new arrivals from Russia drafted into the company, in which there were a good many new faces that morning; but when, at the roll-call, I answered to the name of Martin Alexandrow, the fellow on the right said to me, ‘What, the same name, too?’ to which I answered, ‘It is a common name enough.’

“The fact that our sergeant called out that name proved to me that the captain had had me brought out of the guard-room in the belief that I was really Martin Alexandrow, who had been out of bounds, and had been put under arrest for it. As the company had received hurried marching-orders during the night, and had to be in full strength, this Martin Alexandrow had been sent for from the guard-room; but when I answered to his name, those about me, who knew Martin Alexandrow very well, took me to be one of the new men with the same name.

“Our young Captain Avdéitch, as I afterwards heard, was a new man, just promoted; the former captain had been killed in the previous day’s skirmish.

“Cartridges were given out to us, and when the sun rose we were marching over the country with Karinsk at our backs. I looked everywhere then, hoping to see Anna Pochowski in the ranks, but she must have belonged to another company of that battalion. I have not seen my poor Anna since.

“It turned out, mon ami, that I was No. 4 in the 3rd sub-section of the 2nd company of the 2nd battalion of the 69th regiment, my division being the 17th. Was it not a complicated office for Nadine Devriloff to fill? I who was always thought to be in some way specially a thing of petticoats! I have often wondered, as I marched along in my top-boots, what Madame or some of my amies de cœur and adorers would have said to see me in that galley! Some would have shed tears, and all would have spent years in finding out witty things to say about my fix: but destiny, it seems, does not mind being tittered at, and Madame the Sphinx can stand a jest without making any answer, or changing her stark smile. Still, it was too bad. Not far before me the marker, with the company's flag on his bayonet, stalked like a man gone foolish with pride, and in order to keep step I had to stretch my poor bijou legs, not made for such work, while round me stalked the two hundred stupid fellows, never dreaming what a basket of bonbons was in their midst. It was a cold day, though bright, most of our road lying under ice, yet I was soon hot and tired, and how I kept on to the end of that march I do not know; the later marches, however, became less toilsome to me.

“What pleased me was that we were going toward the south-east, and nearer to you, and I thought to myself, ‘I will wait till I believe myself out of danger from my father, then I will stand out as a free girl’; on the other hand, I was frightened at the thought that Anna Pochowski might be given the knout, whereupon her sex would be shown, even if she did not blurt out everything when it came to the point of being flogged.

“My right hand neighbour, a middle-aged carpenter of Perm who was my lance-corporal, asked me from what batch of recruits I had been picked to fill the place of his comrade, Martin Alexandrow, whom he had seen shot in the skirmish, and before I could answer he added that in that skirmish he himself had bayoneted five Japanese one after the other as one might pin spiders — a boast which caused a noise of jeering to arise all round him. I told him that new men were just then being chosen by lot out of the Kovel infantry-regiments in order to fill up the infantry-regiments at the front, and that I had only arrived at Karinsk the day before. I had indeed to say many things, if I wished to be polite and answer questions.

“The fact was, that I was where I was as the result of two mistakes made by two different sets of people, the first set being the men who, in searching for Ivan Shtcherbakoff, had taken it upon themselves to seize Anna Pochowski and me at the railway station, without knowing by face the two dead men whose uniforms we wore. The new captain also believed me, till he saw my face at the first halt, to be the Martin Alexandrow whom he knew; whereas my messmates and others, in the second set, believed me to be one of the new men with the same name.

“The second fellow to my right, a simple peasant with a nose like Cyrano de Bergerac’s, began to cry out upon my youth, asking if I was yet of the military age, which is eighteen among us; in fact, I became the point of interest of all my squad when the sun rose, one clown hitting it very near when he said, ‘He should be still in a girls’ school, the boy’; another asked, ‘But who could have done his hair-cutting’? while a fellow named Grigory Khartoy, a young mechanic, was taken with such a hankering for me, that in some days it became painful, for he would not let me be in peace with his kindnesses and offers.

“We halted on the top of a rising ground about ten o’clock; our advanced guard came in, the roll was called again, and I had for my breakfast cold water, some biscuit from my haversack, and groats without any taste, till one added salt, which we also carried in our haversacks. The lot of the soldier is indeed hard, so if they enjoy themselves outrageously in their moments of freedom, that is not strange: there sometimes came upon me hours when I felt myself driven to do something astonishing, to dance in the ranks, or insult the flag, or box an officer’s ears, anything to show that I was no ordinary type of soldier; but I understood that discipline is a good thing, too.

“However, I had in my pockets some Malakoff chocolates and some cigarettes, taken from my skirt at the inn at Karinsk, for Anna Pochowski had brought a lot of such things from St. Petersburg, and of these I ate some. I had also some twenty roubles with which to buy things at the canteen.

“While we were breakfasting our new captain, whose name was Avdéitch, stepped about among the men, to see that they were properly fed, making remarks to one or another; and presently, coming up to me, he says, ‘Hullo, and who are you?’

“‘I am called Martin Alexandrow, my captain,’ said I.

“‘But you are not the Martin Alexandrow who was under arrest last night?’ says he.

“‘No, my captain,’ said I.

“‘Then, whereabouts is that fellow?’ says he.

“‘I could not tell you, my captain,’ said I.

“‘Are you,’ says he, ‘one of the fifteen who came before me last night?’

“I shrank from answering this, for though I did not mind giving false impressions, I had so far made no false statement, but I had to answer, ‘Yes, my captain.’

“‘I do not remember—’ he began, but was now interrupted by a lieutenant who came up and spoke to him, whereat they two went off together. I was sorry then that he did not stay to thresh the matter out with me, for I was sure that no busy company-captain would be able to unmask me, since I did not wish to be unmasked; in fact, a man’s mind, especially when troubled with other cares, is not quick enough to track the dodgings of a girl’s; but perhaps it was better that he went away then, for he never spoke to me of the matter afterwards — he hardly had the chance, I think, for we were busily trying to get into touch with a body of the enemy from that day.

“As I was finishing my breakfast, up comes my friend, Grigory Khartoy, smiling at me, and asking why it was that my left eye is not so large as the right; this little thing seemed to engage this fellow’s curiosity. I told him that it was no matter, and not to allow his head to be bothered about my eyes: so he went away for the time. Meantime, some markers with a sub-lieutenant were sent out to mark out the next bivouac, and we were all soon on the road again, arriving at three p.m. at the head of a valley, where I saw three camps, beside a small one on the hills beyond, and men moving about among them, with cooking-fires, mobs of horses and cattle, parks of baggage, and batteries of cannon; all arms were there, and one could see that something was happening, or was about to happen, for staff-adjutants, aides-de-camp and despatch-riders were going about between the camps and the village; and while my company still stood to arms, a tall old man, with silver aiguillets and a black-velvet collar on his frock-coat, cantered up with his staff and an escort to review us. He was our general of division, Count Vladimir Pushkin.

CHAPTER XVI

THE PRISONER OF WAR (continued)

“THERE WERE THERE a full brigade of infantry, with two companies of our battalion beside my own, and I do not know how much cavalry and artillery. Nor were we allowed much repose that night, I myself being twice roused before daybreak from the deepest sleep which, I suppose, I have ever had. The three companies of our battalion bivouacked by themselves in three lines of tents, with the arms piled before the tents, and a bivouac-fire at each end of each line. I and five others had a tent near the right end of the second line. I was asleep with my belt loosed, when I was roused and marched off by the sergeant of the guard to stand sentry upon the treasure-chest at the rear. I do not know if any enemy was thought to be near, but there was going on a great business of bivouac-guards, with a chain of double sentries on the flanks, with front and rear guards, with a waking picket, and with officers on duty. I stood sentry a weary time, watching with envy another sentry before the commanding-officer’s tent in a line with my ‘treasure-chest,’ for he was by a fire which he poked anon with his bayonet and threw fir-cones upon it; but I had no fire, and the sky, which was thronged with stars, looked down without any pity upon poor lost me. It was no fun, and I thought that leaving one’s home and bed to seek one’s husband may become a hard case. Just behind the officers’ tents something kept on growling in a low voice, and the thought that it was a wolf put me in fear, and left me no peace.

“As soon as I got back to my tent I rolled myself afresh in my blanket and the snow, and had slept but ten minutes (as it seemed to me), when the réveillée was being sounded, though it was still quite dark. My five fellows were on their feet, drowsy and growling, so I, too, jumped up, wretched enough, yet interested at having a share in all this starlit to-do and strange way of life. I saw my messmates wiping moisture from their rifles, and I wiped mine; I saw them taking down the tent, and I helped them; each took a sixth part of it to carry with him, so I took a sixth part. Whatever I saw them do I copied.

“We formed again in column, were given the command to march, and started out, I did not know whither, nor, I am sure, did any one else. In ten minutes the bugle blew the halt, and so it went on, for at one moment our section was running, and at another standing still, looking for the main body in the darkness, so that after two hours, when the day broke, we could not have covered three versts, and then we had to send out vedettes to find out where the two regiments were to which we and some cavalry were acting as advanced-guard. Whatever, therefore, was the aim of this night-march, it was not fulfilled, and so with all the war that I have seen so far — a string of blunders on both sides; perhaps an equal number of women would have managed it all more artfully.

“What we were marching for was to ambush a column of the enemy that was making northwestward about thirty miles away — so I heard; but even when the sun was up it was seen that this could not be done, for a thaw had set in, and one for the first time felt in the air that spring was coming. Everything softened, flowed and slushed; the company-horses floundered in it, the carts went on their side, and I spent five wretched days of soldier’s-life on this account, being nearly always wet to the skin, so that how I did not become ill I do not yet know.

“Meanwhile, we went from point to point as we received orders, keeping touch always with the brigade behind. On the third night my company was told off for outpost to the whole force, and I could not have dreamt of such an experience, for it poured with rain all the time, was very dark, and there was a strangeness in the scenes and sounds about me all that night which gave me a feeling of dreaming, or of being in another world.

“We had come to some rather broken country with woods and hills, and had halted for food, as the sun set behind the rain. When the brigade, too, bivouacked a mile or so in our rear, a rider galloped out of it with a despatch for Captain Avdéitch, who, on reading it, picked three fellows out of my section, and sent them on ahead at the quick. As soon as these had disappeared beyond a ridge of the hill in front, our lieutenant called out four squads of us, and marched us off, bringing with us a Manchu man who had been forced to come with us from a village that morning. We went on for fully a mile, wading through two brooks of melting ice on the way, the Manchu fellow pointing anon, till we came to a cross-road, where we were halted, divided into four groups, and spread out two or three miles along the cross-road.

“I and the three men with me were one of the two middle groups, and I was given to understand that we two middle groups were examining posts, while the two end groups were mere posts; the lieutenant told us that the password was ‘Bayonets,’ and the countersign ‘St. John’ — an ironical thing, I thought, and the fellow made us repeat after him ‘Bayonets,’ ‘St. John,’ so that I had to laugh. When he had pointed out to us just where we were to stay, he and the Manchu ran away back behind the sheet of rain.

“The night came suddenly, the rain poured. My friend Grigory Khartoy and I sat together on the ground in a pine wood, but the wood was not thick, and gave us no shelter. We were not to sleep, nor to loosen our belts, though we might take off our knapsacks.

“Some yards in front of us sat our lance-corporal on a path that ran down a hillock, and thirty or forty yards in front of him our fourth man, a simple peasant who often made me laugh, stood sentry on a piece of ploughed land with his knapsack on his back; but we could not see him, it was so dark.

“Grigory Khartoy presently found a kind of deep and wide ditch in the wood, and crouching down in there we found some shelter among ferns and bushes, whereupon he put his arm about me, and crossing himself every minute, kept on telling me tales about ghosts, miracles and tokens which he or his friends had witnessed.

“In this he was stopped by a sound of horses’ hoofs, upon which we both rushed out into the path through the wood, he shouting out: ‘Halt! who goes there? What is the password?’ To this a voice cried back: ‘What is the countersign?’ Grigory Khartoy then called out sharply: ‘St. John!’ whereat the voice called back sharply: ‘Bayonets!’ I could not help smiling at this. St. John had so little to do with bayonets when he was alive.

It was only two mounted patrols under an officer who had come out from the main-guard to visit us, for half-a-mile behind us, Grigory Khartoy told me, was a body of some thirty men acting as our supports, while half-a-mile behind these supports was the rest of our company, forming our main-guard, which main-guard had to send out patrols every hour or so to visit the supports and the posts, so that it was a tangled business, for beside these visiting-patrols from the main-guard, there was much coming and going of men in the dark; about midnight a squad of flying-patrols, who were sent out on horseback in order to gain information, passed through our posts; and there were others, both mounted and on foot, whose business I did not know. One party of five caused me to fire off my musket, for I had been told to fire if I saw anything, and had no time to give warning. My turn had come to stand sentry, and I was out alone in the darkness, unable to see any of the three others in their places behind me, when I heard sounds and saw forms rising upon me through the rain. My feeling of responsibility was great, for I knew that at that moment I was the outermost guard of the company, which was the outermost guard of the brigade, so that everything hung upon me; and as the forms which I saw were coming toward, and not from, our army, the wild thought struck me that they must be Japanese. ‘Who goes there?’ I called out, and as an answer did not come very promptly, I forgot about calling three times, lost my wits, and fired like a jay into the air. Before the three others behind me could run up I heard laughter, and afterwards a great merriment and fuss was made over this affair, so that I did not hear the end of it.

“The ‘Japanese’ of my too zealous fancy turned out to be ‘secret’ posts, who had been sent a long way out in front of the line of posts to make observations; they were then returning.

“At last toward daybreak we were relieved, and tramped in through slush to the main-guard, where half the men were in tents with loosed belts and with bivouac-fires. It was like coming home after a shipwreck, I could hardly stand any more, and I thought as I threw myself upon the wet ground that I had had reason to scent violets on that 25th of March, for things were hard on me.

“But I made up my mind to bear, and wait, and watch my chance, trusting in God, who is the befriender of the unfortunate.

“I was allowed to sleep hardly four hours when we were on the march again. The fact was that a body of the enemy was moving about not very far from us, but wished to avoid us until it got supports, and had managed so far to do this. For three days after my wet night on outpost the 2nd and 3rd companies were billeted upon a village named Tashka, the rest of the force being billeted over a valley which lay at our feet, for the troops had passed through many hardships within the last days, owing to the thaw and other things, and had need of repose.

“I with the rest of my squad was put to lodge with a rich peasant and his wife who lived near the commandant’s house in the middle of the street; they had a daughter of my own age, named Ribkah, and the old fellow reminded me of Shylock, though I was never sure whether they were Jews or Manchus, for they looked like both, as many of those people thereabouts do; but they spoke Russian well.

“I spent the evening of our arrival at Tashka in helping to put up three finger-posts outside the village, and then had to mount guard over the arms of us four for two hours in our cottage. In going to bed when it was late I found the little Ribkah leaning on the door-post by which I had to pass; she looked shyly at me, and I, not to be backward, returned her smile in a mannish way. I was too tired to laugh at the little coquette, and throwing myself upon the matting under the padded blankets that were there for us four, I was at once asleep.

“The next morning, by the light which each billet had to keep burning all night, I saw Grigory Khartoy standing over me, waiting for me to wake at the réveillée; and the moment he saw my eyes open, he cried out in a glad voice: ‘Christ is risen!’ and fell to kissing my face. That was the cry all day: ‘Christ is risen!’ but it was a sad Easter Day for us when we thought of all the gladness at home, and saw ourselves forced to work in many sorts of ways, as usual, standing sentry over the park of baggage and artillery outside the village, over the horses in their stables, at each end of the village, at outpost on the alarm-places, and forming postal and telegraphic stations to the nearest detachment miles away. However, money and ikons were given out from the senior officer's quarters, which was a cottage in the middle of the village, where the flag hung by day and a lantern burned all night; and with this money those not on duty cheered themselves at the canteen and drink-shop. There was worship in the little church, and some dancing in the street towards evening.

“The next night I was told off! by my sergeant to be one of an inlying picket of six who had to keep awake all night in a room which they called an alarm-quarter. We loosed our belts, took our ease, and these fellows rudely jeered at me because I would not help to drink their hidden vodka, beside speaking grossly, and taking from me my last cigarette. I was furious that it was not for the moment in my power to order these dogs to be flogged. In the morning, before being allowed to sleep, I had to water from the village well two horses that were in a little stable made of skins at the back of my cottage, and while I was in the stable doing this, out to me came the little Ribkah to flirt with me, and to tell me the tale that her father had had to sleep in the fields through having forgotten the password overnight, and so being refused entrance to the village. She put her hand on my arm, and looked up into my face, but I, being in an angry mood, said, ‘No, come, we must be serious’ (faut être sérieux!), whereat the coquette thought fit to turn up her nose at me.

“When I had slept, and was having a meal in the afternoon with Shylock, his wife, Ribkah, and two of my mates, all sitting in a circle on the floor, in stepped a sister-of-mercy, whose name was Sister Katusha, a sister attached to one of the two field-hospitals of our division, which was following the 2nd and 3rd companies, and was billeted with us upon Tashka. She looked round and said —

““Which of you is Martin Alexandrow?”

““I am, my sister,” I answered.

“‘You are one of six trained stretcher-bearers of your company, I think, Martin Alexandrow?’ said she.

“I had to say yes, for the fellow whose place I filled must have been that.

“‘Then,’ said she, ‘you will come with me now, for the junior surgeon has asked me to get a permit for you to help me to-day on the nursing-staff,’ and she showed me a paper which she had.

“It turned out that one of the junior dressers had died that morning, and as the two ambulance-wagons of the two companies were nearly full of sick men, that was why I was called upon; so I spent an easy and happy day with the sick fellows and two of the sisters, the wagons being drawn up under a tree in an open space at one end of the village.

“I was kept on duty a long time there, and sitting on one of the spring-beds in the wagon I fell asleep; when I awoke a strange thing happened to me, for I did not know who nor where I was. It was late in the night, the sky was full of stars, three sick men lay about me, but I could not tell how I came to be there. This had happened to me several times since I had put on soldier’s clothes that evening at Karinsk, but never for so great a number of seconds before. It was a very odd feeling. But even in my waking hours I had it, for it would come upon me that I could not be Nadine Devriloff, or even Nadine M — , and yet be where I was, doing what I did. Many of the men had fastened upon me the name of ‘the little general,’ because of my small size and proud air, and oftentimes the being of this ‘little general’ and that of Nadine became quite mixed in my head, for the change from what I had been to what I was was too big for my mind, and I could not realize it clearly.

“All of a sudden, while we were still at Tashka, one could say ‘It is spring,’ and the look of everything changed. The red pines had a fresher air, brooks ran without any ice or snow, one saw the wild rose, the moon-dahlia, and very soon cherry-trees all in their white dress.

“Then all was movement and the break-up of the billet. It was said that we were about to fight a battle. All down in the valley bodies of troops marched; squadrons of Cossacks on large white horses cantered away with a gay air; I could faintly hear the music of the bands, and see the up-hill strain of the artillery-horses. Then, we too, moved in our turn, to form a corner of the diamond-shape in which I understood that the brigade was marching; and Grigory Khartoy, with his moustache wet with vodka of the canteen, would say to me: ‘We are only marching to be food for guns, but Christ died for us, Martin Alexandrow.’”

CHAPTER XVII

THE PRISONER OF WAR (continued)

“ON THE MORNING of April 8, the 2nd and 3rd were marching along a rather narrow road in column of squads, when, at about nine o’clock, my heart leapt at an outbreak of firing. It came from far away at the top of a blue mountain somewhat on the left of our front, where part of the brigade was on the march, making me think of some grim bird of old prattling a little with its iron bills in the haze up there, and it was as if I had drunk a glass of champagne, I was at once so ‘elevated,’ by it!

“While we all looked about us, and the halt was sounded, two officers with spy-glasses ran past the column and beyond a ridge in front; then, running back after some minutes, waved a flag, whereat our thicket of bayonets went forward at the quick. I felt like running out of school and playing in a game, for our soldiers, in their long frock-coats with a hood to it, have a very thick, manly, and graceful air, and fear was out of the question for me with such a mass of them all about me. I went in the midst of them stretching out my poor legs, but in the mood of a looker-on, for though I wished them high luck, and was proud of them, my mind was made up to shoot no one, since I was not really a soldier.

“We went two versts or more at the quick, passing frightened people by the roadside or at lonely cottage-doors, anon catching sight of our advanced-guard, and hearing ever more strongly the drumming of musketry and machine-guns. As we began to go up the mountain-slopes, I saw a little haze rising up near the top, and knew that the fighting must be there, for smokeless powder still makes a haze and a smell when a lot of it is fired by troops in close order; but we had not gone far when all was still, and soon an orderly came galloping down the road, whereat we were halted, and afterwards went on more slowly.

“The trouble had been caused by some mounted-infantry scouts taking up a position on our route, and sniping at some advanced body of our columns. They had been galloped by a couple of troops of Cossacks, but not before great damage had been done by this handful of rifles, no less than eighteen of our men having been knocked over.

“We knew now that heavy fighting was near, and from that moment for three long days and nights the noise of guns was seldom out of my ears, for, even as we marched that day, one or other of our columns was sprinkling the foreground with machine-gun fire wherever bush grew. We were said to have ‘established contact’ with the enemy.

“We passed over much stony country, but in the afternoon came to a greener part, where the brigade camped on a plain overgrown with thistle and long grass; and we had hardly been fed and rested when every one, including outpost garrisons, were at the work of turning the place into a fort. The old Pushkin himself got off his horse to make the trace of the big trench, drawing a curving line some half a mile long a little to the east of a chain of mounds which ran north and south; when this was done, matches were given to a number of men, who set fire to the scrub, and the wind being from the west, a smoke was soon spreading away to the east. By the time these flames had died down it was night, and lanterns were lit all along the deepening trench. Each of our companies carries nearly a hundred spades and axes, beside which there were mattocks, pickaxes, and other things, so that it was a great business, not only the digging, but the making of loopholes by the help of boards and flat stones, with officers going up and down watching the men; and I thought when I looked down the line of lanterns that we were a lot of midnight gravediggers digging our own graves. I did this work in quite a heat, I do not know why; it amused and put me in a fuss, and though I was soon weary myself, I cheered and kept my fellows to it, till one of the clowns asked me who the devil I was, with my orders!

“We did not dig all along the trace, but made a chain of pits, each to hold twelve men, heaping the loose earth on their east edge, with oblong holes in it to see and fire through. But all this was not nearly done, when firing was heard to the east, whereupon bugles were blowing in the camps behind the mounds; down the line of trenches went the cry, ‘cover up the lanterns! line the trenches I’ and for a time a scene of bustle took place, men pouring in hosts at the run over the mounds and between them from the camps toward the trenches, the trench-diggers running to seize their greatcoats and muskets, horses galloping to and fro, orders cried out in the darkness, and, growing nearer and nearer out of the eastern night, a sound of war, fire-arms mixed with a throng of voices shouting in victory, at which the heart quailed.

“My own curved shelter-pit already had fifteen or sixteen of the loopholes finished out of the twenty-four which we had to make for us twelve. When the firing broke out, I leapt down into the pit, put my musket into a loophole, and peeped through. It was dark in there, and dark outside; there was no moon; some drizzle was falling, the marl in my trench was soft under my feet. I heard two or three speak grimly to themselves through the teeth; our sergeant said: ‘Thank God, our pouches and bandoliers are full’; and the uproar in the east travelled ever nearer to us.

“Then I was aware of men running toward us — straggling refugees on foot and on horse — from one of our outpost garrisons which the enemy had driven in; then I knew that bullets were beginning to drop about us, and in the next pit on my right I heard the voice of Captain Avdéitch cry out, ‘pli!’ (fire!) All down our line it broke out then, though what they were firing at I did not know, for I could see nothing, till a shell burst fifty yards before the trench; about the same time I heard cannon behind me, for some of our guns had been run up the mounds, and thenceforward the sounds of the battle were like the regular sounds made by a machine at work, which whizzes, booms, wails, sighs, and terribly rattles. The enemy were pouring howitzer and musketry-fire all round our position, and we were replying with machine-gun, field-gun and the rifle. The shouts of Sergeant Krasnastonoff, who pretended to direct the fire in our pit, could hardly be heard by us, and I thought to myself: ‘I am well in it now, and Anna Pochowski should have been here to see my eyes on fire.’ It was hell, but I enjoyed it.

A stream of shrapnel-bullets struck our parapet, and broke down a yard of it; I was aware of the earth raining into the trench. But I was not afraid: I was too highly awake.

“I wished to shoot like the rest, but I did not, at least, I do not think so, though I fired a shot for every one which they fired, and emptied one of my pouches; but I fired low. There seems to be a tiger in men, and a tigress in women; but I would not stain my hands.

It did not last long, certainly not fifteen minutes, for two of our outposts had the enemy’s flanks more or less under fire from the rear; but what saved us, unready as we were, was said to be the burning of the scrub in the afternoon, for when the enemy came within three hundred yards we could guess out with our eyes their front line. Their commander must have believed that the grass was still there, but it was not, and as things were our fire was too hot for any troops. The ground sloped downwards to the front in a gentle glaucis-like slope from our trenches, with hardly any folds in it, and our bullets easily made way through the ashes of the scrub, which may have even helped us by making the enemy lie with a false confidence behind heaps which were no real cover. At any rate, their fire slackened; we understood that they were in retreat. And now our independent firing ceased, and down our trenches a grimmer sound than any broke out — a volley; then others, coming quicker, as it were, in short-winded grunts. It made one think of a woman as big as the world scraping quickly along in clogs, for the cruel noise came almost as regularly as the stride of a walker — grate, grate, most harsh. Each pit must have done its own volley-firing by itself, for general words-of-command could not be given in that din; when it came up to us, Krasnastonoff directed ours. Sometimes several of the pits went off together, splitting one's ears, and the enemy must have felt as if doomsday was cursing after their heels. I was glad of this, and my teeth ground together.

Then the officers' whistles sounded, the guns died down, and the affair was over. But there was little rest that night for at least half the brigade: for some were making the shelter-pits into one long trench and making trenches on its flanks; others made cover for the camps and communications west of the mounds; others turned a brook nearer to the mounds, so that the men lining the trenches might be able by creeping out at night to fill their water-bottles; and others were sent to a forest far away to the west, in order to get wood for fuel and for building a sort of tower out there, from which the commanding-officer might watch the enemy's movements and the effects of our artillery-fire. We seemed to be determined that they should not pass any further westward than this point.

“As for me, I was put to the worst work, for I was one of the stretcher-bearers of my company, and the slaughter, especially among the Japanese, had been terrible. What I saw that night could not be told, and I shed many tears, for now that the ecstasy was no more, only that which was piteous, cold, and ghastly was left, and I wondered to myself that such a thing could be. A crowd of us, each with the red cross fastened on his left arm, went out over the field with lanterns, and as the enemy’s searchers were also abroad, there were many straying lights in the dark. Here or there one heard a shriek, and then silence, then yonder wailings, and then silence. I helped to bear eight, one of whom I found out myself moving his hand a little under two dead, so as to attract notice; most of them I took on three different journeys, first to an advanced dressing-station where they were given first-aid, then to the main station, where two tents stood, with flags and lanterns hung at their doors; inside these were operating-tables and knapsacks full of bandages, and outside were ambulance-wagons and stretchers. Among, the crowd of stretchers lay many wounded waiting to be seen to, and they gave out a sound of lamentation, while inside the tents the two surgeons and their helps were as busy and cool as butchers. It was weary work bearing through the fluff of the scrub, but if I had not been kept going and coming, perhaps I should have fainted; everybody had on the red cross, and this sign is now mixed up in my mind with whatever is most sickly and lazar-like. From this main station the wounded were carried on to the field-hospital, where Sister Katusha with three other sisters and some doctors took them. It lasted till long past midnight; a hundred and twenty-seven were brought in by our side alone, and among them was — what do you think? — a Japanese girl in soldier’s-dress! It was found out at the main dressing-station. I wish that I had seen her, but I missed it all, and she died before morning in the field-hospital. So each army had its amazon, you see! The thing got abroad among our men, and there was no end to the curiosity it aroused, so that for two days many could talk of little else. They did not think that the same fact was under their very eyes! But men cannot perceive anything. I have heard my father tell of an English lady who was an army-doctor forty years, and her sex was only found out after her death, when she did not mind.

“The work was over at last, and I got a little sleep in my camp, which had some artificial cover, being in a hollow, of which the east side was dug away and made steep, and good grazing inside for the horses.

“When I was roused the sun was up. I was alone in my tent, and I sat thinking to myself, ‘their attack is as determined as our defence,’ for at more than one point to the far east one could hear firing. The bugles of the 2nd and 3rd were calling the ‘form company-columns’ with their cantering throats, so I and the other eleven stretcher-bearers only just managed to get some breakfast, and I ran to take my place eating as I ran. Two of us no longer answered to the roll-call that morning!

“We had been ordered to go to the support of an outpost to the east; and with our echelon of baggage and two guns we started out, the drums beating before us, the morning clear and warm.

“We marched past the mounds over some thousand yards of burnt plain, and afterwards entered upon more broken country. Only at one point to the north-east could some firing be faintly heard; elsewhere the attacks had cried off for the time.

“We marched six or seven versts which were a pain to me, for a boot-nail had come through my left foot-bandages, and was like a thorn in my conscience all that day. A squadron of Cossacks from the camps came up with us and trotted past — some hundred and forty men and horses; and it seemed to me that nothing could ever conquer them.

“The attack upon the mountain which we were sent to hold was renewed as we came near it; our commanding-officer, Major Sulkowski, having put our ammunition-carts and ambulance-wagons under cover of a cliff, with red flags on the carts, marched us up a rocky footpath; on lower ground half a mile to the left I saw the squadron of Cossacks drawn up in column of sixes. Our fighting-line was in trenches on the further slope of the mountain, and on our slope were a small headquarters’ signalling-station and supply-store, with a dressing-station lower down. I saw men far up bearing the wounded from the trenches, and I wondered at this, for though the dressing-station may have been under cover, it hardly seemed so from where we were, and small pompom-shrapnel was bursting about the top of the mountain. I asked myself ‘how if one of the wounded be again wounded?’ for I knew that I must faint, if I saw such a thing.

“The din grew as we got well up the slope, coming mainly from the enemy, for a few only of our firing-line seemed to have been told off to keep up fire, the rest reserving theirs — strict fire-discipline, you know, is the army’s strong point, as my father always says. But, as we others stood halted in line two hundred yards from the top, firing broke out from our whole firing-line. The Japanese firing-line was then so near to ours that they had actually cheered for the charge; but they broke before our thundering trenches, and took to flight. At once we heard the charge sounding from our side, whereat a body of reserves near the top ran forward over the ridge, to fight; and we also, called by signal from the station, ran up, deployed by sections, and lay down under any sort of cover on the ridge.

“Our firing-line, joined by their reserve, had now leapt their trenches, and had run down in pursuit or counter-attack. For a time I could see little, for some folds of the mountain side made dead ground at the bottom, but presently the pursuit spread out over a reach of meadow-land dotted with woods and houses, and we saw all. They looked quite small, and yet clear, down there, the morning was so bright, and we at the top lay watching a long time the drama below, the runnings and stoppages to fire, till on a sudden, our men were checked by an outbreak of fire from a hill somewhat on their left flank, where the enemy's reserves had taken up a position; yes, our men stopped, and in one minute nothing could be more utter than their rout. They were not very spread out, fell fast, and fled. Ah, that was a sight. We on the mountain-top could do nothing, for, even if the enemy had been within range, our troops in the plain were relatively too near to them for us on the mountain to fire. But other help soon appeared which I did not look for — the Cossacks; out they rode on their tall horses from between two spurs of our mountain, and I clapped my hands, I can see them again now, the wild white horses raging together, with their wild captain ten yards in front of all, calling them, as still quicker the hundreds of thin legs drummed the ground with a steady rise of haste from a hand-gallop to a field-gallop, and from a field-gallop to a flood. I thought that nothing could live before their sabres: but I was mistaken in this.

“The firing-line of the enemy, driven from our mountain, had rallied when their reserves opened fire from a hill upon their pursuers, and our firing line, too, after having been thrown back by the new fire from the hills, rallied when they saw the Cossacks coming; and these two firing-lines, lying down among bush, wood, lanes and ditches, at terribly close quarters poured fire upon each other. We soon lost sight of them, for a village near by, breaking into flames, rolled them in smoke. Neither was a large body, both were disorganized, and it was said that the Japanese lacked cartridges; but on both sides scores were killed. As for the Cossacks they dashed by, and seemingly over, the north flanks of these foot-fighters, taking no notice of them, but racing for the hill, whence the enemy's reserves were pouring all sorts of fire upon them, while our guns, too, on the mountain, shelled the hill, which we more or less commanded, at long range.

“The Cossacks, meantime, were being fast knocked over, men and horses, though they had spread out over a common and were riding like the wind; till at last they gained some dead ground under the flank of the hill, where two-thirds of them leapt off, even as the horses still ran, every first and third man throwing their bridles to every second man, whereupon the braves could be seen running on foot, extending, and then storming the hill with hardly any cover.

“I wished that I had a glass, for at that distance all forms were as miniature as those seen in the pupil of one’s eye. It was hard to follow, but what really happened was this: that the Cossacks, after a terrible fight, in which they lost a third of their number, took the enemy’s trenches, but, on dashing upon them, found them — empty. It was said that the Japanese had retired from their trenches by twos and threes down a covered retreat — a fold in the hillside — and had quietly taken up a new position further back under natural cover, though it is strange that we on the mountain-top did not notice anything of this. Perhaps, if the truth were known, only a few of them were ever in the front trenches, with orders to retire to the second line some time before the charge; at any rate, when the Cossacks, hot with victory, leapt upon the empty front trenches, they were met with a withering shock at close quarters from the enemy’s second position. Think of their plight, their wretched case! They were perishing like sheep before they could look round them: and they fled like sheep.

“Happily, most of the hillside was dead ground from the enemy’s second position, and half of the Cossacks got back to their horses, which were led to meet them; but they raced back faster than they went, if that could be, cutting down and trampling on the way part of the enemy's first firing-line, which was once more in retreat before ours. When they again came near our mountain, they were trotting in good order, but sadly, many of the saddles were without riders, and they passed back defeated up the glen from which they had ridden out so grandly an hour before.

"It was then that we on the mountain-top received orders to fill the trenches left empty by our firing-line, for the enemy's reserve had again taken up their front position on the hill, and were firing upon our firing-line down in the fields, though it looked as if they must shoot their own men as well as ours. Perhaps they did; anyway, our firingline was again retiring.

"Having left two sections in reserve, therefore, we ran down the mountain-side, which in some parts was very steep, and in some almost level, till we came to the trenches, and these we lined in a pell-mell way, no one quite knowing where his place was. In three of the flank trenches we found a row of forage-caps stuck up on sticks, in order to draw the enemy's fire, and these three trenches we still left empty, though there were hardly loopholes enough in the others for our two companies. It was then about noon.

"Down in the plain our infantry were retiring in a very broken line, made up of squads, but with some rearguard firing, and without haste; in half an hour they, too, passed from our sight up the little valley by which the Cossacks had gone.

"Then the useless long-range gun-fire which had been going on all the time died down; and all was quiet for some hours.

"I was eating lukewarm groats out of my can when I was again called upon to go down to ambulance work. I shall remember groats all my life: I had grown to hate even the sight of it; but we were on half meat-rations, and there was little else. I did not look thin, however, not then, as I do now; nor was the food the worst of it, but the ugly faces and beings of my companions, and the dirt and wretchedness which were giving camp-fever to a number of us. I must be very strong, for what caused strong men to break down left me well.

“Captain Avdéitch called me to him one evening when we were in bivouac some days before the fighting began, gave me a rouble, and said, ‘go out and buy a fowl for me, if you can, but whether you can buy it or not, bring it, for you look like a gaol-bird with those eyes’; and in order to get it, I had to hide in a pond an hour — I got two, in fact, though he never saw more than one — but it did not make me ill, nor did the great thaw, nor my often filthy hands, feet, body and clothes.

“Well, late in the afternoon, I was back in my trench from the ambulance-work, with my hands and front all red afresh; and now, the wounded being done with, another attack began.

“If I had not loved the army, I should have wished then that the enemy would take our position, in order that I might give myself a prisoner: for I never, except once, had any fear of being killed, since I saw that there were many chances against any given person being killed, and I believed that those chances would save me, whomever else they might not save. I dare say that this sort of selfconceit is the reason that any one is got to fight at all, for each knows that some will not be shot, and he thinks that since Providence has a special care of him, he will be among these. I certainly felt in that way, and I was right, you see, for I was not killed. When the danger and uproar was hugest, I was of course ‘elevated,’ but I generally felt that, since I had nothing to do with the matter, it would be very unfair if I were shot, so I left the outcome in the hand of God, believing that He would yet bring me to my sweetheart.

“That evening the enemy’s firing-line, which had been reinforced, twice came within three hundred yards of our position on the mountain-slope, and was twice driven back. Would you believe that both times they concentrated fire upon those poor rows of forage-caps on sticks in three of our flank trenches? And this childish thing may have caused their defeat, for it is a rule in the army to fire hotly upon that part of the enemy which is opposite the part of our line upon which they fire hotly, so our men poured fire upon their flanks, since they were pouring fire upon our dummy ones, and their flanks giving way, the whole line retired for the second time as night fell. We had no killed, and only seven wounded, two by bullets coming through loopholes, and five in the trench next to mine by a shrapnel-shell from the hill to the left where the Cossacks had been killed: it had struck inside the left end of the trench, and the bullets had ricocheted down the length of it, wounding those five.

“That night the companies’ ambulance-wagons crawled back to the field-hospital of the brigade quite loaded with the sick and dying; those who could walk had to drag themselves along on foot beside the ‘wagons. I was with them. Two of those on foot stopped midway, we could not get them to come on, and they were left out there on the plain for I do not know how many hours. Their sick eyes must have seen the stars in a strange light that night, poor fellows.

“Our two companies did not hold the mountain-fort during the night, but were relieved by others, and marched back to camp; nor were we too soon, just escaping an attack on the march, for the enemy had broken through at some small post to the southeast, and we were no sooner back in camp than shell-fire, perhaps aimed during the day, began upon it. As for me, I was very sleepy, and though fire was bursting all about, it no longer even interested me. I was getting used to it: and wrapping myself in my blanket, I slept soundly to that rough lullaby.

“Once when I stirred a little, I heard in my dream both musketry and gun-fire, I did not know where, and I did not care.

“The next morning, when we stood to arms, Captain Avdéitch made a speech, saying that Major Sulkowski had been complimented by the general on the conduct of the two companies the day before, and ikons of St. Vladimir were given out to us all. Our company had to go alone to relieve a garrison to the north; and we set out to do this in a drizzle which lasted all day.

“Our new post was on a plateau about fifteen feet high at its north end, which end looked down pretty steeply upon a pond and some marshy ground. Away on either hand were mountains. On the south the plateau sloped away to the level of the plain, with some trees and bush on it, and in the middle of it a hollow place in which our baggage was quite safe. Along the higher north edge a line of shelter-pits had been dug the day before, but without any particular head-cover, the diggers no doubt thinking that the pond at their feet, which spread a long way out, would keep the enemy far enough off. It was a lonely place, I could not see a house anywhere, and there we spent an idle long day, hearing a croaking of frogs and to the southeast a booming of cannon which after a time one only heard when one listened for it, and then muffled, like a gong struck by something woolly, while all the day the drizzle drizzled and streamed down our muskets.

“It was only about four in the afternoon that two scouts galloped in from the highlands to our right with the news that some companies of the enemy were making gun-emplacements on a hill four versts to the north-east, and near sunset the pond began to spout with shells bursting. We others lined the trenches, I in one of the middle ones with five others under my lieutenant. With our boots three inches under mud and water we stood there.

“At first the shells fell hundreds of yards short, but it was soon dear that our position had been spied out, and that they were getting the range. I believe that the setting sun shining a little through the drizzle upon our bayonets may have shown us to them; and I have since thought it a childish thing for our soldiers to go about everywhere with bayonets fixed: but the army is so ‘conservative,’ you see! they will not change anything.

“At any rate, in half-an-hour the cannonade had become searching, and I am sure that I never witnessed one so bullying, so solemn, so changeless in its rigour. The bleak nightfall helped to make it seem as if Heaven was angry with us, and was growing louder and louder with threats to overwhelm us. Our end of the plateau and the pond were covered with glare and drifting smoke. The wind was from the south: I did not know if the firing would be heard in camp, or if supports would be sent us. We crouched under the north wall of the trenches, and I felt, though I did not see, that men were being wounded about me.

“It was pretty dark when musketry-fire began upon us from the north. Who were firing, or where they were, I did not know, for I felt awed, and I simply would not lift my head to look out. I doubt if any one else did. Our lieutenant called out his ‘tovs!’ and his ‘pli!’ and we fired, but without much aiming, I am certain. Why the men had not been put to throwing up proper parapets during the day I am not sure, but I think that it was the pond which somehow made us feel safe.

“It lasted a long time, shells bursting with awful nearness to us, and we pouring out a quick fire at we hardly knew what. In the midst of it a stupid thing happened to me, for my section-commander put his hand on my back, and told me to run and report to Captain Avdéitch that ammunition was getting low. It was very disagreeable. I wished to tell him 'you had better go yourself,' but did not; I did not like it though, my blood went chilly. And the fellow made me shout the message after him in the noise of the firing.

"However, I did it. Having climbed out, I ran the gauntlet with a stoop, a distance of perhaps fifty yards, then back. Soon afterwards a man lying on his face above us handed us down a zinc box of cartridges, which were given out. But ten minutes later the enemy's musketry-fire suddenly stopped.

"I wondered, I remember, why this was: it seemed strange.

"It must have been about eight in the night then. I wished that the battle would stop, but the artillery-fire was coming, if anything, hotter. A shell bursting on the edge of the bank over the pond threw a splinter which pitched into my trench, ricocheted, and struck a man named Paul Peresviet. I heard him horribly cry out, and then groan. There were rocks standing out of the grass in all that north part of the plateau, and the shot of all kinds shattered their surface, causing splinters to fly. I longed and prayed for it to be over. I had never been nervous before, but I was now. The darkness seemed to me crowded with terrors.

"Suddenly I heard a most strange sound, Yoshio. It was a good way off, but coming quickly nearer, and what it was I could not guess. It was like hail threshing a lake at first, then it was like cavalry splashing through a marsh, a noise of fretted water, which grew louder, and at last became uproarious.

It was the Japanese coming at the trot through the pond which we had thought too deep to be passable; they had been able to creep up to it in the dark, because our men, hiding their heads from the shell-fire, were none of them looking out.

“It must have been all planned beforehand by the enemy, for as the splashing noise grew upon us, their artillery stopped firing, lest it should hurt its own men.

“I thought to myself: ‘Our position will surely be rushed, and this is my chance, if I do not get killed.’

“We in the trenches were fearfully excited. ‘Fire!’ was the cry, and no doubt we killed some of them; but almost as we fired, the Japanese terribly cheered quite near to us; they had got into dead ground behind the steepish grass-bank over the pond, and they must have scaled its fifteen feet of height at a bound almost. My lieutenant shouted something about ‘charging,’ but there was no time; their terrible fat faces were upon us, they were stabbing with bayonets. I must have been as white as milk; I stood stiff, waiting in terror, my heart in my throat. I can only remember dropping my musket, spreading out my arms, and saying with an unnatural calm in a low voice to a down who wished to pierce me: ‘I yield, I yield.’ I spoke in Russian; it never entered my head that he would not understand, even if he could hear, and only afterwards I laughed when I thought of this.

“He grasped my arm, and dragged me quicker than I could go out of the trench. We two then went a little along the edge of the plateau, then down the bank into the pond, and across it. The water nowhere reached above my knees! Our shins struck upon one dead body. A fearful stillness reigned behind us: the men of my company were being killed, taken prisoners, or flying. The man held my left sleeve, walking at his ease, without saying anything, but muttering to himself anon. He was not much taller than I, but stout and middle-aged.

“We went on over marshy land till we came to a rising path, at the top of which were fir-trees and a bit of broken wall in a lot of bush by the side of the path. On the wall some sort of picket — six or seven men — were sitting. My man took me to them, spoke a few words which caused them to cheer, left me in charge of one of them, and with the same saunter went back the way he had come.

“My new man then led me on, he too holding my sleeve. We went at a holiday walk through dark wooded country, up and down hills of grass. It still drizzled, and no moon nor stars were in the sky.

“It became very tiresome, we went so far, this fellow and I, alone as it were in the world. I longed to lie down and sleep; and I thought sleepily to myself, ‘He would not treat me with so much disdain, if he knew that I am a girl.’

“At last we came to an empty camp behind a mountain, and I was led to a tent before which stood a sentry. I went in. Three men were asleep on the ground, prisoners also. There were some blankets in a corner. I, too, was about to lie down when a face looked in at the tent-door and asked in good Russian if I wanted anything to eat. I said no, though I was hungry, for I wished to sleep at once; and having wrapped myself up cosily, I dreamt all the night of Ivan Shtcherbakoff bringing me boxes of cigarettes.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE PRISONER OF WAR (continued)

“IT HAD BEEN my aim all along to be taken prisoner by the Japanese; and it was in my mind, as soon as I should wake the next morning, to say that I was a girl, and ask to be put upon the finding of my husband.

“But fortune was against this, for at dawn we four prisoners and some others were marched away with a field-hospital wagon under a guard. Before we started I said ‘Yoshio M—’ to three separate men — they were about the only two Japanese words which I knew — but they took little notice of me. I looked anxiously about for the face which had spoken Russian to me during the night, but it was not to be seen, and I did not know how to ask for it.

“The life which now began for me was less trying in many ways. I sometimes felt almost happy; but it was harder now that I was a prisoner to hide my sex, so that oftentimes for hours or a whole day I was ill at ease.

“But I managed it by one trick or another, for I was afraid to let a mob of common soldiers know that a pretty young girl was in their midst, without at the same time being able to let them know who I was, and what I was seeking. It was my bad luck that not one of them whom I tried could understand any Russian or French. I felt, moreover, a foolish shame and shrinking from saying that I was a girl before I should be sure that the person to whom I said it was one who could serve my ends.

“We tramped over many sorts of country in a picnicking fashion, going always toward the south and east. The Japanese were strict with us prisoners, but not unkind, and fed us well. Three separate camps were visited by us, where we took up more guards, prisoners and wounded, so that we were soon quite a mob. At those camps I thought that if I could only say in Japanese the few words: ‘I want an interpreter,’ perhaps that would do my business; but I hesitated to show my sex without being sure of having an interpreter to whom to explain myself, so nothing was done.

“One thing was certain: I was going toward you. I said to myself, ‘There is time; I will wait.’

“Our flock of prisoners grew to the number of some two hundred. One of them told me that four of the outposts of my brigade had been driven in one by one, that our main position had then had to be abandoned, and that the brigade had retired westward under fire in a very large circle with the guns and baggage in the middle, without much loss. I was glad of this.

“We more and more came into country where the Japanese were the masters. Anon I saw columns of them on the march, looking in the mass like a lot of sunburnt Europeans with gumboil and swollen faces. But they are not ugly to my eyes, for I have a liking for them.

“Every townlet became full of them; they were in all the blockhouses, dépôts, and barracks; their supply-carts moved northward along the roads, their prisoners and wounded southward.

“At last we came to the railway in the midst of a barren country, and by it crossed over barren mountains, till we entered upon a part where plains were, with mobs of cattle, camels, and sheep on them. The ground was still stony there, but we soon came to a country where millet grew as far as the eye could reach. It was getting quite warm now, and fruit was brought to the train, wherever it stopped, to be sold; but I had spent all my pay and had no wealth left except my watch and a few trinkets hidden in my pockets, so I could eat the fruit only with my eyes, and I dreamt of cigarettes nearly every night.

“I must finish quickly now, for this has to be sent to you to-morrow.

“We were getting near to Liaoyang when I found out that an old Russian prisoner sitting by me had once been a guard to the Legation in Tokio, and could speak a little Japanese. ‘Here,’ I thought, is my affair done,’ and I at once begged him to ask one of our guard where General M — was, for I thought that you would be with your father. The old fellow did this, and the guards, having asked one another, made up their minds that General M — was in Japan, at Tokio.

“That was such a long way off that my heart sank, and I asked myself how I was to get to you without any money. However, with the old soldier near me I felt my feet on good ground, and said to myself that I would keep him in sight.

“But that very night I lost him, for when the train ran into Liaoyang at ten in the night, one half of us prisoners were taken one way, and the other half another. My half was marched to a sort of castle on a hill, and early the next morning was marched back to the railway for the journey to Talienwan.

“I was glad of this, for I said to myself, ‘Talienwan is near to Japan, and in the military prison there some will certainly understand Russian or French.’ But it was a weary voyage.

“We arrived at last, and were shut up with at least six hundred other prisoners. But I allowed three weeks to pass before I said a word about my sex, though I could have done so now any day that I chose.

“The fact was, I was afraid of taking any too hasty step which might spoil all my hopes, so I hung back and clung to my secret. I was not sure how my story would be taken, whether it would be all believed, whether I might not be sent back to the Russian lines. Moreover, I did not like the look of the governor of the prison, to whom I was made a servant in the second week; and you are about to see that I was right in this.

“I thought of writing to your father, dear, and telling him all, directing my letter to ‘General M — , Tokio,’ if I could get no other address.

But I hesitated. What name could I have given him in my letter? Nadine Devriloff? That would have terribly enraged him! If mine had been any other name of all the names in the world!

But I knew that Devriloff would hardly be pretty to this honoured father of yours. I feared what he might do to poor you and to me, and I hung back from writing to him. Ah, how we are unhappy, mon ami!

“I thought also of writing to you, sending you this note-book, and directing it to ‘Yoshio M — , Tokio.’ But I was not sure that you were with your father there! I thought that it might all fall into your father’s hands, and I wished to be wary. I did not know what to do, and weeks passed. It was then that I began to get thin.

“I had a fairly easy life, meanwhile, in spite of the strictness. The Japanese in the town sent all sorts of presents to the prisoners: meat, saké, fruit, tobacco, and we fared well. One morning when we were drawn up in the courtyard the governor picked me out, and said in a sort of Russian that, as my conduct was so good, he wished me to be his servant. I told him that I could speak French, and thenceforward we spoke in that tongue.

“He was a quite shrivelled old man, the old Kujo, with eyes wide apart, and a rag of beard on his chin. I understood that he had been a great lord at one time. I did not like him. His eyes had some hint of wickedness in them; and they sometimes rested on me in a strange way.

“I do not know why he wished me to be his servant, since there was little for me to do. At any rate, I was now almost free, learnt some Japanese nouns, had cigarettes, and was sent out by the cook to buy things. It was an amusing town, not very Russian, for some of the houses had those curved roofs, and the people were Jews of a special type, with Chinese and some Koreans. That made me laugh, the Koreans! (me faisait rire!) with their tall hats of gauze, too small for their heads, and their pig-tails! They put me in mind of the people of Laputa in Gulliver’s Travels, their air was so solemn and innocent.

“I slept in the Governor’s house at the prison gates. I was a pet of his many Japanese servants, and everything was pleasant. But I could sleep little for the care in my heart, and my cheeks lost most of their redness then.

“One night after three weeks, as I was placing a sort of lacquer stool, with metal pipes on it, at the feet of the old Kujo, he said to me —

“‘I am leaving Talienwan for Japan to morrow night, Alexandrow: I am called home; so your duties by me will honourably end — unless, perhaps, I take you with me.’

“I was startled and glad. We were in a rich little room all alone, the old Kujo sitting on a cushion on the floor, and before I knew what I was doing, I was telling him all.

“‘Monsieur,’ I said, ‘I am not what I seem to you. I am a young girl. For the love of heaven, take me with you to Japan, for I am seeking my husband, Yoshio M — , who is in Japan.’

“The old Kujo knocked the ashes out of his pipe, with his eyes cast down. He showed no surprise; I might have spoken to an image of wood.

“‘Who is your husband?’ said’ he presently.

“‘Yoshio M — , monsieur.’

“‘Not the son of the general?’

“‘Yes, the same!’

“‘But he is a boy, I think?’

“‘He has eighteen years.’

“‘Well, he is a boy. He is not a husband. You should not think of him.’

“‘But — he has eighteen years!’ I cried out, for I did not know what to say. The old Kujo’s eyes remained cast down, and I stood in fear of his next words.

“‘Where were you married?’ he asked next.

“‘In St. Petersburg.’

“‘With or without his father’s august consent?’

“‘Without, I am afraid.’

“‘You see, you see,’ said he, ‘he is a boy; he is not a husband. A pretty young girl like you, you might do better.’

“‘But, monsieur, listen,’ I said: ‘you are addressing yourself to the daughter of a prince, and the wife of a noble. I do not need any advice as to the disposing of my destiny. But since I am without money or any protector, I cast myself upon your pity, and pray you to take me with you to Japan.’

“‘But you are a prisoner of war,’ said he.

“‘No, for I am not a soldier.’

“‘How can you prove to me that you are not a soldier?’

“‘I have said it, monsieur; and you see my smooth face, and the grief of my widowhood in my eyes. Here, moreover, is my watch, such as rich young girls wear; my rings, too; my hands—’

“‘Well, well, I know that you are a girl,’ he said. ‘Well, well, all you have to do is to put yourself completely into my hands, and you will find in me a father.’

“‘I bowed before him, but my heart was ill at ease.

“He then began to ask about my father, my marriage, my life in the army; anon he glanced up aside at me, but his eyelids at once dropped again, hiding the unsearchable thoughts behind them. He said that he would take me with him to Japan.

“The next evening, accordingly, we left Talienwan in a large steamer. The old Kujo wished me to put on woman’s clothes, but I thought to myself ‘Not yet,’ and I would not. I was in the old top-boots, blood-stained sheepskin, and greatcoat, my bandolier still full of cartridges. I wished you to see me in that costume, to hear what you would say! Fancy if I set out with a wild heart! for I felt that I was about to meet you. The sea seemed to me a high road to the islands of the blessed.

“But I was soon in trouble of mind again. The old Kujo would have me be a cabin-passenger, though I did not wish this, because of my dress. As the voyage went on, he would not let me be, but wished to make me presents of curios, and to play with my hands and cheeks. This filled me with fear, I was so utterly in his power. One night he became furious with me, as I could tell by his laugh. I was as little maidenly as I could be after that, pretending to like him; but my mind was made up as to what I should do the moment we came to land, for I believed that he meant to shut me up in some castle, and keep me there always for himself.

“We went on through the sea for two nights and two days. On the third evening the ship stopped at a town called Shimonoseki, and it was strange to sleep aboard her that night in harbour, for she seemed to be suddenly dead. The next morning we went on up the Inland Sea to Hiroshima, where we stopped again, and going on thence we came at about eleven in the night to Kobe, where we landed. It was the 29th of May.

“The old Kujo had with him seven servants, male and female, in whom I had lately noticed a change of manner toward me; they must, in fact, have been puzzled by the lordly treatment given me, and were perhaps jealous. At any rate, I saw that in what I was about to do I ought not to look for help from any of them.

“It was quite a business after landing to set off with the baggage and all. The night was drizzly, and we had to make a journey of eight ri (fifteen miles) to a country-house. The women went in rikshas, the men on foot, some carrying burdens slung on bamboos; the old Kujo went in the sort of closed palanquin which you call a norimono. Two of these norimonos were awaiting our landing, and the old man would have me get into the second. I did so, and the fussy party set off. My heart was beating fast in my bosom.

“We passed into the country, up and down mountains, through wonderful scenes of leafage, streams, crags, hamlets, and temples. Sometimes the moon whitened the clouds a moment, and I could not tell you, I seemed to myself to be dreaming, all was so enchanted that dark night. Japan smelled as sweet as a nosegay whose passion one draws up into the nostrils, but cannot get enough, and one draws it up till one is faint.

“But I was cold with fear, for I was not sure if I would be able to do what I had in my mind, or if, having done it, it would end well; whereas, if I did not do it, I was sure that the old Kujo would be the death of me. Happily, his norimono was before mine, and this gave me my chance, for, at a narrow path where it was very dark with wood on either hand, I stopped my bearers quietly, pretending to have a reason for getting out; I went into the wood to the left, and the moment I was ten yards from them I took to my heels.

“I ran farther and faster that night than I have ever run, or thought that I could — up hill and down hill. I only stopped when I had to, and then ran again. That old man seemed to me, and still seems, to be the devil. I believe that he always knew that I am a girl.

“Think, dear, of my situation that night! I had thrown myself utterly upon God, without any hope, but in Him, being a young girl lost at midnight in the country parts of a land whose language I could not speak. I fell upon my knees in a forest and shed tears before my Maker.

“Before morning I had passed through two villages, but I was afraid to knock at any of the houses lest Kujo might hear of it, and have me. At last, toward daybreak, I came to a flight of steps in a grove, and since I could not stand any more I sat on the top of them, leant my head on a pillar, and fell asleep.

“A man was standing over me when I awoke, as the sun rose. The steps on which I sat led up to the forecourt of a temple, and he was the priest of this temple; his name was Suyematsu, a middle-aged man, with a smiling face. He showed no wonder to see a Russian soldier there, and spoke gently to me. I gave him to know that I could not speak Japanese. He then took me by the arm and led me through the temple-courts, and down a flight of steps to a paper house in a forest behind, where his wife, his two daughters, an infant son, and a grandmother gathered round and spoke of me. The infant’s name is Yoshio!

“I am quick in picking up a language, for I learn it with my eyes and instincts, as well as my ears, I think; so I could already gather something of the mood of what was said, and I understood at once that these people were as kind as angels.

“The little Ohana (thirteen years), the little Oyone (fifteen years), and the little Yoshio, who lives on the back of Oyone, stared at me with their pretty cat’s-eyes; Oyouki (the grandmother) brought me tea and cakes; then Suyematsu and Oyei, his wife, took off my greatcoat, my boots, and seated me on the matting; whatever they did to or for me, they bowed down their heads to the ground before me. For this and for much more I call upon my husband to shower rewards some day upon Suyematsu, the priest, and Oyei, though they do not wish for any reward.

“I got them to understand that no one was to know that I was there, for I feared the old Kujo. But this was needless, for I have been with them nearly three months; the whole village has known it: and I have heard nothing more of Kujo.

“Within three days I was one of the priestly family.... That made me laugh when I understood that Suyematsu was a priest! He is more like a fisherman.... But Japan is as secular as Russia is clerical, and in all ways they are just opposites: so this is why they are at war, and this may be why you and I love each other so much.

“Oh, I should have spent three happy months in this place but for my care! On the third day I wrote to you in these words: ‘Yoshio, I am here at the village of Oyosaka, twelve ri from Kobe, in the house of Suyematsu, the bonze. I am in great danger, and without any money to come to you. — Nadine.’ This was written with the same gold pencil which I have used always, and so was the address: ‘To Yoshio, the son of General M — , Tokio.’ I understood that, the writing not being in Japanese letters, there might well be some delay in its coming to your hand, but I was sure that it would come, if you were there; and Suyematsu, who took it to post, agreed with me in this. But when weeks passed and no answer came, nor was the letter returned to me, I did not know what to think, and the good Oyei would often point at my cheeks with reproach, for I got thinner with longing for you, and many of my nights were spent in weeping. But everything else has joined together to make me happy! I love the little Ohana and Oyone as my sisters; I love the house, whose old woodwork has a scent like cedar, and gives out a sound like viols or conch-shells when the breezes of the forest hum through its vacant rooms; and I love Suyematsu and Oyei and Yoshio, and the grandmother, who is as little and ugly as a large monkey, yet the rest of them spend their lives in bowing themselves down before her, so that she is a greater queen than Catherine of Russia.

“The old Oyouki keeps a sort of tea-house or chaya, not much bigger than a hut, on the road through the forest. She rises before dawn to pray at the family altar, which is the only thing rich in the house, for it has lacquer, and gilt, and lanterns on it; then she may take me with her through the forest to the chaya in the very early morning, and perhaps Ohana and Oyone come too, with Yoshio bound to Oyone’s back. Oyouki keeps her eyebrows shaved and her teeth coated with a black lacquer, while the little Yoshio is not a child, but only a doll, turned out in a mood of fond mockery, with his antic costume, and his head tonsured in rings; this gives to the fat fellow that touch of buffoonery which all the village-mothers purposely give to the infants, so that one’s cheeks puff out with laughter to see them. How foreign and far from me all is! And yet not so foreign, for, going with Ohana and Oyone at dawn through that forest of strange old trees, with large butterflies flying among the fern, it has twice happened to me, Yoshio, that a feeling of memory struck through my soul like a flash of lightning, and I seemed to have known it all before. Yes; it was gone in a moment, but it left behind it such a pain! a longing which could never be told, a sense of the world, and of old time, and of eternity. Was not this strange?

“At the chaya they keep tea to sell, with peppermint cakes, millet-cakes, and pastèques of pale colours in a pool; for a fountain which bubbles out of a vase of bamboo makes a pool, in whose clear water eggs, pastèques, and fruit are kept cool. But hardly any one passes there, so that the profits can never be more than a few rin (farthings) each week, and oftentimes the chaya has been left to itself, since I who was in charge would go down through the village with Oyone and Ohana to the beach, perhaps to wash my shirt while they bathed, for in their goodness of heart they do not mind being naked before me; or else we have played together round an idol of granite grown shapeless with age in the heart of the forest; or we have played in the courts of the closed temple, for it is only opened on certain days of the year, though one can spy gilt gods in the gloom within sitting on seats of red lacquer, and in the courts, too, are rows of stone gods with faces which wish to frighten one.

“AU is very decayed and forlorn in there; the courts are rank with bush; only some prayers on rice-paper left before the gods show that any one has come to it for ages; and oftentimes I have spent hours alone in those courts, weeping, and feeling things which words could not tell. All the hot day hosts of grasshoppers shrill there; many grey crabs live in the crevices; and late at night the air about it has a glimmer of its own from the fireflies and glow-worms which swarm in the courts.

“When I am not idle I have a trade, for, by watching the doers of girls’ hair, I soon got the trick of this, so that every one has wondered, not knowing that I am a girl and born to the knack! It takes two hours to do one head, and I am thought to add a coquetry all my own to the art, so that many girls have come to me at the chaya and elsewhere. Oyone and Ohana have theirs done once a week only, for the shining mass is not rumpled at night, since they sleep with their necks in a hollow block, and nothing under their heads. That has made me laugh, the way they sleep! on pads not large enough for a child, with night-lights, and Oyone’s long-handled guitar beside her. Yes, they have amused my sadness, these little people, with their little graces, their little hands: everything is in a mood of such droll coquetry! Suyematsu has a garden of dwarf-trees no larger than a table, with mountains and waterfalls in it! No one thinks of walking over the white matting in boots; the woodwork is scrubbed till it seems fresh cut from the forest; the ware is for fairies to eat from. Sometimes they are just like dolls bowing and bowing by clockwork — their little stoop must be owing to this bowing! but at play they tuck up their long sleeves, and are as noisy as birds.

“How I ought to have been happy in this haven after my voyage and the horrors of war! In some parts the country looks as if heaven had meant to destroy it under snow, but by a fond whim had changed the snow-fall into white and pink blossoms; but in our forest it is not so, for there the trees are huge camphor-trees and cedar-trees, and the leafage is black and heavy.

“One night was a night of fête, and the girls trooped up out of the village into the forest with lanterns at the end of lissom bamboos, all in their sea-blue robes and their sashes, all flustered, hurried, full of little laughs and bowings; they then set to search for something on the ground, I did not know what, I was too sad to ask; and leaving the crowd there, I walked home with a sob in my throat.

“No one was in the house but Oyei; she was spinning silk. Something made me throw myself at her feet then, my sobs broke out, and when I could speak I told her all: how that I was a girl, and about the army, and the old Kujo, and how I was seeking for you.

“They had asked me nothing about my history, for even the young girls have wonderful delicacies of feeling; they had waited, perhaps expecting me to speak when I should have picked up the language: and I was now able to make myself understood.

“Oyei said hardly anything. I thought that she took my tale coolly. She went on spinning, without asking any questions. When I had finished she advised me to go to bed.

“The next noon, on returning home from the chaya, I found that Suyematsu was no longer to be seen. In the evening I asked what had become of him, and was told by Oyei that he had gone inland — she did not say what for. It was only on the fifth evening, when he returned, that I understood that that poor woman had sent her husband by the train all the way to Tokio, in order that he might find out where you were. I flew to their bosoms and kissed them with passion.

“We three being alone, I was given to know that you were not in Tokio, not in Japan. Your father had been in Tokio for a short time three months before; but he and you also were now in Pekin, where, it was said, your father had become one of the head men.

“I did not know how I was to go to you: for no one in Oyosaka is half rich enough to buy my watch and trinkets, even if that would pay for my passage. Suyematsu thought that the note which I had written to you at Tokio may have been forwarded to Pekin, that you must have got it by this time, and would come to me. He advised me to write another note to Pekin, and then await you where I am. But I felt that your father would not let you come across the sea to me.

“‘Be of good cheer,’ said Oyei often to me, smiling with tears in her eyes, when she looked at my faded cheek; ‘he will come to you.’ But I fell into a weariness which could not hope.

“When they saw that I no longer ate, on the third day Suyematsu came to me in the inner court of the temple, where I was lying out of the heat in a shade of bushes, and he said: ‘Since it is so with you, I will tell you what I have to say. Do you wish to leave us, and go back to the continent?’

“I sat up, saying ‘Yes.’

“‘Then it can be done,’ said he, ‘for when I was in Tokio I saw my honourable brother, Kotohito, to whom I told all, inasmuch as he has been a quartermaster-sergeant in the army, and now holds an august clerkship in the department of military things. It happens that in ten days’ time a company of prisoners are to be sent back to the Russians in exchange, and if you still honourably wish to keep up the pretence of being a soldier, Kotohito can manage that you shall be sent back among them: for he will bring the old Kujo to book for his dishonest meanings toward you, and get from him the papers that are needed for you to sail.'

"In the minute that he spoke all my sorrow was gone — I had leapt up, was hugging him, and ready to dance: for I am like that, I suppose, too ready to rush on a sudden into heats of hope or despair; and all this week I have been ashamed of my gladness, since the rest are so sad at my going.

"That very day Suyematsu wrote to his brother, and four days later we received from Tokio the papers which will admit me into the company of released prisoners.

"Suyematsu and I depart in three days' time for Kobe and the barracks there: for it is at Kobe that the prisoners are to be shipped. I hear that there will be a large number of us, for the prisons in Japan have been crowded. The name of our ship is the Shini Maru; she will land us at Newchwang, whence the prisoners will be carried north by train to the Russian lines; but at Newchwang you will meet me, since it is not too far from Peking, and, having there declared my sex, we shall thenceforth be always together. This little book will be posted to you this afternoon, directed to 'The Imperial City, Peking'; the mail to Peking leaves to-morrow, three days before I leave, so that you will have plenty of time, after reading this outline of what has befallen me, to come to Newchwang to meet me.

"Au revoir, then! I am very excited, but not now as happy as I thought that I should be: I do not know why. I feel a remorse for not having been happier here during these almost three months: for God guided me into this haven of peace, and I ought to have hoped and been happy, but I would not; and perhaps I shall never be given another chance to be happy. Who knows?

The world is strange. The maples are all in scarlet and gold, for Autumn is near, or is come....”

CHAPTER XIX

PASSING SHIPS

THAT BEING THE end of Nadine's narrative, the compiler is now forced to carry on her history in his own words as best he can.

As to the boy, Yoshio, we know from his own story how he had been shovelled into the Japanese army by his father, how he had been wounded at the battle of the Fanchu Bridge, how he had been taken to the hospital at Irkutsk. In an exchange of prisoners he had been sent from Irkutsk to Japan, where he had been received by his father, and from Japan had been taken back to China, where his father now mostly lived, having accepted very high rank in the Court of Peking.

It was the father's fixed will that Yoshio should become a man of war, though the good Yoshio, as we know, was rather made for playing on the koto and samisen, and for painting large coiffures with two sweeps of the brush. Therefore, the father and son had no sooner come to Peking than the son was sent to fill the post of sub-lieutenant in the Chinese army in a little country-place called Fengyun in Chih-li, on the understanding that this was only meant as a rest for him after his hardships in war, and as a training also, since his father intended to find him a place as a sub-lieutenant in the fighting force of Japan.

At Fengyun Yoshio passed two months, during which he wrote several letters to Nadine by the ordinary Chinese post to Russia. These, of course, she did not get, since she was no longer in Russia.

His life in Fengyun was dull enough, being passed in a sort of exile in the company of officers with whom he had nothing in common; but what he saw going on around him ever afresh aroused his astonishment, for some busy spirit seemed to be abroad in that remote little place, making everything new.

In an alley of Fengyun a brick house had lately been run up, which all the day was besieged with people flocking in from the country. It was a recruiting dépôt, and at first Yoshio wondered at this eagerness of simple peasants to become soldiers; but he soon understood that they came because they had to: for they were conscripts. On the faces of all of them was imprinted a look of foolish wonder.

Outside Fengyun also two great buildings had been run up, one of them being a barrack and dépôt for artillery and transport, the other a dépôt for grain, forage, clothing, camp-equipment and mules. Both were quite new, not yet finished. If Yoshio took a ride twenty miles in any direction he came upon others like them.

In the barracks he had two rooms of his own where he moped his time away, with little to do. In the mornings he had to be at drill with his lieutenant, a young Chinaman, but what he saw at drill here was so unlike what he was used to, that it made him laugh sometimes, everything was on so overgrown and gawky a scale: a squad was not made of four or six men, but of forty, and what they called a company here was more like a regiment. Some of the men were armed with old matchlocks instead of rifles, and many had not as yet any uniforms, so that they made a strange-looking crew.

One day a great man passed that way, a general with his staff, who, to Yoshio's surprise, turned out to be nearly all Japanese. Yoshio learned that he was the general commanding the army-corps of that "region," and that he was only one of six who commanded in Chih-li, since Chih-li had been divided into six "regions," in which six army-corps of a million men each were to be set on foot, each with its own vast corps-cavalry-brigade.

This was told to Yoshio by one of the general's staff at dinner. The lad stared when he heard of an army-corps of a million human beings.

"But is all this done?" he asked.

"It is proposed," was the answer.

"But is such a thing to take place all over China?" he next asked.

"Sooner or later it may be so," answered the officer.

Three days after this Yoshio saw a wretched man beheaded in the market of Fengyun amid the excitement of the whole district, many as it were casting dust to heaven at the thing which their eyes saw, and a howl of dismay rose from the crowd as the chopper struck the neck of the man, who alone remained calm. He was a mandarin, and had been brought to the block in a palanquin surrounded by servants in robes of silk: but he had robbed the people; and on his condemnation-writ, which was nailed up on a pole, Yoshio saw the signature of his father.

The people were being more heavily taxed than ever, but by new sorts of officials; they were being drilled and called upon in many ways; a strange awakening and unrest was, therefore, everywhere to be seen. In all this Yoshio took a very absent kind of interest, for his thoughts were with his young wife far away, as he thought, in Russia. But she was really in Japan, and his astonishment may be imagined when, after nearly two months of that dull life in Fengyun, on July 14, he received from Nadine a note in these words: "Yoshio, I am here in the village of Oyosaka, twelve ri from Kobe, in the house of Suyematsu, the bonze. I am in great danger, and without any money to come to you. Nadine." She had sent it to him at Tokio, it had then come to Peking to his father, who, without opening it, had now sent it on to him at Fengyun.

The letter had taken a month and a half to reach him, the chief reason being the slowness of the country-post in China; but as it had no date on it, he did not know this.

At any rate, Nadine was in Japan! For a long time the young man's brain could not find room in it for this fact. How she had got there, why she was "in danger" (she meant danger from the old Kujo) and why "without money," was far beyond his guessing. What he was to do now he did not know; there was no telegraph at Fengyun, nor was there any, he supposed, at Oyosaka: and he was bound to his post, such as it was. It took his tortured mind two days to make itself up that he must shut his eyes to everything, and fly to Japan.

He was about to do this, when he received a letter by special camel-carrier, ordering him to come at once to Peking, since his father wished him to take a voyage — to Japan!

Here was the very thing which Yoshio wanted, sent him in the nick of time by no other than Bentem Sana of all Mercy, as it seemed. He made haste to set off to Peking with a couple of servants without writing to Nadine, since he felt that he would now be at her side long before any letter carried by the drowsy Chinese post could reach her.

He went by mule till he came to the railway, and after a week's journey arrived on the evening of July 24 in the Imperial City. But it was not till midnight that he saw his father, who then hurriedly entered the room of the palace where Yoshio was awaiting him. The baron gave his son a warm greeting; he had heard good accounts of Yoshio's conduct under fire, and was now pleased with him. His love for his son was silent, but very deep.

"Have you yet seen either Mr. England or Mr. Petersen?" was one of the father's first questions.

"No, father," answered Yoshio.

“They are about to sail, and have promised me to rouse you to go with them to-morrow before sunrise. They have chartered a Chinese steamer called the Taku, which now lies on the Peiho, ready to depart.”

“What are they going to sail for, father?”

“In order to watch a small naval action which is about to take place, and which I wish you, too, to see.”

“But — I thought that I was going to Japan!” exclaimed Yoshio with terror.

“Yes; after seeing the battle, Messrs. England and Petersen will go on to Japan for a week, during which time you will have several small businesses to transact for me in Tokio, and will receive your commission as a sub-lieutenant in your old company. This done, you will return by mail-steamer to Newchwang, whence you will go on to the front.”

“But this naval battle that we are to watch, is it quite sure to take place at once, father?” asked Yoshio.

“It seems so. Why?”

“Nothing, father,” answered Yoshio.

The father and son spoke on till the darkest hour of the morning, when they were joined by Messrs. England and Petersen. Yoshio was rather silent; his eyes dwelt gloomily upon a marble bridge and a moat strewn with the white and orange blossoms of azalea; his young heart, to which hope was so natural, had learned already to mistrust the future.

“What ships are these that are about to fight?” he asked Mr. Petersen.

“The only two big ones left of the Russians out here,” answered Mr. Petersen. “They are from Vladivostok, and have been skulking among rock-islands for weeks, but have been driven to sea through lack of provisions, I suppose, and have lately been seen off Fusan.”

“But whence have they got coal?” asked Yoshio. “Perhaps from coal-ships that have run the loose patrolling of the Yellow Sea; one is not even sure that they have coal.”

Yoshio had no need to be roused in the morning, for, though he lay down for a nap, he was the prey of the several fevers of eagerness to set out, of wonder that Nadine should be near him, of thankfulness to her for having come so far to him. At one moment he felt himself a king, since he was so loved by his beloved; at another he doubted whether he was not dreaming; at another shivered at the thin threads upon which his and her destiny hung. Near peep of day he, with Messrs. England and Petersen, was leaving Peking behind him for Tientsin; by noon they were on their ship — a coasting-steamer of 3,000 tons, called the Taku.

It was known that the Japanese ships told off to catch the Russians were off Wei-hei-wei, and thither Messrs. England and Petersen made, coming up with the Japanese within four days to the southwest of Korea: and now it was a question of cruising for the enemy.

It had been taken for granted that a battle was on the point of happening, since the Russians were in want of one thing or another, and were believed to be seeking a battle before they should be captured: but there was some hitch, for, from the day when they had been seen off Fusan, they were no more seen for over a month.

Each day, meantime, they were looked out for; hope was kept on the stretch by sea-rumours; the searching ships twice coaled and provisioned from store-ships and colliers, and the search spread all round the coasts of Korea, and among the islands where the Russians might possibly have found a lurking-place.

It will be guessed whether in such a case the heart of the poor Yoshio ate into itself! Here was no flight possible to him: he was a prisoner on the sea.

He saw in fancy Nadine's eyes grow weary with watching, and his own, too, grew weary. Several times he was on the point of casting himself at the feet of Mr. England and craving his pity, but he was always kept back by the old awe of his father, and by that instinct for keeping things dark inborn in Orientals.—'

He would sit silent through the hot days and starlit evenings, hearing without hearing the talk of Messrs. England and Petersen, who sat on their cane lounges in flannels, wearing those umbrella-hats which one sees on the heads of the Japanese rice-growers; anon Yoshio's eyes would bend a look upon Mr. England as if he were about to speak, but would soon become dull and weary again.

It grew on toward the time of the autumn typhoons, but still the dead weather which they had had, with hardly an hour's rain, remained unbroken. Yoshio asked himself if this was never to have any end: he seemed to be bewitched and in chains.

At last one hot morning, the 3rd of August, there arose an event. The three friends were sitting in the cool of the awning, the Taku barely moving through the water, with one of the cruisers three cable-lengths on her starboard beam, and two others six knots away on the horizon eastward. The sea was as pale as a dead thing, and the air like its dead breath. The near cruiser looked like a block of iron stuck without any motion in the water, though a little foam spued from time to time round her ram. Her colours had been saluted; a strain of band-music floated over the water from her anon.

Mr. England, looking rosy and fresh (having been causing himself to be dashed with buckets of the warm sea-water), was saying to Mr. Petersen: "Personally, I am no believer in sea-power, though that is an unorthodox view for an Englishman." Whereupon Mr. Petersen asked him: "How is that, then?" To which Mr. England replied: "Because the modern warship is so very powerful in attack and so weak in defence. Look at that thing, how strong she looks: but she's rather a sham, for one fourteen-inch shell may end her. Therefore I always say that any one battleship is a match for any three. At six thousand yards' range, indeed, three English ships are three times better than one German, or even four times better; but suppose the German is gallant and comes within three hundred yards, pouring out forty thousand rounds of shot during the ten minutes that she keeps afloat? Then, the result of that fight should be that all the four disappear: and where's your sea-power then? In this war there has hardly been any such fighting, so one can't be sure; but if I am right, Britain should be in a close alliance with some army-power: it can't be with Germany on account of race-hatred, therefore it should be with France."

Mr. Petersen was about to reply, when the captain of the Taku, an Englishman, came up with his glass in his hand, saying —

"I see, gentlemen, that one of the scouts has come in, and is signalling."

Yoshio at once leapt up in great excitement, for though such alarms had often ended in nothing, his young heart was still quick to hope. Moreover, we know with what excitement even the smallest happenings are taken by those who have long been cooped up in a ship. The others, too, leapt up; and soon a glass was at everybody's eyes. The scout, a swift destroyer, steamed up to within a thousand yards, exchanging signals with the cruiser near, on board of which a trumpeting was now heard, while her sailors, looking very like British blue-jackets with gumboil, began to swarm over her. Fires had been kept banked, and from all the ships smokes were soon pouring over the sea. The Taku, too, quickened her step, swung round six points to starboard, and a chase towards the southeast began.

It seemed certain now that things must be coming to a head, and every one was elated. On the Naniwa, the cruiser near the Taku, many of the steps which are taken before a battle were seen to be going forward: the captain and his staff were on the bridge, spyglasses were the order of the day, torpedo-nets were being got ready; the ships ahead grew every minute bigger to the eye, for they waited for the stragglers; and Yoshio and his two friends grudged the time spent at lunch, lest something should happen meantime, and escape their eyes.

When they again came up, the Naniwa had quite a stripped look; her commander was pacing the after part of the forecastle deck before his conning-tower, round which a mass of hammocks had now been stacked; davits and cowls had disappeared, boats had been filled with water, and the decks, too, drenched, so that they might not catch fire. Much overhauling of this and of that, moreover, was still going on, testing of torpedo-tubes, of gun-circuits, hoisting of shells. But it was all a haste in vain: for though yonder lay nearly all the ships of the squadron within sight, and the afternoon sun blazed lower and lower, still no enemy was to be seen. By four p.m. Yoshio's high spirits had died down, gloom again filled his mind, and he thought to himself: "There is never going to be any battle, till Nadine and I, too, get sick with waiting."

However, the commodore of the ships had out a chain of three torpedo-boats scouting towards the south-east, and near three bells of the first dogwatch one of these must have come in, for a still more earnest activity than in the morning now broke out among the ships' crews: things that might catch fire were thrown overboard, coal was stacked round funnels, screens round Maxims, guns cast loose: and half-an-hour or more before the sun touched the sea yellow hulls of Russian ships could be made out by the glasses eastward.

It was not strange if Yoshio's heart now beat wildly, for he knew that the moment the battle ended the Taku would start straight for Japan, where he would hasten to Kobe and to the house of Suyematsu, the priest, to find Nadine. Nor was his the only wild heart there, for every heart beat wildly, there was something so shocking in the thought of the fine, whole ships going forward to be outraged by, and to outrage, other ships. They had all hoisted their colours, with some extra colours on masts and stays, and they hastened under forced draught to the battle before the night should come.

Even Mr. England, whose small mouth usually found a great deal to say, was silent now; even the faces of the Chinese crew of the Taku were pale: for war as a rumour is one thing, but when the moment comes the mind can hardly believe that such a sight is really about to be seen by one's own eyes; and on the lonely mid-sea where God alone broods it is even more far-fetched a thing than on land.

The setting sun now made a track on the water, and looked through bars of orange and rose on the sky in that sad mood in which the days of autumn draw toward their end. All the ships were well ready by now for their ruthless work: gun-rooms had been turned into extra sick-bays to receive the wounded; chief-engineers were down in the regions of fire near the bottoms, seeing to their steam-power and bunkers; gun-crews and lieutenants were in their places; tops were manned. The Russians no longer looked like toy-ships, but like growing powers which wished, since they must perish, to leave a memory behind them. A breeze breathed over the sea and died away without making any sound; the ships bows passed through reaches of seaweed such as teem over the Yellow Sea; a fearful silence reigned. Mr. England, with the glass at his eyes, murmured to Mr. Petersen: "This is the evening of a Christian Sabbath."

Very soon after this the sound of a gun was heard five or six miles away; at the same time the captain of the Taku hurried up to Mr. England, saying, "Are we not now getting too near for safety, sir?" To which Mr. England answered: "Give us one half-knot nearer, and then stop, with our stern to the fight." In the moment in which he said this firing broke out on a large scale, and every one began to be struck by air-waves which caused a feeling of unease in the ear-drum. The Taku, then about four miles behind the hindermost of the Japanese, went on another half-knot, and swung round; Messrs. England and Petersen, with Yoshio and the ship's officers, knelt or leaned round the poop and stern-taffrails with glasses at their eyes, while the crew looked over the bows. By this time the air was in so severe a state of shock at the firing as if the world had been cast into a boiling pot, and was bubbling fast and bumping, so that the ear chirped at the hubbub of it.

At about the same time that the Taku stopped on the western outskirts of the battle, another ocean-steamer, coming from Japan, also stopped on the southern outskirts of it, about six miles from the Taku. She was a boat of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha fleet of steamers, and her name was the Skint Maru; she was taking some hundreds of exchanged Russian prisoners from Kobe to Newchwang, to be sent on thence to the Russian lines; and these prisoners, too, with her crew, leant over her bulwarks and watched the battle. She and the Taku were just in sight, if any one on either had looked towards the other, but all minds on each were taken up only with the drama of thunder that was taking place before them over the waters.

Few details, however, could be made out by the two steamers: the warships covered themselves in a mist from their hot guns; mists were seen passing through mist over the sea, like ghosts gliding in haste through the land of shadows; there were curtains of mist, smeared with rosy spots and glares, which lingered two, three minutes before they thinned; the twilight, moreover, was deepening. But the battle could be clearly smelled from afar, and the ear seemed loaded with all the weight of the jabbering quick-firers. It was clear, too, that the fighting was at fearfully close quarters. There were twelve Japanese with a weight of 33,000 tons, and seven Russians with a weight of 15,000, seven only of the nineteen being of second-class size, and the rest third-class cruisers, sloops, gun-boats and the like; and the whole did not seem to cover an area of sea more than seven or eight thousand yards across, so that soon through the stagnant mists leaning masts were spied, and hulls that went lame and humped; water-spouts shot on high, and dropped back showering wreckage over the sea; two of the Russians came within 2,000 yards of the Taku, firing stern-guns, then turned and recharged; fires ran through ships, touched their stores of ammunition, and were seen to quiver a moment like sheet-lightning towards the sky. One boatload of sailors, spied by Mr. Petersen, was struck by a shell, and had disappeared by the time the splutter of flame was over. When the shades of evening had well fallen, and the smoke thinned, only two craft were any longer to be seen, both Japanese, one of them being that same Naniwa which had lain close to the Taku that morning with her band playing; she could not move, for her screws, funnels, and steering-gear were gone; both of her big guns had been struck on the chase; a hole was in her bow: and she was sinking. The other, a composite gun-vessel, could move, but could not long keep steam, since water was rising in her stokeholds; a hole had been torn in her forward bulkhead, all her port battery had been unshipped, and she, too, was sinking. Both were signalling to the Taku and to the Shini Maru.

The steamers, therefore, having hurried up to the two warships, stopped within fifty yards of each other, and got out their boats. On board one of them was Yoshio, and on board of the other was Nadine, both looking over the sea, but looking only at the wrecked ships, at the coming and going of the boats, and at the horribly wounded men. Yoshio's glass would very likely have been able to make out Nadine's face among the row of faces that lined the larger steamer, if he had spied that way before the day quite darkened; but he did not do this. As for her, she had no glass; her face was pale at what she had witnessed; her eyes were fixed upon the boats.

It was a slow work: the moon rose up in the sky, the day had slowly changed into night.

The Shini Maru could not take in many more men besides her cargo of prisoners, so most of the hundred and fifty on board the two warships had to be brought to the Taku. The — was looked to first, for she was in worse plight, and caused a shout to arise from the soldiers on the Shini Maru when she dipped and sank a minute after the last of her crew had been taken off. It was then the turn of the gun-vessel, which had no boat of her own that could any longer float; her wounded were brought to the Taku, but the Shini Maru still lingered on, till the work should be over. Messrs. England and Petersen and Yoshio wished to watch the coming of the wounded, but very soon could no longer bear it, for on the faces of those sailors was a stare of scare and wonder, as of men who have been through that which the heart cannot conceive.

The three friends, therefore, went and sat on the poop, and there was a long silence between them, till presently Mr. England said: "Well, how do you feel?"

"It has boxed me on the ears," answered Mr. Petersen; "the world seems full of grasshoppers, and I think they mean to keep on screaming at me till I die, too. Can you hear me talk?"

"Yes, I hear everything," said Mr. England, "but I hear through the grasshoppers; there is a whole orchestra inside my head."

"Well, it has turned out as you prophesied," remarked Petersen presently.

“Something like. But ah, those men’s faces...”

“Here ends Russia on the sea in Asia, England.”

“Here begins to end the white man both on sea and on land in Asia,” answered Mr. England. “They say that great events take place at the beginning of centuries. I wonder how many people in Europe realize how much bigger a matter this war is than the French Revolution?”

“White men have it on the brain, you see,” said Mr. Petersen, “that it is the white man that matters. It would be such an upset in their way of thinking to see otherwise—”

“But how foolish it is!” exclaimed Mr. England.

“since it is so easy to see that China alone is half the world. Man lives in Asia and Africa, and the white races are there to modify Man; but they are not Man. They are the bitters in gin-and-bitters: the gin and the water’s the thing.”

“It is the greatest lark, if that is really so!” cried Mr. Petersen. “I wonder what it will all end in!”

“Intermarriage, no doubt,” said Mr. England. “Remember, Petersen, that Man is not a white animal: white men are a freak, like white mice, or white horses, and will soon disappear. I have heard M — make the same remark, and Schopenhauer, too, you remember, makes it: that is why, says Schopenhauer, a fair woman likes dark men, because she has an instinct to return, in her offspring, to the original dark type of the race; but dark women have no corresponding impulse to marry fair men: in fact, often shrink from them. We fair types are a temporary accident, only human by courtesy. So I look forward three hundred years to one universal race, highly evolved, of a flushed brown as clear as the ruby, with melting almond eyes, and a thick little coral mouth, with little pearls for teeth.”

“The yellow race will have to be highly ascendant first, though, before any such intermarriage could take place,” said Mr. Petersen.

“But we see that ascendancy beginning,” answered Mr. England; “and remember that it will be accompanied by a Socialism proclaimed in thunder by Japan to the whole world, which may still farther tend toward intermarriage. The ascendancy and the socialism are even at hand: China is drilling away, and I have lately heard M — use words which, if they mean anything, mean a European war within some months: for whatever Japan may intend, M — , I am convinced, intends for her nothing less than Asia, plus Russia in Europe.”

So the talk went on, but of it Yoshio heard not a word, his mind was so filled with eagerness to see the Taku start away toward Japan. He sat on the edge of his lounge, with one fist clutched, and a fixed dream in his eyes. The shuffling of feet, the loud breaths of the stretcher-bearers going down the companion-way with lanterns, the groans and screams, the stream of talk between Messrs. England and Petersen, the orders that were being called out, the sough of steam in the ship’s funnels, all passed before Yoshio as a scene of little interest: his soul was taken up with but one care, namely, that though he was about to see Nadine, miles of sea had first to be passed over. It became eight o’clock; the two steamers were showing each their three lights; the gun-vessel was low in the water now, and looked a sad wreck in the moonlight; on the Shini Maru the prisoners had been given a meal, and were again looking on over the ship’s side.

At last all of the warships’ sailors were in the two steamers. The gun-vessel had not yet sunk, but the steamers made ready to go their ways; their boats were taken in; their throttle-valves shouted. The Shini Maru moved first, steamed through a sixteen-point curve, and began to run westward under the Taku’s stern.

Nadine was bending over her starboard beam, looking down partly at the rush of the water and partly at the Taku, which she was approaching; but at the moment when the Shini Maru passed close under the Taku's stern, the young girl in soldier's dress sprang up straight and became pale, holding her face upward like one sniffing at, or trying to inhale, some scent in the air; she did not seem at first to be certain that she scented it, but presently certainty seemed to strike her, whereupon she uttered a sob, and ran and caught hold of a sleeve of one of the soldiers near her in a frightened way. By that time the Shini Maru was a good distance to the west of the, for the Taku, too, had swung round, and was running eastward. In seven minutes the lights of the two ships had vanished from each other, though each could still spy the wreck of the gun-vessel, waiting in the moonlight to go down to her vast grave.

CHAPTER XX

THE RENDEZVOUS

YOSHIO ARRIVED IN Tokio two nights after the sea-fight, and by noon of the next day was en route for Kobe; but on getting out of the train at Kobe, great was his surprise and annoyance to see Mr. Petersen getting out also.

The fact was that Yoshio's father wished to keep him in leading-strings longer than was meet, as men of masterful minds are too apt to do to their children, and had told Messrs. England and Petersen to keep an eye on the young man's movements; the two western friends, therefore, felt themselves "responsible" for him, and the strangeness of Yoshio's wish to rush away from Tokio had caused Mr. Petersen to wish to do the same thing, so that the two met on the platform at Kobe.

This, however, Yoshio would not stand: his manner was cold and firm as he said to Mr. Petersen: "I am going to a village near here — alone; I will rejoin you here to-night by eight o'clock."

He then went by ricksha to Oyosaka, the village where Nadine had lived with Suyematsu, the priest. The journey had taken a long time, the country there being mountainous: his steps were therefore eager as he went toward the temple through the forest, for he wished to be back in Kobe by eight that night with Nadine, whom he meant to present boldly to Mr. Petersen. Now, therefore, he ran, and now he walked fast. It was about six in the evening. He came to a sort of hut, a chaya, in the forest, and went in to ask if he was going right. Only the little grandmother, Oyouki, was in there, sitting where the water bubbled out of the bamboo vase and made the clear pool at the bottom of which eggs, fruit and flowers were kept cool. But Oyouki was very deaf; thrice Yoshio shouted to her, "Is this the way to Suyematsu's house?" and still the old Oyouki thought that he wanted only tea and pastèques. She got up to get him tea, talking meanwhile, for she had caught the babble of the water in the bamboo vase, and had the talkativeness of old age, so that she seemed to be made with one ear and two tongues.

Just now she had the fact of Nadine's angel-visit and departure on the brain, and of this she spoke dotingly to Yoshio. Every one in the neighbourhood, now that Nadine was gone, knew that the soldier in the house of Suyematsu had really been a girl; so Oyouki spoke of her as "she" without mentioning her soldier's clothes, so that Yoshio did not even now learn that she had been a soldier, nor in what manner she had found her way into Japan: for this main fact was so deeply known to Oyouki, that she took it for granted that it was known to every one. On she mumbled her gossip, thinking Yoshio only a passing stranger as another; Yoshio heard of Nadine's "honourable sweetness" in the priestly household, of Nadine's "honourable note-book" which she had sent on to her young husband at Pekin before her departure; he heard the name "Shini Maru" and uttered a groan at the thought that the Shini Maru, with Nadine on board, had lain two hours not fifty yards from the Taku, with him on board; he heard that Nadine had gone to Newchwang (Yinkow) expecting him to meet her there; and hearing this, just as Oyouki was handing him the tea, he ran from the chaya with a cry, and with his hands over his face.

He spent a long time sitting in the forest that night, and did not reach Kobe till the small hours of the morning, having walked all the way.

The next day he was taken back by Mr. Petersen to Tokio, and two days afterwards got his commission as a sub-lieutenant in his old 2nd Division company, and he set off for China to join the fighting forces, having only with him one old servant named Hara.

The young man made his way to Yinkow (Newchwang) with a forlorn hope of still finding Nadine there, though he had no right to be there, being under orders to hurry to the front. As he was entering his inn at Newchwang, a young Chinese officer whom he knew said to him —

“Your father passed through here from Peking yesterday morning”; and he added with a laugh, “he has gone on to the front in order to see the last great battle on this side of Lake Baikal.”

Yoshio had intended telegraphing to his father at Peking to send him Nadine’s note-book; now, therefore, he telegraphed instead to his father’s secretary there: “Send me the packet which has come for me from Kobe”; but he got the reply: “I think your father has taken it to give you at the front.”

During the rest of his stay at Newchwang he had agents searching all the inns for “a young-Russian lady,” for still he had no suspicion that Nadine had been in soldier’s clothes; but by the end of the first day he had given up hope, for he knew that a “young Russian lady” in Newchwang would have been quickly found, if she was there.

After three days’ search against hope he went on northward in his white putties and new summer uniform. He was in the depths of gloom now, but hope still sprang in him, and anon he said to himself: “There is hope yet, Yoshio. Nadine must have told her father of our marriage and won his favour, for she could not else have come on the Siberian railway and got to Japan; on failing to find me at Newchwang she has gone back to her father, and is still somewhere with him on or near the seat of war. When I get there I shall discover her.”

He saw, indeed, the unlikeliness of all this; but hope is part of life, and because he lived and was young he hoped.

The further he and his servant, Hara, now went, the more they came upon an ocean-current, as it were, of troops and convoyed transport making northward. “Practically the whole of our army is now mobilized,” said a fellow-officer to him at the window of his carriage on the platform at Haicheng; “two hundred thousand troops on each side now face each other yonder to the north on a front of some forty miles, and skirmishing is already going on.”

“Where is my father?” asked Yoshio.

“In your own division with Brigadier Markino: he is facing Devriloff, by the way, who is commanding the 68th and three following army-regiments.” Yoshio’s heart leapt at this, for if Nadine was near her father, then Yoshio would not be far from her when he joined his division.

“They say that this coming battle will be the” most momentous ever fought,” went on the officer, “because if Russia again suffers a defeat, France will now be drawn to take her side, and Germany is only waiting for France to do this in order to join in, too, against England.”

“But what, then, has happened to make you say such a thing?” asked Yoshio.

“I do not know,” answered the officer, “but on a sudden, within the last three days, everyone is to be heard speaking in this way. They say that the moment England is involved in the war; India will be ready to revolt, and that M — . — will then declare the independence of India and Tonquin in the name of China.”

Yoshio's train went on through the passes of the mountains, and during the afternoon of the third day thence he and his man on mule-back passed the sentries of the fortified camp of his regiment, which he found in a shallow valley bounded by a chain of hills on the west. Just there the country had good grazing, with no lack of water and of woods for fuel. The hills were entrenched on their western slopes, with detached flank-trenches, and held by small outpost garrisons. The young sub-lieutenant was led to his captain by the sergeant-of-the-guard, and showed his commission.

"Your father rode through our camp yesterday, and wondered why you had not arrived," said Yoshio's captain; "he is now three miles yonder to the south-east with Markino."

"I will write him at once," said Yoshio, and, going into the company-officers' tent, he wrote of his arrival to his father, asking in a postscript for Nadine's note-book in the words: "Benevolently send me, dear father, by the bearer any letters or packets which you may hold for me," and Hara went off with this note. Meanwhile, a few subalterns sitting round Yoshio told him all the news.

"We are all spoiling for a fight," said one. "Here we have been waiting, facing each other, ten long days, and not a shot fired."

"Then why don't you fight?" asked Yoshio.

"It is hard to tell what the sick Bear is waiting for," said another, "but we know what we are waiting for."

"And what is that?"

"We'll tell you, but it is as close as the grave, you know. The colonel was utterly astonished yesterday when he found that we knew; but these things leak out, my boy. Look here, the key of the whole Russian plan is the position over against us: the 68th to 71st hold it under Devriloff, and we mean to rush part of it or perish. Guess how?"

“How?” asked Yoshio.

“Fifty to one the scheme comes from your father, so you should have the luck to get put on to it before some of us others, if you volunteer: it will be hell’s own work for danger, though. Look here, you know how the Russians send round patrols at night to the sentry-posts of their outposts, to see that the lubbers are keeping awake. We used to do it, too, but we’ve dropped that game now. These patrols go tramping loudly from outpost to outpost every hour, so that, if an enemy were hiding in bush near by, he could hear the tramp, hear the password and countersign, see the forms on the skyline perhaps, and know just where the outposts are and the whole lay of the position. Well, the scheme is for four of us to go round as a Russian patrol just before one of the real patrols is due, and stab two sentries; then the force with us will quietly rush the posts, or slip between them, and so be upon the camps before the inlying sentries can give warning. The worst of it is that these are moonlight nights, and we must have darkness. That’s why we are waiting.”

“But what a thing!” said Yoshio, staring.

“You will be volunteering, of course, and cutting us all out?” said one.

“I do not know that I shall,” answered Yoshio. “There are better men than I, nor am I ambitious in this direction, for I am not a soldier because I will, but because I must. But is all that true which I have heard about the danger of a European war? Do you know?”

“True enough!” cried one. “Banzai! the more the merrier. That is, if we beat the Bear this time again. It is whispered that there are declarations of war in the bureaux of more than one European ambassador at this moment; and the last telegrams from Tokio to the army speak of large withdrawals of foreign securities from London by those in the know within the last two days.”

At this point of the talk Hara stood at the tent-door, having now returned from taking Yoshio's note to Baron M — . "Your father is augustly absent," he said to Yoshio, "but I have left your note with General Markino, who will give it to his excellency when he returns."

Yoshio had hoped to get Nadine's note-book that night; he believed that he would find in it some hint of where Nadine was, whether with her father or no, and was very disappointed.

"Whither is my honoured father gone?" he asked.

"To some further camp," answered Hara.

"For how long?"

"It may be for two, it may be for five, days." Yoshio at once made up his mind not to wait to get the note-book before trying to find Nadine; he was not even sure whether his father had not read the note-book, or would ever allow him to see it.

"Hara," he said taking his man aside, "you will at once begin to do that which has been arranged between us. In a few minutes I will give you the letter for the lady, and here is money to hire the cart and mule, and to buy the fruit; you will find a lodging in one of the villages in the valley to the west of those hills, and to-morrow morning you begin."

The next morning, then, at an early hour, Hara was wending across the valley west of the hills held by Yoshio's regiment. He was driving a mule-cart with fruit, etc., to sell to the Russian camp beyond the mountain to the west of the valley. A pigtail swung behind his back, for he was disguised as a Chinese coolie.

I This had all been thought of beforehand. Yoshio had purposely brought the old Hara and no other with him, because Hara had been with Baron M — when the Baron was an attaché in St. Petersburg, and because Hara had there learnt to speak some Russian.

Hara's instructions were to get into the Russian lines, to draw the soldiers by the cheapness of his goods, to find out from them just where General Devriloff was, and whether he had a daughter near him; if he had, Hara was somehow to make his way to her with a letter from Yoshio.

Hara's cart wound its way up the mountain-road and came down on the other side to a plain between hills where the Russian camp was, ten miles from Yoshio's camp. It was a clear morning in late August; the country here was leafy and arcadian, with two villages in the valley between the hostile camps; a few huts hung on the mountainsides; waterfalls were to be seen, and streams, and brooks by which sheep browsed. Hara drew near the Russian camp, and passed the sentries; but the next thing that happened to him was a bandage over his eyes, while he himself was dragged between two men towards a colonel who was sitting on a grass-bank, smoking and talking to his adjutant.

"Well, I don't know you; what's your name?" said the colonel to Hara.

"Likien is my name, your honour," answered Hara, who was a cool old blade.

"What have you brought to sell?"

"Fruit, eggs, milk, butter, your honour."

"You are a spy, you have seen my gun-emplacements, I shall detain you in camp," said the colonel, smiling.

"Your honour thinks too highly of me," answered Hara with a perfect smile.

"He's all right," said the colonel, and turned to talk again with his adjutant.

Five minutes later Hara was among the parked baggage, surrounded by buyers. The light-hearted Russian soldier cut capers round him, joked him, clapped him on the back, he sold so cheap. He soon knew from them that “the General” was in a village three versts to the west; but three of them whom Hara asked if the general had a daughter near him laughed at the idea of this.

The fourth, however, did not laugh, but turned pale. He, or rather she, said, as she took the pears which she had bought, “I — cannot tell; why do you ask?”

“So that I may take her my best fruit to sell,” answered Hara.

“I — cannot tell,” said Nadine.

Hara, after a sharp look at her, said to himself, “He knows, if he would tell”; but he had to move away at last without having found out anything about the general’s daughter. He meant to go on now to the next camp to ask there, but when he had gone some yards, Nadine ran after him.

“Why do you wish to know?” she asked, reaching up to him; “tell me, and I may be able to help you.”

Hara glanced keenly into her dark, pale face, which now looked older than it was, for she had the expression of one pined with hunger, and in her up-turned eyes was a yearning and troubled light. The old man trusted her. “I have a message for her, then,” he said, “a letter.”

As he pronounced these words, he saw all Nadine’s blood pass away from her face, leaving it blanched.

She knew that Baron M — was in the opposite camp; she had had the thought that Yoshio might be there also. She suspected now that Yoshio may have written to her, and the joy of this, mixed with the terror that it might be only fancy, turned her white. Yet she shrank from asking any questions which might betray her, for the nearness of her father to her during the last three days had filled her with fears, and she was now all shy and on the look-out for traps and tricks to unearth her. She feared also, not only her own father, but Yoshio’s, the enemy of her house, thinking that perhaps he had now found out all from Yoshio, and that this carter might be an agent of his to do her some mischief. But after a silence she ventured to ask, "From whom is the letter?"

"That might be telling too much," answered Hara. "Why do you ask?"

"Because," said she, "I know that the lady expects a letter from a certain individual; if this letter is from that individual, I undertake that she shall have it, if you intrust it to me, or from whomsoever it is, she shall have it."

"But where is she?"

"That I must not tell you."

"Are we in a mystery, then? Tell me the name of the individual from whom the lady expects a letter?"

"That also I do not wish to say."

They were again silent, each shy of trusting the other.

"Well, I must only try to find her elsewhere," said Hara.

"Listen to me," said Nadine, "you will not find her. I tell you that I am one of very few who know where she is, though this may seem strange to you. Intrust the letter to me, and I promise that she shall have it without fail."

Hara looked at her face, hesitated, and said, "Do you swear this, soldier?"

"I swear it," said Nadine, holding up her right arm.

"If I were to trust you, when should I return for an answer?" asked Hara.

"To-morrow morning."

"Then, here is the letter."

Nadine took it, trembling, and the moment Hara's cart was out of sight, had the envelope broken open. Yoshio had written —

"Nadine, I arrived at Kobe five days after you had left it. I was on the Taku and you were on the Shini Maru at the battle. I am here now on the east side of the valley, in the camp over against the camp of the 69th army-regiment. I do not know if you are with your father, or where you are. Can you meet me, Nadine? In the middle of the valley between the two camps is the village of Momiski; the lane from there which runs south past the old mill without any arms takes one to a frog-pond, where it is quite lonely. I shall be there at the frog-pond every evening from five o'clock for twenty minutes, waiting for you."

The wary and secret Yoshio had put no name to it, but when he heard the news that it had been given to a common soldier he was furious with Hara, who crouched and crawled on the ground at his feet. Hara's only excuse for his rashness was the good face of the little soldier who had won the letter from him; but, as Yoshio had not seen this face, the excuse was without any weight for him. He was now torn with doubts, not knowing whether Nadine was really under her father's protection, whether she might not even be hiding from her father, whether in that case the letter might not get into Devriloff's hand and bring mischief upon her and upon himself. The next day Hara, having again gone to the Russian camp, brought back the two written words: "I come!" which he said the little soldier had handed him for the young lady. But they were written on a piece of wrapping-paper in large letters with a pencil which had no point, and this made Yoshio all the more anxious, for he could not see Nadine's handwriting in the two words, they seemed written by a peasant; nor could he think why she should have to write on wrapping-paper. He suspected some net, some trick somewhere.

However, that afternoon before five, he began to stroll with a listless air about the camp, for he did not wish his going out to be remarked, though his stroll had always a westward drift in it. He paused to look on at the watering of a battery, spied into the great trenches made to cover the animals and wagons, and paused again to see an arrival of provision-carts convoyed by two armoured wagons. He then strolled on to the hills and over them, exchanging a word with an outpost officer, or wondering at the minute cunning with which the position had been fortified, at the pits and banks which hid the guns from the enemy's glasses, at the rusts in which the high wheels of machine-guns had been sunk, to hide them; some of the trenches were small and redan-shaped, some long, with loop-holes three and four feet apart, and sluices to drain them, and winding ways to the rear for retreat, or for communication with the camp; some were covered in with boards and earth, forming underground blockhouses, others narrow and open, for standing in. And how grim now were the pastoral waves of the hill, made for sheep to browse on! Here or there he came upon a dummy work, a dummy gun, to draw the enemy's fire; from some of the trenches wires led away back to headquarters for giving signals by tugging, and two hundred yards down was quite a cobweb of barbed wire among trees to entangle attackers; beyond these were tar-barrels which could be lighted by pulling a string, to show up a night-attack; and away to the rear, like a mirage in the air, floated a captive balloon. Beyond the tar-barrels Yoshio came upon the road, passed into a lane, and now his stroll became a run. The sounds of the camp, which reached far in the still evening, ceased to be heard by him; the sun biased near its setting in a cloudless sky.

The wary fellow came to within five hundred yards of the frog-pond, and there stopped, shy of going nearer, lest Prince Devriloff, having got hold of his letter to Nadine, had set some trap for his life at the rendezvous. He lay in high grass, and looked down the path leading to the frog-pond, his musket by his side; and he waited to see a bright girl-form come down the piece of ground on the yonder side of the pond.

But no Nadine came that evening. After half-an-hour Yoshio went sadly back to his camp.

He longed all that sleepless night for his father to come with Nadine's note-book; but Baron M — was still absent from that part of the country, nor did the baron come all the next day.

At five o'clock that second evening Yoshio again went toward the frog-pond with even greater wariness, and, lying on his face, waited for Nadine to fulfil the promise "I come!" though he hardly any longer believed that it was she who had written this on the piece of wrapping-paper. But he meant to see the matter through; a fierceness against the world in general was in his mind as he waited; and this evening again Nadine did not appear.

On the third evening, however, Nadine went to meet him. She had not gone those other two evenings for the simple reason that she had been waiting her chance to get out of camp without being stopped, without being asked questions, and perhaps being arrested and found out. Her chance came when her fond friend, Grigory Khartoy, who would have done anything for her, was on sentry post. He let her pass and whispered her the password. With light feet she ran then, till she was breathless, hardly once glancing back at the camp which she had left, as she thought, for ever.

After coming from Japan and failing to find Yoshio at Yinkow (Newchwang), she had been redrafted into her old company, then a mere cadre which was being filled up, and had soon been ordered to the front, where for five days now she had been, within three versts of her father. This had filled her with terror, lest her life's hope of being with Yoshio should never now be fulfilled; but, as a matter of fact, the search for her in the army was no longer an active one. It had once been active enough, for her woman, Anna Pochowski, had blabbed when it came to the point of being flogged three days after Nadine's, Ivan Shtcherbakoff's and her own arrest at the railway-station at Karinsk. Anna had then told all, except the fact of Nadine's marriage, of which she had feared to say a word on account of her own guilty share in it: so that the prince had soon got to know that his daughter had put on soldier's clothes and had been marched away in some battalion; but by the time he had heard this and could set the search on foot, Nadine was no longer in the army, for she had been taken prisoner; the widespread search had been fruitless, and Prince Devriloff's hair had turned grayer. What had been Nadine's motive for leaving St. Petersburg he could not guess. Anna Pochowski maintained that she did not know. As for the old Ivan Shtcherbakoff, he had died in a guardroom on the night of his arrest at Karinsk. The prince, therefore, was faced with mystery, and with another instance of that fearful destiny which seemed to track the sons of his race. He had taken it with his mocking gruff laugh; but it showed in his hair, his beard, his face, and in a new weight which he seemed to carry on his shoulders.

At any rate, the search for Nadine had now become lifeless because hopeless, so that her fears of the last few days had been without much ground: but they had made her thinner than ever. She now found that she could not run so far as before, and it was a long way to her those five miles to the frog-pond, though she had marched twenty in one day without being very tired. However, she found it a pretty walk; the valley was a shaded landscape in an Eastern tone, with scarlet lilies and large weeping-willows, the trees and creepers now turning yellow or red, and strewn the streams with their leaves. The evening air was clear and drowsy, hardly a sound was to be heard, for most of the people had fled till the fighting should be over. A dog whose master had left it followed the young girl some way; in the village of Morniski she saw nobody but an old woman bearing a tub, and a shepherd smoking on his doorstep. Thence she turned south into a lane, went past the old mill of which Yoshio had written her, and now, though she was tired, she had to run again, for her eagerness drove her. She had no doubt that she was about to see Yoshio at last, for he had said that he would be at the frog-pond each evening, and she knew that he would not fail her. She smiled when she asked herself if he would love her as much in her soldier's dress; she was glad that he should see her so, for she had a fondness for anything that was extravagant or pert in costume; but she did not look forward to the pleasure of seeing him surprised by that dress, for she took it for granted that he had got her note-book, which told her Story.

At the end of a long lane leading south, she turned eastward upon a piece of ground which went down with a swollen surface to the frog-pond at its bottom, a rather rough spot, grown with some bracken and some pine-trees.

She had hardly well entered upon it when she saw Yoshio, and though he was quite six hundred yards away, she knew dearly within herself that it was he: he was on a path which ran upward through long grass from the yon side of the pond. The breathless call of "Yoshio!" at once leapt from Nadine's lips; but as she uttered it, he disappeared from her sight. The wary fellow had lain down. Three seconds afterwards a bullet rang past her left ear; she heard the report of a musket.

She was soldier enough now to have the instinct to lie down instantly when bullets were flying about. Partly, then, through wisdom, and partly through weakness at this sudden woe, she dropped down. Yoshio, on his side, thought that she was now seeking cover from which to fire at him, and fired thrice quickly: he had not seen that she had no musket. Two of his bullets went wide, but one drove into grass two yards before her, and struck dust into her face. "Oh, Yoshio!" was all she could groan, as she cowered close to the ground, with her right cheek on it, trembling throughout her frame at this reception of her glad coming, for the wrath of heaven seemed to be in it.

Perhaps twenty seconds of waiting went by after this, then came another shot: it passed a yard above Nadine's back.

It now came into her mind that she could not be hidden since the shots were striking so near, and up she leapt in a flurry to ran to the nearest pine-tree four yards to her right. As she made the rash, he fired; the bullet struck off some of the bark of the tree before she reached it; she crouched on her knees behind the roots. But the trunk was not thick, did not cover her well. He fired again. The young girl's eyes stared; her bosom panted for breath.

Again Yoshio shot at and missed her: but she knew that he had only to keep on firing in order to make a hit, and as she dared not ran back toward the lane, she determined to make rashes from tree to tree until she got to the tree nearest the frog-pond, from which she would rush into the open, where it was light, with her arms spread in sign of surrender, trusting in God that he might see her surrender in time before he fired. She understood that he took her for a Russian soldier since she was dressed as one, and that he could never have seen her note-book.

She ran, therefore, to the second tree, and thence to the third in a zig-zag line; and at each of her rashes Yoshio fired. "But how determined he is to kill me!" she thought; "this is strange, my God!" One of the bullets passed an inch or two from her neck, and, on the whole, his aim seemed to be getting better. At the fourth tree he fired well upon her, whereat on a sudden she screamed out his name with all her soul. But he did not seem to hear. As she ran again with a bent back, he fired upon her.

"She ran out with her arms spread."

The Yellow Wave

[Page 273]

At last she was behind the tree nearest the pond, and there lingered a minute with her eyes closed, praying, hesitating. But hesitation meant death, for it was a pine-tree, not thick enough to cover her, and when he had fired twice upon her there, she ran out with her arms spread, calling out, "Oh, Yoshio, do not kill me dead!" But even as she had made the run, Yoshio had fired. His bullet pierced her: she felt the pain of it, and stood still with a bent head; the corners of her mouth turned downward to cry, for it was a pitiful thing; but before any tear came, she suddenly dropped forward.

Yoshio then rose, and came out into the path. He had still ten minutes to wait for Nadine, and he was determined to wait, though he felt sure that no

Nadine would come. His eye from minute to minutes rested with a sullen bitterness upon the form which his hand had laid prostrate on the bank of the frog-pond, He would approach no nearer to it, fearing that there might be others in ambush thereabouts for him.

Afterwards he returned to camp, and reported that, having gone out for a stroll, he had seen a daring Russian scout, and had shot him. But he did not really believe that it was a scout: he believed that it was an agent of Prince Devriloff who had been sent to take his life.

CHAPTER XXI

THE NIGHT-PATROL

THE MOON WAS on the wane then, and the night following that on which Nadine fell at the hand of Yoshio was the one chosen beforehand by the Japanese for the attempt upon the Russian outposts.

But before it was dark that night of Nadine's fall, she was seen by a peasant, half Jew, half Mongol, who was wandering near the frog-pond, picking up a cart-load of fir-cones and faggots to take to the Russian camp in the morning; and he, finding that she was not dead, carried her to his hut, where his wife, stripping her of her tunic, saw with wonder that the soldier was a girl.

Nadine was not "severely" wounded, and, but for her general weakness and despair, would not have remained so long unconscious; the bullet had passed through the left arm without breaking any bone, and it was rather shock and fear which had caused her to faint. At about two in the morning she woke in the dark to find herself on a mat, a bandage and some leaves round her arm, her chest open, her body burning, and two persons near her breathing loudly in sleep.

The first thing that struck her was that her sex was now revealed, unless she could bury herself anew in the army before these people should awake and see her face well. She groped wearily for her things, and put them on. Her limbs ached; her left arm seemed nothing but an ache; she shivered and was hot at the same time.

Presently she stole out of the door. The thought of going to the Japanese lines came into her mind a moment, but she did not know the way to them, nor wished to be shot again; she was weary, without much force of mind left in her. She found her way back to the lane, and passed with slow feet through the village again. The way was endless to her; some of it she passed over in a sort of dream and forgetfulness. The moon could just be guessed from a white smear among masses of cloud, and all that valley was as strange and lonesome as the valley of the shadow of death. Anon the young girl buried her face in her hands and wept bitterly with sobs.

In passing over a brook she stopped, and in a weary manner washed some blood out of the sleeve of her tunic. Twenty minutes afterwards she passed an outlying sentry, then an inlying. Happily she had the password, and was not on the roster for duty that night. She skulked to her tent without attracting any notice, and she dropped down by her mates to sleep with a fevered brow.

But by eleven the next morning she knew that it was all up with the hiding of her sex much longer: for the rumour was flying like gas that a wounded Russian soldier had been found by a peasant to be a girl. It was everywhere; it was in the Japanese camp — the poor Yoshio heard it. On the Russian side, indeed, it could hardly be believed, for no one seemed to be “wounded.” Still, Nadine understood that it was only a question of days, of hours perhaps, when her father would surely see her face.

Prince Devriloff, strange to say, did not hear of it till near four in the afternoon. An orderly from Nadine’s camp had been sent to tell him, but the general was then driving in his heavy carriage about the outposts of a camp six versts to the west of his own; but on returning to his village headquarters, as he stepped from the carriage, he heard the news.

His hand swept down the length of his flying sheaves of beard, while his heart jumped within him.

“Well, who is ‘wounded ‘?’” he asked at once.

“That is the question, my general,” answered the orderly. “No one seems to be wounded.”

“Can the peasant have lied, then? Where is this peasant? Why have you not brought him along?”

“No one has thought of this, my general; but the man shall at once be brought to you, for I know where to find him in a moment.”

“Sulkowski, my horse,” said the prince to one of his staff.

While the horse was being saddled, he got from the orderly just where the peasant’s hut was, then went into the cottage which was his headquarters, and now could no longer hide his impatience from himself, throwing his mighty body about a room full of violets in vases, in plates, in cups, and even in tumblers. The moment his charger came he leapt into the saddle and was off without any escort, without a weapon, save a pistol in his saddle-bag, in order to question the peasant who had taken Nadine into his hut. It was near five p.m. then.

Knowing the country minutely, he rode seven versts with a loose rein, down hill and up, not caring how near he went to the Japanese lines, in which, he knew, his old enemy somewhere was. Baron M — was, in fact, fearfully near to the prince, having at last arrived in Yoshio’s camp: for that night the attempt upon the Russian outpost sentries was to be made.

Yoshio, therefore, now had Nadine’s note-book, which his father had brought him unopened and unread; he now knew her story, how she had become a soldier, and something like certainty had struck to the heart of the young man that it was Nadine whom he had shot the previous evening. But this his brain could not quite take in, it was too horrible, and he went about his duties during the afternoon as usual, but with a red eye which his father noticed and mused on. Yoshio could not leave the camp much before five, but when he could, he ran to wait for Nadine again, to wait till she should come to him, "for she will come," he told himself. The young man was hardly any longer sane; his chief aim in going was to wait for her to come to him, and he had also the saner aim to find out what had become of the body which he had shot, and to glance once at that dead face.

His father, who was talking to the colonel at the door of the commanding-officer's tent, saw him going, and made a remark on it; whereupon it came out that Yoshio was in the habit of going that way about that hour — a strange thing which had been remarked in the camp, though Yoshio little thought that it had been. "Some love-affair with a damsel of the valley perhaps?" said the colonel, with a smile; to which Baron Murino answered: "Well, it is a fine evening; perhaps I will stroll that way myself."

The baron then walked out of camp, fast at first, and twice caught glimpses of Yoshio's back, though at several points Yoshio started into running. But by the time Yoshio had come near that spot from which he had fired at Nadine he had heard some steps behind him, for the evening air carried far, and not wishing to be observed, he lay in the long grass, and waited for the steps to go by. He breathed to himself the word "Father!" as the baron went past him with quick steps, looking for him.

The baron went down to the frog-pond, skirted it, and went up the rough ground on the other side where Nadine had been shot. As he got near the top of this ground he heard steps coming toward him, and a moment afterwards found himself face to face with Prince Devriloff.

With the prince was the peasant who had sheltered Nadine; the peasant was leading the prince to show him the spot where the girl-soldier had been found.

The two noblemen and generals halted and looked at each other. The baron expected to drop dead instantly, for he had no weapon; so did the prince, for he had none; he had left his pistol in his saddle-bag, his horse being tied up at the peasant's cottage a mile away. Both were pale. Prince Devriloff's lips trembled.

But in some seconds Baron M — understood that he was safe, and he smiled, saying:

“What, prince, still alive?”

“And you?” retorted the prince.

“Oh, I mean to live a long time, and see many days and changes,” said Baron M — : “but you, I can see, have a tendency to — consumption.” Prince Devriloff stooped to the peasant, whispering close: “Run back and fetch me my pistol from the saddle-bag.” The peasant ran off, whereat Baron M — said with a smile:

“No, he will not be back in time: I think it is decreed, prince, that it is I who shall shoot you, and not you shoot me. Yes, I think so.”

“Shoot you?” laughed the prince. “What, do they shoot rats, then? I thought they always drowned them. What? Gol, gol!”

“Yes, you have a pretty wit,” said Baron M — : “even of Russia, the land of clowns, you are not worthy. I shall do a good thing for your country when I pin you at last.”

“Why, whom is this little rat going to pin?” cried the prince, appealing with a red face to the four winds: “I declare I'd make that peasant wring its pestilent little neck—”

“You have already had private dealings with necks, I think,” said the baron, “and you have bloody dreams, prince, confess, in your bed at night. It is said that the dead live afterwards, and come again—”

“What, have Japanese women, too, got ghosts? What? Gol, gol!”

“They have husbands and sons. You had better look out, by the way. My boy, I think, is somewhere not far from here with a gun. He will shoot in the legs, so as to preserve you for my pleasure.”

The prince glanced quickly round at this, and swept his hand down his beard. “Now I have alarmed you,” said the baron; “but I doubt if you are destined to be won in this easy way. Perhaps I shall reach you through your country.”

“My country, indeed! What of my country now?” retorted the prince in the tone of a woman quarrelling.

“It is reported that she is in some danger,” answered the baron with a malice in his smiling eyes.

“What, are you going to invade us all? What?” laughed the prince.

“The rhinoceros has a big body but a little mind, Prince Devriloff. Can you conceive before you see it a war to which this little war of ours is as nothing, in which you shall feel England on your breast and Japan on your back? It could have been done months ago with a scratch of my pen. You have heard of a place called China? It may be done now in a day without anyone taking up the pen. That should be a blaze which will frighten the heart of Russian princes, perhaps.”

“Oh, your European war! let it come,” said Prince Devriloff. “Our success in this war has not been immediate because our men cannot feel that they are fighting with men, but with lower creatures. Let your European war come: then we will fight. Meanwhile—”

“Yes, I am going: God preserve your life, till we meet again.”

Baron M — had kept his eye on the moving figure of the peasant, and, as soon as the peasant disappeared, turned his back upon the prince and walked away. The prince went the other way, muttering and laughing, with an ashen lip. He walked to the peasant’s hut, and giving up now the purpose of looking at the spot where the soldier-girl had been found, rode off toward the west. He believed the peasant's story, and meant to look before noon the next day into the face of every soldier in the camps about him. He turned his horse toward the camp of the 69th, the nearest to the valley, the camp in which, in fact, Nadine was; but midway he began to be distressed by an odour which he smelled, or fancied that he smelled, and this thing seemed to have a wonderful effect upon the prince, for he became paler than Baron M— 's presence had been able to make him: it was an odour of violets. At one point he was so tormented by it, that he got off his horse and searched among the bush for violets to hold to his nose; but there were none in the valley at that time of the year: those which he had in his headquarters cottage had come for him from Russia. Instead of going to the camp of the 69th he galloped straight for his cottage, in order to be among his violets, continually sniffing out the scent meanwhile, and hardly allowing himself to breathe: he believed that some terrible thing was on the point of befalling him and his.

But when he reached his cottage, he still found no peace; the violets there were faded, and he could not make himself believe that what he scented came from them. At dinner he drank deeply and laughed loud with a forced and mocking gaiety; but afterwards, at about eleven in the night, he had to give way to his mood of gloom and grief; his great head with its flat back fell upon the table, and, as he sat so, his breath puffing audibly from his hairy nostrils, he said to a staff-officer, a close friend, who hung over him, "Sulkowski, do not mind me, I am in a bad way to-night, boy: and all on account of a fancy, an old woman's tale: what? gol, gol! But you do not know, you do not know; there are queer things in the make of the world, Sulkowski; why, I smell it now, man — distinctly — at this very moment, strong, strong, by God! They say that she comes to us when things are about to crush us with her weak, helpless messages that do no good, and that it is her presence which haunts our nostrils. I feel bad, Sulkowski. Give me some brandy.” In this trouble of mind the prince continued all the night till three in the morning, when he was shocked into other cares by a sound of firing in the direction of the camp of the 69th.

At that hour the Japanese attempt upon the Russian outposts had been made, but had turned out quite otherwise than it had been planned, and this through an act of Yoshio’s, as we shall see.

That evening Baron M — had returned to the camp from his interview with Prince Devriloff in a very grim mood. Soon afterwards Yoshio, too, who, lying in the grass, had watched that interview, returned to camp, and was seen coming in by his father. Now, before this, the baron had asked the colonel of the regiment whether Yoshio had volunteered for service in the attempt that was to be made upon the Russian outpost-piquets, and though not very pleased when the colonel said no, had said no more about it, since the attempt was a most ticklish one, fit to be entrusted only to a set of born scouts. But seeing Yoshio coming into camp that evening, the baron, grim from his interview with the prince, walked to meet, and said to his son: “Where have you been?”

“I have been strolling, father,” answered the young man.

“Where to? What for? Tell me.”

“Oh, father, let me alone!” said Yoshio. Yoshio was, in truth, as has been said of him, hardly sane. He had just seen that the body shot by him had been removed from the bank of the frog-pond, and he was still in his horrid uncertainty as to whether that body was Nadine’s. He was rather deranged. His father glanced at him with a start of alarm.

“Let you alone?” repeated the baron. “Have you said to me, ‘Let me alone’?”

“Father, I am mad!” groaned Yoshio; then the young man screamed out, opening his arms, “Father, I am in trouble!”

“In trouble? My boy!”

“Yes, father, in trouble, in trouble, I tell you!”

“Never mind, you have your father, the friend of your mother. Tell me of it.”

“But I cannot tell you! That is the worst! I never must, for you would horribly hate me and spit at me!”

“Silence, silence. Command yourself. Now tell me.”

“I cannot!”

“You must. Do not disobey me again, Yoshio.” Yoshio hesitated, turned very pale, then with a mad haste thrust his hand into his tunic breast, caught out Nadine’s note-book, and handed it to his father, saying, “Read it then! read it!”

“Shall I find it all here?” asked the baron.

“Yes, all!”

“I shall read it. But what terrible thing can it be that has so troubled and changed you? You displease me, Yoshio. I came now to ask you by what chance it is that you have not volunteered for service in the attempt upon the mountain-posts to-night?”

“Volunteer? I? I did not wish to volunteer, I felt no impulse—”

“Indeed! But you knew that the task is dangerous; men usually ‘feel an impulse’ to volunteer for dangerous tasks: by what chance did you not feel it in this case? Tell me.”

“I wish I had now! I only wish I had!”

“It is not too late,” said Baron M — — “Write forthwith an application to your colonel, sign it with your blood, and I undertake that a place shall be given you in the second group with Sublieutenant Gheta.”

“Very well, I shall do this. I had a dream last night—”

“Well?”

“It is nothing.”

“But what is the matter with you? Tell me, boy, since I have asked.”

“It is nothing, father. I dreamt that I saw two ravens sailing in the air and coming, but they turned into black swans. Then they began to moult their feathers in a steady way by handfuls, by sackfuls, by wagonfuls, till it became a snowstorm, only a black one, not a white, filling the space under the skies with a darkness of black snow. That would be a horribly sad thing, too, if it could happen. By the gods, I think that everyone would die of pity, if people should see such a thing taking place.”

“But what is the matter with him?” repeated the father, half to himself: “Yoshio, you displease me.

“But you should be glad, father! You should dance for joy! for I think that I have shot one of the race of him who did my honoured mother to death. By the gods, she is abundantly avenged, my mother!”

“You? Did you see Devriloff just now, then? Have you shot him?” whispered Baron M — eagerly.

“Not the prince himself, but one of the race perhaps! She is avenged, my honoured mother!”

The young man chuckled to himself.

“But is he mad?” asked the baron, at a loss to understand the words which his ears heard, or the odd look of the face before him. But before anything further could be said, the sergeant-of-the-guard came up saluting, and saying —

“I have just brought in two visitors to your excellency past one of the south sentries — Prince Ching and General Ma. By the colonel’s order they have been taken to his own tent, and are there awaiting your excellency.”

“I am coming,” said Baron M — .— “Yoshio, write to your colonel for service to-night.” He pressed the young man’s shoulder between his fingers, and with Nadine’s note-book in his jacket pocket, hurriedly went after the sergeant.

Outside the colonel’s tent he saw the two palanquins of the Chinese dignitaries, and inside he found the dignitaries themselves, as scented and dressed as ladies of the harem, waiting for him. They had come, partly to witness a great battle, and partly to witness the signature by Baron M — of a document which was meant to plunge Europe and the world into war.

To some it may seem unlikely that this that is here stated was really so; it may be asked, “How, if a European war was really so near, did one not read of it in one’s newspaper?” But it is none the less quite true: for there are individuals among us who know that when the inner history of the war comes to be written, the public will be amazed to learn how near the brink of a general war the world at that time stood.

The talk between the two Chinese and the baron lasted till near ten in the night. The Chinese wished the baron to sign the document (one addressed to the French Government) at once; the baron did not wish to sign it till the following evening.

“To-morrow,” he said in effect, “a general battle is almost certain to take place: if the Russian army is then routed, as we expect, there will never be any need to sign this document, for a European war will follow that rout without it. Let us, therefore, wait. If the enemy are not routed, then by six to-morrow evening I will sign.”

Prince Ching, who was as rash and eager now for the unfolding of events as he had once been full of fears, answered to this: “But China is waiting to go ahead; you yourself have done much to prepare her, and we are now masters of everything: why, then, should we be politic and careful of this and of that? Better sign the document, M — , and let it be sent off to-night to the Wai-wa-pu to be telegraphed to Paris.”

In this General Ma agreed with Prince Ching, but Baron M — merely smiled at them, as if they had been children; he would not sign.

At last the interview drew to an end. The baron, who was inwardly anxious to read the note-book which his son had handed him, had already risen and bowed to end it, when three new arrivals claimed his attention. These were Messrs. England, Petersen, and a leading Tiger-hunter of Nagasaki, a Socialist and newspaper-man, named Kotohito; these, too, wished to witness the battle, and Kotohito had the special aim of beseeching Baron M — to hasten a general war, which he said would, just at that juncture of affairs, bring about the triumph of Socialism in Japan.

This second interview lasted until midnight. The baron then ran out of the tent, asking for news of the night-parties: he heard that they had gone out half-an-hour before, Yoshio among them. He then returned to his tent, and spent a part of the night by his lamp over Nadine’s note-book.

It was drizzling, and a better night could hardly have been chosen for the attempt upon the Russian outposts, though anon a thin moon looked down through the clouds. But it was dark enough, and mutterings of thunder were heard.

CHAPTER XXII

THE SENTRY

THE JAPANESE ADVENTURERS were made up of two groups of twenty men each, each of the two groups being under an officer who could more or less speak Russian. Four of the men in each group had on Russian tunics and forage-caps, these four being meant to be the active agents in the plot, while the other sixteen were to be hidden in bush not far off, till the sentries were killed. Each group-leader had with him a dagger and a small bow-and-arrow. Two thousand yards behind these pioneers a battalion and a half, say 1,500 men, were to steal up.

By midnight the two groups of twenty were passing through the valley, and half-an-hour later parted where the ground began to rise toward the mountain. One group went along a lane north-westward, the second group under Sub-Lieutenant Gheta, a young athlete as sharp as a needle and as dauntless as a hero, went straight westward up a path between cliffs. With this group went Yoshio.

“How do you feel, Yoshio?” asked Sub-Lieutenant Gheta with a grin, as they passed over a wooded plain on the mountain-side.

Yoshio made no answer.

“What is the matter, then?” asked Gheta again. “Do you think we are all going to be killed, eh?”

“I do not care if we are,” answered Yoshio.

The other glanced sharply at Yoshio, saying, "What? But why do you speak in that manner?"

"I do not care either way," said Yoshio.

Again Ghetta glanced at Yoshio's face; he was leader here, and wanted no half-hearted men with him. After a moment he said quietly, "Repeat those words, M — , and I order you back to camp, whoever your father may be." Nothing more was said.

They came to a hill on the mountain-side on which were a few huts in a wood; after crossing this, Ghetta and another man thenceforward went a little before the rest, picking their course, rushing from hiding-place to hiding-place, or else crawling on the belly; whatever those, two did the eighteen behind copied. Any one looking on would have thought that all that wariness was not needed, for it was mostly very dark, and quite black where crags, leafage, or crops were; the drizzle fell always, and the mood of thunder which haunted the air with moan on moan seemed only to add another awe to the silence of Nature through which this little band crept and ferreted on its dark purpose.

At last the silence was broken. "Here they come!" went the whisper among the Japanese. A tramp was heard — the Russian patrol of three men and a sergeant, going the rounds from piquet to piquet. These piquets were five to eight hundred yards apart — small forces of eight or ten men on the highest parts of the mountain round the front of the camp. Well out from each piquet stood a sentry in a spot commanding a view eastwards; the patrols' duty was to visit the sentries; and what the two Japanese groups had to do was to pass themselves off as patrols, kill four sentries in all, and then surprise the piquets, thus clearing a way for the battalion behind.

As the patrol's tramp came nearer, Sub-Lieutenant Ghetta, whose group was lying behind a clump of trees, whispered hotly at Yoshio's ear: "You others wait here!” and he himself stole out towards the tramp of feet, travelling so fast on the belly through scrub and stubble that in some seconds he was lost to the others’ eyes. He was absent twenty minutes. When he came back he knew the Russian password and countersign, having heard a sentry challenge the patrol.

A mile away to the north-west, the other Japanese group had been not less lucky than he.

They had now to wait nearly an hour, till the patrol should be again nearly due to visit the sentry; but during Sub-Lieutenant Gheta’s prowling after the patrol he had spied a sentry standing so near a thicket, that he had been tempted to shoot from the thicket with the arrow there and then. He had not done this, for that was not quite according to the plot: but during the hour of waiting, this chance of surely and promptly killing one of the sentries so tempted the keen spirit of Gheta, that before the hour was half over, he and his three in Russian clothes had stolen well forward, and were crawling into the thicket near the unwary sentry.

It was slow work in the bush, they prowled so daintily through, thinking of spring-guns and watch-dogs: slow and dark and thorny; but inch by inch they made headway. Yoshio was at the right hand of Sub-Lieutenant Gheta.

At last their heads pried out; they saw the sentry’s form. It was no longer so near the thicket, however, as it had been; and to their surprise the form was sitting down! It was at the foot of a pine-tree, and seemed to have only waited for the passing of the patrol in order to take its chance and go to sleep!

The four on their bellies in the thicket held their breaths, while the very air seemed to watch, Sub-Lieutenant Gheta waiting to see if the sentry was really asleep. He would not shoot the arrow, for the pine-tree rather covered the sitting form, and to shoot and fail to kill would not have done. Ten minutes went by, the fate of kingdoms, of the world, hanging on the outcome.

Presently the sentry gave out a sigh, rose with a very weary effort, and strolled toward the thicket, three, four yards. The form then stopped, sighed again, hung its head like a sick man, and then turned up its face to the drizzling sky with a gaze as it were of prayer. In that upturned face the eyes of Yoshio, now used to the gloom, saw Nadine's profile. He understood that it was certainly she.

The young man now knew strange pain. She was about to be killed. On the one hand was his duty to an army of men, to his teeming country; on the other his love. Nor had he any time to think and choose. Nadine was not five yards from the arrow which he could feel Sub-Lieutenant Ghetta moving to aim. To say something quickly to Ghetta, to tell him not to shoot, was Yoshio's first impulse; his mouth was at once at Ghetta's ear, but before he could say one word Ghetta's palm was over his mouth, pushing his head away. Ghetta then put his arrow to the string to shoot quickly while the sentry was standing on open grass: Yoshio struck down the bow and arrow to the ground.

At this mystery a smothered groan came from Sub-Lieutenant Ghetta's heart; the next moment he was keenly on his legs, about to spring out to stab the sentry. As he started forward, Yoshio caught his right leg: the sub-lieutenant dropped on his length to his face with a sound which Nadine heard.

At the same time Yoshio was darting out of the thicket to save her; she saw him coming, and before she knew him had fired into the air. A second later, however, he had her lifted to his breast and was running wild with her.

"Treason" was the word groaned in the thicket; and, as there was no longer any question of secrecy, since the piquet had been roused by Nadine's musket-shot, the three Japanese fired in a rage upon Yoshio and Nadine, Sub-Lieutenant Gheta now remembering in this new light Yoshio's strange answers and manner during the earlier part of the night. "Traitor!" was shouted, but the fugitives were not hit either by the Japanese shots or by those pouring from the Russian piquet, for Yoshio had leapt into a sort of gut or cleft, and was running wild with his burden he knew not whither — down hill and eastward.

In three minutes the night was loud with firing. Each of the Russian outpost-piquets was connected by alarm-wires with the camp, which was soon pouring out its hosts into the mountain-trenches. Miles of the mountain-top broke into crackling, and cannon like watch-dogs began to boom at the darkness, having no other target.

It was all this noise that General Prince Devriloff heard about three in the morning at his headquarters, three versts to westward; it turned his mind from the scent of violets which had been plaguing him all that night to the scent of powder; and leaping upon his charger, he galloped with his staff toward the supposed battle.

A kind of battle was really going on, but it was a battle in which each side was hopelessly in the dark as to the other's whereabouts. The Japanese battalion and a half which had been posted low down the mountain to await the signal of the adventurers, hearing fire on a large scale, believed that they were being attacked; but they knew that they were in dead ground from the Russian trenches on the heights, and therefore believed that they were being attacked from a hill that ran north and south along the mountain-face above them — a belief in which they were strengthened by catching sight of two Russian forms silhouetted on the hill against the sky-line in the glare of a shell shot from the mountain-top; but these two "Russian" forms were only Yoshio in his Russian tunic and Nadine. The Russians on their part believed that that same hill was held in force by the Japanese when the Japanese replied to their fire, since their mountain-top was in dead ground from fire below the hill; and in this belief they were strengthened by catching sight on one part of the hill-top of some twenty of the Japanese adventurers, who were then in flight down the mountain to rejoin the battalion. Both sides, therefore, were firing in the dark night upon an empty hill, where only Yoshio and Nadine were.

Yoshio, who had a deep breath and could run far, had run with Nadine in his arms as long as he could, then they had run side by side, talking all the time in a disjointed, hysterical way, their aim being to get beyond the hill-top and so reach the Japanese lines, for they had no fear of being shot by Japanese fire; but they had no sooner run up the western hill-slope than bullets from the east — from the Japanese — sang past their heads; at the same time a Russian twelve-pounder burst ten yards from them. “Lie down!” cried out Yoshio and Nadine together; and they lay down, for they could run further neither way, being on an open hill-top between two fires.

“Let us go into that hut there,” panted Nadine.

“It is not bullet-proof,” said Yoshio, “we shall be shot anyway.”

“Do you think that we shall?” said Nadine. “We are together.”

“Come, then,” said Yoshio, “but do not lift your head.”

They crawled on the belly along a dark footpath under trees, till they came to a garden-gate, and by it passed into a hut; there, lying on the earthen floor, they could hear branches crashing down and bark being ripped off where the fire swept in squalls. They could not see each other, it was so dark, but their arms were round each other’s neck, and their faces were together.

“I have felt that I shall die of the wound in my arm,” said Nadine, having anon to lift her voice for the noise; “I could not show it to the surgeon, for then they would have known that it is I who am ‘the girl,’ and it is getting all inflamed. I have had such a fever to-day! I nearly slept on sentry. But I shall not die now, not of that.”

“Your skin is fearfully hot,” said Yoshio. “Does your head ache now so badly?”

“Yes, it does ache; but that will be well now.”

“No, this hut is far from bullet-proof,” said Yoshio, all their talk being disjointed, hysterical, hardly answering each other’s, but flying off to new subjects. “I wish we could find better cover. Both sides are shooting at tis like devils. They shouted ‘traitor’ after me, the cranes.”

“It was hard to be shot by you,” said Nadine without answering him; “I could not tell you of that. It felt as-if it was the good God who kept on shooting at me, and did not love me any more, so that I had nothing left anywhere. And I pitied you as much as myself. But why did you not get my note-book before? Have you read of my scenting violets on that 25th of March, the day when you left Irkutsk?”

“Yes, I have read it. I shall go out and look for better cover. Did you hear a bullet crash through the wall? It is only made of mud. What a bombardment! — what an uproar! — what have we done to them? Did they expect me to leave you to be killed by them?”

“They must be shooting at one another, not at us; only, we are between.... Yes, and I scented them again when I was in the Shini Maru and you were in the other steamer: I am sure that I scented them. And we shall not be killed to-night, or I should have scented them again, but I have not. After all, we are together, and it was not in vain what we have done and suffered, for we are together, if only once. I wish I had some more water. Have you any?”

“I did not bring any water with me. How you are trembling in spasms!”

“It is the fever; I felt as if I must die on sentry, but now I feel all awake, only thirsty, and a bright light seems to burn in my head. How they are firing! The Japanese must be going to charge the hill.... I cannot believe that we are together — together. Oh, you do not know! Sometimes I seemed to be chasing a dream, to have left my home for a shadow, for something said to me: ‘There is no Yoshio, no husband, no midnight marriage, no world, no God, no anything — you have only dreamt all this, and you are a little foolish magpie who has gone out like a Quixote battling after a fancy of your brain.’ Then my heart used to fail me for weariness, for I am only a young girl, and I would then wish for death. But here you are beside me now — I handle you — this can’t be a dream of my brain also. In an hour’s time the dawn will lighten, and I shall then see your face.”

At this moment Yoshio at the top of his voice shouted out in his own language: “Gods, we are undone! Save her!” for he felt himself being buried under a flood of earth, as a mortar-shell from the north-west laid low the north wall of the hut. Under this rage of fire and earth they lay hushed for some minutes, no more daring to speak than if that which is above man had visited them in thunder. At last Yoshio panted to her —

“Nadine. Are you hurt? Speak!”

“Not much hurt. Are you?” said Nadine.

“No. It was mortar, that. Gods, have mercy upon us! Mortar is very searching. It is wonderful that we were not shot. The next will blow us and the hut too away from here, and this is the night of our death, Nadine.”

“Perhaps we may escape,” said Nadine, trembling; “the others may not chance to come so near.”

“Let us move. There is a table just there, which we will put on its side against the wall.”

“But perhaps the next one will strike just where we move to: it might be lucky to keep just where we are, and trust in God.”

“No, come.”

Yoshio leapt up out of the débris, Nadine followed him, and in a flurry of haste they tilted up a table of logs, laid one of its edges on the south wall, and lay down between table and wall.

“You are trembling terribly,” said Yoshio.

“It was so terrible,” answered Nadine, “and the fever, too: it moves about in me, and the parts of me where it is not burning shiver with cold.”

“This comes of your going into the army again when you had once left it. You should have stayed in the house of the priest till I came to you.”

“But I was sure of meeting you at Newchwang! And when I got there and did not see you, what could I do but come on with the other prisoners, since I had no money, and no one to help me or to interpret for me in the town? I was only there twenty minutes, and then I had to go away without having seen you... The musketry-fire seems to be slackening, and no more shells are falling now.”

“There is a mortar that has us on the left flank, one or two of them; they will fire again presently, for I had a dream of this.”

“Perhaps we shall escape; this is a large hill.... Did you see Suyematsu and Oyei at Oyosaka?”

“I saw an old woman in a chaya who caused me to run from her with the tale which she told me of you.... The whole of that wall is down; the breeze is blowing in the spray of the rain.”

“That was the old Oyouki whom you saw in her chaya! Yes, they lead a happy life there; the butterflies in the forest are larger than my two hands, and it is there that we should go to live, if the firing would stop. I could have been happy there, but I would not through longing for you, and something said to me, ‘You may never have another chance to be happy.’ Do you think — ?”

What Nadine was about to say was broken in upon by a noise and a wind — the noise of a shell which came along the ground, bumped against the table, climbed it, and fell back to the ground without bursting. The table jumped, cracked, and dropped back upon its legs, after jamming Yoshio and Nadine against the wall, and breaking some of Yoshio’s left ribs.

Nothing was said for sometime after this. The drizzle had turned into a rain, for the firing was unsettling the weather, and spray filled the broken hut, though there was not much of a wind. Presently Nadine, frightened at the silence of Yoshio, asked him if he was hurt. Yoshio groaned.

“You are hurt, Yoshio!” cried out Nadine in the tone of an accusation.

“I am in pain,” said Yoshio. “Are you hurt?” Nadine sat up and lifted his head on her thigh. “Oh, lie down,” groaned Yoshio, “lie down!”

“Tell me, where are you hurt?” asked Nadine, who felt her hands wet with his blood.

“I do not know,” answered Yoshio; “in the left side. It was the table. By the gods, that came roughly. Lie down, lie down! It was the table.”

“My little one! My sweetheart!” murmured Nadine.

“Are you hurt?”

“Have they killed you, my little one, my sweetheart?”

“It was the table that did it. There is a mortar, perhaps two, that has our range. I can’t — catch my breath.”

“I can’t help you, can I, my little one, my sweetheart?”

“It has just our range. We should have run before. You run now and risk the musketry.”

“My little one! My sweetheart!”

“Run, and then lie down. It came roughly upon the table, and it was the table that struck me.

“In pain, are you, my little one, my sweetheart?”

“It is my breath. It has winded me. Mortars are awful things. I can still feel you with me; my head is on your leg. Yes, I am dying, Nadine.”

“My little one! But you did love me with all your soul, did you not?”

“Yes, with all.”

“And I have loved you: we have had that much for our own, and have it always, have we not, my little one?”

“Yes, but you are still with me. I should have told you to run, for you will be killed here. Pah, there is something in my mouth. I wish I had some — Oh!”

A rifle-bullet, as Yoshio spoke, had passed through the west wall where the door was, and had entered his breast.

“I think I am shot now, Nadine,” said Yoshio.

“My little one! My sweetheart!” murmured Nadine, bending over his head.

“I am shot. My mouth has blood in it. My honoured father wished it. When I was a boy they gave me a gun, and wished me to shoot birds, but I would not. I only wished to sit in the woods and play the koto.”

“Speak to me in French, will you? It is I, it is Nadine, is it not?” — for Yoshio had spoken in Japanese, and in that din Nadine could not understand it.

“It is dark in the grave,” said Yoshio, still in Japanese; “the lark does not sing in it. Is that she still with me? Is it Nadine? Gods! her name is branded into my heart; the dust in the grave will whisper it to me. Kiss me, Nadine; you have been a queen for me.”

Nadine pressed his oozing lips with hers. "I am here, am I not?" said she. "It is Nadine, is it not?"

"Nadine, good-bye," said Yoshio again.

"But I am coming, too, am I not?" said Nadine. "Even if they do not kill me, I have still the wound and the fever, have I not?"

As she said this a little gust of four or five bullets swept into the hut, one of which shattered Yoshio's right knee. He groaned with a deeper pain. Nadine rocked herself a little from side to side, nursing his head, bending over him with murmurs.

For a time Yoshio lay still. All of a sudden, however, in the passion of death, the young man sent forth the gross and bubbling cry of "Water! Water!" a shout which terrified the young girl to the heart.

"Almighty God!" she now screamed out in a passion, "have pity!"

After some seconds of hesitation, during which she quaked from head to foot, she put down his head from her leg, and jumped up to go to seek water outside, in spite of the rain of bullets there, for she had no water with her, having in her fever emptied her bottle while on sentry. But even as she leapt up she was all in the midst of flame, smoke and shrapnel: a shell had burst some yards from the north side of the hut, whereat the walls all fell away. Yoshio was burnt, and Nadine burnt and mortally maimed. She dropped down near the spot whence she had risen.

Presently, finding Yoshio at hand, she raised her body, replaced his charred head in her lap, and so sat, rocking herself, staring and daft with awe, horribly hurt, but still stubborn. In one minute, however, she had to fall back to the ground again.

By that time the darkness was lifting; the musketry-fire which had been going on nearly an hour was slackening, especially that from the heights; and, about ten minutes after Nadine fell, the Japanese cheered in victory, and, to the astonishment of the Russians, charged up the hill, only to be themselves astonished at finding no one at the top but Nadine with the head of Yoshio on her. They were met by fire from the trenches on the heights, but at the same moment their bugle was sounding the retire, and they ran back down without any loss. In fact, as is the way with night-operations, the 300,000 rounds of shot fired on each side had hurt no one, except the two fugitives who had been caught in the storm of lead.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE END

TWO OF THE Japanese, on gaining the hill-top, had seen Yoshio and Nadine; soon, therefore, some stretcher-bearers with the Red Cross went up to bring them down to the Japanese side.

Nadine screamed out when she was touched, but still would not have her dead friend taken from her, putting out her hand and retaining his stretcher. So the men humoured her whim.

The story of Yoshio's treason was by this time spread through the regiment, but as yet Baron M — only, who had been reading Nadine's notebook, and the colonel knew the cause of that treason. These two walked with the stretchers to the dressing-station.

The surgeon shrugged his shoulders when he saw Nadine, she was so far beyond his skill.

"It is not a soldier, surgeon-major," said the colonel, "but a young girl: something must be done to put her out of her pain."

The surgeon gave her a little morphia. She was then put on a spring-bed in a wagon and taken across the valley eastward. It was nearly day now, but the voice of no bird but the cock was to be heard, the air was wet with rain, the leaves on the ground were soaked, and a bleak wind of autumn blew. The valley was empty: no shepherd gave to the sheep their morning-washing, for the last of the villagers had fled; the battalion and a half had returned to camp. Baron M — walked by the side of the wagon in which was Nadine, in which also was the body of his son, whose black face he could no longer recognize. They wended up the road to the Japanese hills and to the camp, where Nadine was put on the little bed in the tent which was being used by the baron. All the camp was now gossiping of what had happened, of Yoshio's act, and the muddle of the night-operation.

Baron M — sat by the side of the young girl, the surgeon sat at her head, and the colonel stood at her feet. She had on a coarse blue gown, for her burnt clothes had easily come away from her at the dressing-station. She lay in sleep, panting in a galloping, light way.

Presently the colonel stooped to Baron M — , whispering: "Shall I send to tell her father?"

"No," answered the baron.

"Ah, you think not," said the colonel.

"This girl," said the baron, "is the wife of my son. She has chosen to leave her father and come across a continent to my son. She has no father but me."

"Well, if you think that true—" said the colonel, and nothing more was said. Soon afterwards the colonel went out.

Nadine was then murmuring to herself, repeating the name of her old nurse, Ivan Shtcherbakoff, for she thought that she was at Irkutsk, looking at a church called the church of Gregory of Nyssa facing her hotel, after hearing that Yoshio was not in Irkutsk. Soon, however, her mind came back to her, she opened a little her right eye, the left being blind, and, after looking a little round, said in a whispering voice to Baron M — : "They have taken him from me."

The baron bent over her, saying: "Do you wish him to be here? It might be better not."

"Are you his father?" she asked.

“Yes.”

“Let him be with me,” said she.

“I will,” said he.

The baron went out, and soon Yoshio was brought in, covered over with a macintosh. His head was placed near to Nadine’s, with his stretcher at right-angles to her bed. She glanced at the covered form, and almost smiled, whispering to Baron M — , “You are good.”

The baron bent over her with the whisper, “Not very good.”

“Do not kill my father,” whispered the dying breath of Nadine: “he is already unfortunate.”

“I will not, then,” replied the baron.

“I should like to see him,” said Nadine.

The baron did not answer to this.

“He is my father,” whispered Nadine, “and you are my father. Can I see him?”

“Yes,” answered the baron; “anything that you wish I will do.”

“If I had gone to you, you would have done whatever I wished,” whispered Nadine.

“Perhaps not,” said the baron, “but now I will. Only ask, and I will.”

“Look at him, he lies still,” said the young girl, turning her eye a little with half a smile toward the form under the macintosh.

“Yes, he lies still,” repeated the baron.

“He did not wish to do any harm ne voulait faire de mal à personne),” said the young girl.

“Nor did you,” whispered the baron, getting up and going away; but he returned to the tent in a few minutes, after having spoken with the colonel outside, and sat with her. Nadine fell into dreams again, breathing like one very near to death.

It became ten o'clock, but within the bell-tent it remained dim, for the opening was small, and the day misty and wet. At ten-fifteen a Chinaman, led by the sergeant-of-the-guard, appeared at the tent-door with a paper which he handed to the baron — a note from Prince Ching and General Ma, asking if they could see the baron at once.

“Say no,” was the baron’s short answer.

Then on a sudden, at ten-thirty, an agitated man in grey breeches with scarlet stripes appeared at the tent-door, his breath venting in puffs from his nostrils, his swarthy skin now wan. It was Prince Devriloff, led by the colonel.

The prince’s stooped head suddenly prying into the tent took Baron M — unawares, though the baron had sent for him. The baron leapt up from bending over Nadine. The two enemies looked into each other’s face, the prince without any malice in his eyes, for perfect grief casts out malice, but the baron, for one moment, with the malice of habit. Then the baron moved away from the bed as far as he could get, whereat the prince, without saying anything, hurried to the bedside, and stood over his daughter.

He no longer saw there the pert and lovely young girl who had worn her fur toques cocked a little aside, with short dresses fitting her hips like a glove, and the damask-rose in her cheeks; her left cheek was now baked hard, so that her smile was an attempt on the right side only, and she was bald. Sobs that hardly made any sound shook the prince’s bosom as he looked down at her. He had had many calamities in this life, so that his shoulders were rather bowed with them; his infant son had been burnt to death, his race almost cut off, and he had always pretended to take it with a hard-headed mockery at fate: but at this sight of Nadine, his best-beloved, his heart was broken, and, falling down presently by the bedside, he had to humble himself in the presence of “his old enemy, and give vent to the sounds of his grief.

The surgeon, who had sat with the dying girl, doing what little services he could for her, went out at this, and Baron M — , too, went out, leaving the prince alone with Yoshio and Nadine for some time.

Nadine once again woke to sense between eleven o’clock and noon, turned her dim eye at the form of Yoshio, almost smiled in her momentary way, and whispered the word “Papa.”

She was now panting very fast toward her last earthly goal, with that look of scare still to be seen on her face, as on the faces of those who have come through flames of fire. The doctor and Baron M — were again present, the latter fascinated to the tent, but standing away back against the canvas, as though nearness to the prince was pestilence. The prince sat over his daughter.

“Papa,” whispered Nadine presently, while the prince bent down his ear to hear, “forgive—”

She failed, but on making another effort, whispered: “Forgive Ivan Shtcherbakoff.”

Then, five minutes later, she whispered: “Je souffre — I suffer.”

After this she never said anything, but presently seemed, by a motion of the eye and head, to wish Baron M — to come to her. When the baron came, she took his right hand in hers, and tried to draw it to her father’s hand. The baron, however, resisted this drawing, and she could not take hold of her father’s and the baron’s hands together, for she had only one hand, her left fingers being half burned away. She therefore let go the baron’s hand, took hold of her father’s, and tried to draw it toward Baron M — ‘s hand. But her father, too, resisted, kissing her with floods of tears.

Still she would have her way, but still her father resisted the drawing of her hand.

“Just to humour her, then,” whispered Baron M — to the prince.

The baron held out his hand, and the prince took it, each with the shadow of a smile at the down-turned corners of his lips.

A few minutes after this Nadine had ceased to live.

It was then close to the stroke of noon.

By this time the regiment knew the truth that the little Russian soldier who had been killed was a young girl, the daughter of Prince Devriloff; that Yoshio’s treason was on account of this little one; that she, the Russian, was the wife of Yoshio, the Japanese; that she had left her palace home and crossed over half the world through snow, and lived the life of the common soldier, and passed through the flames of war, in order to come to him, and then had found him only to die with him. The little Japanese soldiers spoke together of this in low, and sometimes choked, voices all that day. When Prince Devriloff passed away through the camp, it was between men who stood with their heads bowed and bared, and their eyes on the ground.

In camps news and rumours fly fast, and cause deep emotions. Before afternoon the story was being told and retold, sometimes with over-drawn details, in many of the Japanese camps and in many of the Russian; it had spread by evening through the two armies. When the simple-hearted Russian soldiers heard it, they embraced one another, and shed tears.

The reason of the failure of the night-operation had been telegraphed to Tokio, for Yoshio’s treason was a matter of great importance, since the camp of the 69th Regiment, upon which the attempt had been made, was supposed to be somehow “the key” of the Russian position; but in Tokio also the story of Yoshio and Nadine had the same effect as in the army. The Emperor of Japan ordered his condolences to be conveyed to both Baron M — and Prince Devriloff, and suggested a funeral with something of military honours for the two ill-fated young soldiers.

The Tsar, on his side, telegraphed much the same thing.

At the funeral the next evening the regiments of both of the two dead were allowed to be present and lined the road through the valley, many of the Japanese bearing branches of the mournful sakaki, the sacred tree of the Shintos. There the big, friendly Russian put his arm about the little Jap, and the Jap, with sweet retort, put his about the Russian, for they mixed together, as they waited for the funeral in a drizzly twilight, till far away the muffled boomings of the drum smote upon the ear and heart, and then, long afterwards, as the funeral crawled nearer, Chopin's dead-march wailing, and then the wheels of the gun-carriage with the coffins on it crunching quite near at last in the mud.

The coffins could not be seen, each being covered with both the Russian and the Japanese ensigns, the saltire and the rising sun; in front of the gun-carriage went the firing-party with their arms reversed, behind it Nadine's company, then Yoshio's; then followed officers of several regiments of both armies; and among these, side by side on horses, pretending to be unconscious of each other, Prince Devriloff and Baron M — .

When the wailing of the dead-march had passed too far off to be any longer heard, or even the piercing cries of the shono-fues blown by the Shinto priests, still the boomings of the drum smote upon the ear and heart of the crowd which lined the road. All stood uncovered, and many tears were shed.

There was no church in the valley; the Russian chaplain read the service over a grave which had been dug in a little grove near the village.

At the graveside stood Prince Devriloff and Baron M — together, for this had to be done for decency.

Yoshio's coffin was lowered first, then Nadine's. The shades of night gathered fast as the marl dropped upon them. A Russian lieutenant presently called out a word-of-command, whereat the firing-party, made up of Russians and Japanese, presented arms; and three volleys were fired over the grave.

All was now over and done; the mourners departed on their several ways from the grave; the two crowds were marched back to their camps; and the two lovers were left to the loneliness of the valley.

But twenty minutes afterwards two men met on foot by the grave — the prince and the baron, for each had only pretended to go away, and wished to brood a little alone by the grave of his child. They gave a start of surprise when they found themselves face to face once more in that dark spot, and nothing was said for a minute or two; then the baron, striking his hand into the hand of the prince, wrung it, saying in a low voice, "the will of God, prince."

He then at once walked away.

As soon as he returned to camp, a Chinese messenger brought him a note, asking if he would now see his two high Chinese visitors. "Yes," was the baron's answer; but before the two Chinese had come to him, he had torn into four pieces that warlike document which they were partly there to see him sign.

Later in the same evening the baron refused to see Kotohito, the Socialist editor, who was also there to urge upon him the uses, just then, of worldwide war. In fact, the baron, more far-sighted than his friends, had everywhere observed during the last two days the growth of a new mood which changed the genius of the moment, and made waiting wise.

The same night he sent to Prince Devriloff Nadine's note-book and Yoshio's belt; the prince in return sent to him some of Nadine's furs which she had left at the inn at Karinsk on the evening when she first put on soldier's clothes.

From the acorn the oak grows, and great things from small. Nations are made of men, and history of the moods of men. The soldiers, for instance, who had wept together at the burial of Yoshio and Nadine, could hardly just afterwards kill one another; and because of this the course of history was turned.

In Japan the story of the lovers had in two days so wonderfully spread, that even in remote villages torch-light processions bore on banners the names of Yoshio and Nadine. On hearing a mention of those names, men, women and children uttered the cry, "a thousand years!"

In many parts of Russia something of the same kind happened, the story of Yoshio and Nadine soon acquiring in country places the homeliness of a folk-tale. Thus, like the kingdom of God, it spread, the leaven leavening the whole lump, till the love of two children became the friendship of two peoples, and the peace, in its time, came.

CHAPTER XXIV

THE BEGINNING

HEAR, HOWEVER, BARON M — prophesying Change! It was two weeks after the peace, in a hall of teeming, manufacturing Osaka, with a great throng of the workers in the hall before him, and Messrs. England and Petersen there, cheering for joy, and many Tiger-hunters; and he cries out:

“Yes, the peace has come, more perhaps through the influence of a foolish boy and a sweet girl than some of you know. Not quietness, however, and good cheer, but work, and a hard lip, is the call of your age. A hundred years ago a word was spoken, honourable friends, and the four winds took it up — Egalité! Time is in pain with it, the stars in their courses fight for it; this late war was a war on behalf of it; the womb of the world is in love with it. Would you like to be prosperous, and go far, and be borne on a strong stream? Then, be on the side of it. Say good-bye to the past! — a fond goodbye, if you like, but, if you love your skins, say, good-bye. For the twentieth century, I tell you, will have nothing to do with the sixteenth. To the nation that loves the sixteenth, and the crooning of hymns on fête-days, she says: ‘Yes, love the sixteenth, and croon the dear old hymns at street-corners: but as for Me, I am large and in haste, and can’t wait for you.’ Upon every sort of aristocracy, of bladder importance, or pretty sham, She turns a chill smile: for not fancies, I say, but fact, not loudness but arithmetic, not prestige but merit, shall reap her greatly good things. Yes, the word has been spoken; for a hundred years it has been at work: see how already its meaning has widened, meaning no more the equality of man with man merely, but of people with people, of woman with man, of peasant with Tsar, of yellow with white — nay, of ape and dog and tadpole with human. A hundred years, I say: but more than that: for its inventor was a Jewish workman with the brain of a God who lived two thousand years ago; but it was invented over again by France — France, the brain of the world, the child of Reason, the wild-eyed mother of liberty, the glory of the past, the grace and leaven of the present, the hope of the future. She will carry it still farther — it will work and work; and it is the destiny of your brothers in China, and of you here also, in your smaller way, to have a high hand in its triumph. Let us, then, be keen and diligent: let us all shout together: Long live the twentieth century! down with aristocrats, whether they be men or nations! long live the revolution...”

THE END

The Last Miracle (1906)

CONTENTS

THE LAST MIRACLE

CHAPTER I

CHAPTER II

CHAPTER III

CHAPTER IV

CHAPTER V

CHAPTER VI

CHAPTER VII

CHAPTER VIII

CHAPTER IX

CHAPTER X

CHAPTER XI

CHAPTER XII

CHAPTER XIII

CHAPTER XIV

CHAPTER XV

CHAPTER XVI

CHAPTER XVII

CHAPTER XVIII

CHAPTER XIX

CHAPTER XX

CHAPTER XXI

CHAPTER XXII

CHAPTER XXIII

CHAPTER XXIV

CHAPTER XXV

CHAPTER XXVI

CHAPTER XXVII

CHAPTER XXVIII

APPENDIX

THE LAST MIRACLE

By M. P. SHIEL

*Author of "The Yellow Danger," "The Lord of the Sea,"
"The Evil that Men do," "The Yellow Wave," etc.*

LONDON
T. WERNER LAURIE
CLIFFORD'S INN
1906

The first edition's title page

“My domain how lordly large, sublime!
Time’s my domain; my seedfield’s Time.”

THE LAST MIRACLE

TOWARDS THE END of May 1900 the writer received as noteworthy a letter and packet of papers as it has been his lot to examine. They came from a good friend of mine, a Dr A. Lister Browne, M.A. Oxon., F.R.C.P., whom, as it happened that for some years I had been living mostly in France, and Browne being in Norfolk, I had not seen during my visits to London. Moreover, as we were both bad correspondents, only three notes had passed between us in the course of those years.

But in the May of 1900 there reached me the letter — and the packet — to which I refer, the packet consisting of four note-books full of shorthand, the letter also pencilled in shorthand, and this letter, together with the note-book marked “I,” I now publish.

[The note-book marked “II.” has already appeared under the title of “The Lord of the Sea,” and that marked “III.” under the title of “The Purple Cloud,” each in three languages; while that marked “IV.” has been judged unsuitable to publication.]

The following is Browne’s letter: —

“Dear old Man, — I have been thinking of you, wishing that you were here to give me a last squeeze of the hand before I — go. Four days ago I felt a soreness in the throat, so in passing by old Johnson’s surgery at Selbridge, I asked him to have a look at me. He muttered something about membranous laryngitis which made me smile; but by the time I reached home I was hoarse, and not smiling: before night I had stridor. I at once telegraphed to London for Horsford, and he and Johnson have been opening my inside and burning it with the cautery, so I am breathing easier now, and it is wonderful how little I suffer; but I am too old a hand not to know what's what: the bronchi are involved — too far, and, as a matter of fact, there isn't any hope. Horsford is still fondly hoping to add me to his successful-tracheotomy statistics; but I have bet him not, and the consolation of my death will be the beating of a specialist in his own line.

"I have been arranging some of my affairs, and remembered these note-books which I intended letting you have long ago; but you know my habit of putting things off, and, moreover, the lady was alive from whose mouth I took down the words. She is now dead, and, as a man of books, you should be interested, if you can manage to read them.

"I am under a little morphia at present, propped up in a nice little state of languor, so I will give you in the old Pitman's something about her. Her name was Miss Mary Wilson; she was about thirty when I met her, forty-five when she died, and I knew her all those fifteen years. Do you know anything of the philosophy of the hypnotic trance? That was the relation between us — hypnotist and subject. She suffered from tic of the fifth nerve, had had all her teeth drawn before I knew her, and an attempt had been made to wrench out the nerve by the external scission. But it made no difference: all the clocks in purgatory tick-tacked in that poor woman's jaw, and it was a mercy of Providence that ever she came across me.

"Well, you never knew anyone so weird in appearance as my friend, Miss Wilson. Medicineman as I am, I could never see her without a shock, she so suggested what we call 'the other world.' Her brow was lofty, her lips thin, her complexion ashen, and she was execrably emaciated; her eyes were of the hue of mist; at forty her wisp of hair was withered to white.

"She lived almost alone in old Marsham manor-house, five miles from Ash Thomas, and I, just beginning in these parts at the time, soon took up my residence at the manor, she insisting that I should give up myself to her.

“Well, I quickly found that in the state of trance Miss Wilson possessed very queer powers — queer, I mean, not because peculiar to herself in kind, but because so far-reaching in degree. Most people are now talking with an air of discovery about the reporting powers of the mind in its trance state, as though the fact had not been fully known to every old crone since the Middle Ages; but the certainty that someone in a trance in Manchester may tell what is going on in Glasgow was not, of course, left to the discovery of an office in Fleet Street, and the psychical people in establishing the fact for the public have not gone one step towards explaining it.

“But, speaking of poor Miss Wilson, I say that her powers were queer because so special in quantity. I believe it to be a fact that, in general, the powers of trance manifest themselves with respect to space, as distinct from time: the spirit roams in the present, travels over a plain, doesn’t usually astonish one by huge ascents or descents. I fancy that this is so. But Miss Wilson’s gift was queer to this degree, that she travelled in every direction, and easily in all but one, north and south, up and down, in the past, the present, and the future.

“This much I soon got to find out. She would give out a stream of sounds in the trance state — I can hardly call it speech, so murmurous, yet guttural, was the utterance, mixed with puffy breath-sounds at the lips, this state being accompanied by contraction of the pupils, failure of the knee-jerk, rigour, and a rapt expression, so I got into the habit of tarrying for hours by her bedside, fascinated by her, trying to catch the news of those musings which came mounting from her mouth; and in the course of months my ear learned to make out the words: ‘the veil was rent’ for me also, and I was able to follow somewhat the trips of her straying spirit.

“At the end of six months I heard her one day repeat some words which were familiar to me. They were these: ‘Such were the arts by which the Romans extended their conquests, and attained the palm of victory; and the concurring testimony of different authors enables us to describe them with precision....' I was startled: they are part of Gibbon's 'Decline and Fall,' which I readily guessed that she had never read.

"I said in a stern voice: 'Where are you?'

"She replied: 'Us are in a room, eight hundred miles above. A man is writing. Us are reading.'

"I may tell you two things: first, that in trance she never spoke of herself as 'I' but, for some reason, as 'us': 'us are,' she would say, 'us will'; secondly, that when wandering in the past she represented herself as being above (the earth?), and higher the farther back she went; in describing present events she appears to have felt herself on (the earth); while, as to the future, she always declared that 'us' were so many miles 'within' (the earth).

"To her excursions in this last direction, however, there seemed to exist certain limits: I say seemed, for I can't be sure, and only mean that she never, in fact, went far in this direction. Three, four thousand 'miles' were common figures in her mouth in describing her distance 'above'; but her distance 'within' never got beyond sixty-three. She appeared, in relation to the future, to be like a diver in the sea who, the deeper he dives, finds a more resistant pressure, till at no great depth resistance grows to prohibition, and he can no further dive.

"I am afraid I can't go on, though I had a good deal to tell you about this lady. During fifteen years, off and on, I sat listening by her couch to her murmurs. At last my ear could catch the meaning of her briefest breath. I heard the 'Decline and Fall' almost from beginning to end. Some of her reports were the merest twaddle; over others I have hung in a sweat of interest. About the fifth year it struck me that I might just as well jot down some of her mouthings, and the note-book marked 'I.' belongs to the seventh year. Its history is this: I heard her one afternoon murmuring in the tone which she used when reading, asked her where she was, and she replied: 'Us are forty-five miles within: us read, and another writes'; from which I concluded that she was some forty to sixty years in the future. I believe you may find it curious, if you are able to read my notes.

"But no more of Mary Wilson now, and a little of A. L. Browne, F.R.C.P.! — with a breathing-tube in his trachea, and Eternity under his bed now. Isn't that a curious beast, my dear boy, the thing you call a 'modern man'? Is he not? Here am I writing to you about Miss Mary Wilson and her freights of froth, and all the time I know what this frame of mine will be to-morrow night; I know and am not afraid. Am I a saint, then? At least a hero? No, I am a modern man, a know-nothing. The Lord have mercy upon my never-dying soul! if my soul is never-dying, and if ... rather a mess.

"Well, no more now. I know you will think of me sometimes. You will have to, by the way, because I am making you one of my executors. 'A long farewell!' ..."

Here begins the Note-book marked I."

CHAPTER I

MY VISIT TO SWANDALE

I HAVE BEEN asked by the publishers who bring out this book to add yet a mite to the mass of writing which has appeared in regard to the late events, for how are the mighty fallen! and, as when an oak announces its downfall through the forest, so here it was only natural that the little fowl should fly and flap, with outcries (sometimes) of sharp shrillness! Much, then, has been written and said; and if I now place my small word with the books already sprung out of what we call “The Revival” and, rather blatantly, the “Abolition of Christianity,” my excuse lies in the circumstance that during those storms I was much with Aubrey Langler, and that, long before those events, I was probably his closest friend.

I can, therefore, give details as to that gracious life and the strifes in which he had a hand not very possible to another writer.

It was my way to stay with Langler at least thrice a year. My crowded town-life was a rude enough contrast with his eremite mood, so I rarely failed to avail myself of his invitations. Of these he gave me one in the August of the year of the Pope’s visit, and shortly afterwards I started for Alresford (Swandale lies five miles north-west of Alresford by carriage-road).

There happened to travel in the rail-train with me a remarkable man: certainly, I think that I never beheld a larger human being, except in an exhibition. We were alone in my carriage, and I was able to take note of him. His vast jacket was of satin, and from every button ran two cords of silk, ending in a barrel-shaped ornament of silk, such as used, I believe, to be called “frogs”; his shirt was frilled and limp; and he wore four or five rings. This was enough to prove him a foreigner, though otherwise his dress was ordinary. He sat with his fat legs wide apart, smiling at the world in the most good-humoured, yet sneering way, showing some very long top teeth.

All the time his hand travelled to and fro, fro and to, in a rub along the tightly-clad length of his thigh.

The man seemed most happy. From the manner in which his eyes, half hid by their sleepy lids, hovered anon upon me, I could see that he was longing to speak out some of his self-satisfaction; and after some short time he did indeed speak, saying with a drowsy drawl through his nostrils, exhibiting the sneer of his teeth, and speaking English without a hint of foreignness:

“The landscape is not displeasing to me. Oh no; it is not so bad. There now, you see, that little farm: it is not so bad. But it is not romantic — not plantureux. It would be strange to me if the English were other than they are. The English are an exact expression of England — their character, constitution, Church, everything. The cliffs of Dover, now. Cæsar might have foretold their future from their mere appearance as he approached them; a traveller might just look at them from his ship, and go back home saying: ‘I know the English’ — if he be a man of force and grasp and insight. Oh no; that is a little hyperbole perhaps — my little tendency to hyperbole. But, I assure you, the landscape does not displease me....”

In this way he went on purring; did not stop; would not permit me to say anything. His utterance was lazy, nasal; and ever and anon he pipped from his lips, as he droned and rubbed his thigh, a dry pin-point of nothing: this, one could see, was a habit of his being. I cannot now recall a thousandth part of his talk, but I do recall that, as he droned on and on from topic to topic, this thought roved through my brain: “But what a head! what a fount of ideas!”

The man made upon me an impression of great grossness, perhaps from his big bulk, or his manner of ironing his thigh, or his ejection of nothings, or that wallowing in his own self-satisfaction. Round his chin and cheeks ran a bandage of iron-grey beard; his hair was scanty, and bald at the temples, where his forehead ran up into two gulfs of bare skin, so that the skimpy region of hair on his great head resembled a jacket much too small for the person who wears it.

A few minutes before our arrival at Alresford something led him to tell me that he was about to join the house-party of the Prime Minister at Goodford. His servants, I soon saw, were in the carriage next to ours, for as the train drew up a valet ran out to help his master to alight, but his master coolly made use of my shoulder to help himself out as he limped heavily to the platform, and did it with such an air of patronage and old friendship, that, for the life of me, I couldn’t help feeling flattered.

I suppose that to be caressed by a force is always pleasant — the purring of a petted cat! — and I understood that the Baron Gregor Kolár was a force.

For now I knew his already well-known name, inasmuch as, after turning away from me on the platform, he turned again, fumbled fretfully for his card, and gave it me. I gave him mine. Then, with a bow-legged rolling of gait which bowled his head aside at each stride, he strolled to the brougham awaiting him.

His brougham and mine ran along the same road for some distance — Goodford, his bourne, being only five miles from Swandale — till we parted at a meeting of roads, and he passed from my mind for a season.

CHAPTER II

THE WREN

AS I WENT on towards Swandale the thought suddenly struck me that my driver's back was strange to me. I bent forward, and asked him what, then, had become of Robinson.

"I wish I could tell you, sir," was his answer, "but seemingly that's just what nobody knows."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Robinson has been missing for three days, sir," he said— "since Thursday noon, high or low, no one can find him: and cut up is what Mr and Miss Langler are about it."

This Robinson, a very handsome man, well under forty years, was a part of Swandale, and long known to me; but now the carriage rolled over broken stones, and I asked no more. Soon thereafter we passed into the gorge which runs into Swandale.

The fame of this vale is at present pretty far-spread, yet of the "pen-pictures" which have appeared of it I know of none which portrays half its witchery. The piling up of details is, in fact, fruitless, for not the pen, but the brush, is fashioned to paint. I may repeat, however, that the vale is an oval, the gorge being at the south-east, in which already the ear is caught by that sound of waters whose chant pervades the vale (the whole is not more than twelve hundred yards long and eight hundred wide), and one goes on through an air of perfumes to a giant portal, till, in contrast with the wildness of the approach, Swandale itself dawns upon the eye in all its rusticity — a rusticity attained by the touchiest art, for I think that throughout the dale there was not at that time a coo or a drain not due to the care of its designer. Langler had, in fact, given many years and the mass of his fortune to the making of this garden.

The house is not precisely in the centre of the oval, but towards the north-west, on an islet in the lake, the lake itself being an oval, and it is strange that waters so shaken can show so staringly every pebble and grayling in their deeps: shaken, for the ground north of the house mounts in terrace on terrace to the hills, and down these, all rowdy with laughter, darts a rout of waters which wash into the lake. On the wooden bridge looking east over the lake Langler and his sister stood awaiting me.

Langler was now a man of forty, with some silver in his hair, and Miss Emily at this time twenty-seven.

They formed something of a contrast, she was so much darker than he, for Langler had light, wavy hair, parted in the middle over the broadest brow, a brow parcelled up into lax fields by the furrows of “much learning.” He wore no hair on the face, save side-whiskers down the longish hollow of his cheeks, cheeks which looked no wider than the breadth of his broad chin: a massive countryman’s-face, yet with something wistful and ill-fated about the eyes and the thick lips, which ever bore a sad smile. His “bone-in-the-throat” drew the eye by its prominence! He always impressed one as being better groomed than other men, I never could tell why, since he was ever quite plainly dressed, but in the very pink of correctness somehow.

However, in a certain — shall I say cynicalness? — of look there was resemblance between the two — or, say, criticalness, scepticism: both had a trick of screwing up at the cheek-bones a little and piercing into anything new or curious that was in question.

It is commonly known now that both were beings of uncommon endowment, and so kin and kind were they, that they appeared to live, as it were, a twin life.

When we went into the cottage I found waiting to welcome me several men and women servants — a small crowd of much more than ordinary comeliness. Langler said then to me: “have you heard about my poor friend?”

It was nothing new for him to speak so of his servant, so I knew that he referred to Robinson, and replied: “I have heard something. Can’t you form any idea what has become of him?”

“No idea so far,” he answered; “I am giving my mind to it.”

“He should be found, then,” I said; at which Langler smiled.

Miss Emily was rather behind us in the passage, and at that moment I heard her say: “Aubrey, here is John running after us with something.”

I turned, and saw this John pelting up the boards embedded in the soil which served as steps from the bridge to the cottage. He held a spade in the left hand and some object on the right palm; Langler turned to him; and at once I saw that the thing on the man’s palm lived, fluttered a wing, was a bird.

“What!” said Langler, “a wren?”

“Why, it is ill,” said Miss Emily.

“I found it caught in the vine tendrils, miss,” said John.

Everybody bent over it.

“I have never seen it before,” said Langler.

“No, it is certainly a stranger,” said Miss Emily, “and what can that be round its leg?”

She was rather palish.

The thing round the leg was a piece of paper, wound with worsted.

And Langler, peering at it, said: “stay, I will undertake the cure of this wanderer.”

CHAPTER III

THE STYRIAN

SWANDALE COTTAGE IS very large, covering more than half of the island, but mostly one-storeyed, the roofs being of thatch made heavy with rocks, and the walls of marble kept snow-white by means of snakestone; but not much of the walls is visible, for the eaves of the roof droop so low that parts of them have had to be removed over the doors; and as most of the timber about the cottage is huge, the twilight within broods at noon. At the time of which I write candles burned in most of the rooms throughout the day in an atmosphere smoky with incense; for all within was a feeling of the ecclesiastical, everywhere the Church, monasticism, the vestment, the ritual, the Middle Ages, the mood of the altar.

I spent most of the day after my arrival — a Sunday — with Langer in his study, which was in a corner of the cottage, and looked like a great garret or barn with its black beams, its floor of black and red stone, its arras and bookshelves; the ottoman, fixed into a nook under a Christ in hone-stone, was covered with embroideries of the Armenian Church; three diamond-paned windows looked out upon some flower-beds and lawn and upon a slip of the lake seen through oak and poplar; on the desk stood a pyx-and-cross, with two candelabra of plain old gold, whose six candles more or less cancelled the gloom.

At breakfast I had asked him how the wren was faring, his answer had been evasive, but in the study he referred himself to it, saying, “you asked about the wren at breakfast, by which I understood you to ask about the paper round its leg. Now, I have been examining this paper, it bears some written words, and as they are unpleasant I didn't wish to speak of it before Emily. However, I will show it now to you."

He opened the pyx, took out a little curl of paper, and spread it on the desk. It was uneven at the edges, had been much begrimed, but with a magnifying-glass I contrived to read these words in the tiniest writing:

"Ich, der Pater Max Dees, bin ein ... ner im Sc ... des Barons Gregor ... Um Gottes Willen"; or: "I, Father Max Dees, am a ... 'ner' in the 'Sc' ... of Baron Gregor.... For God's sake."

"Notice the material of writing," said Langler.

"Not red ink?"

"No, blood. And the instrument of writing — —"

"Not a pen?"

"No, a pin, as you see from the downstrokes."

"But have you been able to fill in the blanks in the sentence?"

"In two at least of the three instances: for if a man writes with a pin and with blood he is certainly somehow a prisoner, and that seems to suggest the word ending in 'ner', namely, Gefangener. And, having that, we know the word beginning with 'Sc': for he could hardly be a prisoner in anything beginning with 'Sc' except a Schloss. So that we get that Father Max Dees is a prisoner in the castle of Baron Gregor Something; and he begs us for God's sake to do something: very likely he was interrupted in the act of writing it."

"But how on earth, I wonder, did he trap the wren in his prison?" I said.

"People in such situations do become ingenious," Langler answered.

"But will you take any steps in the matter?"

“Well, I suppose one must, for mercy’s sake,” he answered: “but what steps?”

“The first thing,” I said, “is to locate our priest: that is, to find out the full name of our Baron Gregor; but that is precisely what may be difficult.”

“No; I think not,” he answered; “you haven’t looked at the thread with which the paper was tied round the wren’s leg: just look now, though I doubt if it will give you any information, but Emily or John would know at once.”

After examining the thread under the glass I said No.

“Well,” he said, “over yonder among my flock are three goats, half-domesticated Styrian hill-goats, whose greyish undergrowth of mohair is woven undyed for underclothing in Upper Styrian villages, and, in spite of its long exposure, I feel sure that the fibre you are looking at is Styrian hill-goat wool, and a thread ravelled from some garment or other woven in Styria.”

“So that Father Max Dees probably is in some Styrian castle?”

“So it would seem, and we shall know which Styrian castle as soon as we run our eyes down some list of Styrian barons — unless there are two or more Gregors among them. At any rate, we shall have some information, and can then take some step to rid our backs of the burden of the matter. But where to find a list of Styrian barons?”

I answered that I didn’t know, but that there would be no difficulty about that. “But a Styrian wren!” I said. “How comes it in England in August — or at any time?”

“We shall have to get Emily to coach you in some of the more glaring facts of country-life,” Langler said, with a nod. “Don’t you know, really, that many wrens are winter birds? And as to the migratory ones, surely you know that hardly any kind of bird is reliable in its migrations. I once knew a cuckoo — but I won't talk Greek to a Scythian. They drift into strange tribes, you know, at the home-coming; they even change their nationality for a summer or for a lifetime. That bit of paper, remember, has been wafted at least twelve months on the wings of the wind, and mauled in the forests of midmost old Lybia, so that our prisoner may be already free — or dead. In any case, it seems an odd little trait of chance that the thing should come here — to me."

CHAPTER IV

THE RITUAL, THE STREET CORNER, THE DEATH-BED, AND THE BELLS

TOWARDS EVENING OF the same day I was sitting with Langer in a little dingle not far from the water, while down by the water's edge idled Miss Emily, feeding swans. I did not think that she was listening to our talk, or might divine it; but her lightness of ear was always very decided.

I had been telling Langer of the spectacle at Canterbury during Holy Week of that year. For the first time, I believe, since 1870 a Bishop of Rome had been permitted to leave the Vatican, and to pledge, as it were, the return of a prodigal, had pontificated High Mass in the metropolitan cathedral of England.

At that ritual I had been present, and Langer had been questioning me as to the conditions under which Tenebræ had been sung on the Wednesday night, and as to certain minutiae of the vestments worn by the orders during the liturgical drama of the Thursday. The rite was fresh in my memory, and he listened, I could see, keenly, as I went on to tell of the conveyance of the Pontiff from the dean's house; of the trumpets of the Noble Guard; of the reception of his Holiness by a procession of clergy, headed by the Bishop of Emmaus; of the last sound of the bell during the Gloria, and the clapper of the Sanctus and Canon; of the consecration of the holy oils, vase, oil-sticks, and chrism; of the twelve trumpets during Elevation; of the Communion, of which twelve bishops partook; of the conveyance of the wafer to an Altar of Repose; then of Vespers; of the antiphon “Diviserunt”; of “Deus, Deus meus” during the stripping of the altar; and of the ceremony of the night — the cope of violet, the washing and the wiping and the kissing of the right feet of the thirteen....

And as I spoke Miss Emily spun round from over her swans, and flung at us across the distance the words: “thus have they crucified to themselves afresh the son of man, and put him to an open shame.”

“Ah? Is that so?” asked Langer, with his smile.

“Happily,” I said, “nobody any longer cares, Emily.”

“Unhappily,” sighed Langer.

And, like an echo, there came from Miss Emily, who had not heard him: “unhappily!”

“But observe,” I said, “that this whole Canterbury gaudery remains illegal, for I have yet to hear that the Act of Uniformity has been repealed. Wouldn’t the civil power be competent, if it chose, to take action against someone?”

“I think so,” replied Langer, “if the civil power were not far too deeply indifferent to what takes place in Canterbury to rake up against it old laws which have become academic. Even thirty, twenty years ago what a howl of ‘popery!’ Now — nothing....”

“Yet,” I said, “I can’t think that indifference was quite the feeling of the nation with regard to the Pope’s visit; on the contrary, people seemed interested and pleased. With our much of numbness about the Church is there not, really, mixed a sort of interest?”

“In one class,” replied Langer— “in the class which has acquired a liking for charming rites and vestments in good taste. Hence the corporate reunion that has been growing up since the last century, till now it culminates, for the English Church got to see that it must more and more imitate its great old Mother and her graces if it was to retain any of the interest of the nation. It has, in fact, by this imitation retained some of the interest of one class, but we know that it is none of it a religious interest, but an æsthetic one; and as to the lower classes, no sort of interest has survived. In other words, while the dogmas of the Church have become mawkish to all, her dear altar-cloths and subcingula have continued pleasing to some — to you and me, for example.”

“But the end!” I said.

“Ah, the end,” he sighed, and we were silent for a while till he added: “ah, but talking of all that, I have not told you, have I, of our new rector? You shall hear! He is a man with a tragedy in his future, a brilliance in his past, and, to my mind, much loveliness in his present — though you may not say so. His name is Burton — a Harrow and King’s College man, the son of a successful undertaker of Belfast. He became a Bell Scholar and Browne’s Medallist before he was twenty-one, and was Senior Classic and Senior Chancellor’s Medallist very shortly after. Later on he was appointed lecturer, and got a tutorship. I don’t know what he did for some years, but I am told that he was offered the headmastership of Ardingly, which he refused: he said, mark you, that he wished to devote himself to pastoral work! Think of that for a modern person of that sort! Then the Prime Minister, hearing of his parts, offered him Ritching, which, you know, is in his gift, and at Ritching Burton now is, so you will not fail to come across him somewhere soon. But it is my belief that, if ever Edwards regretted a thing, it is this of grafting Burton under his nose here into Ritching. He has caught a Tartar in Burton, I can tell you. Burton believes! He is the last of the, let us say the — Barons. And he has quite the tone of the old-world type of priest and arch-priest — more lofty than Lucifer himself, in his quality of churchman, you understand, though underneath I believe him to be a dear, humble fellow. The living is worth three hundred pounds, and of that let us say thirty pounds is spent upon Dr Burton. The rest goes in needless ‘works’ among his flock — really his flock I mean, for Burton’s intellect still divides the world into Church and Sheep: he actually says ‘sheep.’ He breaks his fast at noon, in Advent and Lent not till five, and I hear of hair-cloths, and of midnight risings to recite the breviary office. Add to what I have said that the sermons which he preaches weekly to empty pews are undoubtedly the most brilliant, impassioned, inspired now anywhere uttered in the English tongue — I have been to hear two of them, and you may believe me — and you get a figure rather incongruously ranged with regard to his age. He, by the way, bans me even more than I love him, pronouncing at my shadow a ‘Retro, Satanas.’ He knows that I am hardly quite ‘of the light,’ and my love of the Church is an added fault in his eyes. However, to his smittings I find no difficulty in turning always my other cheek. On the whole, I assure you, the world will hear of Dr Burton, or Dr Burton will break himself up against the world —— But who is this?”

It was one of the gardeners, named John, who came to say that someone had run over from Ritching with the tidings that Mrs Robinson, the mother of the vanished Robinson, was dying.

At this Miss Emily hurried up from the water, rushing into pinks and whites, calling: “what, Mrs Robinson! not dying?... Oh, my forgetful head! I intended the first thing this morning.... It is grief and solitude that is killing the poor woman. Aubrey, I must go now to her.”

“Well, and I too,” said Langer; and to me: “Would you care to come?”

We hurried to the house, and soon set out — Langer with his broad hat and thorn stick, Miss Emily with a basket, and old Bruno (a mastiff) at our heels.

We wound the north way out of Swandale by a path where we had to walk in single file through aftermath, Langler going first, Miss Emily behind, and as I in the middle reached my hand backward to relieve her of the basket my fingers happened to meet her palm, Langler then talking about Robinson, though at the time I hardly heeded him; he said, however: “if ever midnight darkened with sudden disaster upon the life of any man, surely it was upon this poor fellow. He was an easy, good chap, this Robinson. You knew him, Arthur. What a beauty of mild, large eye was his, and dark-curling beard! Do you know, I often seemed to realise in him my notion of the face of Jesus; certainly, he wasn’t unlike the later French conception of the Saviour. As to his disappearance, nothing can be queerer. He left Swandale at noon on Thursday to walk to Ritching, in order, they say, to bespeak Lang, the blacksmith. Now, a little on this north side of Swandale there lay in a spinney a ne’er-do-weel named Notter; Notter saw Robinson, but Robinson did not see Notter: and what, according to Notter, was Robinson doing as he went by? — looking up into the air, whistling! So that we may say that Robinson was not then running away — had, in fact, no perverse purpose of any kind in his mind. Yet Ritching is less than three miles from Swandale! And he never entered Ritching! that we know. In that interval, then, the poor fellow was whiffed from the ways of men by some injurious magic: and the place which knew him knows him no more.”

“And as to the police?” I said.

“No doubt they are at work,” he answered; “but in a matter of just this kind I believe you will find that nothing but a species of inspired divining, hardly common in the bureaux, will accomplish much.”

“Aubrey, there were three strangers in Ritching during the week,” called Miss Emily from behind.

“Ah? Is that so?” said Langler. “I didn’t know.”

“Jane heard it in Ritching last night, and told me.”

“Friends?” asked Langler.

“No, apparently; they were people taking holiday. They put up for several days at the Calf’s Head. Two were foreigners.”

We were now at a gate between two great masses of rock, and passed through it to the path over which poor Robinson had lately gone to his fate. Hence to the dale in which Ritching moons the way is mostly downhill, and we were soon entering the south end of the old townlet.

At that south end of the street stood a group of people singing — a squad of three Salvationists, from Alresford perhaps, and with them a few of the villagers — singing as we drew near, with a certain rollicking swing, and I well recall the lilt and the words:

“At the Cross, at the Cross, where I first saw the light, And the burden of my heart rolled away, It was there by faith I received my sight, And now I am happy all the day.”

Twice they encored this chorus, some laughing as they sang, others standing silent, with dimples of amusement on that side of the lips where the pipe was not. When this was chanted out sprang a captain, and, himself smiling, began to cry aloud: “Well, friends, you may laugh, but — but —” He got no further, for just then down the path ran bounding a rat, a terrier, a lot of men and boys; I had to draw Miss Emily aside, as, rushing by, they pelted among the Salvationists, who, in their turn, scattered, and joined the chase. Only the captain and his two mates were left.

I caught the captain’s words: “well, here’s a rum go, mates.”

We, for our part, went on our way, I smiling, but on the face of either of my friends not a smile. I could not help saying: “modern Christianity in the modern village does not thrive”; but at once I was sorry for having said anything, for neither the one nor the other answered me.

Only after some time Langler said: “still, the martyrs, dying for it, lifted up their eyes, and saw heaven open. But now, you see, it has come to this.” I heard him murmur to himself: “And now I am happy all the day....”

Miss Emily, who had hurried on a little ahead, now vanished into a cottage into which Langler and I presently followed her. On our entrance she had just passed through into an inner room, and we heard someone in there going “Sh-h-h!” to her in an angry fashion.

We, too, after a little moved into that inner room. There the mother of Robinson lay dying, and it was there that I first laid eyes on Dr Burton.

He was standing, with a stole on, at the further side of the bed, and a murmur of rapid words was coming from him.

At the near bedside were two of the villagers, with a lay sister from the Poor Clares at Up Hatherley, and Miss Emily; the little place was very dingy, but Dr Burton’s face was towards us as we entered: I saw Langler bow austere, but the Doctor looked through him with a vacant gaze.

The appearance of Dr Burton was impressive: his waistband circumferenced a hemisphere of paunch, so that the hem of his frock stuck well out in front of his toes, and he was also thick about the shoulders, chest, and throat; his brow, invaded all round by close-cropped hair, had a scowl, and his mouth a pout; his complexion was of a red brown. I heard him mutter: “by this holy unction, and through His great mercy, Almighty God forgive thee whatever thou hast sinned by sight....” And his right thumb anointed the eyelids of the dying with oil.

And again he ran on in a rapid recitative: “by this holy unction, and through His great mercy, Almighty God forgive thee whatever thou hast sinned by hearing....” And his right thumb smeared the ear of the dying with oil.

I saw Miss Emily bridle a little. In Dr Burton's left hand was an old Sarum liturgical book in pigskin, and on he droned: "by this holy unction, and through His great mercy, Almighty God forgive thee whatever thou hast sinned by smelling...." And his thumb noted the nose of the poor old woman with oil.

Except this cantering mutter and a death-ruckle on the bed all was still in the darkling room. Miss Emily stood at the head, parted from Dr Burton by the breadth of the bed, I with her. And once more the drone was droning: "by this holy unction, and through His great mercy, Almighty God forgive thee — —"

But now there was an interruption: the little old woman for some half minute had been making some effort — to speak or to move — and now she lifted her head, opened her eyes, and whispered something to Miss Emily. Her words, as I afterwards learned, were: "ah, Miss Emily, tell him to stop ... dear, good soul he is ... my poor son...."

Her head fell back upon the pillow. It was clear that her strength had already been well tried before our entrance, for on a table near the bed were the bell, light, and cross of the Blessed Sacrament, with the pyx wrapped in linen. But at the interruption Dr Burton stopped; his face darkened, and forth went his arm, pointing to the door.

"All leave the room," cried he with a gruff brogue.

I saw Miss Emily's face go rosy, while Langler's eyes dwelt upon the Doctor, and he asked, with a smile: "but why so, Dr Burton?"

"Do it, sir!" cried the doctor in a startling manner; whereupon for perhaps thirty seconds it lasted, the doctor pointing, Langler smiling, till Langler turned, and said "come" to Miss Emily and to me.

We went out, the two villagers following us, leaving the doctor and the Franciscan alone with the dying woman. But in the outer room Miss Emily sat on a chair, saying: "I mean to wait here till Dr Burton chooses to go away. Send John to me, and don't expect me home until all is over."

"Well, then," said Langler; and he and I started off to go back to Swandale, night now falling as we passed through Ritching and thence on up the rising land towards Swandale, and half way up we halted, and turned together, surveying the scene of the valley, veiled now in the hazes of the Sabbath evening: Ritching church-spire could be seen standing out of a garland of wood; so could a part of Goodford village far in the north-west, and there, too, just vanishing out of sight, a church-spire; and presently there was wafted up to us from the valley a charming noise — church-bells chiming for Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. Langler said then to me in a low voice: "Arthur, to me it is very touching, such a scene; that Goodford church always reminds me of Bemerton, where George Herbert walked and talked with his Lord, and on the whole, what a language do they speak, those spires, those bells, how noble an expression of men's noblest thoughts of this world through twenty ages! One knows that for the new phasis of the world the old expression will not do; but for myself, though I tolerate the sun, give me Iris and the Götterdämmerung. Certainly, she was rather lovely, this old church of the Nazarene, with a loveliness that was so useful, too, to lure and lever the world. Who could have foretold that just in sorrow would have been born such a charm, that the moan alone of a saint could more ravish the sense than the rose of Sharon? And through such a roll of generations, Arthur! The beauty that could so long baffle the law 'they all shall change,' what a charm of life must have informed her! If we who now see her mouthing her mumblings in her extreme age, garishly rouged and dizen'd with trumperies, can still by an effort live again in her youth, how vital a youth must that have been! But that extreme age is really here apparently. Surely the rouge cracks now, and beneath peers the very saffron of death and putrescence imminent. Look where you like, from the event at Canterbury to our 'now I am happy all the day,' and do not the signs bode the passing-bell and the sexton? Judging only from our experiences of to-day, may we not say with some assurance that we now listen to those chimes for about the last time?"

CHAPTER V

THE TRAIL

LANGLER, LET ME repeat here, was a man of some luck in prophecy; and though those bells of Ritching, which he said that we then listened to for about “the last time,” were about to clash over Europe carillons of summons, shaking the hearts of men, yet even here, it will be said, he was not quite at fault: for death more often than not is forerun by this very kind of flickering: slow decay, then a rage and show of life, then the end and darkness — that appears to be the way.

On the Monday morning after our visit to Ritching, as I entered the breakfast-room a few minutes early, there at a casement stood Miss Emily, and I see her once more as she was then, as fresh as the morning, or as the twines of roses that climbed within the small marble casement. Like her brother, she was not tall, but her figure was highly spirited, with a quite French outpush of bust, reminding one always of Gainsborough’s “Duchess.”

We two were speaking together in low voices when I heard the steps of Langler coming. I may say that I had been begging her for a rose, but she had not given it me. I had prayed, and she was saying, “but I thought that ‘blue is the hue for folk who hope,’” when I heard the steps of Langler, and whispered her, “then some forget-me-nots.”

The room was gaily feted out with flowers, and she glanced round to find what I had asked for; but there were none, and she was saying, “there are none; it is rather late—” when Langler walked in. I was angry with fate, for it was an anniversary date with her and me; and jealous, for into his jacket she pinned a rosebud.

On sitting to table she said to her brother: “Aubrey, Mrs Edwards wants you and me to go over to Goodford. I have just answered that we have a guest, and, of course, she will ask us to bring him too.”

“Would you care?” Langler asked me: “they are crude but worthy folk, as you know, and their guests are often well chosen.”

I said that I should be glad to go.

“But as to Mrs Robinson?” asked Langler of his sister.

“She died just before nine,” answered Miss Emily. “I came home with John after eleven, so wouldn’t disturb you, as I had made all the arrangements. Dr Burton went away at seven, came back after Compline, frowned excommunications at me, sprinkled the body, said a prayer from the Alexandrine Liturgy of St Basil, and groaned ‘poor sheep!’ with the very tenderness of the Good Shepherd. I should revere that man, if I didn’t despise him.”

“Ah? is that so?” asked Langler, with his smile.

We spoke through breakfast of Mrs Robinson and her missing son, of the Prime Minister’s guests at Goodford, of our probable visit to him, and again of the missing man.

“Do you know,” said Miss Emily in her dry way, hardly meaning, I think, to be taken seriously, “I have my theory of Robinson? Given a village like Ritching, where nothing odd ever happens, when two odd things happen in it those two will be related. Is that a fair statement of a law of probability?”

“Excellent, I think,” I answered.

Langler did not answer, but was listening, one could see, attentively.

“Then,” said Miss Emily, “I say that three tourists at the Calf’s Head is one thing, and Robinson’s disappearance is another thing; and my theory is that these strangers have kidnapped Robinson.”

“But with what motive?” asked Langler, glancing sharply at her.

“Because,” she answered, while the nerves of her face screwed up into a little energy of shrewdness— “because he was beautiful.”

We were silent at this, till Langler remarked: “ah, there you are hardly convincing.”

“I suppose not,” she replied. “But what other reason? There was nothing special about Robinson except that one thing, his beauty, and that is how I feel. Find out some reason why one English and two foreign tourists should need to kill or capture a specially handsome man and you solve the mystery of Robinson.”

Langler answered nothing more, and we spoke of other matters. He afterwards said that he would be absent during most of the day, and, as some letter-writing kept me from going with him, I saw him ride down the course of the brook and vanish behind the arches of the abbey.

He returned before dinner, and some hours later, when the house was asleep, we two were down by the lake’s brim, the night murky and autumnal, but we could just see some moor-hen or wild-fowl briskly breast the waters, like boats in a choppy channel, moored, yet seeming to move forward, as when the moon is flying through cloud.

I asked Langler if he had been able to do anything for the captive, Father Max Dees; he puffed at his pipe several times before replying, and then said: “Father Max Dees is becoming too interesting, Arthur — so much so that he threatens to overwhelm my interest in all life outside himself. How if I tell you that this man, so remote from me and mine, speaking with me from afar by a bird, now seems connected in some way with the disappearance of Robinson?”

“It sounds queer,” I said.

“Yet it is true; and, since true, mark the luck of Emily in this matter. She said that the mere singularity of two such things as the strangers and the disappearance of Robinson was sufficient to make her think those things connected. Well, the singularity is not sufficient, she was not convincing: but we know that her guesses are of a quality not very common, and it will be some time, I promise, before I again permit myself to slight one of them.”

“You have discovered, then, that she was right?”

“Not directly,” he answered; “but I believe so by one of those processes of the mind which, if they be not reason, resemble it. You will understand me when I remind you of a third event among us about that time — the wren, namely, and its message. Now, by Emily’s guess all the three should be interconnected; and if I tell you that two of them are, in fact, connected, I think you will jump to the conclusion that all are so.”

“But which two are connected?” I asked.

“The wren and the strangers.”

“Tell me.”

“I rode out to-day with the object of making some inquiries about these strangers, and also of finding somewhere a list of Styrian barons. Well, then, I went first to the Calf’s Head, and what I gathered there was this: that the strangers are now gone; that they were ‘certainly’ unknown to one another; and that at the hour when Robinson vanished one of the foreigners was sitting on the doorstep of the inn studying the county-map, one was sipping beer in the bar-parlour, while the third, the Englishman, was leaning against Lang’s smithy-door: so that Brown, the landlord, had all these men under his eyes on that Thursday noon when poor Robinson was undergoing his mystery. However, I had no sooner heard of this tableau vivant than my own instinct of wrong, vague before, started into liveliness, the word which stirred my anger being Brown's 'certainly' in saying that the three were strangers to one another. He said it because he had never seen them speak together. Yet these men for days ate, smoked, etc., together, under which conditions men do exchange a word; so what could have kept these apart, except a wish to appear unacquainted? — a wish which argues that they were not so. But their pose at the moment of the tragedy! Brown says that 'they were like that most of the afternoon.' Imagine, therefore, the tale of sips taken by one of them, the countless interest of the second in the county-map, the resource in chat of the last at the smithy-door of Lang — all under the benign, remarking eye of Brown. One can almost assert that, if a wrong was then to their knowledge being accomplished, it would be in just such poses of statuesque guilelessness that they would parade themselves.... At all events, I left Brown with the expectation of finding that other foreigners than these had been in our midst on that mid-day of mystery.

"I then rode over to Goodford, and was told that three weeks previously two strangers had been there — one a foreigner. I went to Ayeling, Mins, St Peter's, Up Hatherley — all within eight miles of Ritching — and learned that the neighbourhood within the last months has been liable to quite a little epidemic of 'strangers,' foreign and English, who did not seem acquainted. I asked whether any of the strangers had been absent on the noon of mystery. In every case I gathered that they had gone for good before that day, or else on that day had remained conspicuously present in the villages.

"But at Mins a very odd accident brought into my way something of a character so wild that my eyes almost could not credit it. You know, Arthur, the unconsciousness of people when in a foreign land that anyone in it can understand their speech: I had this fact in my mind when at each of the villages I inquired whether the strangers had left behind no leaves, no fragments of paper. I pried into waste-paper baskets, even poked into dust-heaps, but could find nothing. However, I was leading the horse from the door of the Crown at Mins towards the gate when I saw a little stick, so to speak, of paper in the hedge. It had been crumpled up to be used as a pipe-light perhaps — you know the habitual frugality of foreigners as to matches — and was scorched at one end, smeared, too, with soap and atoms of hair, so that someone had used it to wipe his razor on. However, it had on it some German writing, still mostly legible, and I got six almost perfect lines. These were the words which I read: ‘... now — the 15th of June — I have been here three weeks, so I know him well. I am sure that he will do for England. He is another Max Dees, as arrogant as he is brilliant, a union of Becket and Savonarola. His name is Burton, and he is rector at a place called Ritching. Your Excellency should find some way of coming down here, for ...’ and I can’t tell you, Arthur, the queer feeling which chilled my veins at the instant when, in an inn-yard of Mins, I chanced upon those words: ‘Max Dees.’”

“It is very astonishing,” I breathed.

“But mark,” continued Langler, “the point at which I had now arrived. I had already decided that, if other strangers were about on the day of Robinson’s disappearance, then the three at Ritching were conscious of what was going on, and that if the three were conscious, then all might be concerned. But at least one of those concerned had that name of Father Max Dees familiarly on his pen’s point; and, looking at the bald record of his captivity which Dees sent forth by the wren, we may conclude that that captivity is unknown to his world — that, in fact he vanished from his world more or less in the manner of Robinson; whereupon one's mind no longer pauses, but, in lack of knowledge, says at once: 'in each case the same agents, in each the same motive.'

"But, given two disappearances, my divination went on to a surmise which would never have been suggested to me by one only, and I asked myself, 'since there are more than one, may there not be more than two?' And this question no sooner occurred to me than I spurred my horse, and hurried to Alresford, where I have spent my afternoon. At the library I obtained some volumes of the county papers, and though my search was, of course, very hurried, I harked back nearly a year, and what I half-expected I found.

"Most dark, Arthur, is the path of some power which now, to-night, is at work within this Europe of ours — a phantom of whose being and trend one's fancy can form no dream, walking vast though invisible among us, amorphous, yet most actual. And I do not speak of a probability. I am pretty sure now that this is so, and Father Max Dees and Robinson, if they live, are sure also.

"One of the oddest things which I have noticed is the slumber of understanding and of memory — especially of memory — with which we modern people look through the newspapers. I have been reading to-day, with dismay, details which I had undoubtedly read before, but at the first reading must have dully cast out of my consciousness as devoid of interest. May we not, then, define man as 'a dormouse who wakes during earthquakes'?

"The bits of news which I mean were mostly printed small, in obscure corners, and the significance of their considerable number in the papers which I perused is big when one considers that they are country papers, not formal chronicles of world-news. If, then, you find in them mention of two disappearances of fishermen within four months on the north French coast, you may conceive that not two, but four, may have been the actual number: men vanished; caught quite away like leaves on the midnight wind; and one in the Harz Mountains; and one in London; and one in Naples; and two in Hungary; and one in Belgium; and three in Russia; and one in Catalonia; and one in Savoy — —”

“My good Aubrey!” I breathed.

“Vanished, Arthur,” he said— “gone into the gorge of that dragon. There it stands printed, and all have read it, but none has seen it, so unrelated seems each case in its isolated chronicle. I, however, have been able to read with a larger eye; and as to the palace of torment of at least one of the victims we are not in the dark.”

“Have you discovered, then,” I said, “the full name of the Styrian baron who has imprisoned Max Dees?”

“Unfortunately,” he answered, “there are no less than three Styrian barons part of whose name is Gregor — one a Dirnbach, one a Strass, and one a Kolár — possibly the well-known Kolár — —”

At that name an exclamation escaped me.

“Well?” said Langer.

“But have I said nothing at all to you since I have been here, about Baron Gregor Kolár?” I asked.

“I think not,” he answered.

“Then it is a singular chance,” I said: “why, I came down with him in the same carriage, I have his card in my pocket now. It never once entered my head that he might be Styrian! He is over at Goodford at this moment, a guest of Mr Edwards.”

“Well, then, that fact seems to narrow our round of inquiry to two,” said Langer: “our Gregor will doubtless now be found to be a Strass or a Dirnbach.”

I made no answer, and we sat there some time silent, looking where some moor-hen or wild-fowl breasted the streaming of a surface agitated by the inrush of the cascade, stationary, yet seeming to move forward, like the moon ranging through flights of cloud.

CHAPTER VI

THE MEETING

THE NEXT DAY we were at Goodford. The mansion is Queen Anne, square and grave, standing on grounds which slope towards the exterior of the domain into oak-dotted swards that droop down to a wooded valley.

That first day at dinner I was able to point out to Langler the sneer of Baron Kolár at the part of the table where he droned amid the silence of his neighbours; and the next afternoon, when some men who had been shooting were standing in a group on a terrace, Baron Kolár, who was among them, left them to lower himself upon a bench close to that on which Langler and I were sitting.

It was just then that I heard someone in the standing group remark: “here comes our eloquent divine.” And I heard Mr Edwards, who had looked round, say in his characteristic way: “what, he still on that same temperance job, I wonder?”

This remarkable man (who started life as a puddler’s-boy in South Wales, then became a typewriter in a London newspaper-office, then editor of a boys’ paper, then of a financial paper, then speculator and millionaire, then — without eloquence, stateliness, “brilliance” of any sort — Prime Minister of his country at the age of thirty-seven) — this remarkable man, I say, gave by his mere manners and appearance some hint of the reasons which underlay his elevation; he himself always accounted for it by declaring that “he alone knew how to run the Empire on purely business lines”; and, in truth, he looked like a man who could do this.

His face at this period was still fresh and pink, and assuredly he did not look older than a youth of four or five and twenty. His hair swept from the parting across his forehead quite down to the right eyebrow; and against this he waged an old war, ever dashing it back, but down it came again. His eyes darted from side to side, and he appeared ever on the point of pitching at something, and having it over and accomplished. He was not large in stature, and by the side of big Mrs Edwards (who was some ten years his senior) looked rather insignificant. It was suggested by his walk that one of his legs was somewhat shorter than the other.

He started out at once to meet Dr Burton, who came toiling up the terraces swinging a copy of, I fancy, Paradisus Animæ. I saw them shake hands, and then lay their heads together, Edwards hearkening, Burton talking. Their walk led them towards Langer and me. Edwards began half to laugh, deprecatingly I thought; his shoulders shrugged; his arms opened; Dr Burton’s brogue swelled; he waxed wroth.

The first words which I heard were these: “and are these poor sheep, then, to be so lost and ruined, Mr Edwards? Always, always the body, and never the soul? And is the protest of the Church no longer of avail with the great ones of the earth, sir? I tell you, sir —— !”

Mr Edwards said: “but, Dr Burton, if you would only listen to common reason! My good sir, what can I do? If I were a parish councillor, now — or a magistrate — but I am only a Prime Minister, after all.”

Edwards, by the way, was never averse from references to this fact, with some mirth tacked on. But now he was interrupted by a deep, a bitter word: the doctor looked ireful, and in the very voice of reproof he said: “the matter is not one for jest, sir. I have laid this question before the Bishop, before the Suffragan of Southampton, before the Bishop of Guildford, the Dean, the Residential Canons; I have appealed to the Licensing Magistrates; again and again I have appealed to you; I have turned right, I have turned left: and everywhere I have fallen in with evasions, with infidel shrugs, with dull delay. Now hear what I say as to this grievance: I say that I should not suffer it, no, I should not bear it at all. I don't wish to see this new bugbear in my parish: I will not see it: and if the heavens should rain for a harvest-moon a rain of atheist archbishops and rebellious ministers-of-State and blatant councils, all bound together to impose it upon me, still I say I would not suffer it, no, I would not bear it at all, at all, for God's sake I would not. In the spirit of the blessed St Ambrose, with my own sacred hand I shall abolish it from my sight if it confront me; and afterwards, but not before, will I give up the government that I hold, not of men, but of God."

And as this torrent ceased I just heard snuffled with a drawl near my ear these words:

"Oh, well, he is not so bad, though; he does it very well — very well...."

They came from Baron Kolár, who was gazing through sleepy lids at Dr Burton with (it seemed to me) the fondness of a father contemplating the feats of his boy in the presence of friends.

As for Mr Edwards, I saw him fling his hand at Dr Burton's words. He was a being who gave heed to one thing only — effective force. Pride, high words were so far wide of his interest that they failed even to win a smile from him; he heard them like wind, regarded only facts, results.

"Well, Dr Burton," he said, "I am always glad to lend a helping hand to a parson like yourself, interested in your work, go-a-head, and so on, and so on; I am the same kind of man myself, and there's the fellow-feeling, and so on, and so on. But I can do nothing in this matter — candidly, it would be going too far out of my way; you must approach the proper authorities, mentioning, of course, that you have my sympathies, and so on, and so on — —”

Here I lost his words. Meantime the baron's eyes were dreamily following the priest and the minister-of-State, while Langler's gaze was fastened upon the baron's face, and I glanced from one to the other, seeking to fathom how much was inherent in what I saw about me.

Presently the Baron's eyes wandered round, as if looking for someone to talk to, and when they lighted upon me quite close he droned in his happy manner: “Well, he seems a worthy fellow, a nice fellow: a little too zealous, like a torrid sun, but he's not so bad. Have you heard him preach?”

“Dr Burton? No. Have you?”

“I went to hear him last Sunday. He does it very well — very well. You should hear him.”

“Yes, I have been told....”

“But you could not conceive; he does not do it badly. He is a man who really is master of his business. He preaches with the progression of a great river. He is destined to become the greatest priest in Europe....”

“Ah? You think that?”

“Wait, you will see. If a man is master of his business, and has self-assertion to make the world cringe before his force, that is all that is necessary. A man is either like leaven or like meal: he leavens or is leavened. The chief thing about any animal is its amount of available vigour. How much of Sun-fire has the man in him? — that is the question. If he has only enough, he can wash the world in his flush, and also if he is taught in what fashion to use it. But this Dr Burton, I assure you, he is not a paltry man. I want you to present me — now.”

“I?” I said, taken rather aback, “I don't know him.”

But at once Langler said at my ear: “I do.”

“Mr Langler, however,” I added, “probably knows him.”

At this the baron said, half rising: “Ah, then —— ,” and Langler stood up quickly, saying: “with pleasure....”

Dr Burton had now parted from Mr Edwards, and was passing close by us, wrapped in gloom, his frock brabbling at every stalk with the breeze; so Langler hurried out to get at him, and Baron Kolár goaded after Langler his rolling gait.

At this Dr Burton, as when a bull stops in its career to stare at some new object, stood still, and at once Langler said graciously to him: “Dr Burton, permit me to present to you my friend, Mr Templeton — his Excellency Baron Kolár — Dr Burton.”

The moment which followed was full of misery: for one could not tell what the doctor, still heated, would say or do. I was afraid that he wouldn’t shake hands!

But the baron, with instant tact, spoke. “It was I,” he said, “who asked Mr Langler to present me to Dr Burton. I had the pleasure last Sunday of being in the church at Ritching: that will explain.”

At some moments, when he ceased to show his teeth and measured one with a stern up-and-down movement of the eyes, this man’s face took on an expression of power which could even become compelling; so he looked now, eyeing Dr Burton, measuring him from head to toe, till Dr Burton put out his hand, whereupon the baron pipped a nothing sideways, and showed his teeth.

“Ah, well,” he said in his happy drawl, “it is not often now that one can hear a sermon — not often. The pleasure comes from toillessly lolling and watching the toil of another: but the toil of that other must be real toil, and the toillessness of the hearer must be real also. I confess that I have some fault to find with your pews, doctor: a pew should never be a symbol of the narrow path that leadeth unto life. Oh, but they are not so bad, though — not so bad. Still, I, now, in Styria, have a church, and the pews are fauteuils. A man begins to cherish these little boons when the hair is getting grey. Oh, yes. The later Romans were the only race who truly understood the art of temple service. The courts, too, where men like Cicero, Hortensius, and Pliny thundered, were made luxurious. There must be the felt contrast between another's toil and one's own comfortable indolence. Only, the toil must be real toil. In the matter of books, now, the French have not done so badly in that — not badly. The author thinks and works hard, yet manages so that the reader need merely read, without thought or worry. That is rather good, very nice. I, for example, am no longer a young man: an old fellow gets to feel that people should see a little to his comforts. Everything should be made easy and pleasant. The King of Korea, now: he sits, I am told, through a certain ceremonial on a couch made, back and seat, of four bags of brains. You know the derivation of the word assiduity: to sit is to be a man; to sit much is to be civilised. But that is a long tale. What I wanted to tell you was not to disturb yourself about the detail which I heard you discussing with Mr Edwards. I will take the affair upon my shoulders, and see to it that no public-house is opened in your parish to offend your eyes."

As the sense of these words possessed my ears I saw that the astonishment of Dr Burton was as supreme as my own. Langler leant with his well-straightened neck over his thorn-stick, smiling, the lax skin of his forehead twitching a little.

After some seconds Dr Burton said, looking at the baron as at some strange being: "I am sorry, sir, but I am pressed for time. As you see, I am a priest, and my harvest is great, and the labourers are few, so I think you will understand that I have no time for loitering and listening. As to your reference to the public-house, I confess that I do not understand you at all."

Baron Kolár was bestowing upon him a smile of sleepy fondness, and as the doctor half turned to go, the baron's hand went out to the doctor's arm.

"Ah, well, you are busy, of course," he said: "well, it does not displease me to see you so. A man's youth is his ancestry: the best heirloom which he can inherit from it is a habit of industry. A young man should work hard, not for the sake of what he can accomplish in his youth, but because the impulse of his acquired energy will last him through his course in a higher sphere. He buys the habit of strife and empire, and that persists to the end. I am rejoiced to see you stressful and impressé. Similarly, the youth of nations should be full of rages; their age suave and luxurious. But with regard to the public-house, now — do not harass yourself about such a nothing, since I answer for it that the difficulty will vanish. I would speak to you, but you are so busy. I will call upon you to talk it over. Tell me when, and I will come, oh yes, I will come."

I was certain that, as the baron stopped, Langler, standing now close by Dr Burton, whispered some word at the doctor's ear. He afterwards told me that the words were: "you should say no."

But at his whisper Dr Burton turned upon him a look of surprise and some resentment, and at once said to the baron: "I shall be at home to-morrow evening at eight-thirty, sir, if that will please you." Whereupon he bowed, and was off.

"Oh, well, he's a nice fellow — a nice fellow," said the baron, summing up the doctor. "In a high position he would be just the man whom the Church needs to push her forward and make her aggressive. What is your opinion of the Church in England?"

His eyes rested upon Langler's face.

"My opinion?" said Langler.

"As to her lasting powers, now, I mean."

“My outlook is vague enough,” answered Langer: “I should say that bishops, church-bells, sermons, and so on, will persist as we know them in England for another thirty, forty years.”

“Ah, you think that. Well, well. I, now, should say a hundred, a hundred and fifty years.”

“That is a long time,” said Langer.

“Not so long. I mean, you know, if nothing happens to annihilate her. It is astonishing how old things will continue to hold on long after they are quite dead and decayed. Look at old oaks and houses! A glass of water will sometimes remain in the liquid state a long time below the freezing-point; the least shake would make it shiver into a glass of ice, but, lacking that, it remains liquid. Well, so with the Church. Especially in a country like England, I give her another hundred and fifty years.”

“You are quite possibly right,” said Langer; “your opportunities for observing may have been better than mine.”

“Oh, yes, I know old England very well — very well. I was once an attaché to the Embassy for three years; altogether, I have lived in England eight to ten years. I know the old country very well — not badly. Very nice it is, too — provided one brings one’s own chef. The pride of England is not her political potency, but her beef, for in no country in the world is so exquisite a care bestowed upon the culture of cattle, and if a quarter as much had been given to the culture of men, by this time the Angles would, in truth, have been angels. Not that I have a word to say against the culture of cattle. Perhaps after all man himself is not of so much importance as what he eats. Beef is the half of life; the other half is mutton. No, that is a little hyperbole perhaps — my little tendency to neatness and epigram. It is astonishing how, as a man gets older, he runs to seed in that way, for epigram is only an instinctive device for concealing meagreness of thought.

I, for example, am no longer a young man. I begin to get fond of my little comforts. To be candid with you, the cooking at Goodford does not altogether please me, those partridges at dinner last night were not done enough — not enough. Still, they were not so bad — a little underdone — and the wines are very good — very good. But, talking of the Church, I assure you I give her a hundred and fifty years — unless someone has a motive for giving her a push, and then down she goes. Would you care to see that done?”

His wandering eyes halted suddenly upon Langler’s face.

“I?” said Langler, “why should I?”

“Oh, well, isn’t there always the danger that a decayed old house may tumble and crush one? If the thing is a groan and a danger it may as well go, and be done.”

“But if it be quaint and gracious and historic,” said Langler, “it may as well stay, even at the cost of a prop or two. While it stands it hurts no one: it is only its fall that may hurt.”

“Well, I see your point of view. You are right, too, in your own fashion. But for myself, the Modern Spirit does not displease me; it is very nice in its way — oh yes. Let us have it in its full noon, I say. Whatever survival of the past stifles it should be quickly excised and suppressed. And if in England the Church is only laughable, I assure you that in other parts of Europe, where it is more mixed up with the life of the people, it continues to be positively baleful. In Austria, for example, one half of the teachers in the common schools are still ecclesiastics! and though the people do not believe in the Church any more than you do here, yet it influences them, it checks and hampers them: they feel that they would like to be quit of it, yet do not quite know how. And, apart from any harm which it does, it is astonishing how many thousands of men might be found in Europe who, from mere motives of vanity, merely to tell how they took a part in modifying the modern world, would lend a willing hand to pulling down the old building. I believe that that is so. But you, now, you see from a different standpoint. Well, you are right, too, in your own fashion.”

To me it became clear that these two were pumping and sounding each other with some not very evident motive on either side, Langler striking his stick into the turf as he walked, looking downward; the baron looking downward also, at Langler’s face.

Langler said: “I cannot be made a convert, Baron Kolár. Shells, you know, are sometimes quite charming things, and for this shell which remains of the Church, I personally should, under certain conceivable conditions, be even prepared to give my life: such is the whim of my mind. But now you will excuse me — Arthur, you will excuse me: I have some letters.... But stay; I have to ask you a question, baron.”

He had stood still; we all stood still, and Langler and the baron faced each other.

“Well, then,” said the baron gravely, eyeing Langler up and down.

Langler, I must say, was paler than usual. He said: “I have lately had reason to run my eyes down a list of the Styrian nobility, baron, and find that three several Styrian barons have the name of ‘Gregor’ — you being one. Are you acquainted with the other two?”

“Well, yes,” was the answer: “one is a Strass, the other a Dirnbach; easy, good fellows they are. Our Styrian nobility is not what it was; no, the nobilities will soon have to go too. Fortunate thing, they will last through my time. Look at Mr Edwards, now — nice fellow, powerful fellow. It is fellows like him, with fresh, vulgar energies and elementary insights, whom the world needs to guide it now. Oh no, the nobilities must go, too. Do you know —— ?”

But Langler cut short that drawl. He said: “Well, one of these two Barons Gregor unlawfully has in his castle a prisoner, one Father — Max — Dees — —”

He spoke pointedly, his eyes fixed on Baron Kolár’s face; and on his face dwelt the Gorgon eyes of the Styrian.

Some time went by in what was to me a distressing silence, till the baron pipped a nothing sideways — a movement, to me, of relief, as it were setting me free to breathe again, for I felt that Langler had dared to cross a definite Rubicon.

“What about him?” said the baron, a new something in his voice.

Undaunted, though gauntly, leaning over his stick, Langler went on.

“It is my intention,” he said, “to expose and punish this particular Styrian baron as soon as ever I discover his identity; and I speak of him to you in order to see if you can give me any hint as to which of the two is the guilty one.”

The baron’s look had lost its rigour now; his lips unwreathed from his teeth in a smile.

“It is that fellow Strass, you may be sure,” he said; “or it may be Dirnbach, it may be, there is no telling. The nobilities are no longer what they were in authoritative power, and in Styria, I assure you, it is nothing very astonishing that a baron should lawlessly clap a priest into a dungeon; but nice fellows all of them, not wicked, not so bad. I really should not worry myself about the matter, if I were you.”

Langler said: “thank you, baron, I will think over what you have said.” And he walked away to the house.

It was only after two or three minutes of silence that the baron said to me: “your friend is one of the brightest minds in the world, really as extraordinary a fellow as I ever met, I assure you. No one with any respect for intellect could avoid liking him. But he is a man of books, he is of the scholar type, he is not a man of action — oh no. A scholar should never jog himself into antagonism with a man of action. The man of action may even wish to save and spare him, but sometimes he cannot: for, just as he is vastly stronger than the scholar, so facts and auspices may be vastly stronger than he. By far the safest plan for the scholar is to hatch pastorals in his closet and handle volumes of piety. So amiable a man is your friend Mr Langler, so charming — nice fellow. I don't know if you think it worth while to repeat my words to him. Now I must leave you to talk to Mr Edwards about my friend the doctor ..." and he rolled away on his bow-legs, his hat canted over his eyes in his habitual manner.

That very night, some time after ten, Langler was handed a letter which he called me into the library to show me. It was a card damasked with raised devices in red — a Christ on the Cross — and on it had been scribbled in pencil the words: "You should not interfere."

CHAPTER VII

THE COMPACT

THE NEXT EVENING, as Baron Kolár raised himself on the arm of a valet into the trap which was to carry him to his meeting with Dr Burton, Langler remembered that some matters were going forward at Swandale which demanded his personal managing, and he asked me to go with him.

It was a fine autumn twilight when we set out, a sound of singing following us from the house and laughter from knots on the lawn, and we had a very pleasant ride. At Swandale Langler talked with John, with Jane, saw this and that with his own eyes, the water-cress at the rill under wire, the patch of reaped corn, for now poppies lay low, over the fields of the land the corn-shocks were leant together in lots, and all smelt well of harvest.

Langler wished to return to Goodford on foot, and we were presently trudging back through Ritching.

That something was on his mind I had felt sure; and this proved to be so, for as we drew nigh to Ritching church he said: "I have decided, Arthur, to speak with Dr Burton to-night, since, if this good man runs his rather rash head into any danger, I do not wish to have to reproach myself with too shrinking and nice a silence on my part."

"But danger of what nature?" I asked.

"Its nature is unguessable," he answered; "but of the danger itself one can't, I think, have any doubt. We know, for instance, that Dr Burton is ‘another Max Dees,’ and we know that Max Dees is, for some reason or other, in durance. Now, of Max Dees we have two further pieces of knowledge: first, that his imprisonment has features resembling the disappearance of Robinson; and secondly, that he, like Dr Burton, is a ‘union of Becket and Savonarola.’ Well, now, with regard to the vanishing of Robinson, Emily has let fall the view that it was motivated by his ‘beauty’; and though this reason for the disappearance of a man seems even ridiculous, still we have promised ourselves not wholly to ignore her instincts in this matter. If, then, she may somehow be right, the reason for the disappearance of Max Dees may somehow be found in the fact that he, too, is ‘beautiful’; or it may be found in the second fact known of him, that he is a ‘union of Becket and Savonarola’: we don’t know: but we know that he is imprisoned, and that in some respects he resembles Dr Burton. As to who is the gaoler of Max Dees, I am really no more in any doubt. The word ‘Kolár’ fits very well into the blurred space on the missive brought us by the wren; and the man himself, you remember, made no effort to blind our eyes when asked about the matter, even going out of his way to assure us that the other two Gregors are ‘harmless, nice fellows.’ What a beast that man is! Yet how great a strength of soul is his! Imagine, Arthur (if he is, in truth, the gaoler of Dees), his astonishment at hearing that name on my lips! How utter at this moment must be his loss to understand by what marvel I could ever have learned that name. I expected at least to see him start, to look abashed a little. But no; his eyes rested serenely on my face: he seemed to be sorry for me, to deplore my indiscretion. Here, then, is a man mighty in mass and stature, all self-assured, whose will, whether it be bent upon good or upon ill, is hardly to be withstood. Such a person is, apart from special considerations, inherently formidable; but how if this person be found trying to convert another to enmity against the Church, and at the same time be found striking up a friendship with a churchman who in certain particulars resembles another churchman imprisoned in his castle? Certainly, one's mind can't reject a notion of danger; and it has appeared to me that I ought not to hold my peace in the matter, in spite of the outré warning of the card which Baron Kolár has been kind enough to forward me."

We had now arrived before Ritching church, which stands well back from the village street in a large piece of land— "park" one may call it — well timbered and dark. The building itself is big, modern, and ugly — one of those churches with huge roofs, red bricks, red shingles, which rather suggest the cult of some latter-day Moloch than of the Carpenter. It is built, however, over some old vaults in which repose generations of the Hampshire branch of the Bellasis family, once of Goodford, now extinct.

We got into the grounds by a gateway in a wall of rubble before the church, and thence, by a path which winds inward through the park some quarter of a mile towards the vicarage, passed on to the vicarage garden. The night was now dark, and we found the house in darkness.

"It looks," said Langer in a low voice, "as if the baron's visit to the doctor has been quite a long one — two hours at the least — for he seems to be still here, if one may divine by the darkness in this front part, which, no doubt, the doctor would have lighted on seeing his visitor through. The baron must have left his trap at the Calf's Head, for I don't see it here. Let us wait outside, then, a little. The doctor, by the way, has the good taste to look out from his study window behind yonder upon a patch of that white vetch which shimmers so bridally in all shades of twilight. Come softly, and I will show it you."

I tracked his tread through thicket towards the back of the old manse, till we began to catch sight of a glow of light emanating from a casement behind, and a moment later Langler whispered me: “There, you see, is the growth of vetch.”

Five feet farther, and from an angle of a lean-to, we could peer through ivy and rose-bush into a lighted room: in it were Baron Kolár and Dr Burton, standing. Langler laid hold of my arm, and we stood breathless, looking.

The two in the room were deep in converse, the rumour of which reached us, but none of the words.

Presently the baron took his hand from the doctor’s shoulder, took up a book from a table, held it uplifted a minute, kissed it.

He then tendered the book to the doctor, who seemed to us to draw back rather, and I felt Langler’s grasp tighten on my arm, but the baron seemed to press and reason with the doctor; then the doctor took the book, lifted it to his lips, kissed it: and at once the hands of the two men met in a clasp.

Langler whispered into my ear: “but what agreement hath Christ with Belial? Isn’t it written that he who is a friend of the world is the enemy of God?”

CHAPTER VIII

THE FACE OF ROBINSON

TWO MINUTES AFTER that clasp of the hands the doctor passed out of the room with the baron; two minutes later he returned to the room alone, and stood at the casement, with his brow drooped toward his breast, in a brown study.

Langler whispered to me: “you will wait outside. I am going to speak to him now.”

We walked round to the front of the manse, where Langler rapped, Dr Burton presently came to him, and I from outside looked on at the two standing together in lamplight in a parlour.

Langler, I think, was not asked to sit. I heard the brogue of Dr Burton, then in Langler’s hand beheld the piece of paper on which Dr Burton was spoken of as a “union of Becket and Savonarola.” Dr Burton did not look at it, but began to lower angrily, Langler to bow, till at last Dr Burton frowned towards the doorway. Langler bowed, and withdrew.

When angry he had a habit of lowering the eyelids in an expression of hissing disdain, and the street-lamps, as we trudged through Ritching, revealed him so to me. For some time he was silent, but finally, when we were climbing towards Goodford village, he said: “Dr Burton has insulted me, Arthur, and for the moment I find it difficult to speak of him in a Christian spirit. However, he is a good man — I really need just now to repeat that fact to myself — though mewed up in crassness. Uppishness, of course, is part of the being of every dominant man, and I don't blame him for his uppishness, but only for the fact that it is so blatant and instant. Still, one must take the thorns with the rose, and I promise by to-morrow morning to love him again. Partly it was my own fault, for I should have felt, after the compact which we witnessed, that my warning would be all too late. Imagine how momentous must have been the matter of that compact, Arthur, when Burton could be brought to confirm it with the Bible at his lips, and imagine the craft and the might of will by which he must have felt himself crimped and mesmerised. Here is a man who two days ago began by telling Baron Kolár that he had not leisure to listen to him, and already we find him in genubus, with (of all things) the Book at his lips. Have you not here a miracle of mind? But given a known individuality, one may deduce certain facts from it. We can assert, for instance, from our sure knowledge of Burton, that the compact contained nothing dishonouring to him, that it was lofty and pure on his part. It must be so. And since it was Kolár who first kissed, and afterwards Burton, we may say, too, that the first terms of the pact are to be fulfilled by Kolár. If Kolár will do certain things, as he says he will, then Burton will do certain things. But what things? Pity we couldn't catch a few snatches of the talk; yet certainly, even so, I don't think that we are quite in the dark. For Burton's motives were lofty and pure: therefore Kolár's promises of good things did not concern Burton's own self-interests, or not solely. Yet Burton was so enthusiastic as to these promises that he took an oath of repayment: they may very likely, therefore, have concerned his love — the Church. But the Church where? At Ritching? It is inconceivable that Kolár can be so interested in the Church at Ritching as to wish to exact any oath with regard to it. 'Church,' therefore, as between him and Burton, must mean Church on a larger scale; and in the Church on this scale we know that Kolár is, in fact, interested.

But how is Burton, a village priest, to repay services rendered to the Church on so large a scale? Does it not seem as if Kolár's promises do not apply altogether to the Church, but in part to Burton personally, that Burton is not for ever to remain a village priest? Indeed, did not Kolár yesterday volunteer the prophecy that this 'union of Becket and Savonarola' is 'destined to become the greatest priest in Europe'? A singular prophecy, Arthur, from a man whose words in general assuredly have some significance. We may guess, then, that Kolár's undertakings consist in rendering to the Church some good which will include the rise and greatness of the doctor himself, and the doctor swears to use his greatness in some way indicated, or to be indicated, by Kolár. Certainly, such seem the divinations prompted by the facts which we have."

"Isn't it a strange thing," I said, "the interest of Kolár in the doctor, even before he saw him? It is not to be supposed that Kolár is a very regular church-goer, yet he hastened to hear the doctor at once on coming to Goodford. One could be almost certain that the letter describing the doctor as Becket plus Savonarola, and asking someone to 'come down,' was addressed to no other than to Baron Kolár."

"Very likely," replied Langler; "and that was chiefly what I had to say to Burton in our interview just now. I tried to persuade him that the baron is no friend of priests, that he probably has one of them a prisoner in his burg at this moment, but because I could make no certain statements his mind was closed against me. On his part, he used the words 'evil-speaking,' 'presumption,' 'interference'; he said 'dare,' he said 'irreverent.' But I won't speak of that interview — it was bête. The sentiment that now occupies my mind about Dr Burton is this: 'the pity of it!' One cannot touch pitch and go undefiled. I have often had the augury that Burton is a man with a tragedy in his future, and, if I was right, that tragedy now perhaps takes shape: it will consist in his 'defilement.' Baron Kolár has prophesied that the doctor will be the greatest of priests: well, if I, too, may prophesy, I say that from being the greatest of priests, as he now is, he will become no priest at all; that by little and little he will drop from his height, will lose perfection of motive and absoluteness of fibre, till on a day he will find himself fingering the dross of the grosser world."

By this time we had got into sight of the lights of Goodford House. On our arrival, as we were passing through the outer hall, a man handed a letter to Langler, which Langler, after glancing through it, handed to me; and I read the words: "Charles Robinson, your groom, is certainly in this neighbourhood, and if you have not found him it is because you have not searched enough. If you have the courage to meet the writer at the north-west corner of Hallam Castle alone at seven on Sunday evening, he promises you that at least you shall see the face of the missing man. — A Well-wisher."

CHAPTER IX

“CRUCIFY TO YOURSELVES AFRESH THE SON OF MAN ...”

IT WAS THE thirteenth Sunday after Trinity, and for what reason I don't remember — certainly, the house-party at Goodford were hardly zealots in the matter of church-going — that Sunday evening quite a party had been got up to go to the office at Ritching. The fact, I believe, was that the fame of Dr Burton's oratory had spread through the house, and dowager and lordling, finding the Sabbath evening empty, yielded to the pique of curiosity and to Mrs Edward's organising genius.

Baron Kolár, too, had everywhere dropped the opinion that Dr Burton was a nice fellow, that he was not so bad, that he was the only living man with whom grandiose speech was a natural function, like sleep.

Langler alone had declined to take part in the bout. Under any circumstances, I fancy, he would have shrunk from that kind of religious picnic; but he had now the special reason that he meant to go “at seven” that evening to the rendezvous at Hallam Castle given him in the unsigned letter.

To me this seemed very foolish, for I argued that no one could know the whereabouts of Robinson except those to whom he owed his disappearance, and during two days I had been praying Langler to ignore the letter. He answered that he had made up his mind to go. But at least he would let me go with him, I urged. He answered that he would rather be alone. What arms, I asked, would he take with him? He said that he was not accustomed to carry weapons about, and would take his stick.

“But you speak,” I had said, “just as though you were not conscious of any danger in the undertaking.”

“Well, I am conscious of danger,” he answered, “but I believe that in proportion to the danger may be the amount of information to be gathered.”

He had said that he would walk to Hallam Castle (three miles), and then, after his interview with the letter-writer, walk from Hallam to Ritcheing church (two miles), in order to get back to Goodford with the house-party in a carriage.

A little before six on the Sunday evening I was leaning with Miss Emily over a bridge in the north park when he came to us on his way to the rendezvous, spoke a few words, said he was going farther, and made me a signal with the eyes to be mum. Twice he waved back at us as he went forward; once and again I saw him stop to bend over a hedge-flower. He was rather pale. I had long understood that his heart was not strong, as small exertions would sometimes put him out of breath.

Miss Emily, for her part, had consented to be one of the party of excursionists, so after half-an-hour at the bridge she and I climbed the rising ground to the house to go to the church.

She said, I remember, that the escapade was a bore to her, so that up to that moment she certainly meant to go.

There in front of the porch when we reached it stood a crowd of vehicles, saddle-horses, drivers, grooms, in the midst of costumes and chatter. Two of the carriages had already started, bearing away cries of laughter at the crowded discomfort within them. I saw the pink brow of Mr Edwards under the neck of a rearing horse; large Mrs Edwards was in a flush of earnestness; Baron Kolár was seated on a cube of marble bestowing his teeth upon the scene.

Miss Emily was not yet ready to start, so ran into the house, telling me that she would be back in three minutes.

It had been ordained by Mrs Edwards that she should drive with Baron Kolár. I was with another party. In a few minutes only two of the vehicles were left; in one of them sat the baron, waiting for Miss Emily. I was in the other with four ladies; the baron's was a cabriolet, mine a car; both waited for the coming of Miss Emily.

Someone in my car said: "she is a long time."

The baron's eyes wandered; he drew his hand backward over his scrap of hair, looking restless; he pipped nothings. Presently he called out: "where is she, then?"

I was unwilling to drive away without her, so I called back to him: "if you will take my place, I will take yours, and wait for her."

There was the objection of space to this proposition; but, without answering, the baron at once got himself down from his cabriolet, and, with ponderous cares, managed to wedge himself into my place in the car, which drove off, while I stood by the cabriolet, waiting for Miss Emily.

She did not come. I waited ten minutes, fifteen. Then I went into the house, full of trouble.

I quickly found a housemaid, and sent her to hunt, but, running back after some minutes, she said that Miss Langer was not in her room. Before long I had a number of men and women searching the house for her; but she could not be found, and my heart sank at the thought that both of them, brother and sister, were where I did not know.

One of the girls said that half-an-hour before, when Miss Langer was coming down the great stair to join the party, she had handed to Miss Langer a note which one of the villagers of Mins had given her. She had gone away while Miss Langler was reading the note, and did not know what Miss Langler had done afterwards.

As for me, my mind was a void filled only with fear. The house was empty, I had no one to consult, no notion how to act. At last I leapt into the cabriolet, lashed the horse, and went along the road that leads to Hallam Castle: at least I knew where one of the two was to be sought.

It is a ruin in the older Norman mood in the midst of Goodford Manor demesne. On getting to it I made fast the horse, and ran up a dell to the “north-west corner” of the rendezvous: Langler was not there, but it was still light enough for me to see some footprints in moss on a mass of broken ground not far from the castle-wall: whether his footprints or not I couldn’t tell.

I began to call out, but there was no answer, and the footprints passing from the moss, I lost them among stones.

Night was darkening when I went to the other (east) end of the ruin, and entered by a wicket into one of the courtyards. When I had stumbled a little way up a stair I was all in darkness. I called aloud Langler’s name again and again; but there was no answer.

I would go no farther, the steps were so broken, the darkness so crowded with foes and fears; I had no light; so at last I ran back down. He might after all, I thought, have left the ruin and gone to the church, as arranged. That was the first thing now to find out, so I ran back to my trap, and cantered off towards Ritching.

At Ritching I flung my reins to the railing before the church, and ran inward, the middle portal framing a glimmer of light before me. I heard the rise, long triumph, and fall of a royal voice: Dr Burton preaching; and, running up the three steps before the church, I peeped in.

There was no pulpit, no rood-screen; Dr Burton was before the sacrarium; and with his hands behind his back, he was striding sharply a little way to and fro, with swinging shoulders at the turn, like a man moved to wrath.

That evening he had read of the sending out of the Twelve; of the power vouchsafed them over unclean spirits; of the charge that they must take naught for their journey, save a staff only — no scrip, no bread, no money in their purse; and the contrast between the spirit of Christ and the spirit of Christendom may have fired the doctor. He had taken for his text: “crucify to yourselves afresh the son of man, and put him to an open shame”; and at the moment when I entered he was launching a war of language against the modern world and the modern Church.

The party from Goodford formed much the larger part of the congregation, down the nave running a desert of pews, and I think I am right in saying that not more than fifty persons were present, all herded towards the front, looking lost in the largeness of the church. So low had the gas been turned that, though I went peering quite half way up the nave, I could not say whether Langler was or was not there.

At that moment Dr Burton had lashed himself into a really painful pitch of heat. He was tacking to and fro in short runs, rather like lions at the moment when they spy their keeper coming with meat, and loudly he cried out in his brogue: “ye crucify him afresh! Oh, the poor, bleeding hands — so nailed. Oh, the poor, bleeding side — so pierced. Oh, the ravished lamb, oh, the violated dove, oh, the crushed Christ! Have ye, then, no pity? no entrails of compassion? ye dry eyes? ye hard hearts? ye tearless teats? Have ye become men of wood? worm-eaten? loth as death? chill as the silver ye gloat on? sallow as the gold ye clutch? May God put fire into you, if it were half hell-fire, ye Monophysites, ye modern men of pure Polar snow! Oh, look — oh, see: that lip — so sucked: Is there no lust about you that you don't bind it with wild community to your mouth? Those eyeballs ooze a whey of blood: is there no heart in all the Sahara of your vulgar gullets to weep and groan and weep?... Yes, it was pitiful: he was kind, and he was killed, he was good, and he was galled, he was meek, and he was mangled. And will you crucify him afresh? In the name of Holy Church, I call the Eternal God this night — —”

But at this point Dr Burton stopped with a gasp, gaping upward all in wonderment; and from his mouth, from mine, from the mouths of us all in the church, there burst a sound.

Yonder in mid-air — under the roof of the central aisle — hung the crucified himself.

That sight will never tend to fade or be blurred in the memory of those who beheld it; if there be memory in Eternity, then always still in Eternity that sight, I think, will be with me.

It was not an optical error — that was the first certainty at which the brain, on waking a little from its deadness, arrived; it was not some magic illusion: a real man crucified on a real cross stood there revealed. From three points of the thorn-dented forehead I, with my eye of flesh, saw a trickle creep, and pause, and creep.

I found myself on my knees on the tiles, with my hands clasped. I forgot Langler — I forgot my love, his sister — and all things else. From the bowed knot of men and women in front of me came groan on groan.

At last! The heavens had spoken....

Yet it was faintly seen, and though I raised my head, and forced my eyes to search the divine horror, the light was most dim, and the revelation seemed rather the spectre of a thing than the thing itself. Only, each detail was perfect, and it was the crudeness of these details which proved its reality to the mind with proof a hundred times sure. The haggard crucifixions of Dürer and Spagnoletto — all the macabre dreams of a painter, graver, sculptor, heaped into one massacre of flesh and of grinning bone — would seem like a child's fancy in comparison with that fact. Still in my dreams I see the sideward hang of that under-lip, and that hollow between ribs and hips drawn out into shocking length, and the irregular drip from the hands, the left of which had been ripped to the finger-roots, and the crown of sorrow, and the dead drop of that tragic brow, it cannot be told....

Perhaps I alone examined details; the rest knelt bowed down; only Dr Burton, with his neck stretched back, stared as if in vision straight upward upon heaven. In myself I felt a kind of rapture, and also of peace; and the words which I murmured to myself were these: “at last.”

All at once, without ascent, descent, or movement, the image vanished.

But still for a longish time no stir nor sound, save some hushed sob, was to be heard echoing through the building.

At last! after the dumb centuries, a sign from the skies, a flag from God; and I thought to myself: “long have been those years in which so many generations of men have wept in the face of the sphinx, craving but one sure word from the callous vault for a morsel of manna to their hunger, and now the old silence is over”; and I remember hugging myself, thinking: “it was true, then! it was not a fancy of man's infancy! it was all quite true.”

Through the church the sobs of duchess and ploughman, of server and acolyte, began to sound in growing volume; I saw Dr Burton lift himself and escape into the sacristy; the others mingled the sounds of their awe, till the echoes became one murmur in the vault. As for me, the burden of my thought was this: “at last....”

But, looking up, I was conscious of a row of teeth, and of Baron Kolár, who, with a raised head, was smiling his benediction upon the scene, and his look was as when he snuffled sleepily of a thing, “well, it is not so bad.” I do not know if anyone else noticed him; but, as for me, filled though I was with my other feelings, for a moment I was most offended.

CHAPTER X

OF HALLAM CASTLE

WHEN AT LAST a movement was made to leave the church I first assured myself that neither Langler nor Miss Emily was there, then I set out upon the drive back to Goodford somewhat behind the crowd of carriages, no sound now to be heard from all that picnic party which had left Goodford loud with gaiety an hour before.

During that drive the mere sight of the trees and fields once more brought down my mind from the miracle to the care which had racked it before I had entered the church. Langler, his sister, both of them, were where I did not know; and at another time my fright at a situation so fraught with darkness might have been even maddening, but that night my heart was the home of feelings so pious that something of hope healed my fears.

My relief, however, was great enough when, in front of Goodford House, I spied Langler standing among the alighting church-party. As I hurried up to him he was just saying to one of the ladies: "I hope you enjoyed the office," but her only answer was: "ah, Mr Langler."

Langler, of course, was quite out of tune with us all at the moment, and he could not perhaps observe the look of our faces, for the night was dark.

As I touched his arm he spun round, saying: "ah, Arthur," and I remember how his tone of the world, his cigar, shocked me: he seemed to me a grosser being than we. I wished to say to him: "Hush! the earth is holy ground."

In a low voice I asked him as to his sister. His answer was: “she is in the house; two hours ago a note was handed to her, purporting — —”

“We can’t speak of it now,” I said, stopping him: “all is well if she is in the house.”

When he looked at me with some surprise I whispered to him: “we are none of us inclined to talk just now: you will soon know why.”

The others meanwhile all going within, in the inner hall I now heard a laugh which I recognised as Miss Emily’s, and I did not know whether it more shocked me or filled me with thankfulness that she was safely there.

“If you had waited one little hour for me,” she said as I went in, “I should have been back to go to the church with you.”

“I will explain all later,” I answered. “I had to go to look for Aubrey.”

“Look for him?”

“You may be told in time,” I answered: “you see, everyone is making haste to retire....”

“So I see,” said she, “but what is the matter?”

“We have all seen something.”

“One would say a ghost.”

“The ghost of God,” I answered, in what she must have thought a tone of bathos!

“You imply that God is dead,” she retorted in her dry way.

“He died for us, Emily,” I answered most crassly! whereat she bridled, and said: “O!” with such an underlook and depth of satire, that I could not bear to see her so banned from my awful mood, and, with a motion of my hand, left her in haste, for all manner of talk at that moment seemed to me unholy.

On the Monday morning, as I was breakfasting in my own quarters, Langer came to me, saying: “I have to apologise, Arthur, if my manner last night was at all incongruous with your mood, and I have to add Emily's apologies to my own. We have now heard and read what you saw, and understand how you must have felt."

"You understand something," I answered; "you can't understand all."

"Well, no," said he: "I am only sorry that neither Emily nor I was privileged to be present, so that we might be in the fullest sympathy with you. Did you, Arthur — get a complete sight of the vision?"

He sat beside me, his hand on my arm, and I told him all, word by word, in a husky voice; and he listened with a bent head.

"We are dust and ashes," he murmured when I had finished: "the humiliation of it for us all!"

"Yes, the salvation," said I.

"But the humiliation firstly, I think," said he. "How modern men have taken up and confirmed the seer's word: 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.' It was the one certain clue which we had to God. And now that, too, is snapped when we find His way of acting on Sunday night so foreign to His way on Saturday and Monday."

"Aubrey, we know nothing," I said.

"So I, too, say," he answered, "and I say that it is in the proof which the vision has given us of this that our humiliation lies. How shall we ever more trust our reason, or enjoy the pleasures of our mind? We were so assured that His voice is ever small and hinting, that He guides us with His eye; but now on a sudden we seem to find Him glaring and pedagogic — —"

"Still, let us not allow ourselves to criticise the vision, Aubrey," I said.

"No, certainly, we mustn't allow ourselves to do that," he replied: "I was rather criticising the paltriness of our reason, and I was thinking of the damper which the vision will undoubtedly put upon the intellect of the Western world before this day is over."

“Well, since our intellect is unreliable, that won’t much matter,” I said, “and God’s way is best. But I still know nothing of your adventures last night: did you go to Hallam Castle?”

“Yes, I went, and the promise of my unknown correspondent was even duly fulfilled.”

“You don’t mean that you saw Robinson?”

“At least I saw Robinson’s face, according to the promise.”

His words struck me dumb.

“I reached the Castle soon after twilight had begun to darken,” he went on. “It is a low ruin, you know, stretching along the upper edges of a mound, at the bottom of which, on the north side, runs a road through a sort of dell which they call the ‘Castle Dell’; up this road I went in order to get to the ‘north-west corner’ named in the rendezvous. A few sheep were pasturing on the castle-mound; but no other living thing was to be seen, nor a sound to be heard, and I won’t pretend that I was so perfectly collected in mind as I might have been. It is a pity that we should ever breathe shorter than we will, but.... Anyway, I climbed up the dell-road till I came as near the north-west corner of the ruin as I could, for one can’t quite get up to it, the mound at that point being rocky and steep; but after waiting on the road some minutes, and seeing no one, I began to climb a path at right angles to the dell-road leading south on the west side of the castle — a path with steps embedded in the soil. I was on these steps when I heard some sound like the echo of a shout, and on glancing to my left I saw Robinson’s face at a window of the round-tower which forms the north-west corner of the ruin.”

The fact of Robinson’s face being seen at last sounded so strange to my ears that I could only breathe: “but are you sure, Aubrey?”

“Well,” said he, “he was separated from me by perhaps thirty yards, for between the mass of ground on which I stood and that west side of the castle is a ravine or dry moat of about that breadth; moreover, it was getting dark in the dell, which is well wooded; but still I saw him pretty well, and it was certainly Robinson and no other.”

“But did he see you? Did he speak?” I asked.

“He probably did not see me,” Langler answered; “certainly he did not speak. I cried out to him, bending forward over a rail at the edge of the cleft, but he did not answer.... Oh, Arthur, it was a face much marred, believe me! It is my belief that he was unconscious, that he was held at the window for me to see by others whom I could not see. After some seconds he was withdrawn from my sight.”

“But this is pitiful,” I said. “What did you do?”

“I might perhaps have acted more promptly than I did,” he answered: “I see that now, and must confess it to you and to myself. It is certainly to be regretted that the rate of one’s breathing should ever have an influence upon the quality of the mental operations or upon the quality of one’s mode of acting; and here certainly is a little matter to which, it seems, that I, for my part, will have to give some attention on all future occasions. There is no doubt that I lost some minutes in thinking what I should next do: however, as I am familiar with the castle, I did not lose time in running to the west gate near on my left, for this I knew to be fastened, but I hurried down the dell-road to the east side of the ruin, and there climbed the mound by a path in the sward which leads to the east gate. Here I could gain an entrance, for the wicket of this gate has disappeared, but I see now that I ought to have waited outside, and not gone in: help might have come from some source; at least no one could have come out of the ruin without being seen by me. However, I went in, for after the delays already made I felt urged to do something energetic, and, no doubt, fidgeted. Some people seem to act aptly without forethought, as the fly flies; others act aptly by forethought; and others again, in using too much forethought here, and none at all there, produce those left-handed, gawky results which seem to guffaw in one's face. I hope that I am not of this last type; but on this particular occasion, I confess, I do rather seem to have been outdone — in fact, I was outdone. I rushed without thought through the wicket into the lowest of the three courtyards, which is now a greensward shaded by two walnut-trees, and ran up some steps in the north-east round-tower, my feet, I fear, making some sounds, and once or twice I slipped in the dark, the stones being very displaced. Near the tower-top I turned west over the castle-wall — the wall is really two walls, you know, filled between with concrete, over which runs a footway between field flowers. This footway brought me into a second tower, where some stairs lead up to a similar path on the wall which runs along the second courtyard. It was quite dark in that tower, and I stopped once to consider whether the course which I was pursuing was quite the best; however, having come to no decision, I was creeping on up when I heard a sound behind me, the creak of a door, then at once another creak of another door somewhere; at the same time both doors were bolted, and I understood that I was in durance.”

He smiled at my look of concern, adding: “don't be alarmed, since you now see me here; in fact, having convinced myself that I was really imprisoned, I, for my part, became easier in mind than I had been, feeling the irksomeness of having to fight out this matter taken off my hands, since, being a prisoner, it was now out of my power to do anything; and I resigned myself to suffer with a calm spirit whatever might be in store for me. Indeed, it seems to be often less of a burden and bore to suffer patiently than to have to run, and wage war, and act; at any rate, I felt that my captors had relieved me of a responsibility in this matter of the rescue of poor Robinson. I stood against the wall on a ledge three feet wide, with a railing at its edge, and the hollow interior of the tower below, and the two doors being grey with age, their surface rough with the carvings of visitors' names, but still stout, I put my arm through some of the holes which have appeared in the oak, trying to reach the bolts, but could not. Then I sat down in a hearthplace, and was sitting there so long, with nothing for the eye to rest on but the bushes at the tower-top massed against the dark sky, that I should have fallen asleep if I had not been roused by hearing some shouts, coming, I thought, from the castle-dell — —"

"They were my shouts probably," I said; "and you were there all the time!"

"What, were you at Hallam Castle last night?" he asked.

"Why, yes," I answered, "for when Emily disappeared, and it struck me that you had both been inveigled away, I could think of nothing but to go to the castle to look for you. I shouted your name in the castle-dell, I even went up the very stairs — didn't you hear me call out 'Aubrey'? Hearing no answer, I hurried off to Ritching, to see if you were in the church: and you were in the ruins all the time!"

"Your shouts reached me only as echoes," he said, "and when they ceased I composed myself afresh to rest in my hearthplace, but was soon again startled by a sound — the drawing of the bolt of the door by which I had entered. I leapt up, to find the door open: but my liberator, whoever he was, was not to be seen. I hurried down the stair, but neither saw him nor heard his tread."

"Strange proceedings," I said.

"But with a meaning in their strangeness, I am convinced," said Langler.

"What did you do now?"

“What could I do? I walked back to Goodford village, informed the constabulary that I had seen Robinson, then, very tired, trudged up to Goodford House, only to hear that Emily had not gone to the church with the party, but had disappeared. However, I was examining the servants on the matter when Emily herself walked in.”

“What had happened?” I asked.

“As she was about to set out with the party,” he answered, “a note had been handed her, purporting to come from me, asking her to join me secretly on a matter of urgency at the Cart-and-Horse in Mins. So outré a thing, of course, alarmed her, and she started out in great haste. It was only when she got to the Cart-and-Horse, that, looking again at the note, she saw that the writing was not really mine, but a forgery. She then got a trap, and drove back to Goodford.”

“Oh, there is something ominous in all this, Aubrey,” I said.

“Well, so it seems,” he answered. “The note purporting to come from me was handed to Emily by a still-room girl here named Charlotte, and was handed to Charlotte by a villager named Weeks. Now, I have had Weeks over from Mins this morning, and Weeks declares that the note was handed him by a dapper young gentleman, probably a foreigner, who met him a little outside Mins, and offered him five shillings for taking it to Goodford House. Weeks left the stranger sitting in the gloaming on the roots of a well-known yew on the road between Mins and Up Hatherley.”

“But what design,” I said, “could this man have had in enticing Emily from Goodford at that particular time?”

“That is hard to say,” answered Langer; “but you observe that I, too, was enticed from Goodford at that time by a promise which was kept by men whom we need not suppose to be scrupulous in the matter of keeping their word. What, then, could have been the motive of actually showing me the face of Robinson, as promised? It could only have been to draw me into the tower to his rescue, and so to my imprisonment. But remember that that imprisonment only lasted three-quarters of an hour at most, and during that short detainment it was that Emily was enticed to Mins. It would seem, then, that with the same motive her absence and mine from Goodford House during that particular three-quarters of an hour was a thing to be desired.”

“It wasn’t from Goodford that our absence was desired, Aubrey,” cried Miss Emily, suddenly looking through the half-opened door, “but from Ritching church: for I was about to go to the church, and so did you mean to go to it from Hallam Castle.”

Langler, it seems, had been constrained to tell her something of his adventures at the castle, and he said now, with rather a start: “well, then, it may have been from the church that our absence was desired.”

“But for what reason in the world?” I asked.

“Who knows?” he answered. “Still, it does seem now to be so.”

“But for what possible reason, do you imagine, Emily?” I asked again.

Miss Emily after a moment’s silence answered: “how should I know? But quidquid latet apparebit! we shall know it all some day” — and, saying this, she was gone from us.

CHAPTER XI

BARON KOLAR ON THE MIRACLE

GOING DOWN THE stair later in the day, I was met by Mrs Edwards hurrying up with her large face flushed, and she stopped a little to give into my ear like a cargo all that was on her mind. Her manner was ever homely, one might say petting and motherly.

“How did you sleep?” she said in a sort of whisper, “I hope you and the Langlers are not going to desert me, too: five of the others are off after lunch, and it is too bad, everything will be spoiled. If the miracle had only waited till — but God’s will be done. What a thing! I haven’t got over it yet, have you? Edwards says he will be at the telephone most of the day, and that Dr Burton will have to be a prelate or something. The Queen has been talking with him from Windsor about Burton and the miracle; the whole world seems wild with excitement; they say that no miracle was ever seen by so many reliable witnesses. Poor Edwards is up to the ears in it, I’m afraid he is not very pleased at bottom, and he puts the whole blame of it upon me, as though I had any power to interfere.... I oughtn’t to have got up the church-party, he says — as though I could have foreseen.... Anyway, five of the guests are off, and Edwards says that Society will have to moderate its tone in face of what he foresees” — and some more of this kind.

I told her that I didn’t think that the Langlers would be shortening their visit. “But as to Baron Kolár,” I said, “is he among the departing guests?”

“No,” she answered, “the baron stays on till Thursday. He was closeted an hour this morning with Edwards — Oh, that man! he is too incorrigible; he has told Lady Truscott not to be overwhelmed, since the miracle has some explanation — puts it all down to hypnotism — I must go.” On this she ran on up, and left me.

Below I was at once struck by a difference in the tone of the house. I did not see Mr Edwards, and Baron Kolár too was missing. Langler told me that the baron was at Ritching Vicarage with Dr Burton, and when I mentioned to him what Mrs Edwards had whispered me as to Burton’s probable rise, his answer was: “well, that will be only fitting: moreover, Baron Kolár prophesied it, you remember.”

The afternoon passed into twilight, and still I saw no sign of the Styrian, but an hour before dinner, as I happened to be strolling alone in one of the home-coverts separated by a path from the park, Mr Edwards, without any hat, broke through the bushes, dashing back his hair, and looking pestered. “Oh, Mr Templeton,” he said, “have you seen anything of Baron Kolár?”

I said no.

“Hang the man,” said he, “I have had four men out on his trail for an hour....”

I said that I had understood earlier in the day that the baron was at Dr Burton’s.

“He was,” answered Edwards, “but he isn’t now. It is precisely about Dr Burton that I want to see him, for the Bishop of Lincoln offers Burton the nomination to the vacant Chancellorship and Residentiary Canonry, on condition that I accept at once. Properly speaking, you know, the whole job lies miles outside my interest, and I only wish —— God forgive me.”

“But why all the flurry?” I asked.

“Well,” he answered, “the country, of course, looks to me now to rush Dr Burton into some Grand Lamaship — as though one could at a moment’s notice like this! I assure you, Mr Templeton, soft isn’t the word for the hundreds of unpractical suggestions that have been made me this day by leading men in the country, so what we are coming to from a business point of view is rather hard to say. Oxford is a place up in the clouds! and Cambridge isn’t far below.... I don’t seem to have even a spare deanery into which to fit Burton, and the whole to-do is rather hard on me — all extraneous work and worry — for I haven’t studied Church-organisation! if anyone were to ask me who is the real head of it all as things are, the King or the Pope, I believe I’d be put to it to give him a straight answer. However, there’s this Lincoln Chancellorship, and I’m hunting down Baron Kolár to see whether or not he’ll have it for Dr Burton just for the time being....”

At this I could not help exclaiming: “but what voice has Baron Kolár in the matter of the career of Dr Burton?”

“Oh, well,” said Mr Edwards, “you would hardly see the inwardness of it off-hand by the light of nature, for it is delicate in a diplomatic way. You know that Baron Kolár fills such a place both in and out of the Reichsrath that he is one of the four men who really have the world’s peace in the hollow of their hand, but perhaps you don’t know by how far he is probably the most dangerous of the four, for the bottom meanings of that man’s polity remain an unknown quantity, and in order to get at them you would have first of all to draw his teeth, for his mind lurks in a stronghold of which his teeth are the ramparts, and it takes a pretty tricky one to see much that’s behind ’em. Anyway, the Foreign Minister of a country whose chief asset is peace would rather stand personally well with Baron Kolár with a view to sound sleep at night than with, I was going to say his — own — wife.”

“Quite so,” said I; “but still, what can be the grounds of this interest of the baron in Dr Burton? not political?”

“It is, somehow,” said Edwards, “though I don’t pretend quite to fathom the lees of this particular mind; but from the first he adopted Burton, and, of course, when a man like him chooses to chaperon a parish-priest up the mountains of preferment — —”

At this point a clerk ran up to deliver some message to Mr Edwards, who went off with him, I, for my part, continuing my stroll through the covert till I came out upon a road, where the first thing which I saw was Baron Kolár’s valet reclining in a meadow, smoking. I went through a gate to him, and asked where his master was. His answer was in the words: “perhaps can you that house there under see? there is he.”

I knew the house to which he pointed: it is called Dale Manor, and was then the home of two old maids whom I had long known as “Miss Jane” and “Miss Lizzie” (Chambers), for they were visitors at Swandale. How Baron Kolár had come to know them, why he was there, I couldn’t guess; but, in good nature to Mr Edwards, I walked down three very steep fields, then down two lanes, to Dale Manor, in order to tell the baron that he was being sought.

This Dale Manor, certainly, was a very charming home. I pulled the bell-chain at the wall which surrounds the place, and, on being let in, caught sight of Miss Jane pacing, with gloves and scissors, among her flowers. I think that the sun had already set, and the scene in there was all one of bowery shades and peace and well-being. Miss Jane, I suppose, thought that I had come on a visit, and after asking some questions about the Langlers and the miracle invited me in. I then asked if Baron Kolár was in the house, to which she replied, with a smile: “yes — fast asleep.”

“Asleep!”

“Sh-h-h!” she whispered, “he is just under that window there: my sister is watching over him; it must be nearly time for me to relieve her...”

I was too astonished to speak! My knowledge of the manner of life of these ladies, its English primness and reclusion, made all the keener my feeling of the oddity here, for certainly they would have consented to take turns in watching over the slumbers of no other male person, and I thought to myself: “well! such miracles are wrought by great men.”

“I didn’t know that you even knew the baron,” I said at last.

“We have known him for five afternoons,” answered Miss Jane in a hushed, but animated, manner— “since last Thursday! In passing by the Manor he fell in love with it, and rang the gate-bell. I happened to be in the gardens, and, being naturally startled, contrived to send for my sister, who after examining him through the spyglass from a window came down to us. It was so embarrassing at first! we had no notion what to make of the man suddenly sprung upon us, with his great satin jacket and stream of talk, we couldn’t, of course, know who he might be, for it was only after a long while that he let out that he was staying at Goodford. He led us round the grounds, criticising and admiring everything, then had the head gardener brought to suggest certain changes to him — and there is no doubt that he must be a past master of horticulture, forestry, and landscape gardening, you know — then he said that he was tired and thirsty, and had a headache, so we had finally to decide to ask him in.”

“It must have been an event!”

“Well, we were certainly put out,” answered Miss Jane, “and poor Lizzie has been taking lavender-water; for Barons Kolár do not grow on every bush, and it all came upon us like any thunderclap. He sat by that window in the drawing-room, talking, talking in his long-drawn way, and looking sleepy, while Lizzie and I glanced at each other, wondering what next, for my sister and I of course know what each other is thinking without needing to speak. Now, as it happened, Fanny, our between-maid, was ill, and Lizzie had been making some special milk-toast for her, so it occurred to Lizzie to give him some of it, with tea; she had made quite a pile, and never dreamt — anyway, it was brought in. Well, he began to eat languidly, but he kept on eating and talking, and, Mr Templeton, he ate up every scrap — yes, every scrap.”

“Poor Fanny!”

“Yes, indeed. My sister and I glanced at each other when we saw the pile of milk toast going, going, and then gone. But he consoled poor Lizzie, who, if she has just a touch of vanity, is to be condoned on the score of her youth — you know, of course, Mr Templeton, that my sister is my junior by three years — he consoled her by saying that he had never tasted anything so nice; and it is only just to my sister to admit that she can make milk-toast. But he had hardly finished the milk-toast when he began to nod, and before we knew where we were we had him fast asleep on our hands. He muttered afresh that he had a headache, that he wished to be allowed to sleep on the sofa, and that he would like his hair to be brushed while he slept! then he threw himself down, and was instantly asleep. Imagine our plight! What could we do, Mr Templeton? Lizzie, who was quite distracted, put a chair under his feet, and proposed to me to brush his hair! I simply would not! She maintained that it was my duty to assume the initiative, since I am the elder, but I could not see eye to eye with her, and at last, after a great deal too many words, she decided that, since it had to be done, and I would not, then she must, being the younger — —”

“That was brave and charming of Miss Lizzie,” I said.

“You think so?” asked Miss Jane, with a weighing look at me: “to tell the truth, we here are not much in favour of adventures and new departures, and rather affect the quiet old monotonies; but since you think so —— At any rate, he slept for an hour; and every afternoon since then he comes, eats a pile of milk-toast, sleeps an hour, and has his hair brushed. What can we do or say? We are in the maze of an enchantment! Punctually as the clock strikes four his ring is heard at the gate, and in he comes, happy and smiling.”

“It is an idyll,” I said; “but I have an urgent message for him, if one may venture to disturb his Excellency’s siesta.”

“I fear he would hardly approve of being awakened,” said Miss Jane; “but he won’t sleep long now, I know. We might go in softly, and see them....”

On this we went in, to find Miss Lizzie, all brown silk and mitts, sitting in patient vigil over the Styrian, from whom came a note of slumber. To me nothing could have been funnier than this casting of his gross weight by Baron Kolár upon these dainty ladies, and at the sight of it I was afresh pierced with laughter. Miss Jane now took Miss Lizzie’s place as watcher, while Miss Lizzie came to ply me with hushed questions about the miracle, till at last the baron opened his eyes, showed his teeth in a smile, moaned for happiness, and sat up.

I informed him that he was being sought by the Prime Minister, and presently, after some talk, we two left Dale Manor together for Goodford.

“Dear beings,” he said happily to me of the Misses Chambers, “nice people, charming people, I like them. These are not women, oh no, they are angels. It is astonishing to what differentiations the human species lends itself: here in these ladies you have a type which is not the highest anthropologically, and yet may be as unaplike as the exactest genius of our age. Primitive creatures spent their lives in a passion of earnestness, seeking their food, and defending themselves from violence; but evolution is toward the appreciation of trifles. The earnestness of the engineer, of the statesman, is still brutish: he bestrides the world wild of eye, while to these ladies a parish is the world, tiny traditions are their life, whatever arises causes them to exchange a code of glances. Nice people, gracious people: their velvet manners, their cushions, their shaded interior — everything nice and luxurious, and, I assure you, they make very good toast — very good. Nor does it displease me to find them devoid of ideas, oh no, there is no need for them to say anything: merely as listeners they have a merit. I am only sorry that this so-called miracle has come to excite and unsettle them.”

“But ‘so-called,’ Baron Kolár!” I could not help crying out: “surely you saw the miracle with your own eyes, like the rest of us!”

“Well, yes, I saw it,” he said; “oh yes, I saw it, too. But this looks to me a case in which it would be well not to place too much faith in the senses. If we know that miracles cannot happen, then, when we see them, we can only regard them as due to some caprice of our fancy; and if Providence is warned beforehand that we shall so regard them, it will be the less tempted to trouble us with any. On the whole, a mood of impassive aloofness seems to me the wisest with regard to what we witnessed on Sunday night. Do not permit it to engage or modify you at all; just say to yourself: ‘let the vulgar millions lose their heads, but let me and my friends watch them with an impregnable eye.’ Or do you not think that my advice is good?”

“On the contrary,” I said, while a flush leapt to my face, “I think it even irreverent, baron — as an eye-witness of such a revelation must needs think it.”

“Oh, you think that: well, you are right, too, in your own way,” he answered. “A religion that was based on the senses would not be displeasing to me, even though somewhat displeasing to reason. Do not imagine me an enemy of piety. I only meant to suggest that the senses are not always sure avenues to knowledge. But you, now, believe that you have seen a revelation, and the dawn of an epoch: well, you are right, too, in your own fashion.”

As he was thus droning we arrived before Goodford House, and the private secretary hurried out from a French window where he had been watching, to hail and greet the baron.

CHAPTER XII

THE QUESTION OF STYRIA

MY HALF-PROMISE TO Mrs Edwards that the miracle should not shorten the stay of the Langlers at Goodford was too soon given, for on the Tuesday both Langler and Miss Emily begged me to return at once to Swandale with them; in fact, quite a number of departures was already proving the spirit of dissolution at work in the house-party.

“I do pity Aubrey,” Miss Emily said aside to me on the Tuesday night: “there he stands smiling like a statue, but I know that he is tasting bitterness in the very valley. To any scholar of forty years it must be no fun to have to change his scheme of thought and life on a sudden; so what this miracle, or whatever you call it, must mean to Aubrey’s touchy intellect and tremulous piety is more than I care to think on. Anyway it is certain that he must be in agony in his present company, and longing to be alone.”

“Yes, that must be so,” I agreed. “Well, let us go away, for we all need time and solitude to find room in ourselves for this new thing.”

“Oh, as for me,” she said, “I am in no rage to adjust myself to it: my soul can wait till his has won back to rest. Being a woman, I am less sensitive to evidence, you see, and tougher in the nerve; but poor Aubrey’s elements are delicately mixed, and ah, he suffers.”

“I understand that,” I said; “perhaps it would be even well if I returned to London for the present.”

She looked at me, saying: “don’t say that; he needs you now, and wishes you to stay.”

“And you?” I asked.

“Not what I will,” she answered softly in Greek, “but what he.”

We accordingly returned to Swandale from Goodford on the Thursday morning. But something of the old Sabbath was soon known now to have departed from our habit of life in the cottage, for the roar of the age reached even into our cloister, hampering the mood of that old world which we wished to inhabit. The very servants had new looks of unrest. Langler smiled doggedly, but was as one who ruminates bitterish herbage. He was much alone, questioning the oracles in the dells or in his study; and Miss Emily and I were much with each other.

She at least knew little quietness in those days, I think: I would spy her hanging about the door behind which her brother paced, and her fever about his state of mind became chronic. “The visits of this man must be terrible to him,” she said of some sort of police-official from London who called about the happenings at Hallam Castle on the Sunday night of the miracle; Robinson had left no trace behind: so poor Langler was plied with questions, without having the least faith probably that the man with the note-book would see light where he himself saw none. And “it is so distressing,” Miss Emily said to me during the third of the visits; “he keeps Aubrey closeted an hour, and he is not pretty, his boots creak. I only wish that Aubrey could be coaxed into some change of scene; you ought to be able to get him to Paris, if you try. Have you noticed that for four days he has burned no incense at all in his rooms?”

“I wonder why?” I said.

“Perhaps he thinks it unbecoming now — I don’t know; and he hasn’t once played the usual chants since we have been back from Goodford. The old attitude to everything has to be all changed, twisted, readjusted, now. Deus meus! in what foreign world have we suddenly waked up?"

"Patience!" I said: "in time the new way will be seen to be the best."

"But the old pleases Cato all the same," she muttered, with a nod of stubbornness which belonged to her; "it is to be desired at least that the new way was not complicated by officers of the law."

As to this officer, Langler himself spoke to me that same evening when I happened to be in his study, saying: "you saw, Arthur, the officer who called to-day?"

"Yes," I answered, "I am afraid he must have bored you to death."

"Well, he means well," he answered, "and we are none of us perfect in grace and wisdom. This man in particular must be very impressed just now with the limitations of our human intelligence, for he stands almost ludicrously dumfounded before the facts which we know about Robinson; dumfounded, above all, before the fact that Robinson should have been shown to me in an unconscious state at Hallam Castle at the hour of seven-fifteen, and in that state should have been conveyed away through a peopled countryside without being seen, though by eight p.m. the constabulary had been warned by me, and have been searching for him ever since. Before the failure to find some trace the mind stands as staggered as if in the presence of unearthly agents. To the questions Where is Robinson now? in a house? in the grave? conscious? still unconscious? why can he contrive to give no sign? our minds can begin to form no guess. Well, we are a small infantry, just wise enough to learn to be meek, and of few days, and full of trouble. But what I wanted to tell you as to this officer is that I took occasion to lay before him all we know about Father Max Dees in his Styrian dungeon, and to ask what I could do for this poor man."

I had forgotten Max Dees in the excitement of what had lately happened! “Well, what did the officer advise?” I asked.

“He seemed unreceptive of the whole matter,” was the answer: “to people of stolid minds the unique is apt to seem unreal; and the mere fact that our knowledge of Dees was brought us by a wren appeared to obstruct this man’s concern in the case. However, he remarked with truth that we had no evidence that, of the three Barons Gregor, the one whom we suspect is really the gaoler of Dees; that, in any case, the English police have nothing to do with the incident; but that, with regard to the Austrian authorities, my best course before approaching them is to ‘make sure of the facts.’ In truth, he doesn’t half believe in Dees — the wren being to blame. The man actually recommended me, with a smile, to go myself to Styria in order to ‘make sure of the facts.’”

“Well, that might be done,” I said: “by all means let us go, for I would go, too.”

Langler looked at me, and smiled, hardly taking me seriously, I fancy.

But this question of “going to Styria” was destined, alas, to arise again. The very next (Sunday) morning, in the breakfast-room, Miss Emily, to my surprise, said to me: “who, then, is Max Dees?”

As I knew that nothing had been told her of the wren’s message, I could only think that she had overheard Langer’s talk with me on the Saturday evening, and, anyway, had now to tell her all — of Dees’ imprisonment, of his prayer “for God’s sake,” of our almost certainty that Baron Kolár was his gaoler, of the paper found at the inn at Mins stating that “Dr Burton is another Max Dees,” of the disappearances, like Robinson’s, which Langer had found to have been going on over Europe, and so on. That morning Langer had not risen from bed — he had flutters of the heart — so I had time to tell a long tale, to which Miss Emily listened without comment, and remained museful throughout the day.

In the evening we were all at Ritching church to hear Dr Burton's farewell before his departure for Lincoln, and I don't know who took care of Swandale during the office, for Langler was now most strict in having every soul about the place at each church-service. He had risen from bed, and we three walked somewhat ahead, with the knot of retainers following. I have an idea that in some recess of Miss Emily's mind these church-goings were not regarded with emotions quite utterly saintly; but whatever resentment rankled in her she breathed no word of it, but went meekly in the pilgrimages with her brother.

We had started out early, so as to secure seats, and far off, as we walked down the road to Ritching, out broke the shambling brogue of the chimes. I thought then how, when Langler and I last heard those bells together, he had said that we heard them for "about the last time," and thenceforth all the evening there were ringing in my head like a sing-song the words: "[Greek: kai pulai adou, kai pulai adou] — and gates of hell shall not prevail against it." When we reached the church it was already full; but in the end I fancy that seats were found for all the Swandale party, though we were all separated throughout the office.

Dr Burton was assisted in the duty by his diocesan and two others, but spoke the address in person. His manner, I judged, was most meek, his throat choked, as of a man who has been struck dumb and has not yet recovered himself: I, in a seat far back, could hardly hear his words, though once, twice, as it were, the lion's voice lifted and vaunted a little, threatening wraths. However, one had little need to hear, in order to feel, Dr Burton that night, for his holiness by itself was as a focus of fire, pouring forth its power into all.

When it was ended, and our set met once more beyond the crowd, Miss Emily said to me: “three-quarters of these folk have never seen Ritching before; half are from London: I saw Lady Agnew, the President of the Academy, and Dr Gootch, who has Aubrey’s heart in his keeping. What do you say brought all these good people here?”

Her manner of speaking, I must say, seemed to me rather dry, and I answered shortly: “a pious need, no doubt.”

“Not a hope to see in Dr Burton’s church a repetition of the ‘miracle’?” she asked: “not the lust of a new thrill?”

“How you can be cruel!” I whispered.

“But what went they out for to see?” she laughed. “Wherever Dr Burton preaches henceforth all England will be squeezing after him in the secret hope of a peep-show! and I prophesy — —” But at that moment Langler joined us, and she was mum.

It was a gloomy night, without any moonlight, and during our return to Swandale groups of wayfarers trudged before and behind us, a strange sight, quite changing the mood of the countryside. Night, however, in the country merges everything in an enchantment, and in Swandale itself was once more nothing but fays and black shades. But even there, just as we were crossing the bridge to enter the cottage, a messenger from the world intruded to trouble us. It was a boy who brought a telegram — for me — which on going in I opened, and read the words: “Two fresh visions reported — one in village-church, Windau, Baltic, one in Bayeux Cathedral.” It had been sent to me from London by a good friend of mine, the editor of a morning paper, and I handed it to Langler, who, having read it, handed it to Miss Emily.

It was at that moment that a thing new, I think, to Swandale took place — a spark of anger, a flush of the cheek: for Miss Emily, tossing the telegram aside even as she read it, let the heated words escape her: “oh, I am like Baron Kolár: I don’t believe in miracles”; and then for the first time I saw Langler look with reproof at his sister.

“Emily,” said he pointedly, “your words seem to me irreverent.”

Miss Emily’s cheek blanched. There was silence for a little while.

“Emily,” said Langler again, “I ask you to take back those words.”

Miss Emily sat down sharply on a chair by the table, having on still her hat and gloves, the little bird perched on her shoulder, her lips set. She answered nothing, and another most painful silence followed. I, for my share, did not know what to say, or where to hide myself away from such a scene so suddenly sprung upon us. I wished that the unhappy telegram had never come.

But after a minute of this silence Miss Emily’s pallor rushed into pink, and the words broke from her in a heat not far from choking, and a strain of tears: “so, then, I am to abase my intellect before the incredible at your bidding, Aubrey! Then, I will say that I do believe in miracles, since such is your pleasure, Aubrey, but that I do not believe in this one.”

“But this is precisely the only one that was ever well attested,” said Langler, with a puzzled brow.

“Then, it is my whim to believe in the ill-attested, Aubrey, rather than in this,” said Miss Emily, “since we are in the Inquisition, Aubrey, and expected to believe in miracles.” She stopped a moment, and then went on, pouring out her words chokily, with stoppages: “I did not see the thing, I am not gainsaying my own senses, and to be charged with irreverence, Aubrey! Why was I not allowed to see it? Why were not you? To be charged with irreverence, Aubrey! The thing is not, so to say, ‘the work of God’; it is related to the disappearance of Charles Robinson and of Father Max Dees, and of all the others, and to these two new ‘miracles’ — and Baron Kolár foreknew that it would happen in Dr Burton's church when he foretold Dr Burton's rise. And to be charged with irreverence, Aubrey! If you wish to find out the meaning of it all, go to a castle in Styria, for that is where the key lies—" and some more of this kind: guesses without proof, statements without form, but so sprung in a pile upon our minds that Langer and I stood dumb before them.

Thus, at any rate, for the second time in two days, those words: "go to Styria," were broached in the cottage: a seed of bitter reaping.

Miss Emily went to a casement, and stood there looking out, while upon me Langer turned a look which I took to imply surprise that I should have spoken to her of Max Dees. For some minutes nothing was said; but presently Langer moved to the window, and laid his hand upon his love; whereat she heaved up to him a smile which beamed with beatitude: and at this I slipped away.

CHAPTER XIII

MISS LANGLER OUTRAGED

SO PEACE WAS made. However, Langer did not sup with Miss Emily and me that night, nor was it till one p.m. of the next day that I saw him again, looking rather haggard, and it was then, for the first time (not the last!), that he made me the announcement that he would go to Styria.

“Yes,” he said, “I will go.”

“Well, and I also, Aubrey,” I said.

“That is like you, Arthur,” he answered. “Ah, yes, it is a high mountain, this, but I say that it shall be climbed.”

“A short journey,” I said. “When do we start?”

“At once,” he answered, “while the grimness of it is upon us.”

“To-morrow, then?”

“It shall be done!” said he; “but let us hasten slowly: Emily has first to be won over.”

“Oh, I think that that will be all right,” I answered, for I knew that Miss Emily desired a change for him.

“She may be alarmed,” he said; “in any case, the question must be broached to her by degrees.”

I answered nothing, but thought to myself: “then, it will be another week before we start.”

He did not mention to me the grounds of this impulse to “go to Styria,” but I assumed that the words of his sister, random as they were, had roused and set him furiously thinking, as they had set me. Indeed, the miracle had been very numbing to the intellect, as it were bludgeoning one's head, so I was glad to notice that afternoon an almost playfulness in Langler during a visit of Miss Jane and Miss Lizzie (Chambers), for it seemed to show that nature in him was at last roused to cast off a gloom which it found unbearable.

Still, this new gaiety of his was certainly a little forced, a little distempered. I was rather puzzled. Once when Miss Emily left the room, Langler seemed only to have waited for this in order to say to the Misses Chambers: "I am on the very verge of a voyage to Styria."

"Styria!" they said together.

"What, is Styria so remote?" asked Langler, leaning forward with a quizzing look. "I didn't say China, I said Styria — a two days' journey by the new rail-trains, with 'every luxury' en route! Do you imagine, then, that you will never see me again?"

"But can he be serious?" asked one of the ladies over her tea-cup: "Emily said nothing of it."

"Emily does not happen to know!" cried Langler— "that is something in store for Emily!"

"Then it is hardly a serious intention, since Emily has not yet been told."

"Who lives will see if it is serious!" said Langler.

"But Styria," said one of the ladies— "Styria sounds so mythical! Why Styria?"

"To open the eyes of the blind," said Langler in a deep voice, "to set at liberty them that are bound!"

The ladies exchanged glances; but before any more could be said Miss Emily came in with a plate of seeds, and Langler sat up straight.

Now, before this, Miss Jane and Miss Lizzie had been giving the story of Baron Kolár's visits; one afternoon lately, they said, the baron had come down from London merely to eat their toast; and they expected him again soon. This being so, I was surprised that Langler should be so unbridled as to publish to them his going to Styria to set free the baron's prisoner! To this day I am at a loss to understand him, though I suppose that he was somewhat distempered by the late events, and in a state of unreal levity. And the very next afternoon, when one of the Benedictines of Up Hatherley, an old college friend, called at the cottage, to him, too, Langler told his intention of "starting at once for Styria." All this time he had said not a word of it to Miss Emily, so that I found myself doubting whether his intention could be serious. When at last Miss Emily heard that we should perhaps be going, it was I who told it her in confidence.

That was just a week after Langler had assured me that his mind was made up to go: and it was during the evening of that same day on which I told Miss Emily of it that a group of Spanish peasants, moving homeward in the gloaming through some fields between the villages of Guardo and Villalba, in Palencia, saw wrought in mid-air by a mountain side a vision of the crucifixion, and dropped to the ground. I was in my own rooms when a message of it was brought me. It was after dinner; Miss Emily had gone to Ritching to see some sick, and when I went to look for Langler I heard that he, too, was not in the house. However, I presently found him down in the south-west, in a grape-arbour near the abbey, and handed him the telegram without a word. He, as he read it, rose slowly from his seat, with a paleness under the skin; for the news of these events had always the same effect upon the mind — awe mixed with a very peculiar ecstasy — which did not diminish with repetition, for with each new alarm I was anew imbued with the same dream of the wind-up and term of the drama of time and the trumps of the tribunes of eternity. I saw the telegram tremble in Langer's hand; I heard him murmur: "another."

"Yes," I said, "another — the fourth." And I cried out: "Oh, Aubrey! where do we stand?"

He made no answer; his head was bowed; till presently he said: "let us go! why do we delay? let us go to-morrow."

"But am I not ready?" I cried.

"That is settled, then," said he: "we go. Emily shall hear it this night, and to-morrow we turn our backs upon Swandale and all our life here. It shall be done now."

"I am sure that you will be none the worse for it," I said.

"On the contrary," said he, "for ease and sloth are the very bane of the soul, Arthur, believe me. It is putting out from port to rough it that braces the ship's timbers! Well, let us launch forth: I at least am ready. So there is another now — the fourth."

"The fourth."

"From Heaven, Arthur?"

"Or from hell."

"Ah, talking of hell," said he, "just come now with me, and I will show you something in that tone."

He left the harbour, and I went with him down a dell towards the south-east of Swandale, till, near the great gate, he stopped at a certain larch tree on a brook's bank, peered at its bark, and pointed to it. It was already rather dark, but I, looking close, saw carved in large letters in the trunk the two words: "Don't Go."

"You see it?" asked Langer: "it was pointed out to me yesterday by John. You see, now, you see...."

I kept on gazing at the carving, while Langler looked at me, smiling, with his arms akimbo; and I thought to myself: “what a pity that our intention of going was ever divulged!”

“Someone seeks a quarrel with me, Arthur,” said Langler: “you see now, you see. But perhaps I do not look dismayed.”

“Of course not,” I murmured.

“Let them threaten me,” he said, “let them do their worst! They may find me of grimmer make than their present delusions of me conceive me. Wait, you shall see me give them their fit answer now.”

“But why?” I cried: “no, Aubrey, pray, don’t think of carving anything there” — for I saw him opening a pen-knife.

But he would not listen to me: “Allow me,” he said, coming to the tree. I could do nothing to stop him, and stooping there during ten minutes, he carved under “Don’t Go” the words “I Will.” I was astonished at his conduct, and still cannot understand what end he imagined would be served by this ataxic defiance.

That same night he spoke to Miss Emily of our voyage, and from the next morning the business of making ready began. But this was not soon over! I had imagined that the packing of a trunk would be almost all: but Langler had many orders to give, and letters of farewell to write to his churchmen and wardens and fellows and professors; and by three in the afternoon it was seen that we could not go that day. Nor could we go the next, for Langler rose from bed with a pain in the heart and a pallor under his skin, and toward evening said to me in his study: “it seems callow, Arthur, for us to set out upon this enterprise without seeing our way before us: let us hasten more slowly, and at least provide ourselves with the proper introductions to people abroad.”

“But isn’t it rather a question of time, Aubrey?” I asked, for it began to seem to me that if we hastened any more slowly we should never get to Styria.

“Yes, most decidedly, it is a question of time,” said he, “and each day that passes is such a care and qualm to me, such a disease and harassment, that if I break down under it, you won’t wonder. Would that we were already gone — that we had gone long ago! Oh, Arthur, am I never to know sweet quiet and peace of heart again?”

I was taken aback! poor Langler said this with so much heart; nor did I quite understand ... since a voyage to Styria to make some inquiries did not seem to me such a task. Langler, of course, was an autochthon — had never been farther than Paris! — and I understood that he was loth to tear himself from his Armenian cushions, his roses, and the Greekish old routine of life in Swandale; but still, I could not see.... Each mind, however, knows the bitter tang of its own plight and entanglement.

“Well, well,” I said, “but we have only to set out and you will feel better.”

“I know it full well!” he answered, “but each day’s delay has only made our departure the more irksome to me. If we had set out at once, as I begged you to, all our difficulties would by now perhaps have solved themselves. But when I think of that poor man in his dungeon, and of how each of the days which we have wasted here may be an age of pain to him, and of how much hangs upon our action — how much! — my limbs seem bound, and my sense of my guilt becomes hard to bear.”

“Perhaps it is the heat of these last few days,” I said.

“Certainly it has been hot,” he answered: “one can hardly get one’s breath; and to venture at such a time into southern lands — —”

“Ah, but there is the sea-voyage,” I said; “let us not think of obstacles, let us just go: solvitur faciendo.”

“You are right,” he cried, “right! That is just the word that we needed — solvitur faciendo! thanks for that word. Oh, Arthur, we have lost time — time that never comes back — the angel with the parting look. And think of what world-business depends upon us — so much. For mercy’s sake, let us lose no more.”

“That is agreed, then,” I said: “we set out.”

“But to what?” he asked suddenly. “We take a voyage into mist! Where exactly are we going to? What shall we do when there? Nothing is clear to me. Suppose we go and effect nothing, and have to return like Quixotes? Suppose there is no Max Dees, no Styrian castle, save in our brains? Shall we leave Emily alone, and our solid good.... Really, Arthur, a certain terror of the absurd is mixed for me with the other obstructions to this adventure.”

“But that is what the police-officer thought of Dees,” I said, “that he is a myth, and you called him stolid. What you were sure of now seems mist to you when it becomes a question of venturing your weight upon it, as Peter lost faith when he stepped out on the waves. But even if it is a myth, let us go and see, fearing nothing, not even the absurd.”

“Well, that is bravely said, too,” he answered: “let us go, then, let us go.... But tell me whether you do not think it better to get letters to the foreign personages first, and not go crudely like birds migrating without due support.”

“As you please,” I said, and said no more, for I did not see that we needed any letters.

However, he wrote for letters, and it was some days — I forget how many — before he had all of the number which he asked for. By this time our date of departure, our very train, had been fixed by Miss Emily, it was now three weeks since Langer had first mooted his idea of going, and by now scores of persons all about must have known that he was going, and when.

During the day before our departure Langer gave a last look to every part of Swandale, and re-entering the house near five p.m., had tea with Miss Emily and me. We were having tea when I heard a noise in a corridor, and on asking was told by Miss Emily that it was “Aubrey’s trunks being taken to the station.” I could not at first understand why they were being taken that night till, on glancing through the door, I saw almost a cartload of baggage (swelled by books!). Miss Emily and I, standing at a window, she with the wren on her shoulder, watched all this luggage being put upon a cart — Langer had now left the room — and driven away; but a minute after it had gone Miss Emily, crying out something, ran from my side, and out of the cottage. I saw her hurry across the bridge, heard her call after the driver, who had disappeared, and soon she too disappeared beyond the bridge.

I assumed that she had run to give the man some forgotten instruction, and expected her back soon; but when she did not come I was not at all anxious, since I had no reason to be so. I was reading Bellarmine, I remember, in a wicker chair that rocked me, and it became so dark that I could hardly see the print. I heard Langer playing Gregorian chants on the organ in the oratory, for he had the habit of playing chants about that hour of the evening, but had rather given it up since the miracles.

Well, I was thus reading in the half dark when, suddenly, a man stood before me — the driver of the cart, who, having left the luggage at the station, was now returned. He seemed unable to speak: if ever I saw awe it was in that man’s face; when I asked: “what is it?” his breath burst from his lips in his vain effort to answer me; his face rolled with sweat. At last when he was able to say something, it was in the words: “Miss Langer — come with me — don’t say anything — —”

I sped with him past two astonished girls in the passage out of the cottage, he taking the way to the south-east, but having already run far he had now to make stoppages, and so hard he found it to speak that we had gone over a quarter of a mile, and were near the great gate, before I could gather from him aught of what was in his mind. He had led me down a path that ran between a brook and a rose-tree hedge, till we were within sight of the carriage-road, and there in a sort of glade, where a larch stood by the brook’s bank, he stopped, and pointed — the same larch on which had been carved “Don’t Go” and Langer’s “I Will.” At the foot of the tree, in a patch of reeds, I saw a female form lying like one asleep, or unconscious, or dead. It was my poor Miss Emily. When I peered nearer I perceived that her left hand had been pegged to the tree by a big nail. But she did not know it, nor reck, she lay in sleep, without any pain or care, her lips a little open, and two poor tears of her truce had trickled down her cheeks.

While I was still gloating over her I was aware, to my woe, that Langer was with us: one of the girls in the house, on seeing me run out, must have warned him of something wrong, and he had hasted at a rounder rate, though a sorry runner, than the exhausted man who had brought me could come; but the effort had been altogether too large for Aubrey’s gauge: he was awfully breathed and gaunt. I saw him stand off, peering gingerly at his dear, asking: “what is it?” with his cheeks peaked up, poor Aubrey: and I had to leave her pierced, in order to turn to him.

CHAPTER XIV

CANTERBURY

AFTER THIS WEEKS passed before we knew whether Miss Emily would live or die, and the existence of Max Dees and of Styria was forgotten in Swandale, for our poor friend took a delirious fever, and had three relapses, so we others dragged our lives through many a black day while hers hung in the balance: weeks of watching: leaving not much outstanding in the memory, save the fact of a certain new quarry — a puny affair perhaps, but for ever associated in my mind with the nightmare of that time, and somehow lending to it a strange awfulness; for it happened that someone had lately opened a quarry some miles north of Swandale, and was blasting the rock: so fifteen, twenty times a day we would hear it, not loud, but clear, a knock at the north door of heaven, and two seconds later an answer sounded in the south of heaven: and each time Langler would look at me with such a smile. So that this sound of blasting, all mingled as it was with Miss Langler's fight for life, has still for me whenever I hear it meanings the most momentous, as it were rumours of the guns and din of Armageddon, and the arbitrament of the doom of being. In the end, however, I managed to make terms with the owner, and the noises ceased.

About the same time — i.e. towards the end of the year — hope brightened for our wounded friend, and my mind found some breathing-space to think out what I could do for her brother, who had been very gravely shocked and cowed. After a time I would get him into his study at night, and there read to him his accumulated correspondence, with a view to weaning his thoughts from a room three corridors away; for the letters, being mainly from men in the whirlpool, were full of history, and such as to reawaken his interest in things. Also I insisted upon answers to some of them being dictated to me; and also, at last, I read to him a little from books and newspapers.

At midnight of Christmas Day I was thus reading to him through the noise of the cascade, made noisier that night by stormy weather, when he said: "Europe and America, then, are again Christian in an ancient sense. How many visions in all have now been seen?"

I found among the newspapers on our half-round settle one containing a list of the miracles, with their dates, and saw that their number was twenty-three.

At this Langer seemed to wince, and we sat cowering over our wood fire in a bitter rumination, till after a while he said: "I have nothing to do with the defect in the world's fate, and don't wish to cause my voice to be any more heard: but still, Arthur, consider how the sins of nations do find them out."

I was pleased at his new tone of interest, but said that I did not know to what he referred.

"I refer," he answered, "to this proposed 'weeding out' of our refuse populations by the 'lethal chamber' method, and to the growth among men of a certain brute directness with which the nineteenth century was less tainted. Mind you, I interfere in nothing; but don't let us hide from each other the existence in our minds of certain ghastly suspicions with regard to these visions; and if such a thing can be, however large-minded the motive, think of it, Arthur! The growth of such a brute directness can only be the penalty, subtle yet terrible, of some sin in the body politic; nor is any seer needed to see that that sin is the mere discussion of such a step as this wholesale 'weeding out' of men's lives."

"I, too," I said, "have felt that such a thing was brutalising."

"But it is beastly!" he hissed. "Man's evolution, certainly, is henceforth in his own hands; but to want to beget taller sons with a strain of the thug in their blood! It is an instance, and a chief cause, of that brute directness which is tainting society, which perhaps culminates in these miracles, which I myself have experienced — —"

"Never mind," I murmured.

"To strike me through her — —"

I said quickly: "but this purpose of 'weeding out' the submerged seems to have died since the miracles, for the people are now Christian, Aubrey, in deed as well as in creed."

"But before we rejoice, let us ask for how long!" said he. "If what we have dared to suspect of the miracles — that they may be none — be true, is it not probable that they involve some plot unfriendly to the Church? We have sure knowledge, for that matter, that someone who need not be named between us is no friend of churches. Since, therefore, the Church flourishes by the miracles, it can only be, if there is a plot against her, that the miracles will in time be shown to be none: in which case, think of the moral swing back, huge enough perhaps to wreck the frame of society."

I said nothing, and for some time we bent over the fire in a silence of wormwood.

"Is there a plot?" he began again: "if there is, I believe with her who lies hurt that the key to it may be found in a castle of — Austria. But anon, when I remember that we here are the only three in the world into whom such a doubt has entered, it strikes me as even impious — —"

“There is also Rivers who doubts,” I said. “Lidcott, by the way, has written you an account of Rivers’ secession and ‘new religion’ in Littlemore — a ‘religion’ with a following of six! Lidcott’s letter also contains one from Burton about Rivers’ secession: I’ll read it you now, if you like.”

“Well, then,” said he; so I got and read the letters.

Rivers was an Oriel man of very brilliant reputation, one of the younger group of leaders of the so-called “Liberal Movement” — a church-party which had been making some noise in the world just before the miracles; he was a contemporary of Langer and myself, so we were familiar with his personality and church-idea, which had been called “anti-romantic”; he was one of the warmest admirers of Langer’s criticism, and had set to sweet minor music some of Langer’s songs. Well, when the miracles began, Ambrose Rivers, alone of thinkers, for some reason or other broke off from the Church, and started a new “religion” in Littlemore — with a following of six; and Dr Lidcott’s letter to Langer was a description of this new flight of Rivers’, containing also the following from Dr Burton: “The Chancery, Lincoln, In Festo Sanct. F. Xav. My dear Lidcott, — The tragedy of Rivers has been as great a heaviness to me as to you and the rest; how mysterious, too, now, when our Light is come. Can nothing be done even now? It was a branch loaded with flowers and fruit, and though the very canker was in them, it is hard to see it lopped off at a stroke. Do reason with him, then, still a little; but, if he be obdurate and damned in error, you will leave him to the tormentors, warning him that the day is even at hand when Holy Church will no longer spare dissent and rebellion, but everywhere on the front of that chief of crimes will brand her effective anathema. Verbum caro factum est, et habitavit in nobis. Farewell. On the 13th inst. I leave this for St Paul’s. Miserere mei, Deus, asperge me, Domine, hyssopo, et mundabor; and you, pray for me. — In haste, yours faithfully in Xt., John Burton.”

“Well,” said Langler when I had read the two letters, “but Rivers’ doubt of the miracles is due to some trait of a wayward mind, if not to some wisdom of the man’s really divine genius; but in our case the doubt has grown out of facts which have come before us, and since those facts are very meagre I say that our doubt sometimes strikes me as impious. I think, however, that it will be justified if Dr Burton’s rise so continues as strikingly to fulfil the prophecy that he is ‘destined to be the greatest of churchmen.’”

“Oh, you think that,” I said.

“Yes,” said he; “for, if there is a plot, there is no difficulty about divining its purposes: we can say with assurance that those purposes are, firstly, to raise the Church to the height of power, in which case what she will surely do was foreseen: she will become harsh, will clash with the modern spirit. And to make this clash doubly certain a number of brisk churchmen would naturally be chosen out by the plotters to become generals of the Church — of whom Burton was chosen for England. It is so. For we read of Burton: ‘I am sure that he will do for England: he is another Max Dees, as arrogant as he is brilliant, a union of Becket and Savonarola.’ Now, it is clear that the ‘Savonarola’ and the ‘brilliance’ in Burton are one, and the ‘Becket’ and the ‘arrogance’ are one: for who was Becket? an arch-priest who flouted the civil power. Therefore, if there is a plot — for I state nothing, I interfere in nothing — if there is one, I say that the Church is to be pushed to clash with the civil power. And now suppose, secondly, that at the height of that clash the miracles be shown to be none; and suppose further, thirdly, that it be then made to appear that these false miracles were contrived not by the enemies of the Church for her ruin, but by churchmen themselves for their own rise and rule: well, then — what then?... And shall no man be found to meddle in this, one with heart, head, hand, Arthur, though a sword pierce his own heart?"

"I mean to meddle in it somehow," I said suddenly.

"Beware, however, Arthur," he murmured. "I too feel the muth to venture — if it be not already too late.... In any case, let us hasten slowly, and wait till our doubt acquires some little certitude. I say that something of certitude will be ours, if Dr Burton's rise becomes so marked — —"

"But surely, Aubrey," I said, "we need not wait for that. Look at things in Germany and Russia, look at France: in France ever since the Separation Act, the Church was a dead thing; then came the miracles, and to-day France is on her knees. It is touching: there never was an age so hungry for faith. This week there have been eleven pilgrimages in France alone to the spots of the miracles — caravans counting their hundreds of thousands. Things have been moving, you know. Italy is more a theocracy now than under Alexander VI.; one quarter of the Austrian Abgeordneten House is already given over to churchmen; in our own election in October forty people of churchman type were tided into Parliament, and in the Lords the bishops awe, so how it would be there under Dr Burton one may imagine; when Burton was preaching at St Paul's crowds vaster than the cathedral could contain waited all the night through — nowhere, it seems, are there enough churches, and women hourly swoon in the crowds round certain churches; not a few rich men have stripped themselves to endow the Church; as for charity, here is the high day of Christ's sick and needy: everyone is giving apparently, everyone is muttering prayers — merchants over their cargoes, doctors over their charges; in November two New York negroes, by pretending to have seen the vision on a country-road, and asking for funds to open a church, became vastly rich, and now have disappeared; even the bourses have caught the rapture, gambling is going out, all sorts of personal oddities of behaviour and costume abound, as in Puritan days, saints arise, newspapers no more print certain kinds of matter, in the Commons during prayers members are as if in pews; as for the Nonconformists, they are hardly any longer even the political clubs and caucuses which they had become, since most of them have gone over to the Church of the miracles. If you would bear to hear me read, you would see for yourself the millionfold modification of everything. A certain Father Mathieu, in whose church at Windau the second of the visions appeared, is followed by multitudes to be healed by his touch; while the once Vicar-Apostolic of Bayeux, a man of Burton's very temper, is now Metropolitan of Paris. It was about him, by the way, that I wanted to tell you, for since his rise is complete, we needn't wait for Dr Burton's to become so, in order to get that certitude as to a plot — —"

"Well, let that be so," said Langler; "but ah, Arthur, what touch shall be found, both gentle and strong, to heal all this fevered world? If the Master were indeed here, with the stars of night in his eyes! As for me, I confess, my longing is for escape. I have read a tale of a tiny world which struck our earth, tore up a field or two, and carried off someone into space —— think of that! — the dumb empyrean, the leisure to be a man, the starry dream, and in those grassy graves, too, of Ritching churchyard — —"

"But things are as they are," I murmured; "we can't escape them."

"True," he answered; "life is a sterner dreaming than dreams, but surely a diviner; and in His plan be our good."

"Well, then," said I, "this being so, what I, for myself, propose to do now is to write a letter to the Styrian authorities, stating what I know of Father Max Dees, and giving hints as to the place of his imprisonment, without breaking any law of libel. Dees may thus be liberated; whereupon, if he knows anything of a plot, he will divulge it."

“Well, we might think that over,” said Langler, “and see if we find it to be our duty.”

In the end this was determined upon between us, and from the next morning I set about it, writing first to consult my solicitors as to the proper authority to whom to address ourselves: this, they answered, was the Public Safety Bureau of Upper Styria; so Langler and I set to work to draw up the document, and on the 7th of January it was posted.

This work quite warmed us anew, and we were eager for a reply, sometimes discussing whether it would come in one week, in two, or in three: but a month passed, Miss Emily was being allowed to sit up, and no reply had come.

Those were the days when England was at the height of the excitement over the disappearance of the Bishop of Bristol. On the death, three weeks before, of Archbishop Kempe, the question who would succeed him had raised a simmering of interest, not in church-circles only, but in the nation: a very distinguished Cambridge man was a rumour, also Dr Todhunter, Bishop of Bristol, while Dr Burton, now Bishop of Winchester, was the popular choice. For us at Swandale, however, only two of these were really in the running, for we lived too near to Goodford not to know that Mr Edwards would never of his free will set such a spirit as Burton over the province of Canterbury. Edwards' majority in the House was now only twenty-three, and, apart from that, everything in him shied at Dr Burton's whole State-idea and order of mind; so when Dr Todhunter's appointment was made known Langler said to me, “you see, now, it is as we said.”

Three days after Edwards' letter of invitation to Dr Todhunter the doctor wrote to Langler, stating that he had accepted the primacy, and closing with a very tender reference to our wounded friend. We two had known and loved him since undergraduate days, and Langler in particular had a kind of devotion for the classicism of his style and preaching. Who, in fact, that ever knew him could fail to revere him? When only fifty his mass of hair was quite wool-white, and no saintlier face, surely, ever lifted towards the skies. Well, his election by dean-and-chapter had taken place by the 17th of February; on the 19th the archbishop elect took a trip to London, meaning to be back in Bristol by the 21st; but from the hour of two p.m. on the 20th nothing appears ever to have been seen of him. At that hour of two — high daytime! — the old man parted from the Rev. William Vaux, Dean of the Arches, on the pavement in Whitehall, and — walked away into nothingness; nor, I think, has one ray of real light ever been thrown upon his disappearance.

I can almost feel again, as I write, the mood of those days. One sometimes lost control of oneself! one had seizures of excitement, could hardly utter one's words! Langer in particular was strongly moved: his cheek at one spot would go pale, and quiver. By the 24th or 25th we at Swandale began to understand that Dr Todhunter would never more be seen; and I said then: "No! he will never more be seen; and in two months from to-day — wait and see! — Dr Burton will be primate of England."

"But will he consent?" asked Langer, pale with excitement: "does he not already — suspect? Will he plug up both his ears against a hundred whispers that already throng in his consciousness?"

What grounds Langer had for assuming these "hundred whispers" in Dr Burton's consciousness I do not know; but, if it was a guess, it may have been a shrewd one, for I have seen a letter of Burton's written about then, in which twice, occurs a certainly very suggestive prayer against "the deceitful man": "ab homine iniquo et doloso erue me" — twice in one letter.

However this was, it was soon beyond doubt that Dr Burton would not only be invited, but would accept the primacy. The rumour grew and grew.

The Prime Minister, in fact, must have been under the strongest pressure to invite Burton, and after a struggle with fate, with his hair, and with the wire-pullers, had to give in. Mrs Edwards herself, who drove over one afternoon from Goodford, told us so much; and by the middle of March it began to be taken for granted that Dr Burton would be metropolitan of Canterbury. I remember the date very well, for just about that time Baron Kolár came down to Goodford for one afternoon to repose himself, to eat the Misses Chambers' toast, and sleep on their sofa, and have his hair brushed; and it was that same day — either the 14th or 15th of March — that the weak voice of our friend said to her brother: “you should go to Styria, since it is so.” It was a rough evening, before the candles were lit, and we two were sitting beside her cane chair by her fire; and Langler, with his brow bowed over her hand, answered: “yes, I will go, since I should. We have written a letter to the authorities in those parts, and are waiting for their answer, but if it does not come within a week — or two — I shall do as you bid me.”

CHAPTER XV

OUR START

TEN MORE DAYS passed without answer from Styria, and I was daily awaiting Miss Emily's word: "You should start now."

She had left her room on the 22nd, and I can see again in fancy our friend as she was that day, with her hair somewhat lax, and the little wren on her bosom; she was palish, but one would hardly have thought that she had come through a great illness, and more laughter than I could quite account for, than quite pleased me perhaps, was on her lips.

Those were warm days in which much more than the daffodil had blown in Swandale, and on the 25th of the month our friend went out of doors. Towards evening she and I were in the pavilion — for I find that I must tell something as to her and me, and since I must, will tell it more or less verbatim, with reporter's blankness, as well as I can remember. We, then, being in the pavilion (a circular temple at the end of an oblong of water), she said to me: "those groups of lily-leaves on the lake looking like ears must remember the music which Aubrey and I made here most nights last summer. They will never hear us more. We used to sit in that recess there, and this is the cupboard where we put up the violin and harp." (A series of cupboards and old chairs went round the wall, and there were chambers within the thickness of the marble, each with its big window and seat; in one of the cupboards I saw still a harp in a bag.)

"But the water-lilies will hear you and him again, Emily," I answered.

“Will they? What name shall we give him, Kitty-wren?” she asked of the bird, “let’s call him Mr Hopeful, Mr Butterlips; let’s screech him down with nicknames, Jenny” — whereat the bird from picking at the scab in her palm broke, as if in answer, into chattering, so that we had to smile: indeed, this tiny brown being that had come to us so strangely with its message from Styria, and would never leave us, was seldom silent even in the winter, and now in the spring would sometimes scatter one’s talk with its showers of music. Miss Emily touched its cocky, short tail, saying: “Jenny knows! and the water-lilies know, too: they are never to hear us more. Birds and herbs and women: they are in the original obiah-dodge, and know what they do know.”

“Women above all,” I remember saying, though my heart was sore for her and for me.

“Look at her now!” she cried— “perched right atop of the harp, screaming something: the devil’s in the bird, I think — pneuma akatharton echei!” This she said with a laugh, but when the bird now suddenly hopped upon her she stepped back from it with grave looks, brushing it off, murmuring, “get away, you, go”; and at this I found myself bowed over her drawn left palm, choked with her name; for she was no longer herself, and feelings surged within me which cannot be told; but as I held her hand, she first looked gravely at me, and then, to my wonder, began to hum the common song: “two in a bed,” whereat, with playful reproach, I murmured “Gregorian,” and let go her hand. Just then, the bird settling afresh upon her, she said to it: “well, come then, Kitty-wren: though you be the banshee, the very moth of death, I sha’n’t shun you — not though your mood be all of shrouds, and of thundery lone nights in the ground, and good-bye all. Still, you were sick, you know, and I nursed you, I have fed you, and watered you, and cleaned you, and tamed you, and loved you, and you have a devil against me, Jenny.”

“Oh, but, Emily,” I said, “this little bird begins now to take up too much of your thoughts!”

She did not answer me, but remarked thoughtfully: “she has baseness in her nature; yes, she makes a show of affection, but how flightily she forsook me that evening! I was just by that whitethorn bush out there, looking down at the water-lilies, and she was on my left shoulder, when suddenly she flew away, and before you could say ‘Jenny!’ a wet cloth was over my face, my mouth was crammed, and the scream of my being made no sound in my ears. Yet I have a sort of memory of a man, a masked man, a lanky man with a stoop, so strong, so rude, dark as death, cruel as the grave — —”

“But, Emily, you speak of that?” I cried.

“Aubrey isn’t here to hear,” she said in a confidential way, “so it is nothing. Let me talk. There’s something in mere blackness without one ray, in ravines without bottom, in bitterness so bitter that it churns to cud in the chewing. You don’t know how strong he was: I struggled with him, but I was like a straw in his grasp; and when I felt myself going, and no succour nor ruth in the world, and the large darkness glooming, why then I sighed and was reconciled, and I chewed the brash of the grave like black bread, and it was boon and good to me.”

When I began now to reproach her for such melancholies she hummed a catch of Langer’s —

“In its dash Showers down the rill,” then at once ran to a window, crying: “look, you can see the whitethorn from here; I must have been dragged at least forty yards from it — —” but I would no longer hear her, but drawing her down to the window-seat, said, “hear me, dear Emily: you are not well, you are still far from well, and for some days I have determined to ask you whether you do not see that it would be well for you now to end my ordeal. If I have the right — —”

“Which right, Jenny?” she cried: “here is a young man who wishes to sleep two in a bed with me — two in a bed, bed, bed, bed, bed! but he will never sleep two in a bed with me, I think.”

At these words I was so alarmed for her and pierced with pain, that I could only bow my head over her knees, and I used the word “mercy.”

“Mercy?” said she, “is it she who lives in Cuckoo-town? But you have not waited long.”

“Five years.”

“Is that long? madly, dyingly long?... But it is only four.”

“The fifth has long since begun.”

“Has it? Truly? You might have reminded me!”

“On the morning when it began I begged of you a rose as symbol, and you would not give it.”

“Is that so? But perhaps I might have given some forget-me-nots, only there were none.... You see, there’s failure in you somewhere, Arthur, there’s a troubled light about your eyes, you were not born to make a mother of me: you should buy an urn, Arthur, to blubber in.”

“Well, I must, since you pronounce me so unfortunate,” I said; “but after four years and nearly a half of hope and promise — —”

“Not promise.”

“But of hope so warm — —”

“The conditions remain: I have a brother.” “But, Emily, you care — —”

“For him.”

“Alone?”

“They say the flowers grow fresher on maids’ graves, Arthur: have you ever heard say that?”

“Yes, but hear me: a day had to come when you must leave Aubrey — only for a time, only partially — and for over a week it has seemed sure to me that it is come now. You should be taken from Swandale, you should enter upon a new life — only for a time. Hear me, Emily: you have been fearfully ill, nigh to death; turn to me, say that you will come — —”

“To Styria?”

“Styria! Of course, I did not mean Styria.”

“Then, where does the man mean, Kitty-wren?” cried she: “he is talking in Nephelo-coccugia, he hears a toll and thinks it a marriage-bell, I am sure he is bewitched, he has blinkers on his eyes and morris bells on his fingers: let’s scream at him, and stop his dancing; he will take worms to his bed, and be hugging them for his warm darling: Heaven guard us from such a carle!”

“But pray, pray,” was all that I could say, for a hunger and pity of her possessed me.

“I am only telling you the truth,” she answered, “your luck has leprosy, your godmother must have been cross-eyed; and have I ever vowed to be one Mrs Templeton, with your ring round my finger, whispering: ‘this is my body’? I don’t remember! I knew you when you were a young boy, and I had a dream of you one night in which something said into my ear nothing but ‘Arthur, Arthur, Arthur’ — just ‘Arthur, Arthur, Arthur’ for years, and nothing else — a rum dream. But ‘wife!’ ‘wife!’ shrilled the thrush, and the cuckoo answered, ‘all gone,’ ‘all gone.’ ‘Wife’ is a bird-word, Jenny, it has no equivalent in my language. ‘Wife!’ sing ‘wife!’ My tongue is too thick to sweet it.”

“Mine isn’t,” I said, “if you will hear me say it. Emily, look at me, I am praying you — —”

“Idolatrously: I am wood and stone. Still, let me hear you say it.”

“Say what?”

“‘Wife’: to hear how you pronounce the fluty f-sound and the deep i and the wallowing w.”

“Well, since that pleases you, I say— ‘wife.’”

“Oh, but so sheepishly? without unction? Hear me say it— ‘wife.’”

“Well, so I too say it— ‘wife.’”

“Yes, that’s strong. But you still speak of this? You still hope for such a thing of me, really?”

“But may I not? Only to be allowed to take you — —”

“To Styria?” she repeated: “oh, Arthur, the colour of your eyes and mine don’t match, you were not fashioned to be the father of a houseful of sons, they would all squint. Deus meus! doesn’t the enthronisation of Archbishop Burton take place to-morrow, and will you not be going to Styria the day after, or the day after?”

“I do not know that,” I said: “we are waiting for a letter from the authorities there.”

“But if no letter comes? Will you not be going? Will you let Aubrey go alone?”

“I am far from certain that Aubrey is going! There are pits and perils — —”

“He shall go,” she said, “though they pierce my side, too, so that out of it gush blood mingled with tears; he will go of himself, because he should, and he shall go, because I will tell him to.”

“I know that he will if he should,” I answered; “but should he? What has Aubrey to do with the world’s trouble? As for me, I tell you, Emily, that I care for nothing in the wide earth — —”

“But care you must! Kitty-wren has come, the gripe’s on,” said she, “and if she hath a devil we must nourish a God in us, to match it. There is no escape, we are under orders, and care we must, go he shall, and you with him, though they crucify him and you, and though they fix every muscle of me to a different tree.”

“But why did this bird come to us?” I thought then in my pity: “there was the world for her, and she came to Swandale”; and some despair in our friend’s face seemed to say to me, “yes, she came to us, to me, to you, not to others, but to us: it stands recorded, two Gods are in it.” Her face showed wannish in that twilight against her violet velvet and her furs, for the shades of night were gathering, and we looked aside through the window upon the darkling oblong of water in silence, since I could find nothing to answer her, nor any way out of the entanglement in which my feet seemed to be engaged; anon her large plush hat touched my face, anon she fingered the chords of the harp, while the bird on her shoulder twittered its song. At last I said to her: “let it be as you wish, Emily: but is a journey to Styria such a great matter? We will go, and we shall return. Nothing shall be strong enough to restrain me from returning, if you say that my ordeal shall then come to its conclusion.”

She looked with sorrowful eyes over the water, and after some minutes she murmured: “only return safe with him, and I may be fond to you, Arthur.”

We dallied there a goodly time after this, till some of the star-glints were lit all amid the lilies of the pool; the little bird became sullener or sleepy, and barely lisped anon; I saw a tear steal down the cheek of our friend, as she commenced to hum, and then to sing wistfully, and to twang out on the harp one of those artificial little hymns of her brother, whose austere, sad music had long been dear to our hearts: it was his Serenade, already at that time set to music by the many-minded Ambrose Rivers of “New Church” notoriety:

“In its dash Showers down the rill, Raving of the hill (Graves are on the hill), May its streams Mingle with thy dreams. Rove with Robin, love: Mumble in thy brain Murmurs of the main.

For the cock Drawleth as a-yawn, Dreaming of the dawn (Hoarily a-dawn), And a-mount Showereth the fount. Almond-drugged the garth, Showery besprayed, Hoarily arrayed.

And of God Worthy is the sight, Worlds are in the night (Walkers of the night), And He calls Westwardly His thralls; Gorgeous large they glide, Wardedly like sheep, Walkers in a sleep.

And a brawl Craveth in this breast, Craving thee and rest (God in thee and rest), And a roar Droneth to the shore. Dashing raves the rill, ‘Lazily they lie, God it is to die.’”

Her rendering of it was berippled all the while by the whispering tongue of the wren, and when she finished I said to her: “you see, the water-lilies have heard at least you once more, Emily, and there is hope, for Mercy is only in Cuckoo-town in so far as Cuckoo-town is in heaven. But we should go back to the cottage now, for the stars are looking out in crowds, and it is beginning to grow cold.”

She came with me, and we paced back by the margin of the pool, through the wood, and up a dell, to the cottage. All laughter had gone now from her lips, her steps were laggard, for she was easily wearied and emptied now; and I held her poor hand all the way.

As we entered upon the bridge, there stood Langler at a door of the cottage, a letter in his hand, which, when we had gone into the dining-room, he handed to me openly before Miss Emily. It was the letter from Upper Styria come at last, signed by a certain Oberpolizeirath Tiarks, whose face I was destined one day to see. I read it with a greed which I could not hide. But it consisted mostly of a gorgeous heading, the writing being in two lines only, and these cold enough but for their salute of “high-born sir!” It merely acknowledged the receipt of our “honoured but somewhat insubstantial [ungegründet!] communication”; and there it ended.

It was for this that we had waited! The paper was actually perfumed.

It had upon me an effect of gloom, and I felt now that our departure was about to be, but nothing was said of the letter at dinner, nor was it till near ten in the night that we three met to talk of it in Langler’s study. Miss Emily closed the shutter, we felt like plotters, and laid our heads together with low voices. Our friend seemed now quite business-like and herself: she proposed that we should leave England in four days’ time, our purpose of going being kept quite secret meantime, and that I should start first, to await Langler in London. All this was arranged; also that Miss Emily should stay mainly with the Misses Chambers during our absence, and it was not till towards one in the morning that, at the third knocking of a nurse, we rose and parted to go to bed.

After all this I was naturally not a little surprised to hear Langler say the next morning to his old butler, Davenport: “Davenport, I am about to take a long voyage from home, as you will soon see for yourself!” It was a propos of nothing! The old fellow had brought in some sour milk, and was retiring, when Langler stretched back his neck and made the remark! No one, indeed, could be safer than old Davenport, but still, the confidence seemed so needless.... “But it is a secret, Davenport,” I said pointedly.

Well, I left Alresford for London that evening, and from the next morning, the 27th — the morning after Dr Burton was enthroned — set to work to gather all the information which would be useful to our undertaking: I engaged an agent, named Barker, to accompany us, I wrote letters, did business, relearned German and the map of Styria, kept clear of friends, and even bought a number of things, including some revolvers. On my second morning in London I got a letter from Langer, and another the next morning, with a note from his sister: he said that he was ready, and would be with me at three p.m. of the 29th.

During the evening of the 28th, I being at home alone, reading, a letter was handed me, consisting only of the three words: "All is known," scribbled across half-a-sheet of note-paper, with a criss-cross for crest. After much reflection I made up my mind not to write of it to the Langers, but it robbed me of sleep that night.

At three p.m. the next day I was at the station to meet Langer, but he did not come, and from then I underwent the keenest anxiety till six, when I got a telegram: "About to start now"; and near nine Langer, thick in furs, stood smiling before me, with the words: "eh bien, me voici."

"The luggage below?" I asked.

"No, I took it direct to Victoria."

"Oh, but I thought, Aubrey, that you were to bring it here, as the safest way?"

"Well, to save a double nuisance...."

"All right: I hope it doesn't matter. And as to Emily?"

"Well, thank God, and strong in heart."

"And you, how do you feel after the voyage?"

He smiled in his wistful way.

"Well, let us dine," I said, pulling the bell. "I mean to have you in bed by eleven, after no more than two pipes, for our train starts as the clock strikes nine in the morning."

I had kept back dinner for him, and we were soon at table. We were eating fish when my man brought me in two telegrams, and the moment I saw them in his hand, before ever I opened or touched them, my heart sank: for I think that only the farther future is quite unknown, but we know a moment hence, as when a heavy weight is to drop we feel it beforehand. Tearing open one of the telegrams, I glanced at the sender's name— "Lizzie Chambers"; she had written: "Emily ill, don't go away"; I tore open the other: it, too, was from Miss Chambers, and she wrote: "Emily's other hand has been nailed."

Into the gloom of my mind grew the understanding that the milder of the telegrams must be for Langler's eyes, the sterner for mine alone: but I showed him neither, I left him there at the table, and in another room called out upon Almighty God for help and strength. When I returned to the outer room I could speak.

But I showed him neither of the telegrams, for I had not the heart, and he slept in peace that night. The next morning I told him when he came to my bedside that I feared I should not be able to go to Styria, since I was ill; and indeed I was very ill.

CHAPTER XVI

“DISEASED PERSONS”

WHAT HAPPENED NOW I do not find it easy to tell, for my next weeks were passed in a state like to De Quincey's "tortures of opium": I cannot clearly remember telling Langer what had happened, or showing him the telegrams, and he had to return to Swandale alone, in what sort of state I do not know, for I was in a bad dream, flushed with fever, nor was I able to go out of doors till the 25th of April. It was a Sunday, towards evening, I was accompanied by a friend, and we happened to go into St Clement Dane's, where the preacher referred to Miss Langer, and expressed the wonder of the world at the outrage; but what makes that service stand out in my memory is a little thing that happened to myself, for I was sitting with my head bowed during the Kyrie when a priest who was pacing about came and pushed me rudely on the back, saying: "kneel, kneel." I never was more astonished.

The next day I stood at last by the bedside of our friend. She knew me, I think, though not very clearly, but I understood that she had received such a shock this time that she would never more be strong, even if she did not die, for she had been still frail from the first woe when again she was torn. Langer stood with me and watched her, for his self-control was at all times fine, though I don't think born with him, but won by strict schooling of himself; but after a time when we saw her tossing her head from side to side, so acquainted with misfortune, we had to turn from her. She had been especially unlucky, since she had meant to be on her guard, never to be out of doors alone, during her brother's absence; but in passing from her carriage at the park wall of Dale Manor to the house, it had come upon her. I remember spending that evening of my arrival on my back at a window, staring up at a poplar which looked like a fountain of leafage shot up to a point on high out of the ground; sometimes its top seemed to be sailing against the sky, as toppling to fall; and the breaths of the wind rocked its branches, roughing up the under-white of its foliage with a chaunting like the psalm of Time; and a starling flew up to her charming home on high in it: and this somehow calmed and consoled me.

I could stay only three days then, and for the next six weeks was to and fro between Swandale and London on dates of which I have no record, spending most of my time in a sort of political pool and uproar of things, which perhaps did me good. Those were Diseased Persons days, and well I recollect the thrill that ran through England on the night of its virtual throwing out by the Lords in Committee. Burton and Edwards were now at their death-grips, on the side of the archbishop being all the awe of the nation, on that of the minister all its reason, its secret sympathy, for it seemed that even God, howling from heaven, could not quite bring it about to clericalise the modern world. I had just telegraphed the throwing out to Langler, and was gossiping about it with some men in one of my clubs — it was late, after the theatres — when I was aware of Baron Kolár's presence: he had come in with three men, and his eyes, swimming round, found me out. He walked straight to me. "Miss Langler," were his first low words—"how is she?"

The cheek, and also the hearty concern, of the question confounded me. "Miss Langler is, of course, gravely ill," I answered.

He groaned, with a look of ruth, of care, on his face: nor did it occur to me to suppose it feigned, since I very well knew that the man was no hypocrite; yet I was sure too, in my heart, that here was the man who was the undoer of Miss Langler.

“But surely she will recover?” said he: “let me hear now that she will.”

“Well, no doubt she will recover,” I said.

He pipped a nothing with relief, his lips unwreathed, his teeth shone out happily, and he said: “Oh, well, everything works out nicely in the end, if only things be premeditated by men of grasp and vigour. I assure you, the longer I live the more I see it — the supremacy of mind in the world. When I was a wild chap of seventeen I said to myself one night: ‘go to, now, I will be a man: I will be grand, I will govern my passions, and have a hand in history.’ And so said, so done. I did it! here you see me now, I did it very well, very well, oh yes, here I am. Mind is everything. Look at Mr Edwards, now — nice fellow, powerful fellow, sharp as a falchion! You know, of course, that the Lords have just virtually thrown out Diseased Persons? Tell me now which of the two you think will come off the victor in this duel between Edwards and the archbishop.”

“Who can win against the grain of an archbishop under a régime of miracles, Baron Kolár?” I asked.

“What!” said he, eyeing me sternly from top to toe, “but is there to be no term to the insolence of the Church? Remember that this plan of sterilising diseased persons is no new thing: during twenty years it has been under discussion; in Austria, I assure you, if it had not been for the miracles, diseased persons would at present be consigned to the lethal chamber; but this most moderate bill only ensures their sterilisation. Everywhere such a measure is called for; it is in the very gist of our age; and now when Mr Edwards, by a travail of Hercules, has driven it through his House with a grim majority of twelve — earnest fellow, grand fellow — are we to see his pearl trampled under foot by a herd of bishops? But you shall not see that. I forecast that the bill will be sent back to the Lords a second and a third time, and in the end Edwards will win — oh yes, he will win.”

“He may,” said I.

“He will,” said he: “England will rise to his support; wait, you will see.”

He turned off from me, but turned again to ask after the Misses Chambers, then left me to rejoin his friends.

When I mentioned his words the next day at Swandale, Langer said to me: “but since this man is so very sure beforehand of the Prime Minister’s victory, may we not at once look for some stroke of policy against the Church on his part — perhaps the showing of the miracles to be none?”

“In that case, Aubrey,” said I, for I was excited, “let us be beforehand with him! let both of us now write plainly to our friends that the miracles are probably none, but still are no contrivance of priests — —”

But Langer interrupted me, saying: “you would hardly have us, Arthur, appear to our friends in the light of crusaders and quixotes.”

“Why quixotes?” said I.

“Wouldn’t it be terribly like springing upon them the statement, ‘the sky is brown’? The miracles are now among established things, nor are our suspicions anything but suspicions. Certainly, we should seem pert, if not irrelevant. Letters are perused over the breakfast-cup, and are not expected to be epic.”

“However,” said I, “this is the one plan which you can carry out without fear of being interfered with and hindered, and by it you wash your hands at once of the whole business and burden.”

“Perhaps; but still, frankly, it would not be quite to my taste: I’d rather die than seem outré, or strutting, or oracular — —”

“But since so much is at stake — —”

“Sooner any other plan, Arthur.”

“But what other plan — except going to Styria?”

“Hardly again,” said he, with closed eyes, “hardly again,” and we were silent.

After a while he asked: “does the agent, Barker, still decline to go to Styria alone?”

“Yes,” said I; “he and others naturally scent danger in the adventure after what has twice befallen us. If anyone goes, it must be ourselves; so what shall be done?”

“But do you ask me that, Arthur?” cried he, much moved: “how shall I answer you? I have already paid a great price; my heart has wept. The men who are against us are of withering mood, though I do not say wicked men; in fact, they are not, since the mere success of their exploits implies, I think, an erectness of meaning which commands our esteem — —”

“Esteem, Aubrey,” I murmured: but such was the finesse of Langler’s criticism, whose scales no zephyr of passion could ever shake, and he derided as crass and green whoever did not give to the devil his dainty due.

“Yes, I say esteem,” said he, “for the misdoer is, and must be, a bungler, so where you have a series of lawlessnesses finely achieved you may look to find behind them a mood of moral erectness. But little the morality of these men concerns me — I was speaking of their power.”

“Now, however,” said I, “whatever their power, is the hour for us to strike in, if ever: Diseased Persons will soon be back in the Lords; Burton, of course, will not yield—”

“Talking of Burton,” said he, “I have two letters of his which I will show you now” — and he rose and got them: one was a letter of sympathy, very feelingly worded, written to Langler on the second wounding of our friend;

the other, written only five days before to Percival of Keble, was as follows: — “The Palace, Lambeth. P. + T. My dear Percival, — Forgive my silence, since you are continually in my heart. It is now confirmed that Diseased Persons will be thrown out; and as Israel prevailed over Amalek in Rephidim, so we shall ride over them that rise up against us. Hertford, Jersey, and Ellenborough have declared on our side, and the zeal of young Denman, who now has rooms in the Palace, is profitable to me: the Lord reward them according to their works.... There can be no looking back now, even if we would, being more strongly impelled against the Bill from the side of St Peter than many divine; and, in addition, there are forces, in their nature subterranean, which prompt and urge us, and make retreat impossible — even if we would! Bellini of the Maddallena writes that he does not consider the Bill contrary to Holy Writ! And is it? What say you? Give me of your wisdom. But however that be, on we must, the force behind is grim and deaf. I say that the whole truth is known to none: you will remember at some future day, if need be, that I have said it to you and to others; nor is what I now give you any whisper between ourselves. But is not the whole truth still good to speak? not the truth only, but the whole? We have Clement of Alexandria on ‘uttering a lie, as the Sophists say’; but to utter a lie is it not to tell one? and to tell one is it not to lie? and to lie is it not to be a rotting liar? And to trim, and economise, and keep dark, and be shifty, is it not to utter many lies? To all which I say: ‘Get thee behind me, Satan! I will wash my hands in innocency.’ Forgive me if I am curious and obscure to-night, good friend, since I write in some gloom of mind. One short year ago I was a village-priest, and had songs in the night; at present I am full of tossings to and fro till the morning. But my every loss, were it of life and soul, I will count as gain, if only Zion prosper, though I warn you, Percival, of rocks ahead, and fears and doubts not to be formulated; at some hours I see the future dark as crape — I could not tell you. Our victory in Gloucester was ominously close, and here and there in the country one hears Old Adam growling. They must obey! they must submit themselves! stantes sunt pedes nostri in atriis tuis, Jerusalem: over all uprising we shall ride gloriously, God help us. Alas! sometimes when I am mightiest, then am I weakest: the solid Pisgah gives way under my feet, the wings of Icarus stream with melting; oh, for faith, and more faith, and still more: pray for me. Still, we shall ride, we shall triumph. As to the Lambeth degrees in medicine, and our right to grant them, this you shall see carried against all the rage of the heathen in the near future, so also as to the proposed new powers of Consistory Courts and of my Court of Audience, so also as to the restoring to Canterbury of her jurisdiction over wills and intestacies, so also as to the condign punishment of Ambrose Rivers: all these. Only, still the sleeplessness, no rest, no shutting of the eyelid, but tossings till the morning, and not poppy nor mandragoras shall medicine me now, I think. Oh, Percival, how happy is the obscure good man, the upright heart and pure, kept unspotted from the world! Down yonder in Ritching parish my garden grew wild, the vicarage was holey and ruined, but very pretty, very homely, and ever for me there was one sweetest, secret cruse of water from Siloa's brook, and my morsel of dry bread was like coriander seed, man, I tell you, and the taste of it like wafers made with honey. Percival, I warn you, fly from preferment: there is one sweeter sluice than all. Pray write as to the scripturalness of Diseased Persons. Farewell, dear friend. — In haste, yours faithfully in N.D.J.C., John Cantuar.”

“Here, I think,” said Langer when I had got through the two letters, “you have a soul in the toils,” and we went on talking about Burton and other things, without coming to the point as to what we personally were now to do; moreover, I had promised to be back in London at once, and left Swandale that night, our friend being then definitely on the road to recovery.

I did not, I think, return to Swandale during some two weeks, and meanwhile twice saw Archbishop Burton, once in the Lords on the night when Diseased Persons was being debated for the second time; all the world was there: I saw Mr Edwards peeping behind the throne; I saw Baron Kolár ironing his thigh, while his eyes dwelt upon the primate, who, somehow, denounced the bill less loudly than I had expected to hear. I thought that Dr Burton's girth was less outgrown, his visage less brown than usual; indeed, I have grounds to know that about that time the archbishop was putting himself to cruel tortures with regimen, the thongs of discipline, and other articles of piety. Twice to my knowledge, while speaking, he glanced up at Baron Kolár in the gallery, and I witnessed the meeting of their eyes. Well, the bill, which had been sent up this second time with an ominous drop in Edwards' majority from twelve to nine, was anew mutilated; and at this thing the sort of ecstasy which marked the mood of the country can only be recalled, not described, for Diseased Persons and the Education Bill (setting up lycees on the French model) were the two main items in the King's Speech, the Church withstood both, and the deadlock was complete. Edwards would not yield, for if ever man knew England and Englishmen it was he, and a sort of world-wide mutter against churchmen, which did not dare express itself, yet could be felt, was abroad. It was at this juncture that I again saw the archbishop one night at a political crush at the Duchess of St Albans'. I was making my way through a throng when I caught a view of Baron Kolár's head above a press of men, and, the hall being full of a noise of tongues, I won near to the group around him to hear, for he was talking; in doing which I caught sight of the robed figure of the archbishop sitting on an ottoman, silent, solitary, but within earshot of the baron's talk; indeed,

I fancied that the baron's voice was purposely pitched so that Dr Burton might overhear. As I won near the first words of the baron which reached my ears were: "but Jesus did not believe in the immortality of the soul: no, he didn't believe in it; he never heard of such a thing: not in our sense of the term — —"

I stood astonished at this drowsy outrage upon the ears of a devout crowd, though a year previously his words would have been ordinary enough, and I saw Dr Burton's eyes fixed sideward upon the baron with I know not what musketry of meanings in them.

"Oh no," the baron went on, "he had no notion of our 'immortality.' Our notion of a ghost distinct from the body, of 'spirit' distinct from matter, is, of course, an Aryan-Greek one, quite foreign to the Hebrew mind: the very angels of the Hebrews ate mutton like Charles II., their very God was material, with hind parts and front parts; and you will burrow through the Old Testament in vain for a valid hint that men may live after their body is livid."

No one answered anything; only Dr Burton's eyes aimed a ray of keener and keener meaning at the speaker.

"However," the baron went on, "there arose at a late date a crowd among the Hebrews called Pharisees, who said: 'no, all is not over at death, for some day there will be a resurrection, and we shall then live again'; opposed to whom were the Conservatives — the Sadducees — who denied that there would be a resurrection: and Jesus was a Pharisee in this belief in a resurrection of the body. But as to our fantastic Greek ghost and its immortality, it was quite outlandish to all Hebrews, to Pharisee, Essene, and Sadducee alike: Jesus hardly heard of it."

I glanced toward Dr Burton's face: it had in it reproach, shame, and anger together: and still the baron droned on: "hence the frequency of this word ‘resurrection’ in the Gospels, in spite of the fact that their writers were tinged with Greek ideas: for Jesus believed that we ceased to live at death, but afterwards should have a ‘resurrection’: he was a good Hebrew. On the other hand, in the writings of St Paul, who was both a Hebrew and a man learned in Greek ideas, we have a perfect confusion of the two ideas, Greek ‘immortality’ and Pharisee ‘resurrection.’ Sometimes Paul believes in one, sometimes in the other, sometimes somehow in both together. Where he says, ‘to be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord,’ he is a Greek; where he says, ‘I have fought a good fight ... henceforth there is laid up for me a crown which the Lord will give me in the day of his appearing,’ he is a Hebrew: for he won’t get the crown at once, oh no, it is laid up for him till resurrection-day, when he will wake up out of the dust. And so all through that epistle — —”

But at that point the baron stopped, looking with a delicious fat chuckle after the flight of Dr Burton, who was off through the throng. Nobody made any reply to the baron’s words. I wish that one could describe the man’s tones, his eyes! — wandering, fishy, light grey, the whites fouled yellowish; but so strong somehow! They would light upon one a moment in a preoccupied way, and wander off again, as if one was not of worth enough to engage their attention. But I’m afraid that my pen was not made to paint. At any rate, his words were always most weighty, living, memorable, and overbearingly authoritative — not in themselves perhaps, but in some way because they came from him.

I happened to overhear a few private words between him and Dr Burton that same night which I should recount, but before then I was in a crowd with Mr Edwards, who was looking rather harassed, though quick-eyed as ever, and appeared from his talk to be less bitter against Dr Burton’s big attacks than against the “pin-pricks “; “the face of Europe was turned towards the future,” one heard him say, “and now come the parsons twisting it about, and saying, ‘look back to the past.’ It can’t be done, you know: neck’ll break. And such pettifogging, penny-ha’penny, antediluvian antics! How is an archbishop to grant degrees in medicine at this time of day? As for Ambrose Rivers, all I can say is, if the church-party should succeed in laying a finger upon that harmless lunatic, then the Government will begin to ask itself whether the time is not come to throw up the cards. May the dickens fly away —— !” he stopped, but I understood him to mean “with the church-party, and all things, save the multiplication-table and the present Prime Minister of England.” He was a man of many sterling qualities of mind, and exercised a true influence over his countrymen, perhaps through his very actuality and directness; and though he ever refused to embellish himself with one touch of personal stateliness, he was listened to with attention.

Half-an-hour afterwards I was talking with a man over a balcony rail, where it was dark, when I heard behind me the words: “you should not slacken in your opposition to the bill: the Church must be pushed on and made quite triumphant”; they were spoken by Baron Kolár, and from Dr Burton I heard a murmured reply, but not the words; then I am almost certain that I heard the baron say: “there will be some more miracles”; and I distinctly heard the doctor’s reply, halting, wifely: “how do you — know?” and the answer too to this I heard: “I know by faith, doctor,” whereupon they turned in their pacing, and their voices were lost. I allowed myself to whisper to the man with me: “Mephisto and Faust!”

Well, what happened next with respect to Diseased Persons happened in a kind of whirlwind, and before I knew where I was I was off to Styria. Once more the bill was sent up, this time by Lower House majorities of in general seventeen. What Mr Edwards’ hope was, whether he was pushed from behind by secret forces, one does not know; certainly by this time the grumble in his favour — on the platform, in the press, in the country — had grown; but still, no one much expected the Church to give way. However, at about two in the afternoon of the very night on which the bill was brought for the third time before the Lords, an old woman, one Madame Ronfaut, who housed close to the Cathedral of Bayeux, found in her cellar a grave, not a new grave, but one newly reopened, and in the grave a cross, and nailed to the cross the remains of a man's body that had been dead at least some months. The news of this thing flew that afternoon like loosened effluvia. What was the precise significance of the find I suppose that nobody gave himself the breathing-space to think; it was felt to be significant: and never was news more dynamic. That night Diseased Persons had a victory in spite of all the bishops. I, for my part, flew to Swandale, understanding that the finding of the body and cross was no chance thing, but purposely managed to give a first shock to the faith of men. "Have you heard all?" said I to Langer as I hurried into the cottage. He gazed at me strangely, without answer; I saw his cheek shake; and I cried out: "Aubrey, how is Emily?"

"She is gone, she is gone," said he, with as woeful a smile as ever I beheld.

"Gone, Aubrey," said I, "what do you mean?"

He handed me a note which she had written to him, and I saw that, on hearing of the finding of the body and cross, she had fled from Swandale, alone, weak, hardly yet able to walk. "Dearest Aubrey," she had written, "you will go now to Styria, because you should; and partly to make the leaving of me possible to you, and partly to save you from being stopped this time by any hurt done to me, I am running away to hide myself well somewhere. Have no fear for me, I undertake that no one shall track me, I shall be safely hidden, and get quite well, and be back in Swandale to welcome you when you return. Go at once, will you, for me? with Arthur. ‘Quit you like men, be strong’; you are in for it now, poor dear: it has happened so. I take £40 from the casket. But, beloved, if it be only possible, come back to me; and bring him who goes with you. Your Emily.”

I found Langer in such a state of powerful, though governed, emotion, that I was unwilling to have him start that night, for his heart was not strong. But he would come, and we reached London at two a.m., went to bed for a time, and started in the morning by private car, so as to catch the first passage.

We were safe aboard at Dover, and the boat about to cast her moorings, when a car was seen making down the pier, and an outcry arose for the boat to wait awhile, the men in the car being Baron Kolár and two others. They were barely in time, and soon after the baron had manœuvred himself aboard I saw his earnest looks clear into a smile.

During the trip across he took not the least notice of our presence, nor we of his.

CHAPTER XVII

THE MOUNTAINS

LANGLER WAS A great preacher of France and French lucidity — when he was in England, but in France itself he changed his tune, for nothing now quite pleased him as we raced through the land — not the food, the people, the language, the country — but all came under his criticism, which, indeed, was mostly unuttered, but one felt when he was criticising by a certain fastidiousness and thickening at the cheek-bones, as if he tasted acid. At Charleville, where we found a streaming town, one of the pilgrimages having just got there, the tone of the dévotés was specially distasteful to him; we saw a throng kneeling in the twilight on some church-steps, everyone with a certain beggar-like languishing of the eye-whites — a very Latin thing — which Langer called “sick-saintly.” But he was ever out of joint with the age, had flinched from its paganism before the miracles, as now he flinched from its piety. “We are such hapless Midases,” he said: “whatever we happen to touch turns to iron.” Swandale itself he found wanting; he sighed for a rounder world. Now, piety was “the rage” in France, and one day in France was quite long enough to turn Langer qualmish against the words “male and female Christian,” ever chattered everywhere. At Charleville, when we returned to our hotel from our stroll, a lively little maid with flaxen curls would have us look at her first-communion veil, her paroissien, and suchlike pious gems, remarking meanwhile: “is it not soft and nice, sir, to be a female Christian — n’est-ce pas, monsieur, que c'est doux et bon d'être crétienne?" To which Langler replied: "I only hope so: moi je suis crétien."

Being very weary that first night we slept till two a.m., when we set out afresh on the car road over the suspension-bridge through Mézières, under a dark sky most bright with stars. Our trim little chauffeur, whose name was Hanska, was a "rager,"; but this mode of flight was never to Langler's taste, and we had meant to travel on rails, till the sight of Baron Kolár on the Channel-boat had caused me to know that the rail-train would be much too slow. We had lost sight of the baron at Calais, but near noon of the second day, when we were shooting some miles well on past Sedan, a trumpet hooted behind, and there churned upon us a large chariot travelling urgently. It must have been very swift, for we were swift, but it rolled pressingly past us, showed its hind wheels, and travelled on out of our sight. Through the dust I saw in it Baron Kolár and his two friends.

"Baron Kolár means to be in Styria before us, Aubrey," I said.

"In which case, what is the good of our going on?" asked Langler.

"We are going to investigate some facts," said I: "no one can stop us in that, unless they kill us; in any case, we have it to do to the end: your sister's eyes are upon us."

"God's," said he. "On we must, I know; I only question whether we are on the road to accomplish any real good: I hope so, God grant it; but it is a world like those jointed marionettes which, however you tug them straight, stick out crudely somewhere; its piety and its impiety both curve the lips of the gods. But let us hope that we shall accomplish something, if only for our poor prisoner."

Well, on we went, hardly knowing toward what: but our object after much talk had turned out to be threefold — (1) to find out whether there was really a prisoner Father Max Dees in Baron Kolár's castle of Schweinstein; (2) to present ourselves with this fact to the authorities, and so force the release of Dees; (3) to interview the released Dees, and then give to the world whatever he might have to divulge of a design against churchmen. And chance favoured us to a wonderful extent that day between Sedan and Metz, for not fifteen minutes after Baron Kolár's chariot had vanished ahead we came anew upon it standing still by the roadside, its occupants standing and prying round it. As we flew past them I cried to Langler: "they can't repair, and are miles from anywhere: are bound to lose a day!" nor from that moment, I think, did we waste ten minutes bootlessly, till we were climbing the country at the mountain-foot. One morning early I woke in a village-room, and peeping out from my window saw the village-street bounded by a wall and some trees; beyond the trees the froths and freshes of a shallow river lacerated with rocks; beyond the river a mountain-side with a crucifix on it, a world of mountains; and grouped about the crucifix the kind of grey goats whose wool had been used by Dees to tie his tidings round the wren's leg; and I said to myself: "we have arrived." What a charm was in that place that morning surpasses expression; it appeared to me the haven of the world; the morning-star was awane in the heavens; and I had the thought: "how well to have been born in here, and to have housed here always in peace!" It was a breathing-space to me, till the burden that was ours darkened down anew upon my mind with its weight of care and doubt. As to where Baron Kolár might be we had no idea, having seen nothing of him since his breakdown near Metz.

My own hostess — Langler had slept in another cottage — had a son named Piast whom she offered to me as guide, upon which this conversation took place between us: "does Piast know the alp well?" "Kiss the hand, sir, he is a Slovene." "But is he to be depended upon as a guide?" "He is a Slovene, sir." "Yes, but does he know the best way to Schweinstein?” “Sir, he is a Slovene.” She herself was a heavy Slav woman, but as our Piast looked a brave wight we took him, and began to climb through higher valleys now and a wilder world. I knew Switzerland very well, but this was different somehow — a heavier eventide of wood and wonderland of solitude, for I think that Upper Styria must be about the loneliest of lands. We travelled up beside one river (with banks of slime, and forested cliff on either hand) which had a mood of millions of years gone, before man or brute was; yet the wild goat bounded on the crag, the boar slouched in the black of the bush. At noon we stopped at a sennhaus (cow-farm) on the banks of a mountain-tarn, and here, to my surprise, it got into Langler’s head to bathe. “But can we spare the time?” I asked him. “Too cold, too cold,” said our host the cow-keeper, with a shake of the head, for though the day was warm, we were now at an elevation where oak and ash were giving place to black fir and yew. But Langler would bathe, the water looked so nice, and as I knew that he could not swim, and was afraid that the bottom might be deceptive, I made up my mind to go in first, to try it. Our cow-keeper lent us two old knee-breeches, for the wagon with our luggage was down behind, and there we cowered by the shore, Langler with knives in the flesh because of the sennerin’s eyes on his back, for she and three children stood in a crowd up at the sennhaus door to watch us. Well, I chose a spot, and plunged in: and the instant I was under, as it were a thousand whispers were about me urging me to be out. It was too cold for man, with a certain great gloom of cold, and I was no sooner in than I was out again. Understanding now that it would hardly do for Langler with his panting heart, I prayed him not to try it; but his honour, I suppose, was now at stake — he had ever a large share of what one may call physical courage — and in he stepped. However, he did not plunge, but almost at once came out gasping, and seeing his left foot dyed with blood, I knew that something had gashed it.

On the whole, we had no sort of right in that water, since time might be so dear to us: but so it happened; Langler's gash proved grave, for he could not put on his boot, so after our good sennnerin had bandaged it up there we sat for hours before the longish shed which was the sennhaus, drinking goat's milk, smoking porcelain pipes, and looking toward the summer snow on the top of high Hochgolling.

"Pity we ever went into the water," said Langler as we sat there disabled and the afternoon sun sank low: "we have lost a day, and through me, I'm afraid."

"Bad luck," said I, "not your fault."

"We are such tools of Nature!" said he. "Men rage of their 'power' over Her, but what of Her unperturbed reign over and in them? We should now be at Schweinstein, yet here we are, the truth being that new lands induce a vagueness and vagabondage in the mind, so hypnotising it that one's own concerns seem paltry in comparison with the mass and pageant of Nature, and irrelevant to her mood; whereupon 'I am here' grows so uppermost in the mind as to strangle 'why am I here?' However, I think that the foot is now fast healing."

"Then we may be able to get on to-night," said I. "But who is that man talking so earnestly to our Piast? He was here an hour ago, went away, and now is back again."

"I have observed it," said he; "they are at this moment discussing us."

"Are they?"

"Yes, they are talking near the cascade, and louder than they think, for I have twice heard 'die Herren,' and presently you will see them glance this way."

“But do you suspect Piast at all?”

“I doubt if he is quite trusty and good.”

“Then let us not go one step farther with him.”

“But we have the charts, he can’t lead us far astray; nor can we allow ourselves to judge him on a mere suspicion.”

I said no more, but felt uneasy. Soon afterwards I left Langler outside, went up the (external) steps into the middle room of the sennhaus, and sat by the wheel where the sennerin was spinning flax; she looked homely and good with her thick waist and calves and dress of opera-bouffe, so I entered into talk with her, asking her first what had been the effect of the miracles in the alp. “Kiss the hand, sir!” she said, and she smiled as she told me that “the good people of the alp must work hard to keep body and soul together, without troubling the head about such matters. That is not all gold what glances.”

I was astonished! The thought came into my mind, “here is Ambrose Rivers in the Noric Alps,” for, except Rivers and this woman, I had heard of no one who thus lightly threw off the miracles. “But surely,” said I, “such high events!” She sighed, saying: “ah, dear Heaven, those on the alp had their miracle six long years ago, and that was enough of miracles, it seems to me, with great cry and little wool.” “Six years ago? a miracle?” said I. “Yes, sir; but let each sweep before her own door” — another proverb, and a strong one apparently, for nothing further could I get from her as to this miracle of six years before.

I then, for the first time in Styria, spoke of Max Dees. “My friend and I,” I said, “are here to visit the Pater Max Dees: do you — know him?” Again she smiled, saying: “my man did frohn-arbeit on his buckwheat-field for three years” — (this “frohn-arbeit” being, as she explained it, a kind of church-due paid in day-labour). “So you know the Pater well?” I asked.

With the same half-a-smile, she answered: “I knew him.” “But isn’t he still in the alp, then?” “Not at the church, sir.” “Which church?” “St Photini’s in the castle-court.” “Oh, he is not still the priest at St Photini’s, so perhaps my friend and I have taken a voyage in vain. Who, then, is now the priest there?” “There is no priest,” said she; “even if there were, we of this church-parish should no longer plod to his church, since it is work enough to keep body and soul together; for burials a priest rides up from Badsögl; but St Photini’s has been shut up near five years — before the birth of the little sugar-corn Kätchen, in fact.”

“But that is strange!” said I. “To whom does St Photini’s belong?”

“All this alp, one might say, belongs to the baron, sir.”

“All? He must be enormously rich and powerful!”

“Gold makes old, sir; but the baron is not believed to be rich, not as some of the great landowners are, for glaciers and precipices make no man rich, and the most of his land is forest, with some flax, beet, and then the pastures; his lordship has also a share in the glass factory a mile up.”

“So he is not very rich, the baron? But is he powerful? much feared in the alp?”

“Ah, dear Heaven, he is very much feared, and very much loved, and very much pitied, by all.”

“Pitied? Baron Kolár?”

“Ah, dear Heaven, yes: for nothing less than a very great wrong was done to his lordship by one in whom he had trust. They say ‘one love is worth the other’; but unthankfulness is ever the world’s repayment.”

“But what was this great wrong done to his lordship?”

She sighed, and answered: “end good, all good; it is a long story, sir”; nor was there any overcoming her reserves when she chose to be silent.

“But that is strange,” said I, “that St Photini’s should be shut up — five years! To what church, then, do you — go?”

“We go to none, since the body is more real than the soul. There is a little Roman church down there in Speisendorf, but no one goes to it since the miracle of six years ago; those of the alp once went to St Photini’s, but St Photini’s is of the Oriental Greek Church, and the Pater Max Dees was an Oriental Greek priest.” “Was?” said I, “but is the good Pater no longer alive?” “Who knows?” said she. “You do; tell me,” said I. “But I do not know, sir, truly! perhaps the baron himself could impart to you that information.” “But where is the baron?” I asked, “in the duchy, do you know?” “The baron is at the burg, sir.” “Baron Kolár at Schweinstein! When did he arrive?” “Late last night, I believe,” she answered.

“Strange,” I thought, “that we have heard nothing of it, though we have questioned so many people”; and wondering if he had come in a clandestine manner, or by another route than ours, I hurried out to give Langler the news. In telling him, I saw the cow-man trotting toward the tarn under a load of wurzels, so I called him to us, and asked why he had told us that the baron was not at the castle. “Kiss the hand, sirs!” he said, and answered with a blank air, “but this is strange! is the baron at the castle? and is it the little woman who has told you this? she must have seen it in a dream” — and he peered sourly up into the room where the spinning-wheel sounded. Turning to Langler, I asked him how the foot was going, for I felt that it would be well to make a move; “you see I have on the boot,” was his reply, “I can walk quite well”; and within some minutes we had started, for eventide was falling, and we had to get to a sort of guest-court three miles higher. We had sent the horses back down to Speisendorf, our farther route being rough for night-travelling; and with our Piast stepping out ahead in his coloured home-spuns, we tramped toward the bourn where beds and the trunks awaited us. It had turned bleak now, the fuffs of the mountain-winds began to tune-up and fife, the gloom deepened toward night. I confess that I felt afraid, I hardly knew of what, but the mood of the mountains was undoubtedly morose and dark. When I asked the lad if he had heard the news that his lordship had arrived he looked foolish, and said no, he had not heard. We passed by rude altars decked with gauds, by crucifixes on the crags, and a mile from the sennhaus reached a river all shut in by ravines, up the banks of which we wound, till, after about an hour and a half of continuous walking, we came to some lock-gates, and then, in an opening in the cliff-wall, to a factory, which Piast said was a glass-factory, and I remember wondering where the hands could come from to work it; a little higher was a mill-wheel and other lock-gates, and thenceforward unbroken lines of cliff, walling-in the river. I had known that we should have to journey up this or some such river, so had no fear that we were being jockeyed; yet I felt like one lost, for by this time we could hardly see our hand before our eyes, the winds waged their business in many a strange tongue, and my knowledge that Langler was limping made me the more anxious to come at shelter. As usual in such a case, we were stricken rather silent, plodding on in patience for the journey to be over and for a light to arise before us. And in front of us stepped our Piast.

But at one place when I called out “Piast!” to ask him something, I got no answer; whereupon we both stopped, we called and called, but Piast was gone.

“Well, we seem to be abandoned,” Langler said.

At the same moment I called out sharply: “but do you feel your feet wet?”

“Yes,” said he, “I do. The river seems to be rising.”

As he spoke I was already wet above the ankles, for not only was the river rising, but so very fast, that I understood that this was no tidal rising, but must be due to some other cause. Langler too understood, for he now said: "the lock-gates have apparently been closed."

"Purposely to drown us, Aubrey?" I cried.

"Well, the timely flight of Piast seems to indicate as much," he answered with astonishing composure, to judge from his voice, for he was merely a voice, since I could only just divine his presence with my eyes, and I heard the water welter directly upon the cliff-wall, and felt it at my knees.

"But what are we to do?" I cried.

"What can we do?" said he, "except bear our lot with fortitude."

"But we shall be drowned!"

"Well, so it seems," said he. "I personally never hoped to get through this adventure."

The water, working actively up, had won to my middle, striking very cold; and that cold, together with my forlornness in that wild, made my death the more awful to me. I tried once, and only once, to climb the cliff-wall; but I could not lift myself a foot, and thenceforth, as in a glass, I saw that there was no escape. A mile or so lower down was a water-mill, where the gorge opened somewhat, and thereabouts we might have got out of the trap (provided that we could climb the lock-gates); but, as Langler said, long before we could get to the gates the water would be over our heads; he could not swim; nor did I mean to leave him before he drowned in any hope of saving myself by swimming, since I knew that I should very soon perish of cold.

Only one thought, and with it a hope, if it can be called a hope, occurred within me, and I said to Langler: "but which way did Piast escape? it must have been forward: let us move forward...." and we did so, walking on a bottom of grass and slime, I in front with a grip on Langler's sleeve, and the water at our breasts. But it was slow going, and still the wall of rock was with us, so we did not go far, but stood still again near together, and I heard Langler's breaths looser than the puffs of the wind, and more burdened: a rather horrid sound in my memory.

"Well, Aubrey," I panted, with my hand on his shoulder.

His jaws chattered: he could make no answer.

It was about then that a light from, say, forty feet above streamed down comet-wise upon us that must have come from an electric dark-lantern, for, on looking up, I could see nothing save the dazzlement, though I have now an impression, too, of the hoofs of a horse on the cliff-edge: and a voice was shouting to us.

"There is," it cried — in English — and stopped; or I may be mistaken, but I am privately convinced that I did hear those two English words, though Langler did not.

"There is," it cried in German, "a stair in the rock twenty metres below" — and at once the light vanished.

We had walked past "the stair"! nor was there any chance that we should ever have found it, though so near; a stair it was not, but a few jags notched out of a slanting slip of the cliff. However, we found them, we contrived to climb to the top: but no one was any longer there when we got to it.

What followed for us that night was almost as baleful as what we had evaded: we were abroad hour after hour in an alpine storm, miners in the colliery of the night, sometimes standing still, dreading to take a step; indeed, it is strange that we were not many times dashed to death, for one could not see the mountains, nor the ground, nor the sky on high, all on all hands was swallowed up in awe, the heart failed at the great rivers of grief which the deluges of wind poured through the forests. It must have been long past midnight when, by a feat of luck, we hit upon a hut in which was one poor woman, living that hermit-life which they call almen-leben, with a few kine only for companions; she took us in, and succoured us; and with such greed did we eat out and still eat out this good Gretel's larder that our griefs ended in laughter.

When at last we were lying wrapped in blankets in a gloom beshone by a blush from the stove, I whispered to Langler: "did you hear the 'there is' in English from the cliff?" "No," said he, "I think not." "But was not the voice at all familiar?" "I thought, Arthur, that it resembled Baron Kolár's." "So did I," I said.

Outside the winds worked, venting brokenly and gruff like breakers of oceans thundering on unearthly shores, while for some time I lay too fore-done to sleep, pondering the wonder of that voice in the night. If it was truly Baron Kolár's — I am still not sure of it! — what, I asked myself, could be his motive? Had he merely wished to prove to us his absolute power over our lives? Or had this terrible man meant to destroy us, but relented in the midst? I oftentimes think that he had a liking for Langler.... But I could not solve the riddle, and before long was asleep.

CHAPTER XVIII

AT THE SCHLOSS

THE NEXT AFTERNOON we got down at last to the little guest-court where our luggage was, and now could see a tower of Schweinstein half-a-league away. Langer, however, had to take to his bed, and thus lost three days more.

I, for my part, more easily overcame the effects of my night on the alp, and during those days set myself to come at the truth as to whether or no Baron Kolár was really at home; I must have questioned twenty people; but the answer was always the same: his lordship was not in residence.

On our third morning (a Saturday) at the guest-court we received, to our joy, a long letter from our wounded friend. I had thought it likely that she would write us at the P.O. at Gratz, so I had written to the P.O., and they had now sent on this letter to us in the mountains. Langer's hand trembled, and he had such a ravished smile as touched one to the heart. She had fled to a village in Gloucestershire named Alvington, and was still safely buried there, but meant, she said, to go back to Swandale as soon as she should opine that we in Styria had had time to work out our purpose. The letter for the most part was in a tone of affected lightness; she described the inn where she lodged, its flower-beds, its cat, the landlady's mows, the gambols of the wren; she even gave the political news! Diseased Persons had become law, and now it was the Education Bill that was the row: "as Satan and Michael contended for the body of Moses," she wrote, "so Mr Edwards and Dr Burton are striving for Ambrose Rivers” — Burton struggling to bring Rivers and his “New Church” under the power of the ecclesiastical courts, Edwards struggling tooth and nail against it; Dr Burton, however, she said, had had an apoplectic fit, and was laid aside for the time being. She begged to be remembered to “the good frock-coat” (i.e. to me), but, giving way in the end to her grief, cried out upon our pity to return to her. For us it was a heart-rending letter. I, at any rate, felt that if any mishap should befall her brother in this adventure, then dangers too sinister to be breathed to one’s own heart might overhang her spirit. We had meant to present ourselves that day at the castle, but Langler was too deeply moved by the letter, so we put it off till the next day.

All those days I had not been idle, but had roved a good deal, trying to get friends, and had explored, too, round about the castle by land and river. There were quite thirty to fifty dwellings within two miles, but I found all these people very reserved, given up to their swine and agrarian cares, and looking upon me as a needless phenomenon. Swine abounded! a pig was in every life. However, I won some of them into saying something, and gathered, on the whole, that probably no one knew what had become of Dees, but that all probably had a guess that he was, or had been, a prisoner in the castle, in which case they were pleased, with a feeling of “serve him right”; also that no one had, or wished to say that he had, any intuition whereabouts in the world his lordship then was. This, too, was strange, that on that Sunday when Langler and I at last walked down through the forest towards the river and burg no sound of bell called the people to worship; Europe was on its knees, but this one valley of Europe had washed its hands of the Christian Church.

And everyone had only one excuse to offer for this — namely, that “it was enough to do to keep body and soul together.”

How clear and new-made was the air in there that Sunday afternoon! “Up here,” wrote Langler to his sister, “it is never hot nor muggy, I think, for the breezes rest not day nor night, breathing eras of music through the timber.” He said that he had never felt better, though bitterly like Don Quixote before the windmill! Old Lossow (our host) and two boys came along with us, but they left us in a flurry at the outwork barbican; then we two stood before the gate, dressed to our gloves, and Langler said to me: “you know, Arthur, that Christ of Castagno in the gallery at Christ Church? it rises before me now as an expression of the languishment of mind which I feel in the presence of this stronghold.” So I, too, felt; nor was I at all sure that, once in, we should ever come out again; but there we were, and I summoned the castle — the knocker being a cannon-ball hanging on a chain, whereat a woman opened, we stepped into the bailey-court, and a somewhat loosely-dressed man, with a tasselled smoking-cap on his head hurried towards us, followed by a brown bear. “Kiss the hand, sirs,” said he, “you are without doubt the two English acquaintances of the baron from whom I have received a communication.” “Yes, sir,” said I. “I am the burgvogt, Jan Tschudi,” said he; “I take it that you still wish to inspect the burg?” “Still, yes,” said I, for I had a weapon on me. “Willingly from the heart will I show you over the fortress,” said he, “be so good as to come this way.”

We followed him inward, Langler fondling the bear, which had a string of rhododendrons round its neck, Herr Tschudi himself a burly German of middle age, fresh-faced, with a bold brow under his smoking-cap. He led us to some cannon, saying: “these two are fifteenth-century sakers, those there are what they call culverins; and everything with us is of this kind, sirs: here you will find all old, nothing splendid.” He next led us into the gaudy little church, which Langler examined lingeringly, especially two curious niches in the south wall beside the altar, where the elements had been kept, over which he bent so long that Herr Tschudi and I became restless; “I see,” I said meanwhile to Tschudi, “that your front row of seats are really easy-chairs, as I once heard Baron Kolár say that they are.”

“Yes,” he answered, with a smile. And he added, with a certain flush and challenge: “we once had a particularly brilliant preacher here whom the baron used to take a pleasure in coming down to hear on Sunday mornings; hence the chairs, for his lordship is fond of his ease.”

I could see his lordship reclining, stroking back his scrap of hair, and enjoying the “real toil” of another!

“Who, then, was that brilliant preacher?” I asked.

“He was called the Pater Dees, sir.”

“And what has become of him now?”

“I could not tell you.”

“But can it be the same Pater Max Dees of whom I have heard that he has been a prisoner in the castle?”

“The very same.”

“May I ask — what was his offence?”

“The sin of ingratitude.”

“Indeed? What is the story?”

“Ah, I’m afraid it might be long: you would regret having asked to hear it.”

“I don’t often regret what I do. But ingratitude! Does one go into prison in the alp for that?”

“It may happen!”

“But in a private castle?”

“Sir, let me tell you what you are not perhaps aware of, that among the ancestors of his lordship on the distaff side have been several Reichsunmittelbarer-Fürsts, and that till late times the lords of this castle have been rechts-fähig” (able to make private laws).

“Quite so, quite so,” said I, “but still, a prisoner in a private castle ... in our times....”

“It is a mere nothing; you should not let that trouble you.”

“But is Father Dees — still a prisoner, if one may ask?”

“Surely one may ask: there is no harm in asking, you know. But all that was five long years ago, of course. Here, however, is your friend, the connoisseur, at last.”

Langler now at last joined us. As we set out afresh a youth with ringlets and a velvet coif came up blushing, to be presented by Herr Tschudi as “Mr Court-painter (Hof-maler) Friedrich.” “But has the baron a court?” I asked, to which Herr Tschudi answered: “not in strict etiquette any longer perhaps; but it amuses the baron to keep up a pretence of the old sovereign rights, and, being a dear heart at bottom, he is ever fond of pets, of whom our friend, the court-painter here, is one.”

We now went on inward to the second court, a party thenceforth of five (including the bear), and were shown the granary, storehouses, electric set. “Do you keep a large staff of retainers?” I asked at the offices. “A mere handful now,” was the answer; and Herr Tschudi added with a laugh: “but they are all trusty to the backbone, in case you ever think of storming the castle!” This was the hard nut whom I had had the fantastic thought of bribing to tell the truth as to Dees! He was full of pride in his baron and castle, and such a hero-worshipper that I even fancied that he tried to ape the baron’s manner and speech. “Certainly, the baron keeps some excellent horses,” said I at the stables: “is he fond of riding?” “Ach, not now,” was the answer; “but he has been a dashing bear and boar huntsman in his time, for whatever he attempts he does with a more magnificent success than others; the mother of the good Ami here (meaning the bear) was slain by him. As for the horses, the alp is noted for them.” “So, since the baron no longer rides,” said I, “how does he amuse himself now when in residence?” “Mainly in the laboratory, which I will show you presently in the keep,” he answered. “Indeed?” said I, “is the baron a chemist?” “What, you did not know that?” said he: “everyone knows that he is even a specially profound chemist, for chemistry has been his life-study.” “The baron is always found to be more than one had thought him,” said I; “I wonder if my friend and I will have the honour of seeing him before we leave the alp?” “His lordship’s comings and goings,” answered Herr Tschudi, “are always very uncertain.” “Strange to say,” said I, “there is a rumour in the alp that the baron is actually in residence; at least one woman told me that she knows it for a fact.” “Thundery weather!” cried the man with a flush, “what is the woman’s name?” “I don’t know her name,” I answered, not wishing to get my good sennerin into any trouble.

A move was now made towards the keep with its square tower at each corner. By an outside flight of steps we went up to the first floor — there was no ingress to the ground floor — and were shown the old hall (rittersaal). The quality of this place was most quaint somehow, with some feeling of ancient forests, damsels and nixen, and knights of Lyones, yet all was quite plain, even shabby, save some rather portentous portieres which shut off his lordship’s private quarters. I, for the most part, strolled with Herr Tschudi, while Langler, with Herr Court-painter, bent over everything in his connoisseur way: there were paintings by old abbots in tempera whose secret is lost, there were cressets, gobelins, tables of pierced bone, painted hoch-Deutsch MSS. Langler said hardly anything, and only once spoke to Herr Tschudi, when he called out: “Is this pieta ancient?” to which Herr Tschudi answered: “fifteenth-century, sir.” “But,” said Langler, “Herr Court-painter says sixteenth-century,” at which Herr Court-painter blushed all over his broad face. “No, sir, fifteenth-century,” repeated Herr Tschudi. “I thought it modern,” said Langer; “but what is this inscription on its base?” We all now went to look at the pieta, a Virgin and dead Christ in wax; but Herr Tschudi could make nothing of the inscription, for he said, “it is some pious motto, but I do not know that language — do you, perhaps, Herr Court-painter?” Herr Court-painter of the star-gazing spectacles shook his ringlets, with the answer: “I do not know what it says.” “Does — the baron read Hebrew?” asked Langer suddenly. “Ach, not now any more, I think,” answered Herr Tschudi; “but he has been a master of several old languages in his time.” I noticed Langer’s brow twitch, but did not imagine that the matter was of any importance; I saw, indeed, that the letters on the pieta were Greek, but all in capitals, with the sigmas like C’s, and much effaced, so my mind shirked the bore of reading, and I turned away with the others from it.

After this we were shown the baron’s laboratory, the upper rooms, one of the four towers, and were now escorted by Herr Tschudi, Herr Court-painter, and the bear back to the gate, where Herr Tschudi parted from us with profound reverences.

“It is a fabulous place,” Aubrey wrote of it, “imbued with an old forlornness, and a waving of woods, and the pining of an alto wawl in the windpipe of its airs,” but certainly I felt rather foolish when I left it, for I had learned nothing, and what we were now to do I had no notion. At the entrance to the forest we met our old Lossow with his pipe, and he climbed with me back to the guest-court, Langer meanwhile striding well ahead of us, wrapped in silence.

CHAPTER XIX

THE FACE OF DEES

ON GOING INTO my sitting-room at the guest-court I beheld Langler already there, with a busy pen in his hand and his hat still on his head; he said nothing, nor could I guess what he was at, till, getting up sharply, he handed me to read a note to Herr Tschudi in something like the following words:— “Sir, you have, to my certain knowledge, one Father Max Dees unlawfully confined in Schweinstein Castle, of which you are the governor, his dungeon being the cell at the bottom of the north-west tower. For such an act of flagrant unrighteousness there can be no excuse whatever, and I have to address to you, in the pretended absence of the castle-lord, the warning that, if within the next twenty-four hours your prisoner is not released, then my friend, Mr Templeton, and I will know how to coerce and duly punish you....”

I was never more surprised! — every word of it was surprising! My first words were: “but by what means are we to coerce and duly punish him?”

“Oh, we shall find a way,” said Langler: “I intend to be no longer tentative and tolerant; Dees must now be set at liberty, or I shall act with a certain rigour.”

“But, Aubrey — —”

“No; Arthur, we have already been sluggish and patient, we have lost time — time. It is for us now to put our powers brusquely to the test.”

“I agree,” said I: “let us put our powers to the test, let us act with a certain rigour. But how? I confess that I don’t understand you. Tell me first how on earth you can know that Dees is not only still a prisoner, but in the north-west tower?”

“As to his being still a prisoner, that is on the surface of things,” he answered: “the slightest criticism applied to the words and manner of Herr Tschudi would unveil the man’s consciousness of that fact. He has even caught the contemptuous, frank trick of his master, and was hardly at the pains to be a hypocrite. When you said to him, ‘but is Father Dees still a prisoner, if one may ask?’ his answer was: ‘surely one may ask; but all that was five long years ago, of course.’ Very ‘long’ years— ‘of course.’ No, he wouldn’t have spoken at all like that if he had not had Dees’ present captivity in his consciousness; he wouldn’t have been stung to retort: ‘surely one may ask,’ but would have answered at once with a careless ‘Oh no.’ And all his manner and other words were in the same sense.”

“You are no doubt quite right,” said I.

“I am even sure of it,” said he: “when I asked him as to the pieta, whether it was ancient, how off-hand was his answer, ‘fifteenth-century, sir,’ though he had previously called me a connoisseur, and might have known, if he had troubled to think, that I should see his statement to be untrue. The pieta is not at all in any of the moods of old Northern work, and it bears the initials of Max Dees, who most likely made it. But Herr Tschudi did not wish Dees to be a topic, and shunned his name even at the cost of an untruth; nor would he have acted at all like that, Arthur, if Dees had gone out of his life and care five ‘long’ years ago — unless, indeed, there were unseen ears listening somewhere to which Dees’ name is ever a word forbidden in the castle.”

“Well,” said I, “let it be taken as settled that Dees is still there in prison; but how can you know that he is in the north-west tower?”

“You didn’t read the words in raised letters on the base of the pieta?” he asked.

“No, I didn’t read them.”

“In what language do you imagine that they are?”

“In Greek,” said I.

“No, in Hebrew,” said he, “Hebrew words in Greek letters, and so put there by a most knowing mind, I gather, the same mind and hand which captured the wren, and sent her out with her message; and if you add to these proofs of wit the craftsmanship in the pieta, and Herr Tschudi’s admission of Dees’ oratory, you get an intelligence of many gifts, as ‘brilliant’ perhaps as ‘Savonarola.’ Dees apparently made the pieta some time shortly before his imprisonment, when he was not without bodings of his doom; and the Hebrew words in Greek letters were meant to baffle a half-classic like the baron, in case it should ever occur to the baron to read what he would assume to be some pious motto in such a place.”

“But what are the words?” I asked.

“These, Arthur,” said he: “‘If I am killed, it will be the lord’s doing; if imprisoned, at the bottom of the north-west tower.’”

“But that is nearly everything!” I cried: “what luck! I wonder what was Dees’ hope.... But do you mean to say, Aubrey, that you would betray to Herr Tschudi that we are in possession of this wonderful piece of knowledge?”

“It has seemed to me that we have dallied and been mild more than enough, Arthur.”

At this, I must confess, there rose in my mind the old rhyme: “he never said a foolish thing, he never did a wise one.” “But, Aubrey,” said I, “is it not clear that the last thing which we must do is to threaten and challenge these people? We should only provoke a smile; even our liberty, our lives, are in their hands. Pray listen to me in this for Emily's sake, for all our sakes. We can effect nothing by impulse and spasmodic high-handedness when our power is just nil. And if we betray our knowledge of Dees' dungeon in this fashion, what is to prevent them removing him to another?"

"Well, your judgment is always good," said he, with a smile: "there stands the letter, written, at any rate, but it need not be actually sent; all life is the same tangle, I suppose, in which not only the why but even the how of conduct remains enigmatic, and the maze is without clue, save at its end," and he threw himself on our old sofa, with his hands behind his head, while I at our window-garden of fuchsias and oleanders tore up the note, looking down an avenue of the wood, till presently I said: "I wonder if Dees' dungeon has a window?"

"Castles of that date," answered Langler, "have not usually dungeon-windows; but Dees' dungeon has one, of course."

"How do you know?"

"But didn't he send a bird from it?"

"Well, of course. Well, then, since there is an opening of some sort, the thing for us now to do is to get at Dees, and he will tell us how to work out his release. I believe that it can be done, if he is really in the north-west tower, for the north wall of the castle rises sheer from the river-cliffs, which are only some thirty feet high."

Langler sat up at my words, and for the rest of that evening we were discussing this thing on every side.

The next (Monday) morning I rode five miles towards Speisendorf, where I got a boy to buy for me forty metres of rope, and on coming home spent the remainder of the day in my room making a rope-ladder; on the Tuesday I purloined two hooks from a shanty in the cow-yard to fasten to my ladder; and at midnight of that same day I was face to face with Max Dees.

I shall never forget that night, that experience, it was so tenebrous and windy, all was like a scene in Erebus — the castle, the cliffs, the forests, not a light anywhere on the earth or in the heaven, and my heart, like the midnight thief's, was in my mouth. We left the guest-court by stealth, hurried down the forest, and at the river launched the fishing-boat which I had previously fixed upon — a nasty piece of work, for that small river falls some five feet, and by ill luck the tide was at ebb, so we had to push down the boat through slush, and when we had got under the castle I had to climb through more slush to the cliff. Langler remained in the boat, for there was nothing to make her fast to. Above some ivy grew on the cliff, but none below.

At a cranny where the cliff-surface was more broken I now began to cast the ladder; but I had cruel luck at first, every cast making a racket of which all the jackdaws on the rock and the very soul of the night seemed to be conscious, and I regretted keenly that we had not tried our luck with the wooden ladder of the guest-court, much too short though it was. However, after a few throws, the grapples caught fifteen feet up, and in the end, by three stages, I stepped over a crucifix at the top at a point where a yew and an ash grew out of the bush at the cliff-edge; and now not two feet from the edge was the north wall of the north-west tower, and in it a window almost level with the ground.

At that window I lay on my right side, I called upon Max Dees: and at once, startling me, a hungry breath was with me; “yes,” it whispered, “I am here, you are come to deliver me — tell me!”

“Yes, Dees,” I whispered, “we are two — —”

“Gott!” he whispered, “speak low.”

I told him that his message sent out by the wren had come to us, and asked what we were to do for him.

“Yes, to deliver me,” he whispered, “a good file, bring it to-morrow night, in three nights I shall be ready to fly with you, go now, tread softly, one good file....”

“I shall bring the file,” I whispered, “but our object in coming was to be able to swear that you are actually a prisoner, and so move the authorities — —”

“Speak low,” he whispered horridly: “no, the file, the authorities would not act against him — not for months, years, and he means to crucify me.... Has the Church fallen?”

“No; why?”

“He vowed to keep me to see the downfall of the Church, which I loved, and then crucify me, bring the file....”

“He shall fail, I promise you, don’t be so frightened, take comfort, trust in God, trust in us, we mean to stick to you to our last breath — —”

“Thanks, the file, go, go, one good file.”

“We sha’n’t fail,” I said, and I was now about to rise when, to my dismay, I heard a noise in the bush, and, peering that way, my eyes made out the form of a man. I was very unnerved. It came toward me along the cliff-edge, and I had a thought of shooting, for a weapon was in my trousers pocket, when I became aware of Langer! — a surprising thing, seeing that he had arranged not to climb. He stooped to my ear, panting, “is he there?” “Yes,” I whispered, “but to what have you made fast the boat?” “Gott, speak low,” came in agony from the window-bars. “I made her fast to the ladder,” whispered Langer, “have you seen him?” “One can’t now, go back,” I whispered. “We should see him,” he whispered, “so as to be able — —” “It is all right; go back,” I whispered, “no! no! don’t strike—” for I heard him about to strike a match; but the match was struck, and in its shine we had a vision of a face all eyes in a bush of black beard and hair; it seemed horrified at the striking of the light! which, however, was hardly burning before it was puffed out by the wind.

It was at that moment that I became aware of a grating sound ten yards along the cliff-edge where the ladder was, and immediately I heard a splash in the river; whereupon, picking myself up, I pelted to the spot, only to find the ladder gone. I understood at once that the boat, tied by Langler to the ladder-foot, had dragged upstream (the tide was rising), dragging the grapples aside from the arm of the crucifix at the cliff-edge, and taking the ladder with her; and I felt hopelessness, for how we were ever to get away it was hard to see, since I was aware that some parts of the bailey-wall went up sheer from the cliff-edge.

“Is the ladder gone?” whispered Langler.

“Yes,” I whispered, and I could not help adding: “pity you came up!”

“I thought that I had better see him, in order to be able to say that I had,” he whispered.

“You might have said it without actually seeing, you know, Aubrey.”

“Hardly, I think, Arthur,” said he.

I would not answer, for at the moment, I confess, I was a little impatient of Oxford and the academic stiff mind of the schoolmen. The ladder was gone! that was the point: and with it all seemed lost.

However, we presently started out eastward on hands and knees, until we entered some narrows beyond which there was no venturing; then, having turned, we once more went by Dees’ window, who sent out to us some momentous hist, which we were in too much misery of mind to heed; and in the end, after somehow managing two danger-spots, we came out into forest at the castle-back. From that point we saw for the first time a light in the night, a light in a tiny window of the donjon — as to which Langler made the reckoning that it was burning either in or near the baron's laboratory.

We then walked up through the forest, got by stealth into the guest-court about two o'clock, and crept to our beds. I, however, could not sleep, but lay living over again all our night-bewitched adventure: the winds, the tremors and chances, seeing again the eyes and hearing the gasps of that poor, darksome prisoner, and thinking of the loss of the boat and of what that meant: for I knew that with the next ebb of the tide the boat would very likely be recovered by her owner, with our ladder tied to her, and with my jacket, waistcoat, and cap, and Langler's hat, in her! so that what we had been about would too probably soon be known in the castle and throughout the alp.

CHAPTER XX

THE UPSHOT

EARLY THE FOLLOWING morning Langler and I had pretty sharp difference of opinion at my bedside. I said to him: "Dees' own view of what is good for himself is naturally worth more than yours or mine: a file is what he says that he wants, and I believe that we can still get it to him if we act now before the boat is found."

"The boat may have already been found," said Langler.

"Possibly," said I; "but no doubt the rumour will take some time to get into the castle, so that if we act boldly at once, taking the ladder here, we may get the file to Dees."

"But we have no file," said he.

"That is the least of it, surely," I answered: "Lossow has a big box of tools; we can take a file."

"No, frankly, Arthur, it would not be quite to my taste," said he.

"What would not, Aubrey?"

"This of the file: does it seem quite pretty and correct to allow ourselves to become the abettors of any person in breaking open another man's house?"

I was silent: it was painful to me to believe that Langler could be serious. "But in this case," said I, "the other man's house happens to be a house in which the person is lawlessly imprisoned. Or is that not so?"

“True,” said he; “but still, isn’t it very well said that two wrongs do not make a right? If you look at it with a certain sidelong criticism and detachment, I fancy that you will just see that it would not be quite decorous and becoming. No, it would not be decorous, and, moreover, it is not in the scheme. We have now actually seen Dees in prison, so the proper authorities can no longer refuse to act, and upon them we must now cast the burden.”

“But the authorities can refuse to act,” said I, “for Baron Kolár, remember, is no mere nobleman, but a political somebody, and the authorities, if they do act, may take weeks, or ‘months or years,’ as Dees said. True, the authorities are what we originally proposed: but we did not then contemplate that time would be the question, that Baron Kolár might be here at home, or might have any purpose against the life of this poor man — ‘crucify,’ by the way, is the word which Dees used: open your mind to it, Aubrey.”

“Well, but to me there is something fantastic in the mere word,” said he: “Dees’ mind may be unhinged.”

“Not in the least, I believe,” I answered. “Are crucifixions so very unfamiliar to you? I say that if some circumstance or other once led Baron Kolár to vow that this thing shall be done, then it will be done, unless we act now out of the rut of ourselves, on a plane higher than our everyday height. It is hard to do, of course, but perhaps we can screw ourselves up to it. Let us think of Dees’ agony of waiting for the file to-night, to-morrow night, every night; and I promised him, I said, ‘we sha’n’t fail you, trust in us, we shall stick to you to our last breath.’ No, we can’t fail him.”

“But you speak as though I proposed to fail him, Arthur!” said Langer.

“No, you don’t, of course, propose that,” said I, “but still, we can’t let some qualm of primness or respectability in us cause the man to curse

Heaven: he should have the file; I know that Emily would agree with me —
—”

“Emily? No! Emily would hardly say, I think, that the principles of conduct should be modified by pressing circumstances.”

“But did not David eat of the shewbread in pressing circumstances?”
said I: “I am convinced that Emily would agree with me, if I know her.”

“No, nego, nego.”

“Well, we won’t dispute that,” said I; “but still, let us think of Dees waiting, despairing, conscious perhaps that Baron Kolár is in the castle, with God knows what ghastly meaning. And to move the authorities will take time, even if they be willing; and who can say what may happen meanwhile to Max Dees?”

“Then I shall know how to act this very day,” said he, “neither approaching the authorities nor giving Dees the file, but in another vigorous, yet law-abiding, fashion.”

“Which fashion, Aubrey?”

“I shall rouse the alp,” said he, “I shall implant into each mind the certainty of Dees’ imprisonment, I shall ignite their indignation, and lead them all to demand his release.”

For some time I made no answer to this; then I said: “well, do so; and, if the human swineherds on this alp were theories, you might just possibly succeed: remember, however, that, in the event of your failure, it will be too late then to take the file, for the news of the boat and ladder will certainly by that time have reached the castle, and Dees will thenceforth be strictly guarded, or removed to another dungeon.”

“Well, but I won’t fail,” said he— “at least let us hope that I won’t fail, Arthur; one can but try one’s purblind best, and it may perhaps be that time and tide will happen to him.”

“Yes, I see how you feel, I see,” said I; “but you know the awe, and even affection, which all these people here cherish for the baron: how, then, can you expect to ‘lead’ them against him? If you do manage it, the baron will send Herr Court-painter to stare them away with his spectacles — —”

“No, I think that you underestimate the good people,” he answered: “though indolent in the presence of a suspected wrong, they will not be slow to rise against a proved wrong. Do let us have some little trust in our kind.”

I felt myself, as it were, caught in the toils with this sudden scheme of Langler’s, seeing quite clearly, as I did, that no good would come of it, but the more I argued the more I seemed to fix him in it, till at last it almost looked as if a crick of contradiction to me had entered into his motive. I saw, indeed, his point of view: to approach the authorities might be fatally slow, to give Dees the file was “improper” — a touch of bigotry perhaps being added to this latter view by my unlucky claim that his sister would believe it proper, for he was touchy as to her judgments, and inflexible whenever the moral, or even the proper, was at all involved; but still, his way out of the fix appeared to me too wild. At one moment I even had the thought of taking the file to Dees without him, but I saw that I should probably fail single-handed; and, moreover, he was the head in this matter: to his house, not to mine, Max Dees’ wren had come, and I had merely accompanied his undertaking.

Well, what happened that day is tedious to me to tell, and shall be told shortly: first, I saw Langler in head-to-head talk with Lossow, our host, who, though very friendly with us, had never yet let one word of Dees’ history escape his lips; then after all the talk, the head-noddings, the finger-countings, I saw Langler giving money — a good mass of it, too — and I thought to myself: “what, has it become a question already of bribing the ‘good people’? the disillusionment will grow!” Lossow then wrote out a list of names, which Langler conned, and near eleven in the morning they two rode out together. I offered to be with them: but it was felt that my heart was hardly in the business, and I was left out of it behind.

At one o’clock Lossow came back alone, and hurried to me, mopping his bald head, where I sat at the foot of a tree. This old man always seemed by some movement of the mouth to be trying to keep back a smile, but without success; he was stout and chubby, his arms hung from his stooped shoulders with a certain paralysed look, and he stepped short like a woman. “Kiss the hand!” he said, beaming, “all goes well, we have ridden like blackriders, and canvassed the folk. Herr Somebody will not only come, but will bring his two sons and his three day-labourers, and by three o’clock you will see gathered here the bravest swarm of them.” “That should mean good trade in the beer for you, Lossow,” said I. “The beer? good trade? for me?” said he, taken aback, “well, no doubt, folks must drink after all, folks must drink, what would you have? There’s Karl and Jakub So-and-so have already struck work, and mean to make a day of it — it is the richest affair this day! You’ll see them come gaping here like fish presently, the blessed swarm of them!” “But why gaping?” said I, “hasn’t Herr Langler explained why they are to come?” “Ach, not to all,” he answered, “for I whispered to Herr Langlaire, ‘hasten with leisure,’ ‘many heads, many minds’; they of these parts are a curious lot, you know, oh, a curious lot, you wouldn’t understand them even after many years, for one must be born among them.” “On the contrary, Lossow,” said I, “I understand you through and through: you mean that, if Herr Langler had told them everything, they would have been afraid to show their noses, and the rich affair would have been spoiled.” “Ah, you are a rogue!” said he, “well, between us, it was something like that: what would you have? one is nearer to himself than to his neighbour. After all, these bayers and landsasses here are a mean-spirited swarm, what can you expect? As for me, if I had been they, I should have demanded the release of the Pater Dees long ago, yes, I! — if I had been they. Still, some of them have been told all, and there's Herr Somebody coming with his two sons, Wolfgang and Ernst — —” “Who is this Herr Somebody?” I asked. “What,” said he, “not know Herr Somebody yet? the Mittel-frei? with fifty acres of beet on the yon side of the Schwannsee? Between us, he keeps a little grudge against the baron, and is all for a lark, with a carouse to follow” — in this way he kept on gossiping, trying not to smile, but smiling, and full of the heyday. Langer, it appeared, was still “canvassing the folk,” had five cottages more to visit, but would be back for dinner, which Lossow at last hurried off to see to.

Langer, returning near two, threw himself upon our sofa with a sad sigh, saying: “well, so far, so good; but the boat has been recovered, Arthur; all is known, and your things and my hat, with the ladder, have been taken to the castle. Perhaps some of them will shrink from coming to the rendezvous now.” He sighed again.

“As to the boat,” said I, “that I quite expected: it is calamitous, but I expected it. But as to the rendezvous, I doubted that you would still adhere, Aubrey, to this strange action upon which you have embarked.”

“But you speak of it, Arthur, as strange! Is it not as natural as the unfolding of a flower to appeal to one's human fellows in a case where humanity has been outraged? True, these people are not quite gilt with perfection — ah, no! one must admit that; but their rudeness is the plainness of honesty, they are robust and good, and, after all, I have had more success with them than I could have hoped.”

“But you have not told them for what purpose you want them to come.”

“No, not told it to all, not yet.”

“And when you do tell them, do you imagine that they will march to the castle?”

“Yes, they will rise, they will act: men are not sheep after all.”

“But suppose they rise, and act, and march, what then? Will they tear the castle down like the Bastille?”

“No, certainly, not that: but truth alone is huge, surely; justice by itself is the shout of a host. We shall see how it turns out. One after all can only steer by one’s best chart, Arthur, casting one’s cause upon the immortal gods, not without hope. But here is Lossow come to call us to dinner.”

In peeped a face trying not to smile, but smiling, and we went down to dinner in the old kitchen, soon after which I began to note the shy arrival of Hans and Klaus, one by one, two by two, who all slunk into the beer-room on the left of the porch, and I heard later on (though not from Langler) that drink was free that day. Meantime Langler was pacing our sitting-room with a strenuous brow, preparing, I think, a speech.

Down below grew a noise of tongues, and soon after three o’clock in looked Lossow busily, giving out the whisper: “they are all in the beer-garden waiting!” this beer-garden being a yard with tables, swings, etc., behind the house, which was L-shaped. Upon this Langler paced yet twice, took up hat and thorn-stick, and said quietly to me: “well, then, let us go.”

Below we stood under the verandah, and with us were Lossow, Frau Lossow, their four daughters, and two servants; before us in the garden a mob of some fifty, with a few women and infants, earth-born beings, one of whom bore a broomstick with a rag for flag: this was Herr Somebody! — I think the name was Voss or Huss — a sloven, red rascal like a satyr. Some few gaped silent, “like fishes,” but it was evident to me that the mind of the meeting was waggish; and Langler, standing against the verandah-rail, addressed them.

He was palish, but then his brow reddened, and, on the whole, I was surprised how well he spoke, since German was strange to his tongue; he kept putting his palms to the rail and catching them up again, and bowing forward and up again, and I felt how very foreign, very trying and hard, to him all this must be; but he became earnest, speaking feelingly, and I could have cried to see him spending his soul upon that herd, appealing to them as brothers where no brotherhood was, giving them news of justice and of compassion and of passionate intrepidity, where only pigs and mugs were understood. Several times he was stopped by the ribald Herr Voss or Huss waving the broomstick, and whooping some such cry as “on to the burg, you clowns! let’s souse old Tschudi in the river-water!”

“Well, now,” said Langler, “let us go: all of us together: with the fixed purpose not to leave the castle without bringing back our poor prisoner with us. We will carry no weapon in our hands, no, yet we shall be great in power. Let us go; and I shall go in front, and my friend here, too, will come, to strengthen us.”

I think that he was about to say more: but just now, on a sudden, behold Herr Castle-governor Tschudi in his smoking-cap standing with us. I first heard a guffaw behind me, then at once the man was beside Langler at the verandah-rail, and at once he was crying out jokes to this or the other of the crowd, cutting Langler short, asking one how his horrid old swell-foot was, assuring another that his old woman was at that very moment making a cuckold of him, egging on another to go at once to the castle to rescue the saintly and grateful Pater Dees; and the throng was roaring with laughter when, all at once, the man’s face took on a look of ire that strongly reminded one of his over-lord, and he ordered them all instantly to be gone to their abodes.

Langler made not one other effort, for he was not one to strive and cry, and the power over the mob of the coarse-grained man beside him was so obvious. As the crowd began to flow away my friend turned to me, and smiled.

The last I saw of our army was Voss or Huss marching loudly away, broomstick held aloft, against the burg, in the midst of a crew of some eight or ten.

As these disappeared, Herr Tschudi tapped me on the arm.

“Sirs,” said he, “kiss the hand: will you have the goodness to step this way with me?”

We followed him into a room opening upon the verandah.

“Those articles yours, sirs?” said he, pointing to a chair on which lay our rope-ladder together with my jacket, waistcoat, and cap, and Langler’s hat, left in the boat.

“Yes,” said I, “they are ours.”

“Well, I have brought them for you,” said he; “but I have now to suggest to you, sirs, that you leave the alp before noon to-morrow.”

“Is it a threat?” cried I, starting.

The man made me no answer, but laying his hand upon Langler’s arm, said to him: “don’t take it as a threat; I suggest it to you in a friendly way: listen to me. You have shot a buck (made a blunder) in coming here, and you will spin no silk by remaining longer. You have been strangely lucky so far, owing to the fact that your intentions are amiable; but you know nothing, you are groping in the dark on the brink of a precipice. You go away now.”

“Well, your advice seems to be kindly meant,” said Langler, “and we thank you. But there is no chance of its influencing us at all, Herr Tschudi.”

“Then I leave it to you,” said Tschudi, “God guard,” and he strode away.

We two then went up to our sitting-room, where we spent the evening and most of that night. Little was said between us. Langler was not well, and complained of a pain in the heart. He was, indeed, very deeply hurt, and said to me with a meekness that made my heart ache: "I shall never again act against your judgment, Arthur, in such a matter. Oh, I thought men nobler, and the gods less niggard." It was useless to go to bed, for I never heard such a racket, the wind was rough, and the crew of peasants, who had gone away only for a time, were below, since drink already reckoned for was to be had that night. Till quite into the morning their music, quarrelling, and roars of merriment rose up to us through the roaring of the tempest in the forest — hour after hour — so that I pitied Langler, who, I knew, must be feeling that the money which he had laid out with fond hopes of good was working harm. Between the noises he and I deliberated as to what was now to be done by us; but there was nearly nothing to be said, since nothing remained but to address ourselves to the law of the land. I wanted him to come, too, with me to Gratz, but he said, what was true, that it was useless for us both to go; he was weary and disillusioned, and perhaps Herr Tschudi's command to go had something to do with his will to stay, but I was unwilling to leave him, and begged him to go down at least to Speisendorf or Badsögl; but no, he would stay where he was. At last the noises died down, and some time after two we went to bed.

CHAPTER XXI

AT GRATZ

THE NEXT MORNING I came upon our Hanska in Speisendorf street, hands in pockets, whistling (as ever) at the crucifix on the mountain. This knit little chit of a man had a pride in his cylinders and some flea of flight in his brain; he and his car were well ready for me, and we reached Gratz in the early afternoon after a charming ride.

I had no hope that affairs would go flyingly with me in Gratz, and thought to myself, "this will be a matter of some days"; but it was three weeks before I left the town.

Whether those were trying weeks for me will be divined: I was afraid for Dees, afraid for Langler up there alone in the mountains, and afraid to open the letters from Swandale which he forwarded on to me. Miss Emily had, in truth, become awfully eager and anxious! all too eager and anxious, I thought. Why the delay, she wished to know! I had begged Langler to write her fully of everything as it happened, but no, he chose to be general and vague, and this only enlarged, instead of lulling, her fears. She was now back in Swandale, living partly with the Misses Chambers, and was quite well, she said. But something in me boded that she was not so well as she said.

Hence those weeks in Gratz were rather to me like three years. Among Langler's letters of introduction was one to a Herr Müller, a grain-merchant in the Holz Platz, upon whom I first called; he received me heartily, and introduced me to a certain Herr von Dungern, a lawyer, who said to me in his office on the morning after my arrival: "I'm afraid that that letter of yours written from England to Public Safety — foh! foh! — unsupported by evidence as it was, will now be against you." He was a fine, soldierly man, but afflicted with something which caused him to mix in all his talk this foh! foh! flung sideways with venom. "But," said I, "that old letter of ours must be forgotten by now." "Oh no," he answered; "there it still lies in the Evidenz-bureau, and you know that interest in a question once dead is not easily revived." "That may be," said I, "but I can now take oath that I have seen the Pater Dees in his dungeon, and here is Mr Langler's written statement, which you will duly formalise for me." "True, true," said he, "very true. Well, it is a matter — foh! foh! — for the Blessed Virgin and Herr Oberpolizeirath."

I now know that this Herr von Dungern was a tenant of land under Baron Kolár, but still, I can't accuse him of untrustiness to me, only of slowness — of intentional slowness, I think. It was not till the following morning that I was brought to the bureaux with the affidavits, and then it was from bureau to bureau, each interview somehow filling up the better part of a day, and everyone as it were laying his hand over his mouth at the high scandal which I was so bold as to air. "But," said I to Herr von Dungern as we drove away on the fourth evening, "someone must be the final authority! I have now been referred up and up from a common Sicherheits-wache-serjeant to two Polizeiraths, and still no end to it." "Lands, manners," said he, with a shrug— "every country has its usages." "Just so," said I, "but I am still at a loss to know why I have spent my afternoon with Herr Polizeirath of Central Inquiry in a case where there is nothing to inquire into." "Well," said he, hardly very honestly, "one, of course, must see Herr Polizeirath before one can see Herr Oberpolizeirath." "Yes," said I, "Herr Polizeirath of Safety, but why, after all, Herr Polizeirath of Inquiry? the interview seems to have been as needless as it was long!” “You do not — foh! foh! — understand,” said he. “No,” said I, “I do not, and it is very trying.” “I am grieved from the heart,” said he, “for I foresee that your patience is about to be tried; but you must amuse yourself, since everyone in our city is eager to entertain you, and the good Lord, thank God, does not grudge us any innocent gaieties; my wife and daughters in especial look forward with keenness to seeing you at our birthday-ball.” “But that is a week hence!” said I: “do you anticipate that I shall still be in Gratz?” “Ah, it may be!” said he, “we shall see: to-morrow at eleven we appear before Herr Oberpolizeirath of Safety himself....”

This Herr Oberpolizeirath, whose name was Tiarks, was a gross old man, all slashed and epauletted, with a nose like a bunch of blackberries in August. I was received by him in a chamber which brought back to my mind the scented answer which he had sent to our letter from Swandale, and from the first I had little hope in this old man. “But what, sir,” he asked me, “is your motive in this affair?” “A motive of humanity,” I answered: “a bird sent out by the captive with a note bound about its leg came to the house of my friend; we felt bound to investigate the matter; we have done so; and we now place it with confidence in your hands.” “But,” said he, “in order to see this captive, you must have entered upon Schweinstein Castle by stealth?” “Yes,” I answered cuttingly, “but that, I take it, is not a point which will distract your Honour’s attention from the proved fact of an outrage committed within the scope of your jurisdiction.” “But,” said he, his face flushing purpler, “perhaps you will find, sir, that the Austrian authorities are not inclined to allow themselves to be pleased with chords (pretensions) strung too high.” “I have already found it, Herr Oberpolizeirath,” said I.

“Ach, it is an affair, this!” sighed he faintly to himself, with a waved hand, and eyes cast upward.

In the greater part of the interview I had no share, but sat staring at the apple-green walls, while Tiarks and von Dungern laid their heads together apart. Such shrugs, such spreadings of both palms, and gazings over the rims of spectacles, one never saw! Then came the proposal that I should drop my plaint for a time, till the baron should be given a chance to set free his captive; to which I answered angrily: “But is Baron Kolár to be forewarned by those who should be his judges? He will never of himself set free this captive, and if he be given hints and nudges in the dark I shall consider that both justice and myself have been betrayed.” “Eh, eh, we know that the English hold no leaf before the mouth!” cried Herr Oberpolizeirath, with a waved hand: “but do you imagine, sir, that the baron does not already know what is being done? Poh, he knows; all Gratz knows. And would you not prefer to withdraw the plaint a little, rather than see it referred to the President at Vienna, and then perhaps up to the Provincial Diet itself after several months? Come, take your lawyer’s advice; and meantime, if you stay on in Gratz — why, we know that every young man craves for the society of the opposite sex — saving the claims of religion, mind you, saving the claims of religion; but between us three here, you can’t beat Gratz for female loveliness: what, von Dungern? Yes, sir, drop the plaint a little, and on the 7th of the month you have the Statthaltereirei Ball, on the 8th Count Attem’s, on the 9th the Prince-bishop of Seckau comes into residence, with street-processions, church-rites” — and more of this sort. In this way this old fogey thought to stroke my beard with honey, as the Germans say. Of course, I did not drop the plaint, and it was formally heard the next day before a lower commissary: but I might as well have dropped it! From the tenth day I began to despair, for I had by then been put through even the formality of giving the date of my mother's birth, had interviewed at the rathhaus, land-hause, Schlossberg people whose relation with the affair seemed to be as remote and entangled as possible; and I said then to myself: "Max Dees was right: they don't mean to interfere."

Meantime I wrote daily to, and heard from, Langler, and enclosed in his letters came some from Swandale which made the delays of the authorities maddening to me, because of a panting for our return which those letters now appeared to reveal. Alas, at the bottom of her heart Miss Emily did not believe that we should ever return to her, I think; but mixed with this under-despair was that hope which is common to all the living, and I believe that it was this hope battling for breath against this despair which gave rise to this sort of fierce haste that now possessed and hissed in her to see our faces yet once again.

Gratz, meantime, was as lively a town, both in a social and religious way, as it is ever a charming one. I saw the fête of the Visitation of the Blessed Virgin, and that of the Precious Blood on the Sunday following, and each time I peeped into St Ægidius it was full of people praying, with a priest or two pacing among them, like well-satisfied shepherds, while in the lesser churches also was much the same sight. I had nothing to do at night, and to escape from myself went to two balls, at the first of which a little German monk, who reminded me of Luther, gave a homily on the lawfulness of innocent amusements. But I was sick of Gratz by the eleventh day, and was wrought to throw up everything, when something gave me a new thought.

On that eleventh day I was strolling in an alley of the Stadt Park when I saw coming towards me a girl whom I had long known — a particularly pretty little girl named Rosie, who for some years had been in the service of my sister, Lady Burney, but now was in the service of the Duchess of St

Albans. When I expressed my surprise at seeing her, her answer was: “the duchess is on the way to Vienna, but stopped at Gratz to have an interview with Baron Kolár; she understood in London that the baron is at Schweinstein, but he isn’t, as it turns out, and no one seems to know where he is somehow, so I don’t know what our next move will be.”

We sat under a tree within sound of the band, and had a long talk that afternoon, for this servant-girl seemed to know everybody of any importance in Europe and the secret history of all that was going on, so she not only kept me amused, but posted me anew as to things and men in an astonishing way. Her mistress was, of course, the great lady in English politics, and had a habit, Rosie said, of making her her messenger, and even of “consulting her opinion”! Speaking of Ambrose Rivers, she said that he had now won a following of over eight hundred, and had opened a church in Kensington, to which she had once gone: “it is a kind of a cross between a theatre and a gymnasium,” said she, “but the duchess regards him more as a crank than as a serious force in religious politics, and he only owes it to Dr Burton’s illness that he has not been already brought under the consistory court. Ah!” she added in her bright way, “I saw that fit of Dr Burton’s!” “What, you were present?” said I. “I alone,” said she: “I was even the cause of it.” “How do you mean — the cause of it?” I asked. “I’ll tell you,” said she, “but, of course, it is between us, sir. Never was so frightened in my life! It was about nine in the evening, at the palace, the duchess had sent me with a note, I was to wait for an answer, and was led into a room in that Blore part. The Archbishop, who was at a table covered with papers, laid the note by his side, said ‘take a chair’ to me, and went on writing. I noticed that he was not looking well: every two minutes he heaved a sigh, twice got up to look for something, but seemed to forget what, and sat down again without, and he would press his hand to his brow, as if he had a headache. Presently he sprang up, and began to pace about: all this time, mind you, he hadn't opened the duchess's note, nor seemed to be aware that I was anywhere, and I, of course, sat quite mum, taking stock of my archbishop. But, all at once, he saw me, looked at me — didn't say anything, went on pacing, but I noticed that he turned pale, and several times after that he looked at me, growing paler and paler, till at last, making up his mind, he came to me: I never saw anyone so ghastly gaunt! he frightened me! And what do you think his Grace said, sir? 'Well, pretty, do you love me?'"

"Dr Burton? said that? 'well, pretty, do you love me?'"

"Yes, he said it — in such a secret voice; and he was pale, pale...."

"But — what did you say?"

"My answer was a scream, sir, for the words had hardly passed his lips when he was on the ground in a fit. The doctors say, by the way, that if ever he has another, he will slip his cable."

Some of Rosie's phrases were not utterly pretty, and her anecdotes so numerous that one doubted whether they could be all quite true; but, assuming this of Dr Burton to have at least some truth, I was very shocked, very deeply moved, and I got from her a promise not again to mention it during the doctor's lifetime.

When I asked her what was the big thing at the moment in England, "Oh, still Education," she answered in her off-hand manner: "it is nearly through the Commons now, but the Church isn't going to hear of it. This bill puts an Eton education within the reach of every boy, as in France and elsewhere, and it does seem hard that the Church should stand in the way when anyone can see that England is perishing for lack of just this thing: but that is the Church all over — the old enemy of light." "Why, Rosie, you are not a good Catholic!" I said. "Oh, well," said she, "one must submit one's reason to God, of course; but still, one's private thoughts will peep through. However, the Church was defeated over Diseased Persons, and she may be over Education, too: Mr Edwards, I know, means fight, and so does the duchess." "But Diseased Persons was won through the discovery of that body and cross in Bayeux," said I: "do people, by the way, still discuss that discovery?" "Nothing has ever been made of it that I know of," she answered: "but some queer things were said, as some queer things were said of the disappearance of Dr Todhunter, and it gave a shock to the Church somehow, till two more of the visions were seen, and that turned people's minds away."

On the whole, the girl proved a mine of modernity: but what causes me to mention her here is a criticism of some of her words made by Langer, and a meditation which occurred in my mind in consequence of that criticism, not without definite result.

On the night of our meeting I mentioned her in my usual letter to Langer, and in his next to me were the following words:— "This Rosie, you tell me, says that Baron Kolár is not at Schweinstein: but you and I believe differently! That voice and those two English words which you heard on the night when we were saved from drowning, and that light in (?) the castle laboratory on the night when we saw Max Dees — these, indeed, are hardly proofs; yet we do have a feeling that he is there: and I have asked myself what can be his reason for hiding his presence there, if he is there, even from political people like the Duchess of St Albans. The reason suggested to my mind is that he may really mean to do Max Dees some harm, with the odium of which he does not wish to be afterwards pestered. Dees, it seems, has somehow wronged him, and vengeance is to be taken. But why, then, one might ask, does the man not take his vengeance and be done? It seems to be because Dees is being reserved till something else first happens, till (according to Dees himself) ‘the downfall of the Church.’ But, in that case, why is the baron at present lurking in Schweinstein? Perhaps it is in order to hurt Dees prematurely, before ‘the downfall,’ in case you and I should make serious headway in the matter of effecting Dees’ release. But if this be so, it would seem to show that the baron must have some real fear of our power to release Dees. Indeed, he has such a fear: why else did he hurry hither the moment he saw that we could no longer be kept away from Styria? How sensitive he must be of the least chance of Dees’ escaping him! Yet he is not a nervous man; one would imagine that he might securely have left Dees to the care of the watch-dog Tschudi! But no, he flies to the spot in person. And those two outrages upon the innocent hands — how sensitive, how frightfully in earnest he must have been to keep us from meddling! But that earnestness certainly implies a fear of our power — of our power, which seems to be nil. It must be, then, that the baron perceives that we have some power of which we ourselves are not aware.”

There Langler’s discernment seems to have stopped short; but his words so struck me, that I could not forget them, and after a sleepless night, which I shall ever remember, towards morning this thought was born in my head: “but Max Dees is a churchman! this is the heyday of the Church, so it is through the Church perhaps that his release may be wrought; and the baron, more far-seeing than we, has long seen this, and has feared our power, because it seemed certain to him that we, too, must see it! Here have I been tossed from Herr to Herr and from pillar to post; but the Prince-bishop of Seckau is in Gratz, and it is to him perhaps that I should have gone.”

Thus oddly, one might say awfully, do things come off: if I had not met that girl in the Stadt Park I might never have come at this meditation, and everything, in the end, would have been otherwise than it was.

CHAPTER XXII

END OF DEES

IT WAS ON my seventeenth morning in Gratz that, having been fortified with a letter by Herr Oberbürgermeister, I saw the Prince-bishop: the morning of an audience: so that I had first to wait a long time among a mob of all sorts of men, who passed in one by one at the call of a Spanish abbé with sandals on his feet, a lad of such beauty that one's eyes clung to his face, till my turn at last came, and I was ushered into a chamber almost Pompadour in style, with statues, mirrors, flowers, through a door of which one could see, and smell, the palace-chapel. The Prince-bishop was pacing the floor, shut up within himself. I think that I never saw a more imposing figure, for he was big, and, having lately come from the chapel, had on a most gorgeous large cope, the apparel of his amice sticking up stiffly about his jaws under a dalmatic that might have bought a farm. Here was the Church in the awe of her gaudery. He looked a young man of not more than thirty-five, and stood like a king; but his lengthy chin was retreating, and he had some kind of lisp which made his speech rather common and silly.

He motioned me to a chair, and as I unfolded my tale quietly enough he listened, pacing, pacing; but the moment I had finished he reddened, and, suddenly placing his two palms far forth on the table, bringing his face down to mine, the good man glared at me, giving forth the roar: "Impious scoundrel!"

I, for my part, felt myself flush, and half rose to answer the insult, for I fancied that he meant me: but he meant Baron Kolár!

During the remainder of our half-hour's interview it became clear to me that there had been long-standing feud and war before this between the prince-bishop and the baron, an old trial of strengths never yet decided, but now to be decided; and when I deposited the affidavits with the great churchman I deposited them certain that I had at last discovered the key to the dungeon of Dees.

And so it proved: for, to cut short the story of intrigue, and runnings to and fro, and hurried breaths, during the next three days, on my twentieth day in Gratz a body of garrison-soldiers and sicherheitswachmänner, numbering twenty-seven, set out from Gratz for the mountains, I being in the rail-train with them, after having sent to Swandale the telegram: "All goes well; you will see us within four days."

These officers of the law were sent out in secret, under orders to break into any part of Schweinstein Castle if need were, and to set free the priest. I parted from them at Badsögl at four in the afternoon, hurrying on upward on horseback, while the troop followed, travelling afoot. Langler and I clasped hands under the corn-sheaf hung in the guest-court porch, where he stood expecting me, looking, I thought, remarkably well, with the good old smile stretching his lips. It was a most happy meeting: I had returned in triumph to find him safe, with a bundle of edelweiss as white as his soul in his hands and a fine brown in his skin. "Well done, Arthur," said he to me, and I to him: "all through you." "No, nego, nego," he answered. "Well, the point is," said I, "that our pains are all but over, and Swandale once more in sight." "Ah, Swandale," said he, "well, that, too, by God's mercy. Did you telegraph to Emily?" "Yes," I answered. "I, too," said he. "Do you think," I asked, "that anyone up here knows yet of the coming of the troop?" "I fancy that Lossow knows,” said he. “I wonder how?” said I. “I don’t know,” said he, “but I fancy that it is anticipated; however, it can be of no importance, since the troop are under vigorous orders.” “Let us hope not,” said I; “well, but I am very hungry.” Just then Lossow’s face appeared, trying not to smile, but chubbily smiling, so we ordered a meal, and, passing inward, I was met at the foot of the stair by the “kiss the hand, sir!” of the frau, of her children, and of all the household. At that moment, at any rate, I may say that these people wore their wonted faces, and seemed to have no weight on their minds.

While I was feeding upon the old gansbrust and beet, Langler and I made up our minds that we had better be at the burg when Dees was set free, so as to seize upon him, hear whatever he might have to tell, and then speed down in the waggonette to Badsögl, whence we would wire Dees’ story to England, and so, having won our backs bare of the world’s business, make for home. All this was settled. My trunk was waiting below at Badsögl; Langler’s was ready packed.

In the midst of our talk a boy of the place named Fritz brought us a telegram: it was from Swandale, and in the words: “Yours received, praises to God, beloved, shall await you Friday night at 9.17 at latest; am quite well, but try, will you, for Thursday.” Langler read, and handed it to me. Now, every word from Swandale always powerfully moved him, so I was surprised now that his first words were: “but what is the matter with Fritz?” I answered that I hadn’t noticed. “Well, he seems much agitated,” said Langler.

I ended my meal, and we sat by our window, smoking and still talking about our plans. I was in the act of looking at my watch, and of saying “within fifteen minutes now the troop should be at the castle-gate,” when we were startled by the toll of a bell. It seemed to come from the burg.

Langler and I looked at each other, as the toll was anew borne to us, shivering up through the forest on the soughs of the evening-breeze. "Someone must be no more," murmured Langler in a low tone. I uttered no word in answer: I was all hushed and bemused into the mood of the tolls; all the mountain seemed hushed now on a sudden in submission to their meaning and the tremolo of their bleating treble. I murmured to Langler: "they seem to be tolling at the burg; someone must be dead."

The tolling of the bell went on. Presently I got up, and struck the triangle (our bell), in answer to which old Lossow rushed wildly in, no smiling now, in that old man's looks the very ghost and gauntness of awe. "Why, what is the matter, Lossow?" said I, "who, then, is dead?" "Oh, good gentleman!" he groaned, with an appealing underlook. "But who is dead?" said I again, at which repetition of my question the old man now seemed to fly into a flurry, and crying out, "I know nothing, nothing of it!" washing his hands of it, tripped with his petty steps from the room.

I looked at Langler, saying: "we shall learn nothing from him, so let us start for the castle at once; by the time we get there the troop should have come."

We took umbrellas, Langler taking his greatcoat, too, for since my arrival the weather had turned out rough. At the bottom of the stair we saw the Lossows all in a knot, all with the same blankness and eyes of awe, and without stopping to speak to them passed out and down through the forest, which every few moments was swamped with shivery tempests and volumes of commotion mixed with spray. It was well past six, but there was still some twilight, save in the thick of the timber. Some way beyond the forest we saw a group of men staring at the troop before the burg with faces that told more plainly than words that something tremendous must have awed all these people to the heart. The bell was still tolling, and again tolling, even now telling out to the mountain as with the tongue of a woman its tidings of good-bye and bereavement, the castle flagstaff flying a flag at half-mast. We two hastened up the footpath to the gate, with the river at flood on our right, to find the men of the troop with their field-caps pushed back, their brows flushed from the tramp, for the most part soldiers of the third army-division, proud fellows, dressed in blue-grey bluses, with cockades and greatcoats. Their leader had just handed his warrant to Herr Tschudi, who lifted his eyes from it to fix upon us two, as we drew nigh, a look of venom. He, too, was white, like every denizen of the valley that untoward night; he strove to keep under his agitation, but the warrant shook in his hand, crackled in the wind; and close behind him the castle bell tolled, and again tolled.

“Well, Herr Feldwebel,” I heard him say, “there was certainly such a prisoner in the castle as is named here, but I may tell you that he left it over an hour ago.”

“So much the better, Herr Burgvogt,” answered the other; “still, I must make a search.”

“Willingly from the heart, since that is your pleasure,” answered Tschudi.

“Who, then, is dead?” asked Herr Feldwebel: “I hear your bell tolling.”

“Oh, one of the men of the alp,” was the answer.

“Forward!” said the sergeant-major to his men.

They stooped through the wicket, which closed after them, and Langler and I were left alone. We waited at first under a wood of yews near the outwork, but as there was lightning we drew away again into the open before the portal, dressing our umbrellas against the wind, which anon brewed drizzle. The twilight died out more and more bleakly; the bell continued to toll. We stood silent, waiting. As for me, a fear was in me. I felt that some doom may have overtaken Dees, though, in that case, it seemed hardly to be believed that they would dare to toll the bell in the very presence of the officers of the law; still, I feared; I think that Langler did, too, but he said nothing of it; if we spoke, it was to remark on the strangeness of the lightning, which up there on the heights somehow strikes in different tints, now purplish, now greenish, or rosy. We must have waited forty minutes when seven of the troop came out, bearing pine-torches in their three-fingered gloves, and biting sandwiches. I ran and asked one of them for the news.

“He is not in there,” was his answer, “we have searched every nook, and are now going to look round.”

“Did you see Baron Kolár inside?”

“No, the baron is not in the castle,” he said.

They ran up into the barbican, ran down again in ten minutes, then ran down the path to the south castle-side, and vanished from our sight.

We abode between fear and hope. No sound was to be heard within or without the burg but the sounds of the winds. It was almost dark before we saw the torches of the troop of seven returning, these having discovered no trace of Dees. They went back into the castle. Some minutes later the whole troop of twenty-seven came out with lanterns and torches. I approached the sergeant-major, to whom I was known, and had some talk with him: all he could say was that the captive named in his commission was nowhere in or near the castle, so that nothing remained to him now but to march back down the mountain.

We saw their torch-lights pass away down the castle-mound, and up to the forest, and lost to sight, and still we loitered by the portal, not knowing what to think or what next to do.

“Perhaps we had better go back to the guest-court,” I said at last; “something may be learned there.”

Before Langler could answer the wicket opened, Herr Tschudi stepped out, and, peering at us, cried jauntily: “kiss the hand, sirs! What, still waiting to see the good Pater Dees come out?”

Neither of us answered him.

“You are only losing your time,” he went on: “Pater Max, is it? the blessed Max? But no saintly Max will come out here again, by Gott, no. Look you” — his voice sank secretly— “I’ll bite into the sour apple, and give you a hint, just to satisfy you two men. You have been eager to see the lovely saint — eager, eager: well, he is not a thousand metres off, up yonder by the right river-bank, waiting now for you; you go, you will find him, you were eager to see him” — and at once the man dashed inward from us, chuckling, and slamming the wicket after him.

“But what a fury!” said Langler.

“Let me go up the river as he says, and see,” said I, “and you wait here till I come back.”

“But if you can go I will, too,” he answered in a strained voice.

We went by a path which, after skirting the castle-back, followed the line of the cliffs a few feet from their edge. Occasionally, in a flash, the river appeared at flood thirty to forty feet below; but mostly it was so murky that we kept on missing the path; our minds, too, were crowded full of gloom, for all that night seemed to us haunted with ghosts and meanings of awe and fear. Some little distance from the burg the river and cliffs had a sudden bend from east to north, thenceforth the cliffs being clad to their foot in fir-forest, and we had gone past this bend, and were going on northward, I holding Langler’s arm, when, at a lighting up of the scene of river and forest, we both stood still in a fright. At one place at the base of the opposite cliffs was a patch of sward some inches above the water, a very lonely little spot, and just there, in the cut of the lightning, our eyes seemed to catch sight of a crucifix. It was about twenty feet below us, perhaps fifty yards beyond us.

What stopped my breath was the fact that that was an uncommon place for one of the wooden crucifixes common in Styria, and that I had never chanced to notice a crucifix just there before, though I knew the cliffs well; but we were still standing uncertain as to what we had actually beheld, when somewhere someone was heard to say: “yes, it is my son Max that you see nailed to that wood.”

The tone was like a woman’s, and not remote, though our eyes could make out no form in the dark; I seemed to find myself with the world of the departed, and while I shrank there from the presence that was with us, I remember hearing in the silence a roaring of waters against the arches of the bridge and the banks of slime below; for the tide was turned, the flood had convened, had teemed, had lasted, and was over now, and the brimming river was streaming back down, as when hosts stream back homeward from some supremeness and ritual, when all’s over now and done, and the mourners stream about the streets.

CHAPTER XXIII

STORY OF DEES

WE HAD NEVER till now even heard of a mother of Dees! so stern a silence must have been imposed by the burg upon the mountain.

“Yes,” said the woman to us, “they watched me and the little Undine in my cottage, dreading that I should bespeak the two foreigners, for I fear neither them nor anything — the world knows it.” We stood now with her within a hütte, or cowshed, which let in the drizzle, and we had lightning glimpses of a Roman face, and black locks, and proud rags, and of a child whom she called Undine hugged in her powerful arms to her bosom.

“Tell us, if you can, about your son,” Langler said to her, “but not if that pains you, for our hearts bleed for you; we tried our best for him, and our best has turned to your utter sorrow, but you will forgive us, if you can, since we meant well.”

“But I do not sorrow!” she cried. “I am only glad and proud! There he hangs nailed up like a bat; dead, sirs; with the wind of where he was born blowing his hair. Is it Max? Is it the lad? It was for this, after all, that you were born that Rosenkranz Sunday night. I said to you, ‘take care, mind your steps, do not always fly on horses of wind,’ but you wouldn’t hear, you wouldn’t heed, and this is what it was to come to. But better this than rotting in the dungeon — a grand death for a grand lad! Yes, he defied them all, the lad! he thought himself the equal of the baron’s self, or of any prince of them. That lad! it is strange, too, where I had the stuff about me to make the lad; his father had nothing in the lad; none knew that lad but me, for a mother knows. He came as a surprise, the lad: he set himself above them all! But now you hang there, Max, for the eagles — —” She was interrupted in this species of raving by someone who, after peering near at us, suddenly cried out: “now, Mother Dees, you know that you should be at home, get you gone from this!” “I defy you all, Hans Richter!” shouted the mother of Dees in answer. “You can do to me nothing worse than has been done to him, and it is that which would be sweet to me.” “Yes, yes, but you know that I have caught you blabbing to the foreigners,” said the man, “come, come—” And at this I, understanding that he had laid hands upon her, landed him a hit on the chest, whereat, without saying more, he took to his heels.

I suspected that he had run to report to the castle what he had seen, so I pressed the woman to talk, and within some minutes we had from her the tale of Dees’ life.

Max Dees was born of peasant parents thirty-two years before, within two miles of Schweinstein burg. From his tenderest years the boy began to notify a genius to whose nimbleness there appeared to be no end: he took to painting and to playing the zither; he would make figures of wood and stone and engines out of fragments of metal; he could cut out and make his mother’s clothes; at the age of eight he vested himself as a bishop, and went preaching at every doorway of Jonah in the whale’s belly and of Lazarus raised out of the grave: everything he managed with ease and mastery. However, he had tempests of passion, a craze for the other sex, and no government over himself.

The fame of his gifts came early to the baron’s ears, and Max was early established a pet in the castle. He was sent to the University of Gratz, where he highly distinguished himself. As in Austria most of the priests are of peasant birth, the baron decided to make of the genius a churchman; and in due course Dees came to be the priest of St Photini's in the castle-court. At that time Baron Kolár was a widower, with one child, the joy of his eye, a little maid of sixteen named Undine.

"But Max strung his chords all too high for the folk," his mother told us; "I said to him: 'do not always fly on horses of wind,' but he would not hear, he would not heed." The head of Dees, in fact, seems to have gone half-mad with churchman's-pride; if anyone was lax in religion he raged, he warned, he launched fines and penances. But no man is a prophet in his own piggery; the alp men kicked against this rigour; and there came a time when St Photini's was left almost empty of worshippers. During all which Max Dees was the tutor of the little Undine.

It was in this state of things, when matters at the church had turned from bad to worse, that a wonder happened: one Sunday night the handful of worshippers in St Photini's beheld a vision hung in mid-air in the nave — a lamb nailed to a cross: a real lamb to a real cross; they marked the dripping blood, there could be no mistake. It chanced that the baron was just then in residence, and present in the church: he, too, saw, and was almost as awed as anyone. Wild was the effect: St Photini's was thereafter the holy of holies, and Max Dees more the lord of the alp than the lord himself.

But this success must have been too much for the arrogant, weak head of Dees. He now dared to let his eye rest on Undine. The baron was often away at the Court in Vienna or elsewhere; often he had his Undine with him; but once for five months he left her at home. He appears to have had a fond confidence in Dees, though all this while he well knew that Dees was an impostor; or perhaps his confidence was in his own coronet and height above Dees, upon whom, moreover, he had lavished so many bounties: for powerful men are but moderately precautions. At any rate, on a certain

Sunday morning when the baron returned to the burg after this term of absence, he returned to learn that his girl had been hurt by Dees. The people of the burg afterwards reported that he took it all very patiently; went down to the church that morning, and, seated in his easy-chair, enjoyed the oratory of Dees, sneering with his teeth at the corpse who preached. Only, before this, he had locked Undine into the chamber, from which she was never to come forth living.

During that same afternoon the baron had a talk with Dees in the burg: and it was rumoured about the mountain that he then made to Dees an offer of the chance of marrying Undine — a marvellous offer on the part of a German nobleman, if it be a fact; but the impudence of Dees was even more marvellous than the father's meekness: the priest demurred to disfrock himself by marriage: he trembled, and said no.

That Sunday night the folk flocked as usual to the church in the castle-court, and the bell ceased to ring, the people waited, but no Max Dees appeared. The hour for the beginning of the office was long past, and the congregation was murmuring, when all eyes were caught by a vision hung in mid-air: but a disgusting one this time — one worthy of Baron Kolár — a pig nailed to a cross, a real pig to a real cross. And while they gaped at it, the head of the baron came up through the trap-door of the vaults; he walked to the pulpit, went up into it. His hands were red with blood. The people declared that in that one day the man's hair had turned grey and his back had bent. And from the pulpit he spoke to them.

He told them that they would never see their friend, the Pater Dees, any more, since he had proved ungrateful to his patron, and had that afternoon been imprisoned in the burg, where he would probably be kept for some years, till the time should be ripe for a still worse thing to come upon him. He, the baron, had been sorry to shock them with the vision of the pig, but he had ordained it so in order to clear their minds completely of the effect of the vision of the lamb which they had seen. That vision of the lamb had been contrived by the mechanical genius of their friend, the Pater Dees. On the Sunday night, a year before, when it had appeared the baron had locked Dees into a room with him for three hours, and had compelled Dees to tell by what means the vision had been produced. Dees had confessed that he had nailed a lamb to a cross in the vaults, and by means of a dark lantern, some limelight, and some plates of glass — a contrivance not new, yet new in its perfection — had thrown, as it were, the ghost of the lamb into the nave of the church. He, the baron, had successfully repeated the same thing with the pig that evening for them to see. He believed now that none of them would ever wish for any more church; if they should, he made them an offer: let any six of them come to him and say so, and he would supply them with a new priest. He would watch with interest to see how they would act. Meantime he hoped that they would continue to be good Christians in their homes; Christianity was the highest sign of man, and could never be destroyed or abolished, but it was an affair of aspiration and conduct, not of dogma: they might take it from him that there was no truth in any one of its dogmas, and for some years he had been casting about for an easy method of destroying the institution which persisted in embarrassing the world with those dogmas. Perhaps their friend, the Pater Dees, had now supplied him with such a method. He would watch and see. But, meantime, they must never repeat to a soul what had passed on the alp or what they heard him say that night; he set up a secret between them and himself, because they were his, and he loved them, and knew that they truly feared and loved him: but if ever anyone should recount or imply aught to outsiders that would incur his displeasure.

So much Langler and I were able to gather from the Mother Dees' gabble. As for the ill-starred Undine, she seems to have died in, or soon after, giving birth to the five-year-old Undine of whom I had lightning glimpses on the breast of the Mother Dees. This child, the granddaughter of a nobleman, was in rags, and had never been seen by Baron Kolár: a fact which chilled me with a sense of the changelessness of this man's resentments.

CHAPTER XXIV

OUR FLIGHT

ANYHOW, IN THIS unforeseen fashion we now had in full the history of the ill-fated Dees, to hear which we had started out for Styria. I now whispered to Langler, “we should be quick”; but he, not perhaps quite understanding my eagerness to be gone, lingered, trying to get the poor woman to come with us, it was such a night, and she within sight of what anon was lit up down on the strip of grass by the river’s brink. Langler offered to adopt the child straightway, but she would not part with it, nor would she come with us, so we had to leave her, leading the van, almost running, so that Langler, who was no runner, panted: “well, no doubt it is as well to make haste.” “Yes,” I answered, “for I sha’n’t be astonished if some attempt be now made to keep us from leaving the alp. That man who ran off has by now taken the news to the castle, where it will be taken for granted that from the Mother Dees we have heard all, and we may not be allowed to get away with so much knowledge in our heads. In my opinion we oughtn’t to go back to the guest-court for your trunk, but hurry straight down to the nearest sennhaus, get horses — —”

“But I have five or six manuscript poems in the trunk, and the Theocritus with all my notes,” panted Langler, trotting after my haste.

“Well, then, we must get the trunk,” said I, “but it is dangerous: I wish to Heaven that we were safe down at Badsögl....”

At that moment — we were now at the castle-back — I saw the light of a lantern, and a second later struck against Herr Tschudi. “Well met, sirs!” he cried at once: “it is just for you that I was going to look, for I have to talk with you; if not in a hurry, perhaps you would favour me by stepping into the castle a moment.” “I am afraid that we are rather in a hurry,” I answered, “for we are wet, and have had nothing to eat; but if to-morrow morning at eleven will do, we shall then be happy to call upon you in the castle.” “That will do just as well,” said he, “but mayn’t you as well step in now?” “Pray excuse us for to-night,” I answered. “Willingly from the heart,” said he, “since that is your wish; but — has not the Mother Dees been telling you about things?” I was about to say “which things?” when Langler said: “perhaps, sir!” “Oh, she has?” broke out Tschudi, “but, you see, you two men have gone a step too far now.” “Come, Aubrey!” I cried out, “we can’t wait!” — and I ran, dragging him by the sleeve, while Tschudi sent after us the shout: “yes, fly, you two! but don’t hope to see your birth-places again....”

On reaching the guest-court breathless, I asked Lossow if the horse had been harnessed for us: he answered that he supposed so, and would see. I then paced our sitting-room for, say, six minutes, expecting him to summon us down, Langler being in his bedroom, crowding some knick-knacks into the trunk. I went in to him, saying that the waggonette must be waiting. “One moment,” said he, and I waited till he locked the trunk. But when we went to go out the door had been fastened on the outside.

We stared at each other’s paleness, then I flew to the window, which was at the side of the house. The night was so deep that I could not see the ground, but I knew that it was no light leap. However, it was our only way out, so Langler slid down by the sheets, which I held for him, below heaped them for me to leap upon without making a hubbub, and I dropped upon my feet: the trap laid for us had failed. We ran on tiptoe, meaning somehow to make our way down the mountain on foot; but when we got to the back the light of the waggonette appeared just coming from the stable, and when the boy spoke to us we perceived that he had not yet been made privy to the plot against us. "We came to meet you, Jan," said I as I leapt in, "for we are in a hurry." "But the trunk, sirs?" said he. "We leave the trunk for to-night," said I: "just turn round now, and drive straight down."

He did so! and we were off down the main road in a flush of escape. I pitied Langler for his lost papers, but there was no help. "Let us only hope," said I, "that we sha'n't reach Badsögl too late to send the telegrams to England to-night."

"Why so particularly to-night?" he asked.

"But is it not certain," I answered, "that the last phase of the plot against the Church must now be about to show itself in the greatest haste? Wasn't it because of the might of the Church that Baron Kolár so feared our meddling in the matter of Dees? And now that he has dared this massacre of a churchman, how shall he escape the Church's vengeance if the Church is to remain mighty one month more? He is about to strike sharply, be sure, for we have forced his hand, and our seconds are precious."

"But shall we do much good?" asked Langler.

"Well, certainly," said I, with a laugh, "it seems late in the day to ask that, Aubrey. Assuredly we shall do good. We, too, indeed, shall have to show that the miracles are none, but, then, we shall also show that they were no machinery of churchmen. In the case of the miracle up here six years ago, which made the little model for Kolár's great scheme, the death of the Church was due to the fact that the miracle was found out to be the doing of the priest; but if we show that on the great scale churchmen have been guiltless of guile no shock of tempest will be let loose, things will decline into their old mood as before the miracles, and the Church will survive.”

“True,” said he; “but is that worth all our pains? an obsolete Church keeping up a look of life....”

“But is it not late in the day, Aubrey,” said I, “to trouble our heads with any such doubts? We decided months ago, before we came, that the Church was worth saving; hence we came. Let’s not disparage our own work. Personally, I assure you, I am not deeply concerned, for I don’t deem myself called upon to be the saviour of anything: but Emily despatched me upon this work, and so I do it with conviction. Moreover, the quicker done the quicker at Swandale.”

“Ah, Swandale,” sighed Langer. “But I confess, Arthur, that I depart from the mountain with some regret: that old burg up there is so cradled in gales, such a spirit-world wears out its winds with well-a-days, and the tarns, the vapours, the wild swans....”

“My own feeling is rather rapture than regret,” I answered; but such was the elegiac soul of Langer, which still discovered something over which to sigh and indulge its chaste melancholies. Meantime, our waggonette was moving at a walk down the benighted mountain-world, our Jan cowering so still over his nag that he might have been asleep; while we others chatted constantly — I at least being elated at our escape, at our task almost over, at home in sight, though I had no hat, the drizzles were trying, the bosom of the mountains gave out a steam of music, as it were thousands and ten thousands busy and breeding, and the organ’s sound-board breathing, and our talk was a forlorn droning in a state of being which was made all of winds and bewitchment; sometimes in a flash we might descry a crucifix hung on a crag, and our sighs would then hanker back to that night-whelmed thing on the river-bank away behind us. Keenly our hearts smote us at this memory of Max Dees. How much harm had our meddling hurled upon that man! how he must have waited and hungered for that “one good file” which never found its way to him; and now he was all in the dark on the river-bank. When I expressed my surprise that it was Tschudi himself who had sent us to see him there, Langler said: “I wonder if Tschudi has been acting to-night on his own initiative? The baron now, at any rate, does not appear to be about the burg, or the troop should have seen him; still, Tschudi may be in wireless communication with him. But Tschudi’s own private motive in sending us to the crucifix seems to have been an impulse of mere spite or rage, and he may have had in his mind that we should never leave the region after seeing.”

“I doubt though that at that time he meant to stop us,” said I: “I think it was only after he knew of our talk with the Mother Dees. Yet it would be odd, too, that they shouldn’t mind our getting away with the knowledge of Dees’ doom, but should be so eager to stop us with the knowledge of Dees’ life-story.”

“But of the two the latter is the more important,” said Langler; “for, as to Dees’ doom, they perhaps calculated that by the time we could report it the Church would be impotent to avenge it; but, as to Dees’ life-story, our knowledge of it is knowledge of the Church-plot, and is of permanent value as proof that churchmen are innocent of fraud in the present miracles; therefore it was urgent to stop us when we had this knowledge, since even years hence our evidence may be of use in restoring churchmen to favour, and in ruining the plot.”

“Ah,” said I, “years hence little would be left of the Church, I think, if we had once been locked into that north-west dungeon. However, here we are, and now for the break-up of the fountains of the great deep. Poor Dr Burton! I wonder where he will be found in all that upheaval? I am afraid for him: the spirit that could pitch from such a moral height to ‘well, pretty, do you love me?’ — —”

“Beastly mess!” hissed Langler to himself: “oh, pray, Arthur, I beg — —”

“As for me,” I said quickly, “the man upon whom I now rather bet is the archbishop’s red rag, Ambrose Rivers” — and we went on chatting about the latest news of Rivers which we had from Swandale. We were still, I remember, discussing Rivers when a jodeling call arose somewhere in our rear, at which our Jan, it seemed to me, sat up to prick his ears. In a minute the call was anew heard, lalling nearer now; and now Jan pulled up short. “Why do you stop?” I cried to him, “don’t stop! get on!” “It is my cousin Isai, sirs,” he answered, “who is running to me with a message, for it is his jodel.” “Still, you are to hurry on instantly,” I cried; “every moment is precious!” But he would not budge, and even as I urged him I heard the panting of a runner near upon us. Our Jan now jumped down; at the horse’s head there was a confab between the cousins, of which all that I could catch was the pantings of Isai; and I sat in a stew of the keenest anxiety. It came into my head to rush and seize the reins and lash the horse; but before I could act the whispering was over, Jan jumped up afresh, and we moved on — at least it never entered my mind to doubt that it was Jan who jumped up, though I now suspect that it was Isai. Anyway, we went on at the old walk, regained some calm of mind, again began to be talkative, and for perhaps twenty minutes now nothing happened, till all at once I was aware of the leap of our driver from the wagon, and a second afterwards the nag broke into galloping. It is my belief that a knife or something keen had been driven into its flesh — nothing less could account for its fury, and the clown had chosen for his deed a piece of the road which was little broader than the vehicle, with precipice on the right, with cliff on the left above us. There was no hope for us but in leaping, and “leap, Aubrey!” I cried as I sprang into the air over the back, with my face to the pace, and fell on my length. Lying there, I seemed to hear a fearful silence; no sound of horse and cart; and, understanding that both had bounded down the steep, I feared to stir, lest I might find that Langler had gone with them. But presently, from some distance down, he called out upon me. I ran asking if he was hurt. “A few bruises perhaps,” he panted in answer, “but I seem to have lost my hat.” This solicitude about his hat I understood to be feigned, for I felt him trembling like a leaf. But such was Langler: he was for ever preoccupied about the soul, and, not calm by nature, wished always to appear to himself immovably calm.

Well, the hat could not be found, and on foot we went on down the pass. But it was not long before we were lost in a wilderness of stone and wood, where no way was. We fell into a state of fear that night both of us, and it imbued our souls for hours. I had never before in my life felt quite like that; I hope never to have to undergo such ghoulis again. But there are things which can hardly be put on paper. Perhaps our experiences of the evening, the nets set for our feet, the steepness of our leap from the cart, that sight on the river-bank behind us — all these may have helped to demoralise us. The word “jumpy” somewhat describes our panic. After a time we ceased to try to hide our chills from each other. What exactly was the matter I can’t quite tell; we had always endeavoured to be brave men, and no particular peril now menaced; but that night our spirits caught affrights one from the other; we both seem to have had the boding that we were about to taste of death; the grave, being, the mountains, grew too hugely gruesome for us, the womb of gloom brought forth awe — somehow we were unhinged. It was Langler perhaps who openly began it. We were resting together on a rock under the fragments of a Carthusian monastery when I heard him murmur in a sort of awed contemplation: “God be merciful...” “Why, what now?” said I. “God be merciful,” he murmured again, “I have seen the wraith of Emily.” This was so unlike him! My blood ran cold. “Where?” I whispered. For a minute he made no answer, then with the same entranced awe he murmured: “there — to the left of the arch, between the two trees: do you see nothing?” The hairs of my head bristled as, peering that way, I murmured: “yes, it is she.” “Our breath is in His hand,” sighed Langler, with a held-up hand.

For me to say now, after so long, that I did, or could, see any such thing would be too much beyond reason; most likely I saw nothing: there was little light in the night; I think that there was no lightning at the time; but we were on that stretch of the spirit when spectres start up, and are catching: at the moment I could have sworn that I saw. It may have been the form of the boy Isai, who had perhaps followed us, it may have been Miss Emily’s wraith, or a phantom of our brains; in any case, we underwent such troubles and shyings of the soul that night as could not be told, lasting more or less upon us almost till we got to Badsögl about daybreak, so worn out that we at once dropped upon our beds, and slept.

CHAPTER XXV

END OF LANGLER

I OPENED MY eyes about mid-day quite quit of our night of griefs, with the word “safe” on my lips, for down there at Badsögl in bright daylight all looked rosy at last, and I was already inclined to doubt the bogies of the dark. Eager to start for England, I woke Langler, wired to Swandale, warned our Hanska to be ready. We breakfasted, and now nothing remained but to send the telegrams and set out.

We had determined to send two telegrams — one to Percival of Keble, the other to my friend, Mr Martin Bentley, of The Chronicle. In that morning’s paper was no word yet of any exposure, the only big news being that overnight in England Education had been again sent up to the Lords; so under the corn-sheaf in the porch I, at Langler’s request, wrote the two telegrams, telling of the little alp-miracle, of the world-plot, of the coming vials: and I handed it to Langler to read.

To my astonishment, Langler’s face showed fastidious, and he said: “Percival will think me sudden and epic, Arthur.”

“Perhaps,” I answered shortly, for he seemed not to mind that Mr Martin Bentley would think me sudden and epic.

“Couldn’t we arrange somehow,” said he, “to spread abroad our knowledge without having our names mixed up in it? I hate this glare —
—”

“But the sudden proposition, Aubrey, at this eleventh hour,” said I: “how can this possibly be done?”

“I have thought,” said he, “of a meeting of journalists in London, to whom we could tell everything viva voce, since that, I think, would be more in order.”

“For Heaven’s sake, Aubrey,” I exclaimed, “let us get this thing off our backs now, and be done with it!”

“But I have thought,” said he, “that if we retard the news even a day or two that might be a great thing for the Church as against the Education Bill.” (He disliked the bill for some reason — called it “smart.”)

“But what have we to do with the fate of the Education Bill?” said I, for what I wanted was to see his sister’s face: “surely we can’t gyve and entangle ourselves with such side-motives now! See, here is the boy waiting to take the telegrams; pray let us send them.”

“Is that your deliberate judgment?” he asked.

“It is, yes,” said I.

“Then,” said he, “I submit to it: send the telegrams.”

But he said it just too late, and the telegrams were never sent, for at that moment a letter-carrier came into the porch with a telegram for us which I saw shake in Langer’s hand as he read it; it came from Paris, bore no signature, and was in the words: “If you send any telegrams you sacrifice Miss Langer.”

We ought now to have decided upon our action in one minute, but were two hours in the dining-room, where we went to discuss it. “What we have to do,” I said from the first, “is to send instantly a telegram to Emily ordering her to fly and hide herself, as she did before, till we come; then send the two telegrams to Percival and Bentley, just as we intended.”

“Ah, it would shock her, such a telegram,” said Langer.

“We needn’t send it, really,” said I; “I only propose it so as to be quite on the safe side, for this message of Baron Kolár’s is just a threat, a last card to keep us from acting; if we defy it, and send the two telegrams, he will have no motive whatever to hurt Emily — except a wanton revenge, of which the man is incapable. I believe that Emily is quite safe, really. Let us boldly send the two telegrams, whether we send one to Emily or not.”

“Oh, I couldn’t,” he murmured, flinching, pacing the floor, sorely pestered now. Of Baron Kolár as regards his sister he had a blue awe and shiver, like a man who when a child has been frightened with bogies. It is obvious that my view of the matter was the rational one, but he flinched irrationally, he had a blue fear of what Kolár might just possibly be minded to do to Miss Emily. On the other hand, his pride rebelled against the baron, for when I said: “don’t send the telegrams, then, but let us start at once,” his answer was: “but who is this man that I should in all things obey him blindly? He may find me of grimmer make than he thinks!”

“But it must be one thing or the other, Aubrey,” said I. “Send the telegrams or not as you please, but, either way, do let us be gone at once. My telegram to Emily this morning assured her that she should see us on Friday morning; if we don’t start now we can’t reach London till Friday night, and she will thus be thrown into a fresh stew of misery. The one fatal thing for us is indecision.”

He stood at a window, looking out upon the garden, and after some time said: “well, I won’t send the telegrams: let us start, and in passing through London we can divulge all to the meeting of journalists, secretly called, then at once hurry on to Swandale.”

“Very good,” said I, “the car is ready; let us start this moment.”

“But what a mess!” he hissed, turning upon me: “I warn you, Arthur, that it is even mean, it is even craven. Am I, then, the bondman of this person?”

“Still, let us start, Aubrey! let us start!” cried I, with a pang of panic in me.

“We are about to start,” said he. “But consider whether this meeting of journalists in London will not mean delay: suppose the man gets wind of it, and, even while we are about it, perpetrates some horror at Swandale....”

“He will have no motive!” I cried.

“Ah, he may have, he may. Would it not be better to send the telegrams, only warning Percival and Mr Bentley not to make them public for some days? In that way we act as we originally intended, our purposes will not have been influenced by this man’s mandates, and at the same time he will not know that we have defied him.”

“Well, then, let us do so, and quickly,” said I.

“But that, after all, is mere self-cheating,” he sighed: “if the telegrams are not to be made public at once, why send telegrams? Why not wait and write letters, which, moreover, would be less sudden and assaulting? No, Arthur, if we are to obey the mandates of the man let us not do so in such a way as to persuade ourselves that we have not done so.”

“But all this subtlety, Aubrey, when we should be stirring!” said I: “come, shall we not decide one way or the other, and start now?”

“But are we to start without knowing what we are about?” he cried. “What a mess! Is it possible that you cannot help me a little to see my way?”

“What more can I say?” I asked: “I have begged you to send the telegrams, but, since you are timid about Emily, do not send them; there remains the meeting of journalists in London; or thirdly, we can write letters from Swandale. Only, let us start. I see clearly that all danger to Emily is past; the really terrible danger now is to ourselves up to the moment when we shall have communicated to someone else this knowledge that we carry in our heads; and, indirectly, there is a danger to Emily if our return is delayed, for it will monstrously shock her, I warn you, Aubrey: let us start.”

“Yes, do, do let us start,” he muttered: “I shall send the telegrams; in which case, do you still advise me to send one to Emily bidding her fly from Swandale?”

I looked at the clock, saying, “no, not now, too late: for if Baron Kolár really meant her any harm, by this time he has made his arrangements to accomplish it; she wouldn’t escape him. But he means her no harm, and such a telegram would only throw her into needless alarms.”

“Well, but I couldn’t venture to send the telegrams to Percival and Mr Bentley without also sending one to her,” he answered.

“Ah, then, here is another deadlock,” said I.

“Oh, Arthur,” he cried out, “how we do need some faculty between scent and sight to live!”

“But if you would let me decide for you — if you could, if you would!” I wooed to him.

“Do so, do so, I beg for nothing better,” he answered with his bitter-sweet smile.

And again I decided for him, but again he raised new side-issues, and it went on until near three, when we at last departed, after wiring to Swandale that we should not arrive on Friday morning, as promised, but on Friday evening between nine and eleven. As for the two telegrams, they had not gone, for our world-message was to be shuffled off our shoulders at the meeting of journalists.

Away, then, we flew westward. A whine was now in the time of year even in the lowlands, and the worm of winter at its work in the woods. I saw bands of telegraph-wires like bars of written music, crowded with birds migrating, and thought how a messenger-wren, too, may be, had once halted to rest on this band or on that; I saw cliffs of forest reflected red, yellow, and negro in rivers, like old tapestry, angular and faded; and that evening I saw such a sunset as I think that I have never seen, save on the three following evenings, perfectly astonishing, like portents. At dinner-time we arrived at Munich, where a telegram from Swandale awaited us, and as she could hardly have been certain at which hotel we should stay, we understood that she must have sent many telegrams on the chance of striking us somewhere. Why the delay from Friday morning to Friday night, she wished to know! Were we actually now on the way? Would we telegraph her at every town? She had been greatly upset, but was reconciled now to the delay, provided we were actually now at last on the way — a long message. We wired that we were straining homeward, and at Stuttgart that midnight met yet a message from her that seemed to laugh through tears, not without something of the rictus of hysteria, I am afraid, with its “joy!” and its “bless God!” and its “poor Kitty-wren is ill; she will sink more and more as you come nearer, and the moment you re-enter Swandale gate will drop dead.” We had to stop some time at Stuttgart, but sleep was far from me, such a pity bled in me, such a fear was mine; then under the stars we started out afresh behind our flying Hanska, who had gained from Langler the biblical name of “the terror, the arrow, and — the pestilence.”

On the Thursday evening we were at Metz, where fresh messages passed between us and Swandale; at Metz also we arranged for the meeting of journalists, first wiring to Langler’s friend, the Rev. Thomas Grimes, who in his reply placed at our disposal a room in the Church-house, Great Titchfield Street; we then sent messages to eight journalists whom I knew, begging them to be at the Church-house at eight on the Friday night, and to bring with them any other journalists whom they chose, to hear a matter of high moment: we hoped that we might thus have a meeting of perhaps a hundred men, who would instantly flood the world with the news.

We then afresh set off, straining to catch the next day's 5.35 p.m. boat. I am fond of the memory of that ride, for with it ended most of my merriment in this life; the air was crisp and bright, the flight filled our breasts, and raised our spirits. That evening on leaving Metz we looked with something like awe and joy at the sunset, which was most flamboyant, and likened by Langler to God's war-lords mingled in battle. There burned in it a form that had an urn in her hand, which he pointed me out, and with much feeling said to me: "to me, too, this earth is dear, Arthur. It is easy to conceive a world with ruby mountains and coloured moons, where all the lads are forever blowing the oboe and ring-doves roll their soft rondeaus; but give me this hand-made old home of ours, with her quite Greek trimness of style; for it is something after all not to have been turned out by a God in a troubadour mood, and out of her strength comes forth sweetness, too, anon, — consolations and vouchsafements, winning twangs, and Memnon-vowels. Farther in the future this music of our Father will discourse perhaps, and mourn, Arthur, to a humanity that will have outlived this outer ear, and hoarded up an inward hearing and harmony."

Moved by some throe of love, I laid my hand on his arm then, as the sunset faded, murmuring to him "Aubrey, always full of grace and truth" — I cannot tell why; it was my last caress; I did it to his burying; and God knew, but not I. The same night we rushed through Charleville, and by 5.10 the next evening were in Calais.

CHAPTER XXVI

END OF LANGLER — continued

WE CROSSED OVER to Dover, where a man came on board the boat, calling abroad: “Langler! Langler!” with a wire for us from Swandale: she wished to know if we had actually reached England, and also why it was that, arriving at Dover at 6.15, we should not arrive at Swandale till ten! — for we had mentioned to her nothing of the meeting of journalists in Great Titchfield Street. She begged us to telegraph the instant we touched British soil, and again when we should reach Victoria.

Langler telegraphed that we were safe at Dover, that all was, and would be, well, praying her to be patient, promising to be with her at ten — but still not mentioning the meeting of journalists, though I entreated him to.

We then set off by rail-train for London, and still there was no mention of any exposure of the miracles, as I saw on looking through the evening paper in the train.

“I suspect,” said Langer to me, “that the delay in the exposure may be accounted for by this Education Bill turmoil, for as the Lords have now again mangled the bill, and the clash between Church and world has now waxed into acuteness, the plotters may be waiting a little till this reach its highest fever, when they will strike. Remember how it was with Diseased Persons. But this time we should be able to counteract at least half the force of their stroke.”

“In any case, I think that the Education Bill will triumph,” said I.

“Well,” said he, “let that be as it will: why do we so heave and rave in all the batrachomumachia, leaving our poor souls behind, as though life were a flight on motor-cars, with the nitrogen all drained out of the air? The earth does not march by petroleum with puffs, but by the charm of an old spell-word; and that sunset, Arthur — look at it: ah, for one bath of that large, warm calm.”

“Extraordinary thing,” said I, “there must be some atmospheric disturbance somewhere; it seems even more glorious than yesterday’s.”

“It may be the assembled good-bye of all the prophets and apostles to their old Church,” said he: “that shape afaint above yonder in white is Elijah translated far with robes aflaut, and that charmed to rose is St Paul caught up in trance to the third heaven.”

He was talkative, full of sparkle and fancy, even playful, that evening; but all our talk in the train was interrupted by a debate between two men about the eternity of hell-fire, which they maintained to the moment of our alighting at Victoria. It was then night, with only twenty minutes left us in which to get to Great Titchfield Street by eight o’clock, but we first made our way to the telegraph-office, where yet a message from Swandale awaited us, this time our friend writing in the words: “Yours from Dover to hand; you are in England, so all’s well, I await now with quietness. Poor Kitty-wren drooped visibly at moment when you must have touched Dover. I pity her a little. She can’t last. Am quite at rest now, waiting upon God’s good will. Carriage will await you at Alresford at 9.52 without fail. Wire me from Victoria.” We sent her a message, I left my chest at the station, and we hastened away.

It was drizzling slightly, the night dreary, the yard crowded with people and things darting to and fro, and I was struck with a feeling of how intensely even within the past few years, the pace of everything had quicken. But only two cars came to bid for our fare. I fancy now that this seemed queer to me at the moment, but being rather late for the meeting of journalists, elated at our nearness to Swandale, I paid no heed to it, and we leapt into one of the cars, I calling to the man: "the Church-house, Great Titchfield Street."

We sped off, but had not proceeded far when we fell in with a procession with banners, at which our car had to pull up. All down Victoria Street it teemed, blocking the world's business, some regions of it chanting ave, maris stella. I was very teased, for by this means we must have lost five minutes, having just collided with the Friday in the octave of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin. Our driver, a lank man with a stoop, deliberately turned, in crossing himself, as if for us to see — so it looked to me, then off afresh we started behind the last of the procession. London was in high animation, in spite of the wet, and I was admiring the flaming advertisements, the tempest of life, when Langer said: "London is still not a great city, no, it lacks the tone, it is a group of parishes. Look at that newspaper-placard occupied with 'Buggins Captured.' Who is Buggins? Some mean misdoer, I suppose. And that other: 'Buggins' Love-letters to Peggy Jinks.' You can't conceive that in Paris: it is not world-news; my Athenians of Paris would slightly shrug at such parish pragmatism; no, London is not a great city...." and as he spoke, I saw "Great Titchfield Street" at a street corner, and into it we dashed.

But we had not gone far down it when our man careered into a by-street to the right; whereat I started up to him, calling out: "but where are you going? you have left Great Titchfield Street." "Yes, sir," was his answer, "they have just taken up the street down yonder, so we have to go round." I, for my part, had no idea whereabouts in Great Titchfield Street the Church-house was, nor any grounds to fancy that the man's words might be false, and after he had raced with us through a maze of Soho back-streets, through so many that I lost track of where we were, when he halted at the door of a house, unhandsome and dark though it was, I did not doubt that I was in Titchfield Street, and at the Church-house.

When we went to the door a man inside said “this way, gentlemen,” to us, whereat we stepped into a passage, and not a thought of wrong crossed my mind until I found myself on the ground, while a crowd of men searched my pockets — to see if I had any pistol, I imagine. Langler was in a like way. I struggled, of course, but quickly gave in; and presently we were permitted to get up, and were taken up through darkness to a room on the second floor.

This room was quite small, not more than fifteen feet long and fifteen broad, in a corner of the house, without any window, and like a room within a room, for two of its sides were made of boarding, which may have been run up for the special purpose of imprisoning us — I cannot tell. The floor was bare, the furniture was one chair and a bedstead placed under one of the two boardings — a cheap little bedstead without a bed, but with a pillow without a pillow-slip. On one of the walls burned an antique electric jet very palely.

All was silent. For it might be ten minutes Langler and I fronted each other’s gaze, the notion or dream, meantime, in my own heart being that our door did not seem over strong, that a dart downward might well deliver us. All, I say, was silent. I drove my shoulder at the door, and my heart hailed Heaven with thanks when I found it frail, so heaving now my all into the strain, I heard the steel give out sounds, felt the beams bound. But the staple would not quite start, though again I dashed myself into it, and again and again and again, with passion. Then I panted out upon Langler, “help, Aubrey, help....”

“Oh, Arthur,” was his answer, “are we to strive and cry?”

“Never mind ... help ... help....” I panted.

“I implore you to be calm,” said Langler.

Sure that his help would force the door, I now flew from it in a passion to my knees before him, with my arms spread out beseechingly to him, crying out to him, “for Christ’s sake, help me, help me....”

“Well, since you so insist,” said he, “but it seems useless, too, and is it not better....”

“Never mind, help,” I panted.

I think that he would now have helped, but as he was now about to say something else the key turned outside, and Baron Kolár came in, equal to three men. As he locked the door again, I sprang up from my knees, and we both faced him. He had on the old shabby satin jacket, his hat hung over his eyes, looking earnest and abstracted, like a man carrying on his back matters of large mass and amplitude, in his hand a bit of paper.

CHAPTER XXVII

END OF LANGLER — continued

“WELL, NOW, YOU see,” said the man.

We made no answer, and Baron Kolár began to pace the room.

“You have been most insolent and foolish, you two men,” said he: “I have lavished warnings upon you in vain, and I shall have you shot within five minutes like two dogs, without compunction, I assure you, unless you do now as I direct you.”

“But don’t be angry,” said I, “since we have meant well, and are quite likely to do as you direct us.”

“You have been most insolent and foolish,” he repeated with invective; “you have hampered me, badgered me, invaded my estate, forced my hand, placed me in the greatest personal danger, threatened the success of my life-work. You are a nuisance and a danger, and should be removed.... Tell me now how you came to know that there was a prisoner in Schweinstein Castle.”

“The prisoner sent out a messenger-bird,” said I, “which came to Mr Langer’s estate.”

“Oh, that was it, yes, that was it.... Well, that was no fault of yours. You have no doubt acted like honourable men. But I hate you for having molested me. You made a great mistake to listen to the woman who gave you the story of the Styrian priest’s life — for I take it that you did hear it of her?”

“Some of it,” said I.

“Or rather — all of it,” suggested Langler.

“Well, you made a mistake,” said Baron Kolár. “However, I have a confirmed confidence in your honour: sign me, therefore, this paper, promising not to divulge to a soul during ten years, or till my death, anything that you have learned on the alp, and you shall be free men. To-night several of the bodies that were crucified are to be disinterred, including that of your groom, Charles Robinson; to-morrow morning the world will learn that the miracles were the work of priests; and, as I do not wish you to be out in the crisis of the excitement, I shall have you here till to-morrow afternoon; after that you may go, yes, you may go. I understand that I risk something in trusting you; it is a disloyalty to my comrades; but I am a reader of men — though I have sometimes been wrong, too, I have not always been right: you, however, are not men who would wound the hand that has given you life. Sign me that paper, as a formality between us.”

“Willingly,” said I, for what I wished to look on was the face of Miss Langler, and gave little heed to aught else, so, without even reading the thing, I knelt flurriedly by the chair, and had it signed and finished with.

It was now for Langler to sign.

“Now, Mr Langler,” said Baron Kolár, when Langler made no movement to sign.

“No, Baron Kolár,” answered Langler, “no,” with his eyes cast down.

“What! You do not sign?”

“No, Baron Kolár, no,” he repeated.

“Then woe to you, sir,” said the Baron, measuring him from head to foot.

“Well, then, woe to me,” said Langler.

Ah, he was pallid now, with a mulishness of mien which I knew with panic; whereat I at his secret ear breathed in my anguish: “but Emily, Aubrey, fair's fair, loyalty to Emily first, this is too much, you know, Aubrey, Emily first — —”

“No, second,” he said, with a stiff neck.

“As if duty and God had anything to do with it!” I groaned panic-stricken: “martyrs are martyrs, and die for what they cherish, but to die for a Church which you always call obsolete, for which you care nothing really, except by some trick of culture, it would be too monstrously pitiful, for God's sake, only this once — —”

“But what is the matter with Mr Langer?” said Baron Kolár: “my time is short.”

“But by what right do you even dream of daring to shed anyone's blood?” asked Langer, turning upon the baron.

“Know that I have this right, Mr Langer,” answered the baron sternly: “men like me, whose heads are clear, and whose motives are righteous, have such divine rights.”

“One readily admits the righteousness of your motives,” said Langer, “but the clearness of your head is less certain, if I may say so. We all intend to do good, Baron Kolár, but to do it is an intricate trick, only given to critics. You seem in your scheming to have quite forgotten the moral reaction which must follow upon the sudden death of faith, and upon the disclosure that the men who try to remind the world of God are a gang of misdoers. Is it nothing to you that to-morrow every wanton impulse of men's hearts will lift its head, the restraints of ages once swept away? Your motives are good: why should you not give up this scheme even now, and I, on my side, should be able to vow myself to silence?”

At this Baron Kolár, looking down upon him, answered: “you speak, sir, very like a child; you are a man with a mind made up chiefly of theories acquired in your study, or acquired from other prigs and theorists who are foreigners to the agoras of men. Is not this scheme of mine modelled on the incident of the alp? But in that case no ‘wanton impulses’ lifted their head — —”

“Ah, I think so,” said Langler.

“But you annoy me, Mr Langler,” said the baron. “Understand that on the final death of ‘faith’ to-morrow the people will remain precisely where they stood before the miracles, when ‘faith’ was already dead, and this because they are moral by habit and heredity. Wasn’t this just the work in evolution which God designed ‘faith’ to do — to make men moral by heredity? for they would hardly, I think, have become so without the goad of ‘hell,’ and so on. Descartes, a theorist like you, was assured that God cannot be a deceiver; but God does nothing but deceive for His creatures’ good, and, housed in His motley, the zebra-herd browses hidden and grey in the grey of the morning. At first two hells were needed; but by the date of the Reformation purgatory could be dispensed with in the highest nations; by the date of the abolition of hanging for sheep-stealing men could do without any hell at all. The Church was thus an excellent crutch, which humanity is now able to hurl away and burn; for men, thanks to her, are now as hardened in good conduct as they were once naturally heinous, and crime would now be quite irksome to the host of them, as swimming is to a frog that was lately a swimming tadpole. But do not trouble your head about any such questions at all: just sign me that paper now.”

“I regret that I do not quite see with you, Baron Kolár,” answered Langler stiffly, with downcast eyes, while I, wooing at his ear, whispered, “ah, but Emily, Aubrey, you forget!”

“But will he not sign?” asked the baron.

“No, sir,” said Langler.

Baron Kolár groaned.

“It seems a pity, Mr Langer,” he said, “that you are quite so gallant a man. Nature, after all, is a cannibal tigress that devours her fairest offspring....” saying which, he now reached aside, and pressed an electric button.

It was now that I cast myself down at the man’s feet, grasping him so that he could not escape me, gasping to him: “but you cannot hurt him, cannot touch him, she will go crazy, is not strong, it is your fault, you should not have done to her what you twice did; she is expecting him tonight, never hoped in her heart to see him again, but we made her hope against hope, and now that he is almost at home — see, these are her telegrams, read them, mad with haste, and it is useless to plead with him, he is infected with some moral crotchet, but you will find a way for us, I cast myself upon your mighty heart like a child, not for myself, nor for him, but for her, whom you have so horribly wronged ...” and, as I so pleaded, the man’s hand lifted, and was about to come upon me: was it a half-blow? a half-caress? I am not even now sure; but when, just then, someone rapped at the door in answer to his summons, he called out in Italian, “never mind, I will ring again when I want you”; and to me he said: “give me the telegrams.”

His demand for them surprised me. I handed them to him in a mass as I had snapped them out of my pocket, whereupon he took out his spectacles, wiped them, adjusted them upon his nose, and holding the telegrams away from his eyes close to the grimy light, perused them patiently, while I waited with legs that could hardly any more uphold my weight. One by one he let the leaves of paper fall down, having read them, and read the next; but the last two he tossed away without reading, and turned off to pace the floor.

I waited shivering while four or five times he paced, poring upon him, and once I saw his brow lift largely, his eyes wander round the roof, and heard him breathe to himself the words: “death death.” Of what he was thinking I was not then aware, and I waited, shaking, my eyes nailed to his face. When he next spoke it was with sudden vexation, saying: “ridiculous beings! I foresaw that you would come to grief, I lavished warnings upon you, I ought to see you shot like two dogs. How do you dare to say now that Miss Langler’s frailty is any fault of mine, when it is wholly your own? I was devoting myself to the welfare of men, seeing clearly, knowing clearly, what I did, for as the heavens are high above the earth, just so, I suppose, are my thoughts larger than your thoughts, and you dared to meddle with me. I ought to see you shot now like two dogs, I assure you. Why should I take my useful life down into the darkness of death in order to save pedants like you, or to spare a woman’s feelings?”

“Your life?” I breathed; “the darkness of death? There is no such question!”

“But you speak very like a child,” said he: “is it not clear to you that either Mr Langler or I must throw up the cards now, since he will not give his word to be silent? The crucifixion of the priest which you witnessed by the riverside in the mountain would be called a murder by the world, so undoubtedly will the miracle-crucifixions. It is true that I am rather above being punished by the law for them, but my name would be quite blighted, and my life nothing worth to me. I have neither wife nor child.... I must only sacrifice it, since you insist that I have already enough wounded Miss Langler — unless Mr Langler will sign me that paper this instant.”

“Oh, sign,” I whispered, edging nearer to Langler, but he stood white, inflexible. “There is no occasion for anyone to die,” he said, with lowered lids: “let Baron Kolár be silent as to the miracles being none, and I, too, will be silent; but if they be bruited abroad as the work of churchmen, then, I shall not fail, if I have life and liberty, to declare that, on the contrary, they are the work of Baron Kolár.”

“But how am I to be silent?” asked the baron: “does Mr Langler imagine that I am alone in this scheme? This night three thousand gentlemen, earnest fellows, large fellows, are in the act of carrying their task to its end, nor should I dream of spoiling their work by sparing your life if I thought that one man’s voice could seriously spoil it; but your voice will effect little, Mr Templeton will not support it, it will be lost in the vast uproar, and will only be of avail to cast a blight upon my own private name: to save my life, then, which I have a thought of laying down for your wounded sister’s sake, vouchsafe to sign me that paper this instant.”

“Such a thought is most admirable, Baron Kolár, and would be quite surprising, if it were not you who had it,” said Langler; “but, after all, the claims upon us of gratitude and affection are not the greatest. I pray you, then, not again to ask me to sign the paper.”

To this Baron Kolár said nothing in reply, but picked up the paper signed by me, put it into his pocket, and paced about, frowning; till on a sudden his brow cleared, he said: “oh, well,” and he sat himself down on the bedstead laths. There he took out of his pocket a bag of grapes, and, stooping forward, began to feed upon them, with quite a working of the mouth and a sputtering of seeds. While thus busy, and given up to this guttling, he kept looking up with wandering eyes, and he mumbled mainly to himself, saying: “they are grapes of Egripos; very sweet they are, too, very nice, not bad, and whenever I die, if I be opened, some of them will be found in me. These few here may be my last feast, hence I do not offer you any. But I do not fancy so, oh no, you will see. It is astonishing what influences personality has upon events: from my boyhood, if by chance I bet on a racehorse, it always won, strange thing, it always won. Once, when a youth, I fought a duel with the famous swordsman, Paulus, and, though no hand at the rapier myself, I somehow came out grandly, I got in such a slash, yes, such a slash, right in his cheek — very nice. I have always come nicely through everything. Archbishop Burton, now: two hours ago he called me a scoundrel, and lifted a chair to strike me; but the moment he lifted it he dropped in a fit, and has since died. I seem to be immune from such maniacs, I assure you. On the sixth of June five years ago a fellow named Vesgolecza threw a bomb at me in Vienna; but it killed my political enemy, Count Attem, and I procured the fellow's pardon. No, I was not born for the martyr's crown, I own the badge and trick of escape. It is a question of organisation and secret league with the soul of the world. Look at me, I am sound throughout, a little trouble with the stomach after food sometimes, a little flatulence, nothing much, a little trouble. But Mr Langler, now: you are one of those men who are tricked out with every jewel, except just the pearl of great price, effectualness, favouritism with high God; such men are the scapegoats of progress; history is based on their pains and groans; to the bane in their fate there grows no bezoar. If you perish to-night, do not imagine that I shall grieve for you; you are a man whom I might have loved, but I lavished warnings upon you in vain, and I am such that even in death my gall cannot quite forgive a personal insolence; but I shall realise that your fate is over-sad, and I shall grieve for your graceful sister, who has not offended me, but to whom I was forced to be ungallant. Therefore I am about to give you one last great chance of life, though you will not rise to the luck of it, you will be failing, I think.... But let me not brag too soon. As you see, it must be either you or I to whom this bedstead within one hour will turn out to be the death-bed. Death is dark and monstrous, yes, death is dark. The artful old brain all at once ceases to discern, the old heart no longer brawls, all becomes nothing. But some humour of the soul has brought me to risk it, and, even if I should not manage to get through, what, after all, is the death of a man? Nothing more to God than the jaundice and death of a leaf. I notice that Fitzroy Square out there is covered just now with dead leaves: no one heeds them, no, no one heeds them.... Well, now, we shall see.”

He sprang up, sputtering his last seeds, wiping his hands, saying: “I shall be back in three minutes,” and went out. Some seconds later I was standing with my forehead on my arm against the wall when I heard behind me some heavy pantings, and, glancing round, beheld Langler staggering, with his hand held over his heart. I was only just in time to catch him. “One moment,” he sighed, “my heart....” He looked ghastly. But when I had got him to the chair and fanned him with my handkerchief he presently opened his eyes. “My heart, God knows,” he began to say, when the key was again heard in the lock, whereat he got up hastily, buttoning his dress again, as Baron Kolár came in.

The baron first placed the key of the door and a piece of paper on the chair, saying: “here is the key and a permit for you to go out of the house, in case of my death, gentlemen”; then, pouring two pills from a big blue pill-box into his palm, he held them out to Langler, saying: “now, sir, if you take one of these I will take the other.”

“But why so?” I heard Langler ask; and I heard Baron Kolár answer: “one is a poison, the other is harmless; choose one, sir, and I will have the other.”

“But if I chance to choose the harmless one,” Langler next said, “I become the cause of the death of a most magnanimous man, Baron Kolár.”

“Of a most rash and foolhardy man, sir,” was Baron Kolár’s answer; “but choose quickly, I charge you, sir.”

“But, baron — —” I heard Langler say.

“Do not delay! or I dash the cursed pills to the ground!” I now heard Baron Kolár cry out: “your chance to serve your sister and madman Church vanishes in two ticks of my watch!”

“Well, then, since you put it in that way, baron ... well, then, baron....” I heard Langler say, but what next went on I did not witness, for my face all this while was pressed against the wall. Indeed, I was sick, with a most mortal taste in my mouth, and there at the wall I waited in what seemed to me a month of stillness, until there reached me a sound of moaning which I understood to come from Baron Kolár. I dared then, for the first time, to turn and look at them. Langler was standing with his back against the wall, white, but smiling; Baron Kolár was sitting on the bedstead, holding his head with both his hands, his eye wandering wildly. When he caught my eye he said to me: “it is I who have swallowed the poison-pill, yes, it is I.” And when I now moved to stand at his side he turned up at me a most haggard jowl, an all-gone gaze, his eyes hanging languishingly upon mine. On a sudden he started, saying with new alarm: “It is I who have taken the poison!” Then afresh he rocked himself from side to side, moving his palm to and fro along the length of his thigh, full of sighs and retchings and moans. I was crouched on my knees before his anguish, I sobbed aloud to him: “great, fatherly heart!” “Stay!” he said, with a new brusqueness, “I feel the stiffness coming on in the neck, I had better get up: it is brucine,” and he now raised himself by my help, and stepped about, upheld on my shoulder, during which, “yes,” he said to me in confidence, “I have gone a step too far, I have tempted God, and He has abandoned me”; and again he moaned, “it is brucine,” pressing his reins ruefully, with groans. “But can I do nothing?” I cried to him, “let me do something for you!” To this he made no answer, but said to me: “I never thought to fail; I have always managed to come out prettily through everything, but now I perish miserably for a mere whim of my bile, a moment's noble wind, it is all your own doing, Gregor, you reap what you have sown. Recount to Miss Langler how a man like me died for her, tell the Misses Chambers and all your friends how I perished, let all their hearts pity me and bleed...." It was while he was saying this that I first noticed Langler, who now stepped out from the wall toward us, trying to smile, saying to Kolár, "no, baron, do not dismay yourself with such fancies, you have already over-much worked out ..." but his speech was broken short by a jerk of the neck, his mouth was drawn, he had an aspect of terror: death was in the face of my friend. Baron Kolár, staring at him, seemed to start from a dream, and like a man dropped aghast but glad from the gallows-rope the man's lips unwreathed in a kind of rictus, as he said with an opening of the arms: "well, I told you how it would be," whereupon at once he now turned in flight from the sight of Langler's face, but turned again to whisper to me, "you can go into another room or be here, just as you wish," and after waiting an instant for my answer, when I only gaped at him, he fled away.

I sat by the bedstead, upon which Langler had fallen, and must have remained there on the floor, I imagine, till five or six p.m. the next evening. Baron Kolár's prophecy that the bedstead would become a death-bed within one hour did not come true, for it must have been two, perhaps three, hours before Langler was freed from his anguish, though I am not sure, for after half-an-hour or so the light for some cause died out, and the darkness may have stifled out my consciousness of time. I think, however, that he lived three hours. The poison given him may have been over-little, or over-much, or poor in poignancy, so that at some times it was difficult to believe that he could be really dying; there were such intervals as that in which he repeated most of the Homeric hymn to Apollo, then there were spasms on spasms, and presently again his mind gave signs of wandering. All was in rayless darkness — it was well so. Thrice he cried to me: “Oh, that we knew where once more we might find Him, Arthur!” “We are like babes that are being weaned,” he said, “but nothing is offered us in place of the Breast that has been withdrawn, we bawl in the dark....” After this he lay without saying anything for some time, until he said again: “yes, now in the hour of my voyage it is Jesus who to me is the most eminent, the best-beloved. Blessed name, blessed name. How abounding in beguilement are all his words, like lovers’ sidelong glances, and honey of Hybla to the tongue! ‘Consider the lilies of the field, even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these’ — surely, Arthur, the most literary words ever used — except in a quite literal sense — if you accept my definition of literature as ‘chastity a-burn.’ I know of nothing quite to match them for that demure rich indirectness which is the essence of literature, except perhaps ‘[Greek: asteras eisathreis],’ and the ‘path which no fowl knoweth.’ How staid the statement, how rosy the aroma; how little is said, how much is felt and meant and suggested: for the puny men dissect and depict, the huge men sum up and suggest. And that big-mouthed ‘swear not by Heaven’ — you can’t match me that God for downright bulk, the earth His footstool, His buttocks throned broad over the stars, His head up in the room beyond, huge Egyptian shadow — Oh, I must....” Upon this my friend was held up by one of the fits, in which he stretched like an arch on his head and feet; but there was no bed, his legs slipped between the laths, causing them to vibrate and jangle; I could not see, it was very well so. But in the interims he was easy enough, without much suffering, I think, and now he was unconscious of me, and maundered with a wandering mind, showing still his ruling passion, criticising still, arguing still of literature, till his passing. “Surely the light is good,” says he, “and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun,” being all gone by that time, I believe, and all gone, too, when he breathed to himself: “oh, a rough God! In what velocities does He mix and revel! The encounter of dark suns — how He slackens bridle and urges them like chargers, faster, faster, with laughter in His beard, and afterwards muses upon the silence of their tragedy when a new star psalms in the sky at night, and the star-masters watch it with awe.” This was among his final utterances, and afterwards I had for some time a sense of being alone in the dark there without him; but then I heard my friend say in a thin and dying whine: “why art thou cast down, oh, my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me?” and at the last he panted out at me, “tell her, Arthur, tell her, in His will is our peace.” Long I sat then, incased in night, with nothing but the darkness and his death in my mind, but in the end God gave me tears, and a deep sleep.

CHAPTER XXVIII

END OF MISS LANGLER

WHEN I OPENED my eyes I found myself lying alone half under the bedstead. The body of my friend, no longer there, must have been very quietly taken away. It was found in the river, high up about Wargrave.

I gathered up my hat and some telegrams scattered over the floor, and passed out, for the door of the room I found to be now open, so also was the door below. I think that I met no one on the stairs.

I next found myself in a train, and noticed now that it was evening at the sight of one of those sunsets that for three evenings had surprised everyone. Some men in the train were wildly talking, and though I heard little more of it than “Church” and “miracles,” and “downfall,” I can vividly remember their vowels of wonder and agitated jabbering.

On arriving at Alresford I got into a car to go to Swandale, but half-way to Swandale got out again, for I was now in no haste to be there, so it came into my head to walk, and at one moment I walked, at another I was standing still, at another I rabidly ran. In Swandale, when I was crossing the bridge toward the cottage, I beheld an old man named Davenport at the cottage-door whispering to two maid-servants, one of whom darted away, and when I had come to the cottage, “quite well, I hope, sir?” this old man mumbled to me, “fine evening, sir.” “None o’ that,” I said to him, “where is Miss Langler?” “This way, sir,” he answered, and ushered me into the morning-room. But I was no sooner in than the doorway was blocked with retainers, men and women, and it appeared to me that these people were there to impede and tease me. No doubt my dress and appearance were in some disarray, since they seemed to gape in alarm at me, so now, growing angry, I said to old Davenport: "what is the meaning of this? is Miss Langler alive?" "Surely, sir," was his answer. "Then what is the meaning of this?" said I, "where is she?" "Miss Langler is no longer in the house, sir," he answered. "That now is a wilful falsehood, Davenport, and you know it full well," said I. "You say so, sir," he answered, "though I was never charged quite in that way till now, sir." "Well, you are charged now, Davenport," said I, "and I require to be taken instantly to Miss Langler." "The Almighty God look down upon this house!" he now bawled out, "you cannot, Mr Arthur, you cannot!" "But we shall see, then, whether I am a captive or not, Davenport!" I cried, whereat the old man shouted out: "John! stop him! he is out of his wits!" They failed, however, to hold me, for I tore clear out of the thick of them, and pelted down the length of two long, dark corridors, nor did any of them dare to come after me.

Through all that region of the house I now flew in a heat of search for Miss Langler: I glanced into her chamber, and she was not there; I looked into room after room, and did not see her; I peered into nooks, for nothing was lit anywhere, and everything brooded in a deep dusk. But on getting nearer to Langler's study I seemed to detect some sound.... I went to it. Both the doors were locked on the outside, and the sound, louder now, was going on within; so, crouching there at one of the two doors in the hush of the dark, I hearkened a long, long while to it. Something within seemed to me to be running about the study at a trot, round and round, with trot, trot, trot, in a steady way; but whether it was a living human soul I did not know, for it was strange that the lungs of a man should last so long, and not fail, and I wondered whether it was she — or he; when it drew nigh to the door I heard pantings awhile, till it went on its way, and presently panted nigh once more, and was away, round and round, in a steady way; twice or thrice, too, I seemed to be aware of a flutter somewhere, the thin utterance of a bird; and ever I spurred myself to venture in, to look and see for myself, but each time that I brisked up to try it my hairs bristled, and I shied at it.

There did, however, come a moment when I very gingerly turned the key and found myself in. It was Miss Langer whom I saw; but she, for her part, did not see, or at least heed, me at all, nor make any attempt to escape, but continued to trot round, panting towards some bourn in a heavy haste, made heavier by the large hat that she wore, and by the velvet of a violet hue that voluminously clothed her, some of which she carried over her arm that she might the handier hurry. That print of Gainsborough's "Duchess" in her large gown over the pyx, if it had stepped down from its frame to run and run, could hardly have more resembled her. The mastiff Bruno was following at her heels, and on her shoulder rode the little wren in unstable balance, this latter all mauled now and bemuddled in its own blood, while many of its feathers lay moulted about the floor-tiles: for when she had seen that her brother did not come to her, she seems to have given way to a craving to crush out the creature's life, but it had contrived to escape her hand, she had run after to catch it, and had kept on running. But why, I wondered, did she so press, with her eye musing inwardly upon herself, the enamel eye of mosaics, fixed and dull? If I dared to stand in her way to bar her, for I was far from dreaming of daring to touch her, she meekly swerved as from some rock or block, and continued to run her course. Rarely did she halt for sheer breathlessness, and lean her shoulder a little, and pant, and start afresh, followed by the machine that whined at her heels with a long lolling tongue and eyes of abashment. I, seated in the casement, hearkened and hearkened to her every step, and to the rushing of the cascade, and my eye-corners were ever aware of her as she came and went in that twilight stillness, of the flutterings, too, of the bird, and of the fading out of the sunset, for all that heaven of hues in the west I saw die down to bloodshed and dabbling, and wished that I, too, was dead.

It was not till two in the morning that I saw her removed, she protesting with a meek dignity, begging to be permitted to catch.... But of this I could hardly write more; it was with her as the hard heart of the world would have it; and God is on His throne, thinking on His glory....

APPENDIX

Having finished the tale of my tragedy, what I may still further have to utter will contain naught that is new, no exclusive knowledge of my own, but may still be of interest as a sketch of my introduction to the so-called Church-of-the-overman.

The nine months following the death of Langler are somehow almost wholly blotted out of my life, I remember next to nothing of them, living somehow in vacuo, with curiously little of pain or pleasure or volition, and almost my first new memories are of the visits of my friend, Mr Martin Magee, who put himself to infinite pains with me, read to me, insisted upon interesting me. Again and again he would recount to me the thousand-fold drama of “the downfall” in all its ramifications and phases. “Dead?” he would say of the Church, with his Irish energy and a thump of the fist, “dead with a thud that has been felt by the priesthood in China: there has been a little recrudescence of old-fashioned Nonconformity in England, Scotland, and America, but that isn’t going to last ten years, you’ll see.”

“So the people imagine that the miracles were the work of churchmen?” I asked.

“Pooh, not now,” he answered; “they did at first, and it was the rage arising out of this fancy that wiped out the Church as a political power; but, of course, the real death of the Church is not due to rage, but to unconcern and oblivion.”

“Was it for this, then, that Aubrey Langler died?” I thought, “in order that the Church as a political power might be wiped out?” “But was there no moral reaction, Magee?” I asked: “Langler said that there would be, and another friend of mine that there would not.”

“Which friend was that?” asked Magee.

“I may tell you and the world some day,” I answered, “if he dies before me, but not at present.”

“Well, whoever he is, he knows his modern Europe,” said Magee. “I don’t remember hearing of any moral reaction.”

“But, then,” said I, “is the Western world left now without any religion?”

“Never a bit,” said he; “it is now just beginning to be gushingly religious. Haven’t we, first of all, our store of hereditary religion, unconscious in us? And remember that ‘the unconscious is the alone complete.’ Religion, I suppose, is whatever binds us back from living to please our primary natural selves? Therefore religion of old said, ‘live to please those about you’; and man has roughly reached to that, of old making society possible, now making it solid. But the evolution of ‘live to please those about you,’ is it not this: ‘live to please those whom you cannot even see, the unborn’? All which you may hear Rivers say if you will come with me forthwith to church.”

“Which church?” I asked.

“Why, Rivers’ — or any of the others.”

“But what is it all about?” I asked.

“Haven’t I told you about it again and again?” said he: “but with this wilful numbness of yours you won’t remember anything. It is a Church of transcendent ambitions, Templeton, aspiring at no less than the planting under heaven before long of a tribe higher than man, though its methods of setting about it are of a naiveté bound at first to leave you alien to their mystery of meaning; its theory is that the fowl precedes the egg: it grapples with the parent, beginning at the base of the ladder, its eyes fixed on the flying galaxies; but you wouldn’t catch a glimpse of all at your first visit, and, if you find anything queerish, remember sacring-bells and praying-mills, and remember that the first British person who happened to broach an umbrella in a public road cast twelve million fools into a brabble of laughter. Anyhow, I challenge you to go twice to the new Church without hungering to go thrice.”

“You seem sincere,” I said, “but you only wish to win me out of doors, I suppose. Where did Rivers get money from? He didn’t use to be rich.”

“But the whole hubbuboo is more or less early-Christian-communistic,” answered Magee: “people pay, because it is costly, and earns its pay. Socialism just needed a religious nerve, didn’t it? and here you have it. The base-wall of all is equality— ‘if one’s neck-muscles alone are brawny,’ Rivers always has it, ‘he will call no man your lordship.’ The idea is to preach and drill the nation into one army, the train-band of the times to come, for Rivers is the arch-foe of heterogeneity, he would have all men as twin as two perfect peas. But the Church is built on pity as well as on aspiration; equality is swallowed up in fraternity; charity is her riches, love is her festival. Run chiefly by women, she is an enthusiasm of the poor for the poor, and for the poorest of the poor, the child to be born; and to the poor a Gospel is again preached. You will find them all inflamed with the finest faith in the future, full of self-culture, ideality, good fellowship, and good food. The soul, too, is fed with a true emotion and communion of saints, as distinct from a fictitious: worship takes place.”

“You seem quite enamoured,” I said. “But worship of what?”

“Of God,” said he.

“But which God?” said I, “the old God?”

“No,” said he, “the new God.”

“Ah, the new God,” said I, “He is a most vague person: like Langer, I almost prefer the old God.”

“But is it a question of preference?” asked Magee: “prefer as you please, you can’t have the old God: He is as dead as His Church. But His death is, of course, phoenix-death, and the new God is only vague because the age is new, and men's brains only just enough evolved to see Him darkly; soon, I dare say. He will take the darlingest bright ship-shape. The old God too at first was pitched too high for men's eyes, hence lapses into idolatry and golden-calfishness, for idolatry is ever a soul-sloth, an idle backsliding to some lower, more facile ideal of one's forefathers; and for us now sluggishly to worship the old God would be equally idolatrous; we must stretch up now to the new, so making the stretch facile for our children: all which are not my own ungiven words, but Rivers'; let's go now to him."

"But is this the right day and hour?" I asked.

"There's a service every day at noon," he answered, "we should be just in time."

Well, I let myself be led. As I was getting ready Magee called to me: "by the way, you must put on a belt; one doesn't go in braces and corsets." So I put on a belt, and we went.

It was a sultry day in May, like summer almost, and most strange, I remember, was the look and mood of everything to me that day as we drove to Kensington. Arrived there, under the porch of the church I was struck by a prodigious fresco of Jesus, which was rather a revelation to me, for then first I seemed to see Jesus, a brown peasant in a turban — not going about blessing little children with long hair and nothing on his head in a blazing climate, according to the too churchy fancy of the painters, in defiance of St Paul's "It is a shame for a man to have long hair." Here, anyway, as it struck me, was the Man, the dusky Lily, and though much too garishly painted, it powerfully engaged our gaze. However, the crowd pressed; we went in.

But never yet had I bowed the head under half so vast a house of man! most vast, though cheap and unhandsome. Magee and I were so fortunate as to be led far forward toward the stage, and there we sat, each in a pew four feet long — only one person sitting in each pew — while hosts of nuns haunted the aisles and seven galleries, nutmegging the air with incense swung from censers; and I noticed that the roofs were in some way detached, and the air as pure and fresh as in the open.

A young man, parting the curtain, stood and howled out with all his heart a number out of a hymn-book; upon which the host of people started up, and shouted it — Tennyson's "Brook"— "for men may come and men may go, but I go on for ever." But that burden of sound was almost too over-ponderous for the bethundered eardrum! trumpets pealed, organs braved, while the earthquake and brotherhood of it brushed in ague-chills down my back, and was still humming about my head half-a-minute after it was hushed.

The next twenty minutes were taken up with the Blessed Sacrament, partaken of in early-Christian manner, only that there was no table. It was served by a hive of nuns, who bore baskets of sandwiches, fruit, cakes, etc., and water dashed with wine. The sandwiches were rather palpable for my palate! but, as with early-Christians, those who were not hungry no longer partook of the Lord's body, though all drank of his blood, those who were not thirsty drinking from liqueur-glasses and the thirsty from tumblers. Meantime, a man at the edge of the stage was howling: "though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee...." And again he howled with passion: "he was oppressed, yet he humbled himself, and opened not his mouth; as a lamb that is led to the slaughter, and as a sheep that before her shearers is dumb: yea! he opened not his mouth...."

When this was over the curtains rushed away, the stage was opened, and for some twenty minutes I was the witness of a set of shows. There was no dialogue, and never should I have supposed that means so guileless would persuade to so high a sense of art: each heart, I think, was touched. The shows were little pictures of man in his various doings and modes of being, and we had all to become human, and brothers of one another; in one case it was a dog that caused the music, and we had all to become brothers of the dog and of one another. First, there sprang upon the stage a Japanese athlete, naked but for a loin-cloth, who did nothing but parade himself as our pattern, with a few wanton movements about the waist to give assurance of his grace and perfected joy. Then followed a boy and girl who kissed on the sly behind a horrid aunt. Then a Jewish rag-picker, who did nothing but pick up rags, but still moved the springs of one's breast with love of him. Then a woman in a loose garment who lay down on a couch, and we marked the pangs that wrung her; she ran off slimmer than she came on! laughing! with an infant in her arms, while the people pursued her with the acclaims proper to victors. Then a child was stolen, but its mother was joyfully guided to it by a dog. Then came a ship-boy, a musician who forgot his own name, a grey astronomer, and three or four more.

While our hearts were still fond at these shows an acolyth who took his stand at the front and left of the stage vociferated the shout: "Blessed are the poor in spirit!" and at once there appeared on the stage a shoeblack, and also a young man rather shabbily dressed, with a bag in his hand; the young man begged the shoeblack to shine his boots, for he had stepped into bog: but he made the request with such polite shynesses and diffidences that the shoeblack at once put him down as a nobody, and cut some faces at him. When, however, the boots were shined the shabbily-dressed young man handed the shoeblack a handful of shillings for his pains. The shoeblack, seeing now that here must be a millionaire, gaped so open-mouthed at his riches, that only after some time did he observe that the young man had gone and forgotten his bag behind. The shoeblack then opened the bag, and drew out what was crowded within — an old lady's portrait, a lock of hair, a violin, an etching, and a copy of Ronsard: and the instant he drew out the Ronsard the acolyth who before had shouted out “blessed are the poor in spirit” rang now to the high dome his shout of triumph: “for theirs is the kingdom of the soul!”

The acolyth next shouted out: “Blessed are the pure in heart!” and at once there appeared an Egyptian man and woman — Joseph and Potiphar’s wife; Joseph had bone tablets in his hand, adding up figures; Potiphar’s wife tickled his neck and drew him: Joseph smiled, pinched her cheek, puzzling ever over his figures. Still the woman would have him, she coaxed, she intrigued: Joseph patted her shoulder, shook her ear, without ever budging or looking up out of his tablets. At last the woman drew him over to left-centre, Joseph going unconsciously with her; but at the door itself he woke up, laughed, escaped, as who should say “not for Joseph,” leaving his garment in her hands, and instantly was puzzling over his figures again. But now all at once Joseph began to wave out gestures of glad new discovery! The man had detected some mistake in his arithmetic! and the instant he detected his mistake, the acolyth gave out the high shout of triumph: “for they shall see God!”

Then again the acolyth shouted out: “Blessed are the merciful!” and at once there came on a man in brown who cowed a hound, and another man in bright who was kind to it. Years passed: and Brown and Bright were both chased in a lane by a madman with a hatchet; but Brown’s morose habit of mind had been the seed in him of biliousness and other ills; he hopped on crutches, could not escape; but Bright escaped: and the instant he escaped the acolyth shouted out in triumph: “for they shall obtain mercy!”

And so they tripped on through the Beatitudes, teaching the people biology in parables. Here was a whole new art: the old prejudice of “Christianity” in respect to the stage had ranged to the other pole, and Church had changed into stage. How fruitful within the last few years has been the evolution of these germs we know. At that time no use was made of the bioscope. The shows were changed each day.

All at once, when this was over, one was aware of the presence of Ambrose Rivers, whereat my eyes ran through the hall to its seventh heaven, and saw it all like leafage of the aspen-forest, while Rivers advanced from the stage-back bent beneath the storm of cheers. And poised just over the orchestra-pews, with a pure voice that pealed through the vast, he vociferated: "Let us reverence That Which made us!"

Thereupon he fell to his knees, with his arms stretched up straight and parallel; all the people did the same, while the orchestra rendered Vogel's "Eternal Tool"; and Rivers, gazing straight upward, shouted: "Father! hallowed be Thy Name. Thy Kingdom come. Give us our bread to-day. And forgive us our debt as we forgive everyone who is in our debt. Amen."

This said, after a minute his arms shot horizontal, his neck bowed, and, still kneeling, he shouted to us: "Let us reverence one another in our human ancestors!"

And while the choir gave "Mild son of man, thy front sublime," all our arms shot horizontal, each worshipper straining to touch the finger-tips of his neighbour to left and right, for the shoulder-joint is capable of no little stretching, with practice.

This done, Rivers rose to his feet with the shout: "Let us reverence the ape, without bending the knee or the neck!"

And thereupon, while the orchestra rendered Brewers' "Ye humble wombs with homage fraught," he put his finger-tips to the ground. Through the building everyone put his or her finger-tips to the ground.

When this was over Rivers shouted: "Let us reverence the half-apes!"

Whereupon, without bending the knees or the neck, he put the first finger-joint to the ground; and while the choir gave Thibaut's "Crooked shapes, the alphabet of life," everyone did the same — or tried to. As it were a wind of breaths began to whiff through the building.

Rivers next shouted: "Let us reverence the dog!"

And with this he put his fists to the ground. We all tried our best to do the same, while the choir gave Sauer-Motti's "Dark Backward and Abyss of Time."

Rivers next shouted: "Let those of us who can reverence all That Which is below the dog!" And with this, without bending the knees or the neck, while the orchestra gave the overture to "The Creation," he put his palms on the ground.

But it was no easy matter to reverence all That Which is below the dog! I can now do it with nonchalance, but it tried me then. It was not a mere question of putting the palms on the ground, but of keeping them there during three straining minutes, with the eyes of ladies criticising your performance! However, I rose from the effort a straighter man: it is this touching what is beneath without bending the knees which makes soldiers, and also saints. Meantime, I was charmed with the movements of the hosts of nuns and other ladies, who, it was clear, vied with one another in ease and achievement: I thought that some of them must certainly have a selection of lovers.

When this was over Rivers called to us: "Let us sum up and reverence all!" whereat everyone held up a bamboo rod behind the back with the stretched arms, and, sitting tight, swung the shoulders smartly, this way and that alternately, thus hardening the muscles of the back. And so it was during twenty minutes: when we reviewed the Past we stood fronting the stage, but with our necks strained back, looking at the opposite wall; when we aspired to the Future we struck our chests with our knees, an exaggerated going-upstairs; when we were meek we dropped our body upon our heels with force enough to bounce us up again, an exaggerated curtsy, thus oiling the hinges of the knee-joints; when we were merciful we bent far sideward to left and right, trying to touch the ground; when we were pure in heart we bent backward at the waist to touch the ground behind, and so on.

All this was, of course, highly exhilarating, both in itself, and because done in fellowship with a host of people all making the same gestures at the same moment; but it did not yet edify, did not move me religiously; and, because it did not, I thought to my self: “it is not a fitting function for a Church.” Within a few weeks, however, I was to find how very far at fault I was in this, for the gestures only failed to edify me at first for the reason that in my consciousness there was no correlation between each gesture and its husband idea: habit was essential for that. Thus to nations that do not kneel to pray, nor raise the hand to say “hiss!” these gestures are destitute of pertinence: there is no correlation. But when habit had once set up in my mind a wedlock between gesture and idea, then the gestures became as touching to the soul as they were teaching of a wonder of buoyancy and joy to the body.

When the exercises were over Rivers spoke to the people. By birth or learning he had the lungs of a bull, and to the giddiness of the seventh gallery, I believe, his bellows must have blown. On the whole, he impressed me as a real prophet or outspeaker, speaking his truth like the wayfaring of a force of nature, without humour, ire, respect, or prospect. I can’t recall much that he said, but he called the people to joy, telling them that a bad tree could not bring forth good fruit, neither could unhappy men beget happy generations. Joy of heart was their obligation, for they were the ancestors of God, the future hung on their joys. “Behold!” he howled, “I bring you word! your life is worth living if you live it a little well.” Of course, no one yet half knew how to live it well; but, thanks to the pryers and the tryers, one knew a little. Already a howling gaiety might be theirs. One rather good thing was to live a moment at a time, ruminating the moment’s relish deliciously, as when that morning on opening his eyes he had said to himself: “Alive! and still young! not a twinge nor a grief throughout! refugee of a thousand hungry hells! this, then, is my turn in the turning of Eternity: for the men of Misgab and of Bagdad are dead, but I am alaugh for a little while.” Then he had run round Hyde Park, and half-way round could not help howling all hey and conversant with wind and the Holy Ghost, to the disgusting of everyone. If there was one thing in this marsh of Divinity more divine than all the rest, it was wind, and ever in March and big November God was with men; but only those dreamed how divine who ran far into it, and breathed it deeply, and drowned in it, and browsed bedrowsedly upon all the sound and sounds of it. Then he had returned home, and had eaten a ton. If they wished to have boisterously high and holy joy of their breakfast, they must work for it, should run at least a mile or two. Joy, then, gushing health, and they knew what went all in fusion with gushing health — chastity, fortnights of titanic continence. Who was the happiest and best of men? He happened to know, and would tell them: not essentially the saint, the philosopher, the plutocrat, but essentially the acrobat — the man with his fibres mobile, his breast like pent Pentecost. The saint, the philosopher, the artist, were happy also, but only because they were acrobats in their fashion. This was just the news of Christianity, that along the path of self-torture lay in ambush a marvel of awaking, a scarlet dawn: to evolve they must twist themselves. And let them know that the soul was a trick of the body. The result of a beauish body was a religious saltarello. Were they covetous to stride out into the infinite? — let them scout in the finite on every side. Mens sancta in corpore sancto. No more, then, of the old necks, teeth, effete souls. With respect to teeth, there was a misconception abroad which he wished to correct: they all knew that in a few ages man was fated to become a toothless gumption: well, but there were two paths to that gate, not only through decay, but, secondly, through the decrease of the teeth in size, till at last they disappeared. Let them choose the latter by chary mating. Devotion to evolution was for the future their only possible piety; so their own bodies must be their care all day long, till their every movement of muscle or brain was a pattern of grace. Perfection! it had to be: why not now? greyhounds were perfect. The men of late generations had really been rather grotesque, crowds of them strutting their personalities about in some rag or gaud of spiritual skill, yet glaring with the lues of a low evolution. One of the most highly-famed poets of the nineteenth century had had — what did they think? — a paunch. “Ho! Ho!” he howled, “think of the pure grotesqueness of it! a poet with a pouch! no wonder he was obscure! it is like a poet with spectacles on his nose! or a poet with bo-peep in his teeth, whom no pious miss would kiss!” No, that wouldn’t do. The chimpanzee vaunted a paunch, and we were devoutly getting done with paunches now, thank God. From men of this age God did not so much need glorious books, of which He was choke-full, but was greedy for glorious children, darting eyes, laughing caverns. The men of the past had learned from St Paul that “bodily exercise profiteth little”; for us it was the main means of grace and the sole hope of glory, of grace for the Roman, of glory for the race. By it they would attain to harmony with God. It had been said by men of old: “God is Love.” “How could they possibly know it?” he shouted: “how profound an insight! for this that to us is old science and certainty to them was only surmise. But what, then, does God love? Not apes, not men, His taste being a bit touchy:

God, we know, did once love, or press toward, apes when only dogs and half-apes were; and He did once love men when only ape-people were; but the moment men appeared He left off loving them, and was for loving their children: always it is evolution that He loves, change, the future, with urge and urge and urge.” So in loving the future they would be all in harmony with Him, loving what He loved. That future was full of shapes and plays. Happily, they could shape themselves to pledge and usher it in: for that was the right of man — to change himself; that was the definition of man— “a self-changing midget”; and an age was in the eye of the Highest when, by the heightening of this right of self-change, earthly lives would writhe in a trice into any shape of wyvern, or moose, or shivering seraph, or moon-eyed octopus, or quadruped with its belly to the sky and its back to the earth. Meantime, by pitifuler pantings, they, if they were fat, could make themselves fit; if they were short, they should, by taking thought, add one quarter-cubit to their stature; if they were bow-legged like the orang, self-bearding would get themselves knock-kneed like the cock; if they were starting and rapturous like the gorilla, they could get themselves impreguably calm like the overman; in an age or two they could change or redress their quite unnecessary length of arm, of spine, their over-plump shortness of leg, their base remoteness of sex-organ from brain, their too shameful “ears,” sham thumbs. They must tackle themselves humbly and in detail. Christianity had been far too heady and star-drunken, had made a leap three feet high to pluck Venus from the sky. We of this age must be more grave and grown-up, more self-conscious and disabused, must use a ladder, come back to the classic. The romantic would return some day in some new dress, for classic and romantic were alternate moods of the mind, neither could ever die. But for us of this age it was the classic, the austere, bare comeliness of reason. If our life and worship was barer and harder than that of the past, it was also far higher. But let them not view our worship as yet worthy to be so called. The idol of the worship of the time to come would be the nightly sky. Man, so far, though with a much larger subconsciousness, looked forth at the stars with a consciousness little larger than that of gorillas, even with some fatigue; was still a villager of the earth, not yet a civilian of the universe; a few of the most elfin ears, they were told did, it was true, by an effort, and dullishly, catch some actual tollings of the chiming and dulcimers; but he believed that brains larger than ours, when they came, would pass pretty nearly all of life in brooding upon the runes of that writing. Let them wait, meekly grooming themselves to greet that “come to the marriage” which they would hear, and soon, lo, the scales would fall from man’s eyes, his tongue should be loosed and enchanted, and the earth should arise at last as the mourning-dove to hie to her room in the chancel of the heavens.

When Rivers had finished speaking we sang another hymn; again the trumpets pealed, organs braved, while the road-march and high brotherhood of it brushed in shiverings over one’s back, and troubled the vast building to its base:

“Time like an ever-rolling stream Bears all his sons away, They fly forgotten. :::”

The White Wedding (1908)

CONTENTS

- I. SHAN'S THE MAN
- II. SHAN ADANCE
- III. SHAN IN ACTION
- IV. SHAN MAKES A VOW
- V. SHAN IN A NET
- VI. SHAN ALL ENMESHED
- VII. SHAN BOTH HOT AND COLD
- VIII. SHAN VANISHED
- IX. SHAN AND SONGS IN THE NIGHT
- X. SHAN AND NO SONGS
- XI. SHAN AND ANNE
- XII. SHAN AND AN OLD WOMAN
- XIII. SHAN BANKRUPT
- XIV. SHAN DEEP IN IT
- XV. SHAN NIGHT-WALKS
- XVI. SHAN DECAMPS
- XVII. SHAN RELATES
- XVIII. SHAN AWAITING
- XIX. SHAN IN LUCK
- XX. SHAN SULKS
- XXI. SHAN HAS A VISITOR

I. SHAN'S THE MAN

ARTHUR GORDRIDGE, THE young master of Glanncourt, just getting better of a sickness that had brought him home from his regimental district, lay on a sofa during the forenoon of that 18th of September 1899 whose Times on the floor at his feet was furious with the news that President Kruger had refused to accept any of our propositions made to him on the eighth of the month; but even these growlings of the outbreak now near could not too greatly jingoize Gordridge's mind that morning, and his pile of papers having slipped off the sofa, his looks hankered towards the door.

Presently when the door opened his eye brightened: but the young lady who came in was not the one whom he longed to see.

"How are you this morning, Arthur?" she asked.

"Well, I think I begin now to feel some life in me again, thanks, Anne," he answered.

"Aunt Margaret asks you how you are, and whether there will be war."

"Well, I suppose there will be war; it will be intolerable if there is not after the insolence of these little farmer-people."

"I wonder if you will have to go to fight?"

"Not very likely."

"But if your company goes...."

"Even in that case.... I am on the sick-list, Anne."

"But you'll soon be better, and having no special temptation to stay..."

"Don't worry, Anne, just mention to mother what I say... Why, by the way, doesn't somebody remove this tray from my side?"

“You might have rung...I’ll take it.”

“As you like.”

“Or would you prefer that Rosie — ? By the way, talking of Rosie, have you heard about her? You have been so much abroad, and so chippy since you came, that I dare say you know precious little about us others here, really. But perhaps you are not much interested in your mother’s pantins, Arthur.”

“I’m sure I don’t know why you choose to call Rosie a pantin,” answered Arthur, “she is mother’s adopted daughter, precisely as you are, and one of the family.”

Anne Hine smiled at this: the slightest minx of not yet twenty-three years, anaemic, neat as an ear-ring; plain but quaint; with lines about the mouth which meant biting, meant impish; and some glint in the gold of those golden eyes which meant — genius? some shriek in that region.

“Well,” said she, “I must now set about to adjust myself to this new point-of-view about my Rosie, not a toy, but ‘one of the family.’ Her father was a twenty-acre farmer on one of the estate-farms.... But have you been told, Arthur, that Rosie is to be married?”

“Rosie?”

“Yes.”

“To be married?”

“Yes, Arthur.”

“Ah, I hadn’t been told. Well, she seems a sweet little body, so I don’t wonder; I only hope it is to some possible sort of man.”

“You remember Shan O’Shannon, don’t you? It is to him. He has lately been made head-keeper, though an unmarried man, and, yes, he’s a ‘tidy’ man, as they say here, though wedded to Socialistic notions; Aunt Margaret, in fact, has lately had the thought of getting him off the estate for airing his arguments round about, but she didn't after, he is such a popular chap."

"O'Shannon: I don't remember," said Arthur.

"What, not that man with his thumb shot off? He turns up like clock-work twice a day to ask after you..."

"Oh, you mean 'Bull's head'!" exclaimed Arthur, "that for some reason was the only name he was known by when I was a boy; of course I remember! why, the fellow used to follow me about like a spaniel, our whole youth almost was spent with one another. You mean 'Bull's-head'? That's all right! He, of course, could never do for Rosie."

"But, then, it must be all wrong, Arthur, seeing that they are affianced," was Anne Hine's answer.

"But that is too absurd for words! Mother would never entertain such a suggestion.... First place, the fellow is short of a thumb—"

"Oh, Arthur, it isn't the thumb that makes the patriarch. And if it has been a bargain for years, Arthur, between Aunt Margaret and the man....? For that matter, O'Shannon is a sober chap, grand at 'kippuring', with some cash in the bank, and—"

She was interrupted by a shy rap, and agush with blushes Rosie Jones entered, a girl of not much more than seventeen: upon which Anne said keenly to Arthur: "Here is Rosie come, you see, of her own accord... I will tell Aunt what you say," and out she hurried, though outside in the corridor she stood hearkening, while Rosie asked Arthur how he was that morning.

"Much better thanks, Rosie," mumbled Arthur, holding a newspaper anew before his face, afresh interested in President Kruger.

She, for her part, raised the tray, but replaced it on the table, in order with a bent head to rearrange the cups, etc., on it, while Arthur looked at the paper, till, as she again raised the tray, he said to her: "So you are engaged, Rosie?"

"Who is, Arthur?" asked Rosie, again getting rid of the tray.

"Isn't that so?"

"Why, no, Arthur."

"You give me your assurance as to that?"

"I'm not engaged to anyone, Arthur, I'm sure. What could have made you think such a thing?"

"Isn't there something about a man named O'Shannon, a gamekeeper?"

"About Shan O'Shannon? Oh, I am not, Arthur! The man has intrigued in that direction, but I have never agreed to such a thing."

"That's all right, then! I was misinformed, and I am awfully — relieved."

"Oh, it is dreadful of them to say such things of me!" said Rosie in distress: "I am not engaged to Shan O'Shannon, I have never uttered one word to make him think—"

"Well?"

"Well, to be frank, one Thursday evening during the week before you came, he encountered me in the south shrubbery as I was coming home from some sick villagers, and urged me so earnestly, that I — don't quite remember what I said. I told him that Mama Gordridge would hardly entertain the thought of my getting married at my age, but that—"

"Tell me?"

"But that — I would think of it, I said."

"Well, but that was no promise at all," said Arthur; "you, of course, are not to blame if the man chooses to take all sorts of delusions into his ridiculous brain. Does he fondly imagine, then, that that was a promise?"

"I hardly know," replied Rosie, "for I have tried not to be alone with him again, but he has been so light-hearted since then, that everybody imagines that we are engaged. Butah we are not.”

“Of course you are not. You are not made for such as Shan O’Shannon, Rosie. Has he — had this craze in his nut a long time?”

“Yes, he and I happen to be cousins, and they say that since I was six he got it into his brain that I belong to him, and he wouldn’t marry anybody, waiting till I grew up. But Nurse Curtis says that you, Arthur, will never let him take me away from the Hall.”

“Nurse Curtis was never so right in her life, Rosie... Do you see that portrait there?”

“That one?”

“Yes, that with the rapier by the armour. His name was the same as mine — Arthur Fraser, he fought at Blenheim, and was the very best of us all, not only a soldier, but a poet, a politician, a gallant, and, above all, a jolly good fellow: I defy anyone to say less of him. Well, he married a farmer’s daughter because it appeared proper to him, because he was pleased to; and it turned out quite bravely, and blood of hers now runs in my veins.”

“Yes, Arthur,” she murmured, her brow turned downwards, but the thought rushed athwart her gorgeous head: “That one’s mother was not this Mrs Gordridge though.”

“Well, what he did,” said Arthur, sitting impulsively up, “I can do, too, for I am nothing like such a swell as he was, and I’m certain that his girl was never half so delicious as mine, nor he ever half so much gone on her... Rosie, come to me!”

Rosie stood shaking, looking at the roses incased in her nails.

“Come, will you?”

Rosie would not budge.

“What a dear you are!” breathed Arthur, as it were secretly, leaning towards her in a craze and heat: “do you realise that you are the very nicest thing that was ever created? Those eyes, so large and arch, the throat in cream... cruel of you to be so sweet! If you won't come to me, I shall jump up to you..."

Rosie tried to speak, but failed.

"What did you say?" asked Arthur.

She tried again, but all that Arthur could catch were the two words: "Mama Gordridge."

"Yes, 'Mama Gordridge,'" said he: "but don't trouble about her now, this is really our own little business only, for all the world are outsiders, and we two Chinese to everybody. Only be sure that I really do love you—"

"Oh, it's too much!" wailed Rosie, suddenly covering her face, whereat he leapt up impulsively and strained her to him, murmuring: "no, don't be afraid of anything, only let me once know that you love me for my own self."

"Can one help it?" spoke Rosie to his neck, crying, "I always did..."

"What, before I came this time?"

"Yes, always, I used to cry..."

"Well, I must have been pretty stupid: I used to see without noticing you, I suppose, a little person with Cinderella dresses round spider's pins, eh? never dreaming into what a dear darling you would suddenly dart up..."

"No, you didn't, but this Shan O'Shannon did, notice me, Anne has been so inspired as to observe, and fixed upon me when I was little like that, and waited for me, and therefore, she declares — Oh, they will take me from you, I know, and then I shouldn't know what to do! Mama Gordridge—"

"No Mama Gordridge: I shan't hear..."

"If you keep kissing me, I shall get a sore on my lip, and then everybody will know what we have been up to."

"A sore! why a sore?"

“It’s a strange thing,” said Rosie, half laughing, half crying, “when I was a child, as sure as I played kiss-in-the-ring, so sure I got a sore on my lip.”

“You arch darling! but—”

But they were scared by a cry of feigned surprise in the room made by Anne who had strolled in, whereat Rosie, all inflamed, made her escape, while Anne Hine with her smile remarked: “Why, you are up, Arthur, isn’t it rather soon?”

“I — it is of no importance — what is it, Anne?” asked Arthur.

“A man who is eager to see you is out there, so I came to know—”

“Which man?”

“Shan O’Shannon, Arthur.”

“Eager? O’Shannon? to see me? whatever for?” asked Arthur.

“He has brought you — a fish, Arthur, and a brace of partridges.”

“Very charming of Mr O’Shannon... Well, you may let him in.”

Arthur returned to his sofa, drew his rug again over his legs, and a moment afterwards Shan O’Shannon entered: a fellow slight, tall, lithe and light-footed, his eyes light-blue, bright with batteries of fun under a broad brow, one of them somehow looking narrower than the other, adding to their twinkle some wink of knowingness, and to their humour ‘cuteness. He came bowing himself down, bright of eye, holding in one hand his cap with a brace of wild-fowl, in the other a four-foot salmon inside a putrod crate... “Pleased am I, Mr Arthur, to see you down at last!... I don’t believe you have wholly ceased to remember me, sir.”

“I remember you quite well, O’Shannon,” said Arthur.

“Well, you have had a longish bout of it in bed, and understanding that you came down yesterday, I’ve taken this liberty—”

“That’s all right, O’Shannon: you are very obliging. Those for me, I suppose?”

“Well, it seems a cheeky thing, too, to make a gentleman a present of two of the best of his own ground-game, but they came so tempting to the gun just now, I said I’d dare; as for the salmon, that I’m prouder of, for it’s pretty difficult to light upon a quite clean one about this season of the year, but this one is just fresh-run.”

“Yes, he seems fine. You are — very good. And how are the river and the birds?”

“Birds could hardly be finer, but Severn’s rather late and dry this year, fish haven’t come up plentiful, and the main of the spawning should be far on in November... Ah, it’s many a good salmon you and I have landed as lads together, sir...”

“I suppose so; yes, that is certainly so; I don’t forget, O’Shannon.”

“It used to be ‘Bull’s-head’ in those first days, sir, not ‘O’Shannon,’ till you got home for your first holidays from Rugby, then ‘Bull’s-head’ turned into ‘Bucephalus,’ for you had learned that ‘Bucephalus’ and ‘Bull’s-head’ are the same words, and it was ‘Bucephalus’ this, and ‘Bucephalus’ that, all over the place.”

“Ah, that was some time ago, I’m afraid.”

“True enough, sir, more’s the grief, for there are no trees so green any more now, nor one can’t ever feel over again for fresh people and scenes the same as for those we originally came across, sir.”

“I suppose not, O’Shannon.”

“You now, Mr. Arthur, no doubt there’s many a gentleman just as fine a fellow, take them all round, as you are, if the truth were only known; but to me they’d never be so, because to my young imagination you were a being to be looked after and worshipped above all others. It’s a foolhardy thing, too, but let that be my plea for forcing myself upon you, sir.”

Arthur, peering under his eyes at Shan, beheld anew the joyous boy whom, because of his priesthood of sky, storm, soil, his naiveté joined with depth, he had once called “patriarchal,” cunning to trap, course, climb, the bane of badger, hare, otter, who had been the humble husband of his boyhood. “Bucephalus” had very clearly been doing some reading since then, and now there was a crowded moustache ending in corkscrew undulations; but here was the same brow broad and low, rather treble voice, pale face, dance of eye, flight of foot; and Arthur’s inwards warmed with friendship, in spite of his ominous consciousness of Rosie and of crude fruit to accrue.

“How long since you last saw me?” he asked.

“Just six years now,” said Shan: “that was at Lydney station on September the 18th, 1893, the night you passed through on your way to India; and I caught a glimpse of you again the night you came home ill on the 2nd, a fortnight ago, but you didn’t notice me.”

“You have quite a memory for dates!”

“I could give you a statement with dates subjoined for every voyage you’ve taken, and for every page of your life. We have not been so far apart as you may fancy, for here’s your photograph in the Eton jacket which you gave me when you were fourteen and three months: I’ve always kept it in my pocket.”

“Yes, that undoubtedly seems to be I, O’Shannon — quite so. And — how have you been doing all these years?”

“Jolly, sir, thank you. Mrs. Gordridge has been marvellously good to me when other folks have had to groan under her pretty cruel rule; I have two married kippurs under me, and I live a free life in the bit of country that I love.”

“That’s all right, then; and before I go away again I intend to add to your prosperity more than you perhaps expect, O’Shannon, so that you will do quite well on the whole.”

“It’s the same generous Mr. Arthur as ever, you see!” cried Shan, while a light started to his eyes. “Not that I have much to crave for, nor would change places now with any man alive, for the streak of luck which I scarcely allowed myself to dream of came to me just the week preceding your coming—”

“Oh?”

“I mean the young girl that during thirteen years and more — No doubt you have seen my cousin, Miss Jones, since you have come down, sir?”

“I have seen her, of course.”

“She is what Shan-Bucephalus has been the fisher-lad to win for himself, then, though Heaven only knows how such a thing has come about, for it’s a long sight beyond what such as I ever had the title to look out for, any way.” Arthur was silent, till with rather reserved eyelids he murmured: “Has the girl given her word to marry you?”

“No, not exactly that, may be, but going on in that neighbourhood, thank God,” said Shan: “she’s young yet, and there’s a year or two’s waiting to endure, but it will be well in the end.”

“Provided you contrive to get Mrs. Gordridge’s consent, O’Shannon,” said Arthur; “it is well to be ambitious, but Miss Jones is almost as good as Mrs. Gordridge’s adopted daughter, remember.”

“But, sir, I have every reason to believe that Mrs. Gordridge won’t be saying no to this—”

“Still, Mrs. Gordridge is queer, O’Shannon, Mrs Gordridge is queerish: I should not build any wild hopes—”

“Yes, but—”

“Well, I am obliged for your presents,” muttered Arthur now, impulsively throwing himself round, turning his back to Shan, and ending the interview, whereat Shan looked at him rather dumbfounded, rather hurt, then placing the presents on a table, bowed, and passed out.

He had already reached the outer hall-region when, to have speech with him, pelted Anne Hine, who after a few moments sent him flying with this whisper pealing in his ear: “Give up hope of Miss Jones, O’Shannon — there is Another and that same afternoon Mrs. Gordridge, too, was able to gather from Anne that Rosie had been undergoing her son’s embraces in the book-room.

II. SHAN ADANCE

AS FOR THE sturdy and sterling President Kruger, God, thirsting to precipitate his presidency, had first spurred him dog-mad. On the 21st the Raad of the Orange Free State, having assembled, in a startling manner manifested jaundice against England, and the night after a Cabinet Council was called in Whitehall in order now to send out another and more wrathful note to the Transvaal. During all which, news of a movement of British troops was being bruited from Natal, troops were en route to Africa from Britain, and clamorous was the rumour of it, for everybody was declaring: “there will be trouble.”

“Wouldn’t they be put down sharply, those Boers, if I had the handling of them!” remarked Mrs. Gordridge to her son during the gloaming of the 23rd, before the dinner-gong had sounded: “how long, Arthur, will the war last when it comes off?”

“Certainly not more than a month, mother,” answered Arthur, “they are only a mob.”

“Arthur, give me to know definitely now whether you will be going, if your company is ordered out.”

“Not unless I am quite well, mother. We have spoken of that before. I feel no overpowering impulse, really, to help in the mowing down of a crowd of peasants.”

“But it is precisely a peasant for whom you are staying behind!”

“This is hardly pleasant, mother,” laughed Arthur, walking about; “even if it be on that account, isn’t it rather a shame to call Rosie a peasant now?”

her speech, her throat — it is merely a prejudice: we are all made of the same flesh and blood, after all.”

“We are, and yet we aren’t, are we, Gross?” said Mrs. Gordridge, chuckling, stroking one of her three Japanese dogs: “I am a peer’s daughter, aren’t I? and Mr. Arthur has noble blood, and should be good. He will go and butcher Boers or anybody else when his mother begs him to.”

“Yes, mother,” said Arthur, laughing, “but your habit of governing has become so confirmed at present that it is apt to be grotesque. Do remember one’s age. You shouldn’t, really. What, for example, has become of poor Rosie these last two days?”

“Hasn’t the child been in her own room? I fancy so...

“What, a prisoner?”

“I recommended her to stay there for the present, and I take it that she has. There’s nothing to be shocked at in that.”

“But don’t be rough on her, mother, I entreat you, or you force me to interfere.... It is so useless, too, for I have really decided to marry her, and you should not try—”

“But who is trying to stop him?” cried Mrs. Gordridge, pointing at Arthur her ebony stick, “I an old dowager with the gout? try to stop a goring bull? Boys will be boys, won’t they, Gross? And where the race is pig-headed, the sons will have their way — unless an even pigger head intervenes.” These last words were muttered, as a servant entered to announce “Dr. Blood and the Rev. Mr. Orrock,” visitors who, unloved by Arthur, drove him out to the lawn, where in the twilight he had a talk with the head-gardener, while in Mrs. Gordridge’s cosy corner she and her two cronies laid their heads together on the matter of Arthur.

“He doesn’t mean to go to any war, I can see,” Mrs. Gordridge said to them: “if I could once get him well off, the moment his back was turned I should marry Rosie to Shan O'Shannon, and so throw off the whole burden of it. But he very sensibly prefers kissing to camping, so something else will have to be done."

"Moreover, there will be no war," remarked Dr. Blood, a ruddy mass of a man; "Providence will never permit such a scourge."

"He will drag in his 'Providence,' you see, Margaret," murmured the clergyman, who was a fair-faced patrician with the fine smile of a prince of the church.

"Let me assure you, Richard," said Dr. Blood heatedly, "that Margaret believes in a God above us, if you do not."

"Margaret," answered the clergyman, "happens to be a woman-of-the-world, and her very proper belief in a God above us is tinctured with all the recent culture and criticism—"

"You are not to squabble, you two," said Mrs. Gordridge: "it is becoming too unbearable, this head-breaking brangle about God and drugs: I wish you wouldn't when I'm about."

"I am done," said Dr. Blood: "though I'd let any fair-minded man decide whether the two positions which I have always taken up are not in accordance with the latest views, namely, that drugs are a hoary superstition, and that there's a just God overhead."

"Then, why does he daily administer drugs!" cried Mr. Orrock.

"Tell him because one must administer something, John," said Mrs. Gordridge, chuckling: "he administers the sacrament, you administer drugs, I administer the Gordridge family: anything for an honest living."

"It is just a question of the popular prejudice with physicians," said Dr. Blood: "folks insist upon being dosed, and the physician doses them; also there are two or three good drugs, digitalis, quinine; but catch Margaret or me gulping drugs! because I am an enlightened, modern person—"

“Aye, with a belief in ghosts,” fleered Mr. Orrock. “The fact, of course, is, that no man really disbelieves in drugs; at this moment I have the advantage to bear within me two tablespoonfuls of blood mixture, four drams of codliver oil, and three little liver pills, whose kindly action—”

“Well, it is a cheap way of dining, Richard,” said Mrs. Gordridge: “cheap and nasty.”

“You see, Richard, Margaret merely laughs,” said Dr. Blood: “talk of superstition! he can’t believe in it! it is merely done to displease others!”

“Superstition should not be considered a crime by a believer in miracles” observed the clergyman.

“But doesn’t the man preach miracles every Sunday of his life, Margaret?” cried the doctor.

“And you, John,” said Mrs. Gordridge, “lead your children to hear him, knowing that he doesn’t mean it. There’s nothing sound in our society, I say, the whole head’s sick. Otherwise, wouldn’t I allow Arthur to marry Rosie Jones? But having lost the power to do anything true and genuine through being impregnated in our cradles with humbug and cowardice, we are mainly doctors who scorn drugs, and preachers who jeer at believers, and aristocrats who secretly know that the creed of Keir Hardie is true: so stop your wrangling, and let’s go on plotting together against this natural son of mine — I don’t mean that he’s not born in wedlock, because he was.” Mrs. Gordridge chuckled in her jocular dry way, and her two councillors, sagacious enough provided the talk did not touch upon the questions of God and drugs, now laid their heads together anew with her on the war and Arthur. A cloud overhung that house; and this council of the 23rd was the second, the first having taken place five days before, convened by the old lady in a hurry on hearing from Anne Hine the horrible story of her son and Rosie.

“If Rosie could be sent away to, say, the King-Crollys,” Dr. Blood now said, “without his knowing?”

“Rosie would only write to him,” remarked Mr. Orrock, “and he would fly after her. He must not be given to imagine that we even dream of balking him, or — you know the Gordridges. There must be one master-stroke, effective and final on this side, or we only make matters twenty times worse by meddling.”

“Good,” said Mrs. Gordridge, “but can you suggest the ‘master-stroke’? Let’s do masterstrokes, Richard, not dream them all day long.’ “It’s a fearful thing!” remarked Dr. Blood.

“I never was confronted with such a crux,” observed Mr. Orrock. “The wonder is that he purposes — wedlock. Wedlock is not the usual solution in such accidents to the affections.”

“Just listen to the gay Herr Faustus,” said Mrs. Gordridge: “he wants Arthur to trifle with that poor child’s life. I shall tell your wife, Richard.”

“No, oh no,” protested the clergyman, “you misunderstand me, I only observe—”

“But supposing he does marry her—” began Dr. Blood.

“Supposing he doesn’t, John!” said Mrs. Gordridge sharply, “it simply will not happen, since I couldn’t endure it, and it is quite useless to suppose what can’t be.”

“But even if Arthur persists in his will to stay at home,” suggested Mr. Orrock, “could not Rosie be secretly married to O’Shannon?”

“It could hardly be done,” replied Mrs. Gordridge. “I have been giving it some thought — not with Arthur anywhere in England; but I’ll tell you what: I believe I could succeed in whipping the lady quietly off to my sister Sheila in Quang Chow, and Sheila could then be counted upon to keep her dark, even if Arthur were to scent her out and fly after her out there — there's my master-stroke: it is bold, but — how does it strike you?"

"Good, good," said Mr. Orrock.

"Good, good," added Dr. Blood, "couldn't be bettered—" this being, indeed, the finish of nearly all the boards-of-three at Glanncourt, Blood and Orrock following with cheers her whom they were called to lead: for, more masterful and fertile than they, Mrs. Gordridge always first determined her path, and only afterwards, from old wont since her girl-days, invited their guidance.

"If Arthur can be got to go to the war," she said, "it will be better to marry Rosie to Shan O'Shannon than to banish the poor child out to Quang Chow; but if he doesn't go away, there's nothing else than the banishment, and it shall be done."

The gong was now sounding for dinner, Arthur walked in, and the group of five moved toward the dining-room, encountering in a passage Anne Hine, at whom Mrs. Gordridge threw the whisper: "See yourself about Rosie's dinner before you sit," so Anne ran off, arranged this, and then ran upstairs. Rosie's door was slightly open, the electric-light, supplied by a power-station in the house, had been switched on within, and Anne, approaching warily, was able to spy Rosie with her nicest hat on stepping like a peahen to and fro before a mirror, and now Rosie made a curtsy backward before her own beauty, like dames stooping into profound humiliations before the throne, and now hung up her fingers in the air, and up there exchanged a hand-shake with some perfect personage of her fancy; all which the prisoner performed with lids rosy from weeping, and Anne, peeping eagerly in, grinned with a grim roguery.

Anne went spryly in, whereat Rosie let slip a cry, and in a moment, the hat flung off, was sitting in her casement.

“What, were you going out, Rosie?” Anne wished to know.

“No, Anne, I had on my hat,” said Rosie, now all gorgeous with blushing.

“I saw that; but whom were you shaking hands with?”

“I? with no one.”

“You are a foolish chick, really, to encourage in yourself such dreams. What can it lead to? I shall inform Arthur of what I caught you doing.”

“Anne, you wouldn’t, would you? you never would!”

“I think I shall. What can it matter to you if he laughs at you? He has laughed at me, and I haven’t minded, since I do not allow myself any girlish visions, you see, for a girl should learn how to see without tasting, or burning to, miss, women being made to grin and bear, my Rosie, and men to get and grin. Do you know whom Aunt Margaret means him to marry? the Honourable Peggy Greening who was here in the Spring.”

Rosie sat grum in her window-seat, gazing out at the cedar with its branches bound in chains.

“Peggy herself confessed to me that she is gone on his eyes,” continued Anne, “because they are of such a fabulous blue, she said, and make such a fascinating colour-picture with his sunburnt face. What do you think?”

Rosie made no reply.

“But I think his teeth are too long, Rosie,” proceeded Anne: “they are nice and white, but one of the front ones is irregularly grown, and over-laps; and they are rather too long, don’t you think?”

Rosie said nothing.

“And, really, his brow lacks breadth,” said Anne.... “What I like best about him is that bit of bottom-lip shewing between the two wings of his moustache. He has a firm mouth. Yes, that’s beguiling to a girl’s fancy, I think, don’t you?”

“I know nothing about it,” muttered Rosie in a tone almost too low to be heard.

“But it must be confessed that Arthur hasn’t acted quite well toward O’Shannon,” observed Anne: “I heard this afternoon — have you heard?”

“What about Shan O’Shannon now, Anne?” asked Rosie.

“Arthur for some cause or other has turned him off the estate, as I have heard to-day from Mr. Cochrane, has sent him a cheque for £200, and at the same time O’Shannon has received from a gentleman in Somersetshire the offer of a keeper’s place down there, so Arthur must have asked this gentleman to make this offer, for how otherwise could the existence of O’Shannon be known in Somersetshire? I am sorry for poor O’Shannon, aren’t you?”

“Why should I be sorry, Anne? The man is nothing to me.”

“Your cousin, Rosie.”

“Oh, cousins aren’t made in heaven; he will have £200, and a new place. But — has he said anything?”

“The poor fellow is hardly any more in his senses, Rosie, if what old Pruie tells me is true: he has returned Arthur’s money, has written to Somerset to refuse the new place, has lately been seen taking aim with his fowling-piece at trees in the deeps of the brakes, whatever that may mean, and Wallas even doubts whether he is ‘quite right’ in the head this last week. I divine that he may be rather a terrible sort of carle to drive to extremities, don’t you? — and I confess I don’t like this firing of his fowling-piece at trees when he believes that no one is about, particularly as Pruie says now that he doesn’t eat or go home at night, but roams over the fields like a bogy possessed by fiends. I don’t know if this is in any way due to you, Rosie; a girl’s play may end in the grimmest earnest, you know—”

But now Rosie broke into tears and anger, crying out: “Oh, go and eat your hat! why should you take a delight in teasing me?” whereupon Anne, hearing Rosie’s meal approaching, and seeing Rosie teased to tears, now stole out pleased, and tripped down to her dinner.

III. SHAN IN ACTION

SEPTEMBER MOVED ON towards its end, and darker every hour brooded the war-cloud; from Britain, from India, troopships were crowding the sea-routes toward Africa; President Kruger had dismissed his Raad with the words: "war is certain"; by the 20th the commandos had been mobilized, the railways taken over, the rush from Johannesburg begun; a gold-train was raided and grabbed by the fury of the God-goaded Kruger; and we others were calling out our reserves. Among the army-regiments under marching orders was Arthur's.

Arthur's heart was now divided within him; he could remain behind if he cared to, and had made up his mind to remain: but after he had made it up, an outcry had arisen: "We shall lose South Africa!" for the Cape Dutch were shaky, which side the negro might choose was on the knees of the gods, it began to be feared that that flock of cultivators might prove thicker skulls to crack than people had believed, and a wave of warm-heartedness was sweeping out our little lords and landlords, to war. Arthur therefore was eager to go and endure hardness with the rest, and he was eager to stay just where he was, in that Rosie Jones was over-sweet. He was pulled both ways many times every day.

But his waverings were solved for him by the way things went at Glanncourt between the 2nd and the 10th of October.

On the 2nd, when a few visitors remained late into the afternoon in the so-called "small" drawing-room at the Hall, Arthur, after talking with them awhile, suddenly on some excuse went away and left them to Anne Hine:

the moment therefore that Anne was free, she sped upstairs to see if Rosie was in her room, for she scented a rendezvous, knowing that once before this Rosie had broken prison, and was not surprised to find that Rosie, though there, was evidently preparing for a flight. Anne at once went away with a view to wait upon events, and Rosie, the moment she was once more alone, shot one eye at a little ivory clock, and was up for action, though there were still some minutes to spare, in which she put on three different hats, so placed her mirrors as to be able to inspect her back, and when the spare minutes which beforehand had seemed an age to wait through were fled like one moment in these cares, she now suddenly found herself late, and was flying to and fro in a flurry of haste, filling the room with her fury to be off.

Now she was outside, and now this keenness all at once yielding to caution, she went on tip-toe, all ears, all leers, a thief in the night, fleet yet shy, till she was down stealing through the drawing-room, then through the conservatory on the western house-wall, whence, taking the plunge into the open, she made one dart northward toward the Old Garden, a seraglio of box-twigg arches, in which she wheeled westward, raced down to the very bottom, and down there, between a fernery and a summer-house, found harbour in Arthur's arms.

It was past half-past six of a hazy gloaming, growing dark, and "I daren't stay — only to see you—" Rosie panted on broken breaths.

"There's nearly twenty minutes, don't be afraid—"

"But, dear, Anne—"

"Don't care, sweet, let's think of nothing — for me there's no room for any thought — Do you know, I have been in rather a stew, I was afraid you mightn't come, that some ill-wind might arise somehow — but here you are quite all right — how good and gallant of you—"

“Oh, I don’t feel that this is a good place,” Rosie said, “if anyone were to pass just there at the top of the garden—”

“Let’s go, then, into the shrubbery.”

But at that moment, as they turned, Rosie uttered a sound, for there, gazing at them over the south wall of the shrubbery, some few yards north of them, she saw a face, and she saw a gun-barrel.

A face wrung with many pangs, many passions, that face of Shan....

“God, Arthur, go,” gasped the girl, in one instant ghastly to her lips.

Arthur, too, his eyes tied to that sight on the wall, stood paralysed at it; and even when the gamekeeper with a swing and a spring was over the coping, and in the garden was darting at the pair of gallants, still Arthur with a pale smile remained paralysed, with one hand holding Rosie away. As to Shan, he seemed not to see Arthur at all, but rushing to Rosie, said in a tone of astonishment, “Hello, what’st doing, Rosie?”

A moment afterwards his fingers closed on her right arm in so agonizing a grasp that she could hardly suppress the cry which started to her lips; and as her mouth parted to cry, or ever she had vented a sound, down upon Shan’s knuckles came the cane of her lover.

“What is it, O’Shannon?” said Arthur, “have you taken leave of your senses?”

To this Shan made no reply, drew back a little from the garden-path into a flower-border whose flowers his boots crushed, and, his face hung quite down, dashed his gun to the ground, as if aiming to knock down something with it; and there he remained a little while, swinging his face from side to side, as if not knowing what in the world to do next, while Arthur, palely smiling, looked at him, and Rosie covered her face with both her hands, as if to banish from her sight that which she felt to be coming.

It lasted perhaps half a minute, till Shan, looking sharply up, stepped forward toward Arthur, aying vehemently: “So this is how it was.”

“O’Shannon,” said Arthur, smiling ever at him, “you are to get away at once.”

“So this is how it was,” said Shan again, still more vehemently.

“I have spoken, you know, O’Shannon,” said Arthur: words at which suddenly now all Shan’s blood swarmed up into his face, till he was almost brown with passion, and out he broke into a cruel laugh, crying: “Yes, the rogues: the Almighty has spoken! and everybody must go and do as they say, because they are sons of fathers who were murderers and robbers of the earth, and they themselves are so confirmed in robbery, they think it nothing to rob a man’s heart out of his bosom—”

“Now, O’Shannon!” said Arthur, cutting this short, his cane smacking his calf: “you must not make yourself a public pest; nothing resembling a wrong has been done you, and you have to take yourself off this instant.”

This again appeared to have the effect of making the gamekeeper fly into yet greater anger, and he cried: “Yes! do as the king says!” and he cast up his arms and stamped, crying: “No wrong! Lord, no wrong!” Then he called Arthur a coward, showing how Arthur had dealt double that morning when he brought Arthur the present of the salmon and partridges: “for,” said he, “it wasn’t any Mrs. Gordridge that’s ‘queer,’ it wasn’t because she’s ‘as good as Mrs. Gordridge’s daughter,’ and I wasn’t to be ‘too ambitious,’ no, it was you yourself that was wambling after her, to her humbling, but you lacked the pluck to splutter what was sick in you, man to man. O, that’s bad,” he said, “when a man’s not straight, O, that’s ratsbane, that’s a grim drug,” he said again and again, groaning radically, “O, that’s drastic, that’s damned.”

Arthur so far had said hardly anything, but at last, flushing, he said to Shan: "O'Shannon, you have been told to go away, don't let me have to tell you again, or I shall have to thrash you."

"Will you that?" cried Shan, starting; "don't suppose because we were both born in one night, and you've been sick, I'd keep my hands off you!"

Upon this Arthur, cutting the air once with his cane, said in a final tone: "Now, O'Shannon."

"Thrash away!" cried Shan, "don't be afraid! thee couldn't cut so deep as thee's cut already, shame on thee," and as that "shame on thee" passed his lips, the Rubicon was crossed, two steps darted Arthur to bruise him over the head, while from Rosie's startled heart broke half a cry, half a sob.

"That's good!" shouted Shan as the cane came down, "give'n to me," and as Arthur gave him another athwart the neck, again Shan O'Shannon called, "that's the way! give the dog a lesson!" and once again was the cane raised, though not this third time to strike, Arthur turning toward Rosie, calling: "Come."

She went after him all with a whitish visage, passing behind Shan, who stood with his brow on the summer-house trellis, and at the north side of the garden they passed under the shrubbery wall, and through a gate into the shrubbery itself, where Arthur said to Rosie: "Don't be afraid any longer, darling, it is all over, and shan't ever happen again—" he being rather short of breath, which she perhaps perceiving, lifted her hand, which he held, so as to kiss his, but in that very act was conscious through every nerve that she was observed, and Shan at her anew....

Shan had come dancing mad, and as tactical as a cat, so that at the instant of that contact between lips and hand, before they could even look, he was between the two, saying: "No, you can't have it all your own way: if thee'st anything of a wight, let's fight it out for her" — and now they could hear his teeth squeak together with eagerness.

"O'Shannon," said Arthur, calmly enough, though he was blanched, "don't you dare molest me, or I'll break every bone in your body."

"That's a cock!" cried Shan, "let's fight for it, and let the finest lad of the pair take her." Arthur looked at him under the eyes, and, "Well," he said after ten seconds, "I'll admit now that you have some grounds to feel aggrieved, and if you believe that a thorough drubbing will bang it all clean out of you, I am not disinclined to do that much for you."

"But it is I who is going to drub you, look," said Shan, "if only you hadn't been ailing, if only I was good egg enough to lay the weight of this little finger upon you."

"For shame, Shan O'Shannon, to talk to Mr. Arthur," Rosie with a clearing of the throat now adventured to suggest in a fragile tone of voice, "I shall be sorry for you if you do."

To her Shan gave no answer, but said in an agony to Arthur: "You hear her? that girl? You have turned her all dead against me now! She means to say that you may do whatever you like to her and to me, but if I just dare to touch you, it will be a case of gaol for me."

"No," answered Arthur with a stern face, caning his calf: "no gaol; Rosie will not speak of it, it shall be a secret between us three."

But now she, seeing what was about to come, turned coward, catching at Arthur's arm, saying "Ah, Arthur, do not think of having anything to do with such a brute—" at which word "brute" Shan laughed, and striking on Arthur's shirt-front with his fingers, chuckling, he asked: "I say, is it the best man of the two who shall have her?"

Arthur's face went all wrathful at this, and dashing away Shan's fingers from his chest, he answered: "Yes, I give you my word, the better of the two” — he being a boxer, and it being the essence of his creed that an aristocrat can ever beat and do as he pleases to a plebeian, though Rosie, for her part, knowing something of Shan O’Shannon, understood in her heart that Arthur ought never to have so far pledged himself; however, she had not the chance to say a word, for now Arthur, turning to her, whispered her: “You run away, Rosie, and await me over there behind the bend; I will soon have this brute drubbed humble and tame—” in saying which his moustache brushed Rosie’s cheek in a sort of kiss, and in the moment of that touch, Shan shoved his shoulder.

No hard shove — hardly a shove: but in that very moment war broke out; at the sound and view of which thing Rosie fled away from them, having never dreamed that two human beings could be so brutish rude to each other, but soon ran back to the fracas, then fled away anew, a little way to and fro, distracted, with slight little cries of “O!” and “Help!” and “Don’t!” and through all the age that it lasted she was unable to look straight at them, but anon caught glances as through scarlet glasses, seeing blood-guilt, seeing Arthur grounded... he appeared not to be able to keep on his feet at all, each time she gave her eyes a peep, there he was, down again, and as down he went, out leapt her thin howl for him. Shan O’Shannon seemed never to miss, to be able to measure his distance as a machine without fail, his two feet moving about as one, never changing their space between, his two fists rolling like wheels in eccentric rotation, his neck twisted somewhat to the right, his eyes fixed to the left upon his enemy with a malign aspect; and thrice the very same thing took place over again, each time with the same grief to Arthur, when Arthur, striking far forth with the left arm and the whole weight of his body a blow, which, if it had caught Shan’s face, must have smashed it, Shan dodged it by a duck to the right, and pressing on Arthur’s extended left arm with his own left, span Arthur quite round, exposing his left ribs, into which Shan now drove with his own right a pounding cross-counter which stretched the other low; thrice: and that last time there followed an omen of disaster that Rosie, though at that moment some distance off, was distinctly aware of — a crackling, like the brittle breaking-in of a box, a little uproar of broken ribs; after which it was a full minute before she was able to look at all that way again, and then, looking, she saw Arthur lying quite quiet on the ground, and she saw Shan O'Shannon crouched by the side of Arthur, with his throat strained right back, poring straight up at the clouds, howling out "Oh-h, Oh-h, Oh-h," like a hound howling over the drowned. In some moments, however, he sprang up and went running past Rosie like a wild thing without his hat, holding his brow between both his hands, and immediately after him she, too, scared out of her wits to be all alone with what lay there quite quiet on the ground, rushed with her wild white face round into the garden-path out of the shrubbery, gibbering something where there was no one near to hear her.

Now, Anne Hine, meantime, was out, had passed through the top (east) part of the Old Garden at about the very time when, unseen by her, Arthur and Rosie before the fight were leaving the bottom part of it in order to enter the shrubbery, and shun the presence of Shan; in ignorance of which, with eager ears and prospect, Anne ran on across the road which separates the Old Garden and the New, and passed into the New through a gate in its great wall. Her eyes ran through the enclosure, which was not thickly wooded, and catching no sight of Rosie and Arthur, she thought to herself, "they are in the rockery" — a grotto all adrip round a pond of gold-fish at one end of the row of hot-houses under the north garden-wall — and thither Anne made, strolling now, lingering to gaze over a flower or plum-espalier, lest any eyes in her hot-houses, chancing to see her, might divine her spying mind.

She passed into the hot-houses by the east entrance, walked through the peaches, orchids, bananas, the vinery, and, stepping over the rocks in the fish-pond, emerged at the western extremity of the houses without having encountered a soul, so back, southward she now returned with brisker feet and an even keener appetite to find out what was what, and in which deep nook sweetmeats were being eaten that evening.

She was soon to know, since, as she once more got out into the road between the two gardens, she met an old body known as “Pruie,” Shan’s housekeeper, and noticing rather a ghastliness in Pruie’s skin, Anne asked her what was wrong.

This old Pruie replied: “It’s Mr. O’Shannon! I have just come on him — lying—”

“Catch your breath!”

“Under that beech-tree on the rise aboove we; when I did speak to’n, him didn’t make no reply, and when I did shake’n, er did only moan—”

Anne’s quick instincts working urgently two seconds, in the third she said: “Is he hurt?”

“Him do have some cuts....”

“I’ll go to him,” and at once she passed into a gate in the north shrubbery-wall, in order to race through the shrubbery as the nearest way to the “rise,” but in speeding down a path in the shrubbery, the sound of a rush of footfalls crushing through crisp leaves of Autumn caused her to look round to her right, and down in an alley she saw Rosie arise out of haze, flying with a wild face. A moment more, and Rosie was moaning on her shoulder.

“What, not in your room, Rosie?” said Anne; “whatever is the matter?”

“He is half killed — !”

“Not Arthur?”

“I left him on the ground — I couldn’t stand it—”

“But don’t be hysterical! just tell one what has happened. You see now, Rosie—”

“He is on the ground, he didn’t reply when I spoke to him—”

“Come shew me—”

“Down there in the round place—”

Both now bolted down an alley until Rosie? pointing at a spot on the road, panted: “there!” but nobody was to be seen when they came to the spot, only someone’s cap lying on the ride; and by the twilight still reigning between the trees Anne was able to perceive blood-smears on some leaves.

“There is no one,” said Anne with surprise, and now the other, without making any reply, failed and fainted quite away, whereat Anne gripped and lowered her down, and, crouching to hold her up, murmured over the unconscious girl: “Yes, it’s a darling penny-farthing face, and the lips are just made for playing Box and Cox with Arthur’s; but they mustn’t, the gods and I be jealous. This serves you right, and him, too, for forbidden fruit isn’t all honey of Hybla, you see, and I’m rather glad in my heart, whatever it is that has happened.... There’s blood on the ground... if a little could be drawn in a sound trouncing from miss, too, that should prove cooling to the passions. It’s blood that makes romance, and I have none, scarcely enough to make me yuck and sicken for more —

Come, you’ve got to get up, I can’t stay here all night admiring you. She is quite wannish now, looking as divine as whitish violets; if I could love, I’d devour her mouth....”

Rosie, being shaken, now unfolded her large orbs, and stared about.

“Where is Arthur?” asked Anne.

“There!” cried Rosie, indicating the place where she had left him lying.

“But he isn’t, you see. Come, pull yourself together, Rosie.”

“Has he got up?”

“Evidently.”

“I must have fainted....”

“Come, try to get up. Let us go that way and look.”

Anne grasped Rosie’s arm while again they ran, this time into the Old Garden, where, though no Arthur was visible there, more marks of blood showed that he had gone that way, and when they had rushed across the garden, they beheld the back of someone resembling him through the evening murks just entering the conservatory, apparently with very staggering feet, for the figure seemed to reel from side to side.

By the time they got to the house, the figure was again out of sight, had gone in, and Arthur had been taken up to his apartments by some flunkeys, one of whom Anne met pelting down the stairs to send for Dr. Blood.

A few moments afterwards both Anne and Mrs. Gordridge were at Arthur’s bed, the rumour of it had gone out, and the Hall was all in a hush of awe, no one having any notion how it had happened, for Arthur, in a half-unconscious way, could not, or would not, answer any questions.

Having tasted of a late and lonely dinner, Anne then made her way to Rosie’s room, saying on her entrance, “There’s no necessity for so much distress, Rosie,” — for Rosie was stretched on her sofa, still inconsolable — “besides his broken ribs, he has two black eyes, it is true, with quite a kaleidoscope of bruises, and has been well peppered on the whole, but Dr. Blood declares that he will be up in some days... Come, tell me about it....”

Rosie now tried to dry her eyes, and slowly told the whole story.

“Well,” said Anne, having heard, “thank Heaven, there has been no murder, as there might easily have been; anyhow, the fight clears the air, for you now definitely revert to Shan O’Shannon, Rosie, it would seem, by right of conquest.”

“Do I?” answered Rosie, drying her eyes: “I’ll shew him reverting.”

“But since Arthur gave his word,” remarked Anne, “that, of course, is final for him.... I must go back to him....”

“But, Anne, you won’t tell that it was Shan O’Shannon, will you? Arthur said that I wouldn’t—”

“No, I don’t intend to tell—” and now Anne sped away down to play her part in all the pother of the house.

IV. SHAN MAKES A VOW

IT WAS ON that same day that Shan and Arthur fought that President Stein forwarded to Sir Alfred Milner a note giving him to know that he was mobilising his burghers; whereat, some days afterwards, on this side, reserves for our first army-corps were called out; Parliament was summoned: and from that to the war was an affair on only some three or four days.

All those eight days before the outbreak of war, Arthur had lain abed, for the paws of Shan had proved bruising; and still Shan was as large, for Arthur would not tell out how he had got his flogging.

“I wonder why he won’t tell,” Mrs. Gordridge said to Anne Hine, on the 6th (October), three days before the Boer ultimatum: “but it could have been nobody except Shan O’Shannon; and O’Shannon must be sent to Gloucester for it.”

“I fancy, Aunt,” said Anne, “that Arthur may have promised O’Shannon before the fight not to take any steps—”

“Nonsense, the man must be properly punished,” said the old lady; “he has my admiration, of course, for, if I had been he, I should have acted just as he has; but, then, I am not he, and, being myself, I want my paltry revenge.”

“You are quite right, Aunt, as you always are,” remarked Anne.

“Who ever heard of such an impertinence?” asked the old lady: “I am a Socialist myself, but I’ll permit nobody on the estate to presume to share my views. O'Shannon shan't be at large another day, so send presently to the village, and tell Morgan I want him."

"Yes, Aunt. But suppose Arthur goes to the war, after all? it might be convenient to have O'Shannon here to marry Rosie..."

"But what puts it into your head that Arthur may go to South Africa now?" asked Mrs. Gordridge.

"I have a fancy that he may," answered Anne: "he has been keen on the newspapers the last day or two—"

"Oh, everybody lying abed is keen on newspapers. He isn't rushing out to any war; and I have made up my mind to pack Rosie off to Sheila in Quang Chow."

"Quite so, Aunt — unless Arthur were to scent her out there... The safest of all, it strikes me, would be her marriage with O'Shannon, for nothing can get over the fait accompli of marriage; and it is quite on the cards that Arthur will go in the excitement, if war does break out: you wait and see: he is disgusted with everything for permitting himself to be drubbed, and seems to have really given up Rosie for the moment."

"Hasn't he made any effort at all to see her since the struggle?" asked Mrs. Gordridge.

"No, Aunt; he has sent her one note by Price, I know, but it couldn't have been a very hopeful one, for she has been specially crabappish ever since; I haven't seen it, she keeps it somewhere about in the region between blouse and chemise."

"You are not to spy upon that poor child, Anne," said Mrs. Gordridge with a cross mouth, "I can't bear a snake-in-the-grass.... But it's odd that he hasn't wanted her to go to him, he must be waiting till he gets well again. It would be interesting to know what was in that note of his; just try to find out; girls should be able to worm out things without exactly being snakes-in-the-grass.... No, he isn't going out to any South Africa, no such freak of luck, so do what I tell you as to O'Shannon, and have Morgan here."

"Aunt," said Anne, "you are sure to be right," and to herself she added: "Darling old blinkard, you are always too bunged up with selfwill to have the least insight into other people's minds."

Anne herself walked down to Albington that afternoon to see Morgan, the bobby, and though Morgan was not then to be found, the morning after, the 7th, he walked up to the Hall, and had a talk with Mrs. Gordridge; and now those clouds which lowered over Shan's brow gathered angrily to burst upon it, not without wide whispers and murmurings, in spite of the furtiveness with which the first measures were entered upon. By noon of the 9th the policeman was at Shan's place with his piece of blue paper.

But it was one thing to go to arrest Shan, and another thing to arrest him. During the gloaming of the 10th, Anne broke into the room of Rosie, who had morosely got sick, brimming with the story of the struggle which had been going on at Shan's cottage, going on in the shrubberies, going on actually among the rocks in the brook, during two long days: on the first of which Shan had fled, and there had been no catching him, than on a sudden he had offered himself, and had said, "take me, if you can."

"They, haven't got him even now," said Anne Hine all in a glee, "I have been looking on among the crowd from the tump of the Morplepiece, and he has been giving the whole four of them beans."

"But the man must be mad, shame ought to cover his face," remarked Rosie.

"He isn't bad," observed Anne Hine with her tart smile: "he peppers them all well: if I was a girl of the people, that's the gallant the turn of my fancy might find pleasing."

“But what can he mean by carrying on like a mad thing, upsetting the whole place like this, and Mama Gordridge been always so good to him? shame ought to cover his face: he is only making it hotter for himself.”

“I know the poor fellow’s motive,” answered Anne: “he fancies that it is Arthur who is prosecuting him after promising not to, and this has embittered and turned him turbulent.”

“But does Arthur know of it?”

“Not a syllable: Aunt Margaret won’t have him told; but that is what O’Shannon believes, I am convinced, and his rebellion against the queen is really a raging against Arthur; I can quite divine the man. Old Pruie says that he has groaned ‘false’ to himself in the night-time: so that’s it. He doesn’t suspect that Arthur starts to-morrow — I suppose you know, Rosie, that war has been declared to-day?”

“War has? I hadn’t been informed.”

“And Arthur is off out to fight, Rosie.”

“Arthur is?”

“Yes, Rosie.”

“To fight, is he?”

“Yes, no more Arthur now. I have only this moment been told, and pelted to tell you.... He is still in bed, but means to get up in the morning, and will start in the evening.”

“But not to-morrow he won’t start?”

“Yes, to-morrow; but you still have a whole night in the same house with him — there she goes, all ghastly: don’t be a goosie, now, Rosie; it is only like wanting chocolat Ménier for breakfast, and not being able to get it.”

Rosie stole all on ache to her casement, nothing more remaining to her now, her day suddenly dark and done, and such a sound of distress gushed out of her, that Anne ran and hugged her a little, saying, “goosie, you must take it standing up, it isn't so much, the trouble won't last a month, and nobody is to be butchered, then he will return nice and sunburnt, and there'll be more bon-bons, maybe—”

“Anne, don't,” replied Rosie in pain, “I'm only a poor orphan all out in the cold without father or mother, I have nothing to do with anything, nothing is any affair of mine...”

“Silly,” said Anne, pinching her chin: “I didn't think you'd cut up so badly: don't I assure you that you'll soon see him....”

But in this Anne proved not so shrewd a prophet as she usually was, for the “troop of boors” meant to approve themselves brave men and a famous foe, so that, save when Rosie caught a back-view of Arthur for a moment from her casement on his departure for the station, she saw him no more for many a month. He left for his love one little last letter, in which, however, were no vows, nor one hope held out of happiness in store: and he went away.

It was five of a wild gloaming, the 10th of the month, that gloaming momentous with war in the memory of many, the heavens all amove on a voyage of heaviness, like caravans with convoys, and armies on the march with baggage, all gloomily bugled by north-winds. Arthur started off on foot for the station together with Anne Hine and his man, Price, one piece of sticking plaster still adhering there on his right cheek, while Mrs. Gordridge, with Dr. Blood and the Rev. Mr. Orrock, eyed him till he disappeared behind the stables. A little beyond the stables he passed through a little iron gate betwixt the north-west covert and the home-farm, whence one path went south into the turnpike road, and so to the village, and a second plunged west down a broken bit of ground, at the bottom of which wound the brook; this latter was much the nearer way to the station, but just here Anne suggested the village-way.

“No, I want to have some time to see to the trunks and things,” replied Arthur: “we’ll go over the Morplepiece — unless you have some reason?”

“I am not sure of it now,” was Anne’s answer, “but I fancy that Aunt Margaret might prefer you to go by the village-way.”

“Mysterious chit you are, Anne,” remarked Arthur: “ever with some secret streak in your mind’s eye to smile to yourself over: you have the genius of the Russian court.... Why ever should mother have any preference?”

“It doesn’t matter,” muttered Anne: “let us take the Morplepiece way, since you like....” The country thereabouts is extremely broken, all mountains, and this Morplepiece a meadow climbing like a bowl on the farther bank of the brook, some way up the brook-valley on a spur of the Morplepiece being Shan’s cottage, with the pheasant-pens and the woodard’s cottage: so that Arthur had not gone far down the broken ground in the direction of the brook before he began to come upon tokens of the brigade still going on between Shan and the queen. First, under an oak he observed lying in a pile the five bikes that had brought over one of the Lydney and four of the Ebbstow police, then he came upon a cart waiting ready to receive the rebel, then, where the wood cleared a little down by the brook, could see the crowd on the tump of the Morplepiece, and lastly, some yards from Shan’s cottage, could see the very press of battle — the six bobbies and something tumbling in their midst. They had won Shan into the open at last, and the end was near now.

“What is it all about?” asked Arthur, stopping to look at the little scene far off.

“It is O’Shannon being arrested, Arthur,” answered Anne: “this is the third day that they have been trying to take him, and can’t. First there was Morgan from Albington alone, then another one came, then two more, and now there are six of them. I am glad to see you look so pleased, I'm sure...."

"Pleased about what?" asked Arthur quickly. "How should I know? I dare say you are feeling that it is no disgrace for one man to be thrashed by a gallant who can thrash six."

"Who has been thrashed by whom? What has this O'Shannon done to be grabbed by these police people?"

"Grievous bodily harm, it is said, Arthur."

"To whom?"

"To you, it is said, Arthur."

"But — why have I been told nothing of this before?"

"Aunt Margaret—" began Anne, but now a noise of voices among the mob of loiterers on the Morplepiece maundered down the valley on the breezes, for Shan had just been floored, whereat Arthur, without waiting to hear more, hastened over the slab-bridge of the brook, and northward up a foot-path to the scene of the fracas. He found Shan down on his back with his chest gasping beneath two of the policemen's knees, the other men trampling about him like a group of people scrambling for pennies, everyone with drabbled garments and bloody sweats, particularly the poor prisoner, who, all red and ragged, was very grimly mauled; but at the sight of Arthur there was a slight pause and suspending of effort, for the men all knew him well, and he said to them, caning his calf, "well, but what is all this, men?"

"Taking Shan O'Shannon for the assault on you, sir," panted Morgan, a fatty mass of matter, not fit for too much fisticuffs.

"This is odd," said Arthur: "on whose charge is the man to be tried?"

"On Mrs. Gordridge's, sir."

“I see.... But on what evidence? I never told anyone that the man had assaulted me; in fact, you are to let him alone, he hasn’t assaulted me.”

“But then, sir—” began Morgan.

“Just come here,” said Arthur, who had stopped some yards short of the struggle, and, having drawn Morgan apart, he impressed it upon him that O’Shannon was on no account to be imprisoned, put into Morgan’s hand some gold, and ran back down the path with a glance at his watch, muttering as he met Anne Hine, “great nuisance, I have lost eight minutes now, we shall have to hurry; perhaps you had better go back, Anne....” Anne, however, went still some way with him up to the tump of the Morplepiece and beyond, till the pace became too great for her, when she was hurriedly kissed by Arthur, who said to her, “good-bye, take care of yourself and of mother, and — just look after poor Rosie for me, won’t you?”

“All right,” said Anne Hine, “take care of yourself, meliorque revertere.”

“Within four months, I hope,” answered Arthur, and he and his man went away in haste.

By this time the policemen, having laid their heads together, had agreed among themselves as to how the land lay, Shan was provisionally at large, most of the crowd gone away, and Anne was almost down at the brook once more on her way home when she noticed Shan in some bush on the other shore, with his nose to a beech-bole which he was holding with both his arms; he seemed to be beating his already bruised brow upon the bark of the beech, for his delivery from the law by Arthur had very powerfully moved Shan; and the sly Anne, with her insight into the mind of her neighbour understanding that this must be the case, and impelled by her passion for pinching and playing the Puck to pain, passed close to Shan, and remarked: “it is you, Mr. O’Shannon.”

Shan glared round at Anne with a gaze of sorrow, the sour grumness of gaze of the ox struck down in the ring, without making any answer.

“I am so glad, Mr. O’Shannon,” she said, “at the lucky way things have gone: I only trust it will be a lesson to you never more to encourage morose and rebellious emotions. You see, Lieutenant Gordridge, for his part, was wholly ignorant of the charge made against you, and the moment he knew he most magnanimously gave himself the pains to save you, though he might quite well have felt inclined to stand aloof in such a case.”

Still Shan stood dumb.

“Well, all’s well that ends well,” Anne went on: “I take it that the whole misery has arisen through a mistaken notion on your side of Lieutenant Gordridge’s motives, for you grossly misjudge him if you imagine that he meant to trifle at all with Rosie Jones. There is no better fellow, no more gracious and noble spirit than Lieutenant Gordridge, and it must grieve him, I think, that you, of all people, should have misjudged him.”

“What are you saying, Miss Hine?” Shan at last asked.

“What I know,” replied Anne with her smile: “poor Lieutenant Gordridge had a really very serious regard for Rosie Jones, and has frequently expressed to Mrs. Gordridge his will to marry her immediately.”

“Marry?”

“Why, yes, though that’s all over and done with now — through you. Since your mauling of him, he has not even once seen her, owing to some undertaking made to you, I believe, and you can conceive, can’t you, what they both have borne. Did you notice Lieutenant Gordridge just now, how very gaunt he is looking? As you are aware, he was always a spoiled child, he gets quite sick if his whims are foiled, and this time a heart of iron might have felt for him, night after night, all night, he has paced his chamber with bare feet, peevishly pining after Rosie Jones, so Price says, and it is you,

Mr. O'Shannon, who has driven him desperate now, and sent poor Lieutenant Gordridge out to the war."

"War?"

"Surely you know that Lieutenant Gordridge is just off to join his regiment, in order — Why, what is it?"

Shan looked electrified, started away from his tree, asking, "is it the 5.25?"

"Yes, but—"

But Shan was gone.

Pelting, he glanced at his watch — it had been smashed; he pulled up half a second, cast up his arms, distracted; then, catching sight of three bicycles lying under a tree, ran and whipped one of them to his shoulder, ran with it over the brook, ran with it up to the tump, and bestriding it at the top, with wild winds behind his back was swept away down in a cloud of dust.

He was just in time, on dashing into the tiny station, to find the train there ready to be off, and ran by the side of it, a wild-looking sight with his batteries and rags, till he came to the compartment wherein Arthur sat snug in wraps and rugs; and now Shan wrenched at the doorhandle — it was bolted; he beat at the window; and Arthur, letting it down, leaning out from his seat, said, "well, now, O'Shannon...."

Shan was so fearfully moved that he could hardly speak, precious as his moments were.

"I'm only a poor chap," were the first pants which Arthur could catch, and he murmured, "yes, yes, be quick."

"I didn't know," said Shan with catches of the breath, "I took it that you were not quite downright square with her, and you look pretty pale now, but I didn't know—"

“Don’t bother now, O’Shannon,” said the other.

“But hear a poor chap out, I’m only a poor chap—”

“Well, what is it?”

“You don’t realize all, look,” Shan contrived to say; “from my childhood, a fetich in my heart, you’d hardly imagine, if you don’t know, you and her, the two of you, no one knows, and what have I dared do now, and how you have paid me for it, it’s painful....”

“I see how it is. Well, then, here’s my hand: now there’s no bad blood left....”

“But you stay here,” Shan breathed at his fetich’s ear, “stay and—”

“Well?”

“Take her.”

“Rosie! You say that?”

“Yes, that’s serious, take her: I have said it.”

“Well, that’s wonderfully decently said!”

“Aye, that’s quite serious, you take her: when a thing’s once said, it’s said, and when a thing’s once done, it’s done.”

“But still — no,” muttered Arthur, “after all, I have given my word, she is yours now, I suppose, and altogether I wish you joy.”

“Always a brick! But you want her, don’t you? Who can escape it? it’s pitiful.... And — I hand her back to you.”

“I say, O’Shannon, you are, really — wonderfully decent.”

“Yes, that’s serious, I’ve said it now.”

“But still, I’m bound now, it seems, to go to the war—”

“Are you? Well, no doubt you are; of course, you are. Go, then, and I tell you what, I’ll — look after her for you till the day you get back.”

“Thank you, you are wonderfully good, thank you, thanks. But, I say, O’Shannon, come now, is that a promise upon which one may rely?”

“Yes, I’ve said it.”

“I’ll be back anyway in four months....”

“As soon as ever you like, I don’t mind, the sooner the sooner over for me, after all: she shall be yours when you come — say in four months’ time.”

“That’s a compact, then; I only hope that I’m not taking advantage of a moment’s generous impulse — no, I think not, that’s all right, for you would hardly send one away inflated with expectations which you did not fully intend to sustain for one. Listen, O’Shannon: it seems beastly to say now, but may be I’d better say it out: she’s hardly — eager to have you in that way, you could never get her quite easy and satisfied; facts are hard things, not always as we would ordain them, so there is nothing like reconciling oneself to them with a good grace, eh? So for her sake — Well, good-bye, thanks, thanks, don’t forget — !”

For the station-master, who would no longer wait, had waved his flag, and Shan ran forward with the running train, grasping Arthur’s hand, till the rate gathered and still gathered greatness, and left him there, and swept his friend away; but still he lingered on, gazing long over the rails, and at last turned to move homeward in so hopeless a mood of bereavement, so robbed and hollow of spirit, that when a policeman, meeting him at the cross-roads, morosely demanded his “machine,” Shan let the machine crash down at the man’s feet without speech, and moved on with a drooped brow.

In passing down the Morplepiece to his house, he was seen an instant by Mrs. Gordridge, who said of him to Anne Hine: “But what about Shan O’Shannon’s arrest? I declare I had forgotten all about the man in the excitement...”

She with her small court was at the far end of the stretch of land called The Meadows — a park really, though almost bare of trees in the middle — from which far end a piece of the railway was to be seen, and, watching the place where she had seen the train bear Arthur away, she was still waiting for nothing underneath the trees there, when for an instant she saw Shan.

Anne now told the story of how Arthur had gone to the rescue of Shan on his way to the train, to which Mrs. Gordridge made answer: "That is all right, then, for since Arthur declares that the man is innocent, of course he is, and I'll forgive him, if he is properly repentant. After all, Shan O'Shannon is part of the place, a most worthy person in his way, and, moreover, a man can't be cast out anyhow who is about to be a husband."

"Right," said the Rev. Mr. Orrock.

"And the quicker a husband the better," said Dr. Blood: "for this war won't last four weeks, I foresee."

"O'Shannon shall be married before the war has well begun," said Mrs. Gordridge, "for I don't believe in running risks, and leaving loopholes to chance."

"Right!" repeated the clergyman: "though personally I believe that the war will last six months."

"Four weeks, sir," repeated Dr. Blood.

"Here is a man," remarked Mr. Orrock, "who once said that it would never happen at all; I think he mentioned, if my memory is not at fault, that Providence would never permit it."

"Pardon me," replied Dr. Blood, "what I did say was, that, if Providence did permit it, it would never permit it to last, and what I have said I stick to."

"Yes, your Providence is a benevolent old soul up in the sky, who swoons at the sight of blood," replied Mr. Orrock.

"Well, Arthur is gone to the war," sighed Mrs. Gordridge to herself, gazing at the stretch of railway far off, "God go with him."

“Listen, Richard, listen,” whispered Dr. Blood: “she believes, if you don’t.”

“Don’t pretend not to comprehend,” answered the clergyman, with a rosy flush: “she believes, yes, but in a modern tone — which is all the difference. I also have every hope that God will go with him, for he goes, to begin with, with a box of bile beans which I myself placed in his waistcoat pocket —”

“Ach Gott!” chuckled Dr. Blood bitterly, “bile beans above every other abomination: catch Margaret or me gulping—”

“You are not to brangle, you two!” Mrs. Gordridge sharply said: “it’s a marvel that you don’t begin to grow weary of it.... Come on, he’s gone, it’s no use waiting here staring at two rails” — and with her court and dogs after her, the old lady hobbled off on her ebony stick for the Hall.

V. SHAN IN A NET

THE MORNING FOLLOWING Arthur's departure for the war was so warm, though in mid-Autumn, that Mrs. Gordridge that morning "administered the Gordridge family" from an arm-chair in a summer-house — that same Old Garden summerhouse close by which one evening Shan had swept down like a wheeling wind upon the meeting between the sweethearts. Thither Anne Hine had led the old lady's gouty toes, and stayed by her side while out of her island of shade she gazed at the blaze of light in which basked the arches flowers and bowers of the garden, and while one after the other she gave interviews to her land-steward, head-gardener, lady-housekeeper, to Morgan, the policeman, and sipped out of her glass of egg-nog, and was good and cruel capriciously to her Jap dogs. It was half-past eleven when, sighing free of all this, she said to Anne Hine: "Well, where is Rosie Jones? did you tell the child that I want her?"

"There she is just passing through the gate, Aunt," replied Anne.

"All right, you go away a little."

"Yes, Aunt," and Anne went, those two pencil-lines like brackets round her mouth expanding in a mincing little smile as she passed by Rosie on a path: for she knew what pill was in store now for poor Rosie's throat.

Rosie ran hatless, a halo of glare entangled in that golden snare of her hair, her sorrow in her gaze, and now at the summer-house door was asking, "Yes, Mama Gordridge?"

"Kiss me," said Mrs. Gordridge.

Rosie went in and did this.

“Sit there,” said Mrs. Gordridge, and Rosie being seated at her feet, wondering what now, with apprehensive eyebrows, as she shot flying glances up, Mrs. Gordridge added, “tell me: what are all the red eyes about?”

Rosie made no reply, tears springing to her eyes, her lip shaking, so the old lady pinched her cheek, saying: “This comes of locking you up like a prisoner, poor girl, and now the roses are gone all withered, though richly watered no doubt with showers out of the sky in the eyes — what? Well, but all’s well that ends well! So long as you are perfectly certain that it was no doing of mine...! since I only work for everybody’s happiness, and have to carry everybody’s burdens, so as to keep people from blundering and miscarrying; and what everybody will do when I am dead Heaven only knows. I had to lock you away from that hurricane, you know — not that I blame him one bit, for you’re undoubtedly a sweet little piece of pig-meat, good to eat between the teeth, and if I was a boy, I’d be after you myself, no doubt; but that gave me all the greater grounds for acting grimly, and may be you haven’t been so weeping a captive, after all, for haven’t you been out of the house to meet him once — or oftener?”

From Rosie’s bent face rose no breath in answer.

“I am not angry; let me hear.”

“Yes, then, Mama Gordridge.”

“Ah, you see, you can’t hide much from me: I know what you are thinking about in your bed at night when the lights are out.... So — how often did you meet him?”

“Twice.”

“You see: I knew. And — whereabouts did you meet him?”

“There, by the summer-house.”

“Exactly.... I have done the same thing myself before I was even sixteen, so don’t be so simple as to think that I am cross at anything, except at your supposing that I didn’t know all. Why ought I to be cross? Don’t you cry, it is all over now, and in three weeks and a half from now you will have forgotten all about it in your new home with your own husband.”

“Who will, Mama Gordridge?” asked Rosie, staring up with eyes of scare.

“Why, what’s the immoderate surprise about?” asked Mrs. Gordridge with a show of surprise: “aren’t you about to marry your cousin Shan?”

“I am, Mama Gordridge?”

“But isn’t that so, Rosie — dear? That’s what I took for granted! Is there any other solution which you can suggest?”

Rosie, as if she heard in some dream, sat twisted, staring up, unable to breathe a word, her face bleeding inwardly away, till she stared mere lily-flesh. Here was the last end of all her lingering dream of Arthur, and good-bye to everything, and such was her greatness of dismay, that over those glaucous eye-balls of Mrs. Gordridge the lids closed down a moment to shut out the sight of it, and she bent aside to sip, muttering with some impatience: “I hope you are not going to behave like a martyr, girl, for you must see that, though this war has come as a merciful thing to pick us all out of a tight place, since it will not be lasting long, Arthur will soon be back upon us, and if you are not then well married off, there may be no end of a rumpus: so you see why — you see why... Now, however, Rosie was suddenly down on her knees, pleading, “Oh, please, Mama Gordridge, don’t allow me to go through this, please!”

On this, Mrs. Gordridge, her eyes averted from that perfect heart-cry, scratched the neck of a dog, then drew Rosie to a stool, drew Rosie’s head to her shoulder, and smoothed and soothed it, cooing: “Foolish old thing!

What, wouldn't you like to be a sweet little wife? Or is it that you don't like this Shan O'Shannon?"

"Oh, I don't wish to be married!" went Rosie.

"What, not to be a mistress of your own home? and have a pink pickaninny to spank and pamper? and a hulking husband to bully and stamp at? and to be always near your mama? for I shan't ever let you be far from my side."

"But oh, not to Shan O'Shannon, I couldn't stand Shan O'Shannon!" cried Rosie.

"Why, since when?" asked Mrs. Gordridge: "you liked him well enough before you got bitten by Arthur, you were aware that I had given you to him, and you gave your assent to it. You see, it is only a whim....We women are such fowl to imagine that our craze for trousers in general is a craze for one particular pair! Why, I didn't like my husband when I married him! I was mad after a dancing little barrister man! but I soon understood that Julius Gordridge was as good for me as anybody, for it is the duty of a woman to use her head, too, a little, and you will soon be quite fond—"

"Ah, never!"

"But, Rosie? you contradict me, Rosie? I tell you that you will: do you imagine, then, that I don't know? But since you disdain O'Shannon for the moment, I should gladly get you some other mate, only where's the time? We should have to find the man, he would have to court you a little — before all which was over Arthur would be back upon us, and all the fat in the fire; so it can only be O'Shannon, you see. And isn't O'Shannon a lad that any girl should be glad of? sober, but no gawk, quick on the legs, larky with his knuckles and with the girls, they say — look what mince-meat he turned poor Arthur into, and how he tackled those six louts of policemen—"

“Oh, Mama Gordridge, you have forgotten how a girl feels,” pouted Rosie, her brow on Mrs. Gordridge’s shoulder.

“I?” breathed Mrs. Gordridge, shrinking: “what, am I so old? It is only like last week that I was flirting! I feel like thirty! And have I got to that now to ‘forget how a girl—’? Well, how the young do look down upon the old, just as the rich do upon the poor, or as English people upon negroes....”

“No, Mama Gordridge, I didn’t mean—”

“But the thing is this, child, that the wellbeing of Arthur, and mine, depends upon this business: well, when I say that, what answer can you find to make to me?”

Rosie could find no answer to make to her, but a sob broke from her bosom.

“Well, then, let us take that as settled; and now — Well, what is it, James?”

She spoke now to a man, who, coming to present a note on a tray, remarked that Underkippur Price had asked him to give it, a note which, as Mrs. Gordridge’s eyes moved over it, caused her mouth to go cross, and produce a sound of worry: — A note from Shan: referring to the corn-account, the pens, with a word as to poulters and wild-bred cocks, and the dividing of the work between the under-keepers, he, Shan, being off that very day with his belongings, seeing that he had previously received warning from Lieutenant Gordridge to quit, and was going accordingly....

“Kiss me,” said Mrs. Gordridge to Rosie the moment she had read it...”now run away, we’ll go more into it this evening,” and, Rosie gone, she whispered with a certain eagerness to the serving-man: “Run down to the headkeeper’s house, and say I want to see him here.”

Anne Hine, meantime, who had been pacing among the flower-beds, on noticing that pale thing that Rosie now was, pelting for the house to find some hole to cry in, came back to the summer-house, but was anew sent away by Mrs. Gordridge, just as the flunkey got back short of breath with the message that O'Shannon was hardly fit to be seen by a lady that day, being so gashed up (by the police), so would Mrs. Gordridge say in a message — “Go away,” said the old lady, “tell Miss Hine there to come,” and to Anne herself she said: “Fly down to O'Shannon's cottage, and tell him to be here immediately: don't come back without him so Anne went, and within ten minutes was back with Shan.

At the summer-house door, then, stands Shan, tall, a bandage, aslant beneath, his deer-stalker cap, covering his right eye; and, “yes, mum,” he said, wondering what now was up.

“Sit down, O'Shannon,” said Mrs. Gordridge. “So you are going, are you?”

“Yes, mum, I've been dismissed.”

“Where are you going to?”

“I'll be lodging with my uncle on the Chase a bit, mum.”

“And then?”

“I'm throwing up kippuring, mum, for it isn't likely that any squire about here would take me now after all this row that's been, and as I don't mean to desert this neighbourhood, I must only turn my hand to some other work.”

“You see, O'Shannon, all this trouble through setting up yourself in antagonism to your betters.”

“Betters, Mrs. Gordridge? Isn't that rather an old-fashioned sort of word? By the purpose of the Maker and Urger of this world, there aren't any betters any more, mum, I give you my word.”

“So true: I forgot that... You shouldn’t be cheeky, O’Shannon! but I suppose you perceive that I am in your power now.”

“How in my power, mum? I only wish you were, I’d soon show you how fond I am of everything that owns the name of Gordridge” — of which saying Mrs. Gordridge, her eyes resting on his face, made a note in her mind.

“Well,” she said, “but isn’t all this business of leaving the estate merely a bit of bounce, since you must know that I want you now?”

“I didn’t know that, mum, thank you; anyway, I couldn’t stay, you know.”

“And why not?”

“What, in the same place with that girl that has turned her back on me? getting glimpses of her? hearing her speak, may be.... One is not a stock, mum. Here I couldn’t stay, nor wouldn’t.”

“Yet you just said that you meant to stay in the neighbourhood.”

“Not by my choosing though: I’d be away like a long-dog to Canada tomorrow, never again to see England so long as oak and ash do grow, if there wasn’t a young calf that I’d promised someone to keep half an eye on—”

“So you really meant to go away?”

“I did, Mrs. Gordridge, and do.”

“Well, you are not to.”

“Thank you very much, mum, I’m sure; you have always been the same to me somehow, marvellously kind and bounteous, and I wish now I could stay, since you ask me to.”

“You are to remain where you are, O’Shannon.”

“But, mum, haven’t I told you? It’s hard enough to me to go from Glanncourt, and I wish to heaven it was only half possible—”

“Be quiet, O’Shannon: I have both my hands full of joy and happiness for you.”

“For me, mum?”

“Yes, for you.”

Shan, his eyes now cast upon the ground, chuckled a little grimly at this, and he said: “Why, Mrs. Gordridge, they say that there’s no happiness save in the grave, since all this creation’s a false show, where we take gudgeons when we fish for grilse.”

“Let the creation alone,” said the old lady, “the creation is a place with plenty of fun in it, at least for young people. O’Shannon, I am going to give you Rosie.”

Silence....

Shan, as the message of that gospel passed out of her mouth, had half started at her, as if to catch a ring falling, then had gradually sat again, while his jaws went quite white, and shook.

“You didn’t look for quite so much luck, I see,” said the old lady, her eyes on his face....

“Well, men seem to be cheap machines to be agitated over the possession of a peach; it is only what was promised you, O’Shannon—”

“Rosie?” breathed Shan, leaning secretly toward her.

“Yes, Rosie, the Princess Royal.”

“But she won’t have me!”

“She will.”

“Have you asked her? Has er said er would?”

“Yes, that’s all quite settled.”

At this Shan laughed within himself, a rather mad laugh, and he said: “What, to have her at last down there between the brook and the pens?”

“Quite so — between the brook and the pens, or wherever else you please to have her.”

He thought it over, and eyeing the carpet askance, he remarked: “For five years I’ve been hearing her feet about the empty house, seen her asleep, may be, with her hair untidy when I came in from night-watching, or winking at me, or making a face at things with her nose suddenlike, as she does: it’s a lonely little hole, too, the cottage, when one’s alone.”

“Well, that’ll soon be remedied, as I mean you to be married Tuesday next three weeks.”

“That’s not long,” said Shan, eyeing a spot on the carpet: “by then it can be all finished and done, and when she is once my wife, where’s the man that could say no to it?”

“Just so: marriage is like lock-jaw, fixed and final.”

“And the other one, now,” said Shan, leaning still more keenly out to speak secretly: “he’ll be none the wiser.”

“Precisely: that’s why I am hurrying things on, since he may be quicker back than—”

“Why, he may never be back! Many as fine a fellow has licked the dust in battle before today!”

“Oh, come, you wouldn’t wish him to be shot!”

“But suppose he is shot, he would never be the wiser, and suppose he isn’t shot, when he comes home and finds me safely wived, what can he say? His arms will be tied! I’ll laugh at him!”

“Be quiet, O’Shannon — But whatever is the matter with the man?” — for now Shan had covered his face, and the outburst of a sob convulsed his frame.

“Tell me — what is it?” asked Mrs. Gordridge, and when she got no answer, she added: “Better go home and get a nap, and then when you are more presentable, come and have a talk with Rosie.”

Now, however, Shan had sprung straight, and the vociferation of his “No!” made the old lady flinch, his face, of a rich red, shaking with passion as he stared at her.

“No what?” she asked: “you are not to startle me, O’Shannon.”

“I say No,” cried Shan anew.

“Well, say No as often as you feel disposed, but please don’t startle me.”

Shan stared at her, but now, his flare-up dying down, while the rich red bled out of his countenance, leaving it blanched, he now said meekly: “Forgive me, mum.”

“So what is the big No about?” asked Mrs. Gordridge.

“I don’t mean to marry Rosie Jones, mum, thank you,” replied Shan, with a short-breath’d bosom.

“What?”

“No, mum.”

“Oh, that’s lunacy: you go and get some sleep.”

“No, mum, that’s the truth: I don’t mean.”

“Then, what in God’s name am I to do with all these distraught people?” exclaimed Mrs.

Gordridge, spreading her palms, appealing to the ceiling; and Shan stood swinging his cap round and round on his forefinger.

“Come, O’Shannon,” said Mrs. Gordridge, “give one some sort of notion what gadfly has stung you now.”

“I say that I don’t mean to, Mrs. Gordridge: I don’t know that there is any reason which I could make quite clear to you.”

“But you know that Rosie Jones is almost like my daughter, that you will be a made man for life — I may mention that the dowry—”

“Oh, I know all that, Mrs. Gordridge, but the moor-game and grouse mate together without any dowry, nor I don’t think I was ever what could be called grasping—”

“No, no, I didn’t think that.... But what, then, has bitten you? Is it that Rosie is not for the moment furiously enamoured of you? I’ll admit that much, seeing that there has lately been a certain flirtation — but, come, I’ll let you into something: — she has only just confessed to me — just before you came, I declare it was — that she will soon come to like you, she said, after the marriage, because she admires your manly manners and independence of spirit, she said, your pretty way of using your pounders upon those louts of police-officers, your larky way of knocking around with all the girls, she said, of which she has heard, and you are a husband that any girl would be glad of, she said. So you see, O’Shannon. The darling child’s heart is, so to say, a fire waiting all laid for you; you have only to put a lucifer into it.”

Shan stood with his surprised forehead lifted and alight at this enlivening tidings!

“Rosie said that, mum...?”

“Rosie,” replied the old lady with an inclination of the closed eyes.

“What, this forenoon you mean? Just before I came here er said it?” he asked, curious for details.

“Just before. She’s all for you.”

“Bless her heart!” he cried half-laugh.

“Quite so. So now, O’Shannon, that much is settled, and I want you now to see Mr. Orrock as to the banns—”

But now Shan groaned aloud.

“Well, what now, O’Shannon?” Mrs. Gordridge asked.

“I couldn’t, Mrs. Gordridge!”

The old lady’s mouth now went cross, making a sound of vexation at the man, saying: “O’Shannon, you try my patience... Won’t you marry Rosie, really?”

“No, mum, really.”

“What on earth, then, is one to do? This is so perfectly exasperating! Do you not realise the situation, my man? If you do not marry her, my son may, and surely you comprehend that I could not stomach such a misery: so for my sake, O’Shannon — don’t show yourself selfish; did you not say just now that you had a great regard for the name of Gordridge? I shall know just how much to think of that profession, if you continue to refuse me this little thing”; upon which Shan, seeing that it was for a Gordridge that he refused, exclaimed: “Ah, Mrs. Gordridge, you make it hard for me.”

Those heavy eyes of the House of Hanover now rested in judgment upon him some silent moments, and she asked: “Do you still, even after this personal appeal of mine on behalf of a family, after you yourself have averred that I have been benevolent to you, do you still say no?”

“Aye, still, mum....”

“Go, go,” said she, brushing him out with her hand, and as Shan went bowing, she drank out of her glass of egg-nog, beckoned to Anne Hine out amid the flowers, and as Anne ran, said to her: “Take me back now.... This O’Shannon, for some reason or other, refuses to marry Rosie, so there seems to be nothing left: we shall be obliged to pack the poor child out to Kwang Chow....”

“Quite so, Aunt,” answered Anne, and turned to hand the stick, to hold her shoulder as a prop, while up with a sigh of Atlas rose the old strategist.

VI. SHAN ALL ENMESHED

THAT SAME NIGHT about nine Anne Hine was droning aloud to Mrs. Gordridge in Mrs. Gordridge's cosy-corner out of Mrs. Gordridge's pet book, Gibbon, when she was interrupted by the arrival of two telegrams, one of them a last word of good-bye of Arthur's, who, just embarked with his battalion, was away, the other being in two words only— "Yes, Sheila" — an answer this to the telegram sent out to Quang Chow from Glanncourt that forenoon: Can you receive Rosie Jones for me?"

"So Arthur is off, poor fellow," sighed Mrs. Gordridge over an apple-wood fire; "if it hadn't been for this ignominy with Rosie, I shouldn't have let him go, such a rough time of the year, too... hear how the wind is howling round the house, and he out on the sea in it. How long before he'll be in South Africa, Anne?"

"Between fourteen and eighteen days, I think—"

"Well, God go with Arthur.... They always say that the Gordridges are fortunate in their youth, and unfortunate after fifty: that's why Julius Gordridge just contrived to snap me up by a fluke, but lost me through his death at fifty-three.... Anyhow, that's all right about dear Sheila and Rosie — that's all right. Have you found out about the P & O boats?"

"I have written to the Company, Aunt, and also to ask Lord Claude Goring to find out if anyone is going whom we could trust Rosie to. The through boats seem to leave the docks on alternate Thursdays, so since next Thursday will be too soon—"

"Why too soon?"

“Poor Rosie will be gone before she realises that she is going!”

“But isn’t that the best way to do things that are grim and disagreeable? Always ‘bite into the sharp apple,’ as the Germans say, and have the whole misery over at the earliest moment. Tell me now how Rosie Jones takes it.”

Anne Hine smiled. As dying cows take Eternity,” she answered, seeing that Quang Chow is a world as vague to her as the further fringes of the grave. When she gathered what was about to befall her, she gaped at me, Aunt, and whispered, ‘how do you spell it, Anne?’ I am sorry for poor Rosie, Aunt!”

“You are a most depressing young woman,” mourned Mrs. Gordridge, almost groaning: “I wish, you wouldn’t.”

“Wouldn’t what, Aunt?”

“You know — play conscience to everybody, stick sly pins into people. I dare say you are blithe enough in your heart at the banishment of the poor child, but you pretend to be pierced with pain, in order to make me feel my cruelty—”

“Aunt, how very — !” went Anne, outraged.

“Oh, we are none of us such inscrutable Rahunas as we fancy, so don’t suppose yourself unknown.... But what else did the poor child say?”

“I — hardly like to tell, Aunt, lest I should happen to ‘play conscience’ to anyone: I had better say that she danced at the mere thought of leaving all her old life here, and diving into something cold and unknown at the other end of existence, and I’d better not tell how the poor girl gaped, and staggered, and gave way, how her poor face—”

Mrs. Gordridge groaned, even as with sudden peevishness she said: “All this through the fatuity of that O’Shannon! Can you not divine any motive why the man has acted in this mad fashion?”

“I don’t know, but I have a notion, Aunt, that there may be a treaty between O’Shannon and Arthur that Arthur is to marry her.”

“Now, how far-fetched! Why, the two fellows are sworn foes!”

“You are always right, Aunt,” sighed Anne Hine faintly at the fire, over which she pored from the hearth-rug by the side of Mrs. Gordridge’s great chair.

“But is it not actually so?” asked Mrs. Gordridge: “did they not do battle for her like two savages? and O’Shannon came off the winner; so why has the wight acted in this wild way?”

“People’s hearts are more or less subtle machines, Aunt,” remarked Anne, “and frequently ‘sworn foes’ are even more in love each with each than most sworn friends are in enmity.”

“Facts are facts,” said Mrs. Gordridge, “and the fact is that O’Shannon and Arthur are at war. Why, O’Shannon almost as good as said to me to-day that he wished Arthur might get shot.”

“I dare say he does,” said Anne—” with one half of his heart, but, if it were to happen, probably the other half would break—”

“More pretty rainbows and mirages—”

“No, O’Shannon, I am sure, cherishes some sort of passion for Arthur, implanted into his nature from their youth, and last evening when Arthur released him from the police, O’Shannon was furiously moved by it, flew off on a bicycle somewhere — I think to the station to catch Arthur, and it is quite possible that they came then to some sort of an understanding which may explain O’Shannon’s sudden passion for bachelorhood. It is beautifully noble of the fellow, if it be so, for his enthusiasm for Rosie more resembles a lunacy—” “Mirages,” said Mrs. Gordridge: “gamekeepers are not great heroes and self-immolators, so the man is either mad, or has some motive that I know nothing of.”

“You are certain to be right, Aunt,” murmured Anne.

“Well, go on with the big trouble,” and Anne, taking up Gibbon from the rug, read of the Romans to the chorus of the gale, till now the brain of the old lady gave way to the droning, her brow dropping slumbrously, upon which Anne drowsed over her sketch-book leaves, her head leaning to the left for her palm to stroke down and down the left half of her dark hair, till late in the sounding night she retired last of the household; but, always the first to behold the daylight, very early the following morning she was at her delight, painting in The Meadows, when a man named Price, happening to pass close by her, rifle on shoulder, drawing after him a rabble of terriers, she becked and called him:

“Price! So the head-keeper has left, has he?”

“Aye, handed over the keys to Mr. Cochrane last evening, miss.”

“So where is he at present?”

“Him did say as er was moving to his uncle aboove the Chase, miss, and his sticks he has put under the shanty in Sharp the blacksmith’s back-yard.”

Anne drew her mink cloak closer round her shoulders, sketching with rather stiff fingers, it being still cold, the morning’s glow yet young, and the early birds, the cows, the ground, all rich with jewels of dew.

“I dare say you will be seeing him?” she said.

“Aye sure, miss.... Is there any message?”

“No, I only wished — By the way, have you all been told that Mrs. Gordridge is going away?”

“Well, now! I hadn’t heard that. For long, miss?”

“A few days, no doubt: only to take Miss Jones to London, who is taking a trip to — Persia.”

“Well, now!” went Price, “I hadn’t heard that,” and Anne Hine thought to herself: “he will inform O’Shannon, and O’Shannon, seeing that she is about to be lost both to Arthur and to himself, may now be tempted into having her. I wonder? He appears to be a gallant piece of spirit, and that should be grand to watch the moral tug and struggle.... I hope he’ll yield now to the flesh and the devil, for it is the only sure scheme for keeping our small Arthur from Rosie, and then for my own repose, for if he’s great enough still to decline her, really this gamekeeper may become girt in colours all too beguiling to the organs of a girl’s fancy.”

And in truth, just as Anne had foreseen, it was only four days later than Shan was hearing the news, not indeed from Price himself, but from a hawker to whom it had already spread through Price, for among those people, supposed to be the most “news-hunting” in England, rumour scoots wide-legged, like a goose pursued by a wolf. The hawker stood with his barrow on the road, and when Shan, who was sawing larch-wood by a well-side in a bower down below, had said that he needed neither bloater nor haddock that day, the hawker remarked: “May be you do know already that the folk at Glanncourt be going off.”

Shan stopped his humming and sawing a moment to say no, he didn’t know, and hummed and sawed anew, whereat the chapman, touching his herrings and things into a witchinger arrangement, remarked: “Aye, they be going, Mrs. Gordridge, Miss Hine, and Miss Jones, all the three.”

“Hardly very probable at this time o’ year,” replied Shan: “but then, you St. Briavel’s bugs, you always know a great deal more than your prayers.”

“Well, I do have it from—”

“Aye, you do have it from Mrs. Gordridge’s self, I dare say.... Where do they say they are going to?”

“Miss Jones, they do have it to say, be bound for Persia.”

“It’s a wonder, now, they didn’t say Japan! for that goes on further still down under the world.”

“Well, I only give you what I have got myself.”

“Gossiping, news-hunting lot,” pshawed Shan, and sawed away, in a moment thinking no more of the thing.

But later in the day, as a seed that, once sown, secretly grows, the fish-man’s words again occurred to Shan, and more and more frequently kept recurring during the next three days, but merely as a curiosity of thought for the brain to amuse itself with, without any doubt at all in him as to the unfoundedness of the rumour; during which days, his uncle’s cottage where he was staying being in a most lonely place, nothing more of the story had reached his ears, and it was only on the fourth evening about six o’clock, when he sat cleaning a fowling-piece beneath a beech-tree’s shade, that something seemed to breathe into some deepest region of his brain: “but if it is true?” for now the seed, secretly growing, had peeped above ground, and within two seconds after the feeling “it may be true” was born in him, all his consciousness was rent with the shriek: “it is true!”

Up at once he sprang, a pallid lad, and at once he ran — toward Glanncourt, with what purpose he could have given no account, only he did not doubt that, if she was really being banished to foreign parts, it was in order to bury her for ever from Arthur, and he had given his promise to Arthur to guard her for him. Well so far had he guarded her for Arthur, his heart knew it, singing a new song and marching-tune within him, so that, sawing his larch-woods during these days, he had hummed to himself for all the lark-music that yarned in his bosom, merry in his bereavement. But how now to guard her in England — but by marrying her? And since she was now to be lost to himself and to the other, too — what then? why not? And that sly fiend of self which is in each one leered inside his chest, tongue in cheek, echoing: “what then?”... “why not?”

It was an ill wind that blew no one any good....

But Rosie might be already away, he was wholly in the dark, might not get to Glanncourt in time: and he ran rabidly, his hound, Snout, half mastiff, half bull-dog, bounding joyously about his toil like a flourish coiled about a sign-manual, and always his heart was raised in a sort of prayer for good lungs and the grace of running, even as it kept repeating in a mechanical kind of way within him its “what then?” and its “why not...?”

But now, as night deepened down, over the lonely road there dashed upon him a calèche whose dobbin was being furiously lashed by its driver, and Shan, casting a glance round as it galloped near upon him, panted aloud, now hard breathing: “Dr. Blood! Stop! I want you to — !”

He got no farther, for the physician with a face as gorgeous as his name, lashing at his nag, shouted out at him: “Out of the road! am late to say good-bye to Mrs. Gordridge — !” and was gone away.

“Now may God help a chap,” whispered Shan inwardly, knowing now that she must be going by “the seven-forty-five,” and there were five miles still to run, a distance hardly great to him ordinarily, but the bigness of his present winded him: and with all his entrails raised in a sort of prayer he raced.

VII. SHAN BOTH HOT AND COLD

IT WAS NIGHT when he hied up the tump of the Morplepiece, halted there half-a-minute breathless, and now in straight career to the Hall hied down across the brook, and up the steep on the other side; but at the swing-gate which leads to the path between the north cover and shrubbery he came upon the puny Chuckabutty musing over the gate in his fez-cap, smoking a cheroot to the moon, to whom Shan gasped: “Mrs. Gordridge at home?”

“She’s gone away,” said the Hindoo chef.

“How long?”

“Chuckabutty now began to chuckle, saying: “Why, you are in a sweat — !”

“How long?” cried Shan.

“Hardly just gone, I think, since—”

Shan span and ran, away past the home-farm, casting vain glances to see the stable-clock through the foliage, down away southward through a small gate into the turnpike road, no time to be out of breath now, only a pair of legs that prayed and rained their steps. Through the village he hied, and when it was well behind him, and still he could see no sign of any carriage, hope perished in him, but on climbing the height of the next hill he could spy in the moonshine on a farther hillside a carriage which one horse was hauling at a walk up the steep with petty precipitate steps: and he was quickly trotting with it.

He could not answer when Anne bobbed forth her head to ask what was the matter, but after some minutes, when he was understood to say that he wished to talk with Mrs. Gordridge, the carriage now stood still, and Mrs. Gordridge looked out.

“I could hardly talk to you here,” he said at her ear — for there sat Rosie and a lady’s-maid within the brougham: so now Mrs. Gordridge groaned and got herself down to him on the road, saying: “Be quick, O’Shannon, or I shall miss my train.”

“Between us, mum,” panted Shan secretly, “is that correct about Rosie Jones being off to a foreign land?”

“Well, what then?”

“But, mum, that was only my fun about not wanting to marry Rosie.”

“Fun!”

“That was all, mum!”

“So are you willing to marry her now?”

“Rather, mum. Everybody about knows very well—”

“But who is it that is mad, the man or I? for it must be one or the other. Fun?”

“That was all, mum! I declare, it’s enough to make one laugh!”

“What is enough to make one laugh?”

“The whole thing, mum!”

“Which whole thing? O’Shannon, I hope you are quite compos mentis. Do you mean that you were not serious that forenoon when you refused Rosie, when you shouted out ‘No!’ and shocked me?”

“What, Rosie, mum? my little cousin who was always a heart’s idol to me?”

Mrs. Gordridge gave vent to a laugh, very relieved and pleased at heart, though, shy of appearing so, she said: “I’m sure some fly has stung the fellow! So, then, it was ‘fun’? and since this fun has cost me £75 for booking a ticket, no doubt you'll be prepared to pay it me back, supposing I agree now to give Rosie to you?"

"Anything you choose, mum," said Shan.

"But what has been your object — ? for it can't well be a fact that you were actuated by some consideration for Mr. Arthur—"

"Oh, mum, don't bring in your son, for Heaven's sake: I have nothing to do with your son, mum."

"At any rate, O'Shannon, you do undertake positively at present, if I should prove so weak as to yield to your entreaty?"

"You may be certain, mum."

"Well, certainly, you do not deserve it, but I'll see what can be done for you," and she fluttered back elated to the carriage, which, presently turning back toward the village, left Shan there, his handkerchief at his face.

He did not return to his uncle's, but took a bed in Albington, where, at the Bunch of Grapes, he gathered a crowd round him that night, and, loud with devilry, astonished everyone by his lavish treating, making the cash fly, himself deeply drinking, though known as "an abstainer so that one winked at another: "Him be gone a bit mad at quitting Glanncourt — that's it."

A late riser the next day, Shan walked up the half-mile of shady road to Glanncourt with the gladsomeness of his health, of the sunshiny morning, of his approaching marriage, showing in his jauntiness of step, though it was strange, too, with what fury he slashed with the switch in his hand at hemlock or honeysuckle flowering in the hedges, and curious how he cut his poor Snout when the hound darted after a motor-car that posted past; and meeting near The Meadows gate a loose-bosomed woman wayfaring with a freight of vegetables, to her he sang cheerily out, "Hello, Mother Higgins, how goes it this morning?"

“Lar, Shan,” she answered with a certain Welt-schmerz, or world-smart, “I gat a bile an me tit this marning, and Bella her’s gat one an hers; but here! a word wi’ thee — Pruie just asked me if I did know where thee’s to be found, for Mrs. Gordridge, er said, has sent out a boy in buttons asking everywhere after thee,” upon which Shan quickened his steps till he got before the low front of Glanncourt, and before long was being led to a room, when out of it stepped Rosie, her eyes on the ground, till suddenly sighting Shan, she stood whitish, Shan, too, standing as whitish on a sudden as she.

“Morning,” he could hardly be heard to say, and the girl’s lips barely stirred, and her regard struck him dead with disdain; and all at once that ghost of Rosie made a dart past him, like one escaping blindly, and was away.

Shan was now brought before Mrs. Gordridge, but so confounded by his encounter with the ghost outside, that for some time he could lend no attention to what she said to him. There with easel and palette at the window opposite the great cedar on the lawn sat Anne Hine, smiling her fine smile at mankind, while Mrs. Gordridge, cowering by the fire, informed Shan of all that had now to be brought about by him and her.

“To-morrow at three,” she said, “I shall have Mr. Spender here, and you can come and see what I propose as to a settlement, but as to seeing Rosie herself, you mustn’t yet, for with all this chopping and changing between O’Shannon and China, the poor child is now naturally half out of her wits; but if you come — what’s to-day? Thursday, the twentieth — come on Saturday to see and may be take her for a walk; only you shouldn’t start pawing the child about yet, O’Shannon, that is, if you are not desirous of having your eyes scratched out.”

“Why, mum, don’t you suppose I know how to keep my hands in their place?” Shan wished to know; “anyhow, till she becomes a bit fonder of me, as she quickly will, for she’s said it herself.”

“Rosie has? I am very pleased! To whom did she say that?”

“Why, to you, mum, didn’t she?”

“To me?”

“Didn’t you tell me so in the summer-house, mum, how she asserted that she admires my — ?”

“Why, so true, I forgot that... quite so. Only, don’t be too crude and brutal with her, woo her by inches, she will soon — By the way, what about your ‘goods’?”

“My sticks I’ve left down at Sharpe’s, the blacksmith’s, mum, for the time.”

“Well, you had better part with the lot, inasmuch as all that bachelor stuff is no use for a young wife, and I will undertake to have the cottage furnished throughout by one of the London firms.”

“Truth to tell, mum, I’d sooner furnish it myself,” observed Shan, eyeing the floor.

“But how much money have you on the whole?”

“Over two hundred pounds, Mrs Gordridge.”

“But what good is that? You are not to be independent, O’Shannon, and you are to remember that Rosie is a well-nurtured girl, grown used to elegance. If you are so eager to spend your £200, you had better pay me back the £75 of passage-money which I have spent through your ‘fun’—”

“I’ll pay it back this day, mum.”

“You are not to be independent, O’Shannon, I say! What you ought to do is to creep on your two knees to worship me and President Kruger, and not be independent.”

“I worshipped you years before, mum, so to speak,” answered Shan, a smile in the eyes: “I don’t know so much about this Kruger.”

“Kruger, too: for suppose Mr. Arthur had not gone to the war—”

“Oh, do, do, Mrs. Gordridge, don’t bring in your son!” cried Shan with sudden fretfulness now, “that’s a man that I want to have nothing to say about.”

“If you like me, O’Shannon, you must like my son!”

Shan groaned.

“Is that all you have got to say to me, Mrs. Gordridge?” he asked.

“I think so. Be sure to see Mr. Orrock at once.... And, O’Shannon, I am to depend this time upon your running straight? There is to be no more mysterious ‘fun’...? I declare there’s something in me now that doesn’t feel quite easy about the man since his queer conduct, as if I were building houses on quick-sands! And yet I always thought that no one was so reliable...!”

“Why, what do you think of me, mum?” asked Shan, rising; “I intend to marry Rosie, and when I once have her, no doubt I shall know how to hold her.”

“Oh, you go away,” pshawed Mrs. Gordridge to the grate, little guessing at his troubled mind, while Anne Hine, who much better divined, smiled over her brush.

But this feeling of uneasiness in the old lady was not baseless, for that ship of fate that was freighted with Rosie’s and Shan’s marriage was to have no roseate trip. For one fact, it became known that Rosie was very indisposed, and then it almost looked as if Shan himself by his own behaviour was trying all he could to make the marriage impossible. On the very day of the settlement, old Pruie, getting into talk with Anne in a walk of the New Garden, in the gloaming, in telling her how Shan had brought up a bed and some things, and was now in the cottage “just like in the old time,” added, “but oh, him be queer, miss, er bent like the old lad at all.”

“In what way?” asked Anne.

“Him be queer, miss — it be hard to tell — but after being in the cover all night wi’ the dogs, er hasn’t slept a wink, only sits wi’s legs afore him, and they do have it to say er made every one of the fellows in the place tight the night before last wi’s money, nor some of them haven’t been right since.”

“That seems naughty,” said Anne.

“Oh, they are a loutish lost lot down in that village, miss, believe me, for as I always do say to myself, it bent the drink that’s bad, it’s the people; people do blame the drink, and think it’s the drink that’s bad, but that’s all a mistake, because er bent the drink that’s bad, it’s them as do take the drink.”

“You are too subtle, Pruie,” remarked Anne; “but it is to be hoped that your master himself wasn’t—”

“Oh, him never was tight in his life, I don’t suppose, though they do have it to say er weren’t fur off it. Aye, him be queer someways — between us him be just terrible bitter against Mr. Gordridge, him will say to me, or to himself rather, as er did this morning, ‘what have I got to thank’n for?’ er said, sitting on the step: ‘if him rescued me from the police,’ er said, ‘it was only keeping of his promise, as any man ‘ood have done, and I do owe nothing to he’—”

“All that means very little,” said Anne, “for O’Shannon does not really dislike Lieutenant Gordridge, but he probably feels that he is breaking some promise, and yielding to a temptation, so he is bitter against Lieutenant Gordridge, for people are always bitter against those whom they feel that they are wronging, Pruie.”

“You wouldn’t say,” went Pruie. “But that was only this morning him was like that, miss, this afternoon er be as spry as you like, er be off to St. Arvens to try on a new coat, having to see Miss Rosie to-morrow in the Hall” — in which new coat Anne was sufficiently interested to watch from a window the following gloaming till Shan turned up with a Homburg hat and glorious cravat, to be led into a book-room where Rosie, new-risen from bed that afternoon, volumed in a shawl of Spanish lace waited for him.

Shan, for his share, followed the flunkey who led him with the reluctance of one being taken to the stake, and when he was announced, and the door closed behind him, and he found himself alone with Rosie in a room in which the growing gloom was beshone only by a glow from the grate, his tongue was tied, Rosie, too, remaining dumb, ghostly vague in her lace, a Whistler vision, standing with her hand on a chair; and during some moments those two, whom the cynic Mr. Orrock was soon to unite for life, stood as stupefying as lions let loose one upon the other.

“I was sorry to hear that you have been bad,” Shan managed to stammer at last.

“It is all right,” she said.

“I have brought you these,” he next said, putting a bunch of George Bruants roses on a pedestal.

“You are very obliging,” replied Rosie.

“Four of them are from the garden, and the rest James Downie gave me,” observed Shan, but it was a blunder to expound the origin of the roses, Rosie returned no answer, and now he stood struck.

“You may take a seat, if that pleases you,” she said presently.

And at once he felt that she was “sticking-on side,” meant to show him the fine lady, and this, increasing his feeling of inferiority, completed Shan’s sheepishness. He sat on the very edge of an arm-chair over against where she stood gray and tail-looking in that gloaming, and all that he could discover to say was: “Well, Rosie, here we are.”

She made no answer.

“Won’t you talk to me?” he asked.

“I am prepared to reply to any observation which you may be pleased to make,” she answered.

“It is like this, look,” said he: “you were going to be shipped away like a clutch of eggs, and when I gathered that it must be either that or going to the altar with you, I came forward and offered to take you.”

“Ah! I am the victim of a philanthropy...”

“The victim — ha, ha! — yes, that’s your way of putting it; ‘the victim of a philanthropy’ — yes, very well put. But you will be just to me, Rosie, I hope: no doubt you have been told that a fortnight ago almost, just after the war broke out, I was given the chance of marrying you, and what did I say to it? I said no. Couldn’t quite tell you just by what muscle I managed it, but done it was. Aye, I did it that day: I said no.”

“Why did you, when you knew that Mrs. Gordridge would be giving more or less money with me?”

“That’s of no importance why, but I did it — in spite of the more or less money that Mrs. Gordridge would be giving with you, Rosie. So you see that it isn’t that I’m grasping after you, for I said no, and it was only when you were being shipped off—”

“That was no business of yours, if I was being shipped off.”

“But which would you rather, be shipped off to Providence knows what far port of the sea, or be married to me?”

“Frankly, I think I’d rather be shipped off, since you ask me,” replied Rosie to that rash query: “but, of course, I am quite in Mrs. Gordridge’s hands, and into whatever sty my guardian likes to cast me, I have to submit to be cast.”

“Why, Rosie,” cried Shan, “can a girl be more cruel to a man who worships her than a terrier to a rat?”

“I do not intend to be cruel, but I don’t mind if I am,” Rosie confessed.

“But, Rosie,” said Shan through a choky throat in a hoarse tone, “you don’t know, I am not a happy man, have some pity on me.”

“No one has any pity on me.”

“Well I have pity on you, since you say that you need pity,” murmured Shan yearningly.

“You are very obliging, but to be frank, your pity and all your other feelings are matters of complete indifference to me.”

“But is that quite right, now? We are about to be husband and wife—”

“We shall be finely matched.”

“No, never that, since I am never half fit to fall and kiss your little finger, but if you don’t egg on yourself against me, you’ll soon be caring more for me, I trust, as you’ve admitted yourself—”

“I admitted?”

“Yes, dear, to your Mama — don’t say that it is not true, even if it isn’t — not as a mate, may be, you won’t be caring for me, but as your poor spaniel you will, for you know, Rosie, I never considered you as quite the same flesh and blood as myself or anybody, but as an angel to be worshipped, as a white image in a shrine, and these five years I have only dreamed of marrying you, dear, so as to show you how a man can be a hound at your sweet feet, dear, with a humble heart before God, to kiss the hem of your garment, as when the people kissed the hem of the Lord’s robe, and that healed them of all their broken hearts, Rosie now Shan’s utterance choked, but he came bowed down, and laid his mouth on the hem of Rosie’s robe.

“This is nonsense,” murmured Rosie with an averted face in a tone of patient boredom which was mainly real, but more or less stagey, too: “if you know what is to your advantage, you will inflict upon me such exhibitions as seldom as possible, since they only bore me,” upon which Shan sprang straight, answering: “No, I mean to inflict them upon you as frequently as my soul speaks, Rosie, till you commence to understand, and to answer to it.”

“That will be never, then, so don’t flatter yourself, you will only be the more disillusioned,” she said.

“But I don’t despair, not a bit! you wait, you don’t know yet what’s coming for you, you see,” now cried Shan, who, standing now close to her, though he could barely see her face in that arrased room, was inhaling fugitive fumes of perfume from her being, “you can’t even conceive yet! I shall be having you so warm in my arms — you don’t know Shan O’Shannon, I am as wild inside as ninety-nine climbing mow-fires! — I shall be leading you such a dance of love, that even if you be a snow-flake, I shall be making you flush.”

“Indeed?” breathed Rosie, eyeing the floor, and she added in a low tone: “you will only be doing bad for yourself....”

“So you say at present,” replied Shan: “but you wait for three or four months of me, and by then you will be able truly to sign yourself ‘ Mrs. O’Shannon,’ with a flourish to it.”

“But just now I was an image in a shrine, now it is another tune, I am to be wildly whirled in some kind of climbing fires: I don’t think that you quite know your own mind.”

“Who could, do you think, when he is by you?” he asked: “but don’t folks kiss the idols that they adore? The Creator did not knead up that piece of flesh all out of cream and peach-pulp, Rosie, only to be knelt down before, but to be kissed, too. Why, bless me, I've seen old men of eighty, and old women, too, Rosie, stop on the road to gape after you with greed, and to mumble to themselves what a bliss you are; for myself, I believe if I was a stock or a stone, I'd stir when you stepped close to me, yes, I fancy I'd scent your step, and stir: and now it is my fate to have you — down there by ourselves in the old house — I don't believe it one bit, for it sounds beerified enough, but it is true, I am to own you, it has happened so, and where's the man who dares say no to it? So I intend to grasp and use what the good God in His goodness grants me, you see, and to fuse you like wax in a wildish fire's furnace, as well as worship you, and I want you to let me put on this ring—”

Rosie drew back. “Ring? No, I have only undertaken to wear one ring of yours.”

“Oh, you have to,” and having now her hand, he drew her to put on the ring, but, on a sudden, forgetting the ring, had her bound to his bosom, devouring her mouth, nor did Rosie struggle in the least, giving herself as a rag to that greed which had whiffed her off her feet, though the moment that he released her she stamped at him, and they remained some feet apart in the dark, dumbly hearing each other's laboured breathing.

“Don't be cross,” said Shan meekly, “though you should be, for I promised your Mama not to... Not the only promise in my life that I have broken, may be. Anyhow, it's done, I've kissed a girl, and that girl's Rosie” — Shan spoke now in a kind of reverie, with the naïveté of a child—” I kissed Frances Price and Julia Howley one Sunday afternoon under the hedge of Perkin's Clause a few weeks after I was thirteen, and they were my last kisses — till now this one.”

“I am not interested,” said Rosie; “though they say—”

“Well, what?”

“That you have not the reputation of being quite such a St. Anthony as you say — so I have been told... not, of course, that I care a fig...”

“Who is this St. Anthony?”

“A person who disapproved of girls, they say.”

“Why, can’t one know how to knock around with the young women for a lark without going any farther? I have spun them all round the waist—”

“I am not interested, really.”

“Well, may I put on the ring now?”

“I’d prefer that than to be subjected afresh to what you just did to me.”

“You’ll soon be liking it better.”

“Shall I?”

“So hold out your hand....”

Rosie now leant aside and switched on the light, and now those eyes of Shan, that mostly had a ray of merriment in them, saw her in her shawl, with a Rubens rose that rode on the movement of her bosom, as she held her already glittering finger for his ring with a little disgust hung on her lower lip; sudden Shan dropped before this revelation of a fair lady that was to be his, and, having pressed on the ring, once more put his lips to her robe.

“There, that’s done,” he said, rising, “and I am grateful to you, Rosie, from my heart; Mrs. Gordridge suggested that you might go for a stroll, I don’t know—”

“As you see, I am not well.”

“I see that. Well, I won’t keep you. May I come again on Monday?”

“Not Monday.”

“When?”

“There is no need — You will soon be having a very great deal of me, it seems.... You will be told when.”

“Well, I must live on that; good-bye, and don’t be downhearted, now: I’d be killing myself for you, if that would save you any heartache, but killing myself would only mean foreign parts for you. Dear, good-bye.” He pressed her hand tight, and went; and Rosie, after putting out the light, sat over the grate in the dark, gazing into the fire.

Yet a new experience awaited her the next morning when, after pacing down the half-mile to the village with Anne, preceded by a little crowd of eight maid-servants, she sat in the church: for, immediately after reading out that Nicene Creed in which he little believed, Mr. Orrock was all of a sudden calling out her name, publishing her banns. There in the family-pew Anne Hine sat smiling, but Rosie’s face flew into crimson, and then was white, this having come like a bolt upon her: for Mrs. Gordridge, always a grim, if a wise, surgeon, desiring to accustom her mind in all ways to the idea of the marriage, had urged her to be at church that day, but had uttered no word as to any banns. At this news there was “movement” enough throughout St. Jude’s that forenoon, half of the throng of eyes turning toward Rosie’s distress, and half toward Shan, who, ever a regular church-goer, heard it with a low head in his seat near the door.

But the effect upon Shan of this hearing of his banns, of feeling himself as it were half-married already, was anything but happy, for that same night the lad broke out in an extraordinary fashion, making such a scandal as was never known, and it was with pallid flesh and shaky hands that his housekeeper, meagre old Pruie, sought out her friend, Anne, on the Monday evening, to ask her if she thought that it would all be getting to Mrs. Gordridge’s ears.

“Mrs. Gordridge already knows something,” breathed Anne Hine close over her sketch-book, sketching beneath a calm arch of sky in which one only star psalmed a solo before the chorus-roar, “she can hardly help knowing.... But what exactly happened?”

“Him got real tight, miss,” answered Pruie secretly, “and everybody else in the village wi’n seemingly — Sunday night, too, why, shame ought to have covered their face, and him that all the world do regard as such a tidy, God-fearing young fellow, what a pity it be. Him was more like a wild lion than a man, miss, they do say er had the strength of ten, for after making them all tight, er turned on them wi’s fists, and er was a free fight, till they all runned away frightened from him, and four of them be in their beds to-day wi’ broken bones and noses. Then when nobody was left to fight wi’, him turned round and fair wrecked the bar of The Grapes, and er caught up Griffiths’ nag in his arms, which they do say three men couldn’t lift, miss, and er runned burdened wi’n down the street, and er hurled’n down the well —”

“How splendid!” breathed Anne Hine.

“That’s cider, you see, that’s what the cider do do.... But O, miss, if you had seen his eyes when er got home! I was there waiting up, wondering where he’d got to, and the minute him come, and his eyes fell on me, er laughed aloud, and er sang out, ‘well, you old messer! look out for yourself!’ — and, miss, er makes one dart after me! If it wasn’t for the table, he’d have had me sure, but I skipped round like a sparrow and skipped upstairs, and by the time er come up, I was under the bed; him searched and him searched for me, muttering to himself, oh, er searched earnest, miss, and my heart was in my throat the same as if er was a ghost searching for me, but er searched every crack except just under the bed — it was only God’s mercy. Then him went down again, and I listened to him breaking up of everything, the table, the crockery — nothing be left whole in the place.”

“Which only shows that the man’s gallant skull is virgin to alcohol,” murmured Anne; “but how has he got on to-day?”

“To-day him hasn’t uttered one word to me, miss, nor er wouldn’t touch his breakfast, but er sat under that beech-tree aboove the brook for hours wi’s brow down on his knees, feeling seedy no doubt. I did keep an eye on him from the cottage, and what do you suppose I see’n do? Him do always keep in his brown jacket the photograph of a boy in an Eton jacket, miss, which I do delieve to be Lieutenant Gordridge’s photograph, so him takes this out of his breastpocket, and er looks at it a bit, then er chucks it from him toward the brook; but it wouldn’t go into the brook for him, er went all sky-larking edgeways through the air, so him sprang up and caught’n, all red in the face er was, and rent’n to bits, and tossed the bits into the brook; then er crouched down again under the beech wi’s brow on his knees for hours.”

“Well, this looks troublous for the wedding,” remarked Anne, putting up her sketch-book; and walking to the Hall, she asked herself: “Shall I be quite sorry if the wedding does not come off? Isn’t this old Shan-lad as much too good in his way for my Rosie as Arthur Gordridge is in his? And it can hardly come off, if he is to continue in this frantic mood of remorse” — for she was aware that Mrs. Gordridge had declared that if Shan only once more broke loose in this fashion, she would refuse to let him be Rosie’s husband. But this mood of Shan’s was soon enough to reel into wholly another mood, one even more dangerous to that cranky ship of fate that carried his marriage: for near eleven of the Wednesday morning following that stormy Sunday night, Shan being then again seated beneath his beech-tree, a telegram was handed him whose influence upon his mind was to prove no less than mighty. It came from the Cape, and thus ran: “Arrived safe. Inform my mother. Thanks. Arthur.”

Quick was its effect: for the moment Shan had read it, he raised himself, and went with roaming feet here and there over the bit of broken ground on which he stood, like some vague wight who seeks some object on the ground, but forgets quite what, and he rubbed the telegram over his cheeks and over his mouth with a sound of bubbling and of sobbing, and a sort of daft laugh of a mother.

Later in the day he got himself piloted to Mrs. Gordridge's presence, to inform her that Mr. Arthur had safely arrived, for he had got a telegram; and when Mrs. Gordridge in a state of amazement exclaimed: "But this is grotesque that Arthur should have telegraphed to someone else than me!" Shan stood and laughed at her.

During the ensuing four days, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday, on which last day his banns were again published, Shan O'Shannon hardly ate, hardly slumbered, hardly did any work, shirked a meeting with his sweetheart: what was going on in the game-keeper's nut no one knew, no one could guess; and on the Monday he disappeared.

VIII. SHAN VANISHED

“WHERE, THEN, IS the man gone to?” asked Mrs. Gordridge on the Tuesday evening, seated on a heap of quilts in the head-keeper’s cottage: “he has no earthly right to take himself off the estate in this way: I declare this man is becoming the greatest anxiety of my life!”

“I conjecture,” said Mr. Orrock, “that he is only gone to Gloucester or somewhere, to see may be after his wedding garments, because—” but he was interrupted by a louder row of the hammering, rasping, sawing, steaming, which was being made upstairs by the London furnishers still at their work in the last of the twilight.

“But why should he slink off in this singular fashion to get clothes?” Mrs. Gordridge wished to know.

“Why should he do any of the odd things which he has lately done?” asked Dr. Blood, sitting on a dado all among shavings: “I’m afraid that here is a case in which Socialism and Free-thought have brought about a state of the spiritual part of the man—”

“A state of the digestion, may be,” said Mr. Orrock: “O’Shannon is not a free-thinker, nor have I any closer listener to my sermons, or rather my lectures—”

“That may account for the poor man’s going wrong,” grumbled Dr. Blood.

Now, this grumble Mr. Orrock, pacing about, could scarcely hear in that row, but he guessed what had been said, and answered: “Precisely what I said last week when I heard of Perkins' little girl's decease: I said: 'I need hardly ask if Dr. Blood attended her.'"

"Never even saw the child," said Dr. Blood; "I was on my way to her when she died."

"Ah, you see.... The poor little girl clung on to life for days, but on learning that the doctor was coming, gave way to despair, and sighed her last."

"How trying!" now pouted Mrs. Gordridge: "can't you two ever be conscious of the presence of third persons when you get together? You are so preoccupied with each other, like piston and cylinder, that you are absent to all else beneath the sun, till it becomes really unmannerly! I was asking, Richard, why you should suppose that O'Shannon would go off to get clothes—"

"Oh, Aunt," remarked Anne Hine, now turning inward from regarding the sunset's death-drama, "do you suppose that O'Shannon has gone to get any clothes? I doubt if any of us will see Shan O'Shannon again...."

"Now for the augur of evil," groaned Mrs. Gordridge.

"It seems to me so clear now," said Anne, "that O'Shannon must have promised not to marry Rosie: what else can be the meaning of that word 'Thanks' in Arthur's cable to him from the Cape? or why else should Arthur wire his arrival to O'Shannon at all, sign the wire 'Arthur,' and be so wise as to send it almost a full day before sending one to Aunt herself? For O'Shannon received his at eleven in the morning, and Aunt did not receive one until seven in the evening. The whole business was deliberately contrived by Arthur in order to tickle and please O'Shannon to the man's simple heart, to drench him in flattery with the 'inform my mother,' and so to keep him to his word: and I believe that O'Shannon means to keep his word."

“Oh, don’t be sibylline,” said the old lady: “if there was any such understanding, would O’Shannon ever for one thing have let the banns be published? would he ever—”

“Oh, but O’Shannon quite broke down when Rosie was going out to China,” replied Anne; “he must have said to himself, ‘she’s going to be lost to us both, so I’ll have her,’ and he did evidently mean to have her, for those outrageous bouts of his were only due to a muggy state of his conscience, to his secret feeling that he was breaking his vow, however good the excuse; but when Arthur’s artful cable came, the fellow fell fervently in love with him anew, and resolving once more to keep his vow, he once more renounced Rosie, and ran away: that’s my reading of him, and I doubt if we shall see him again.”

“But it was not until days after getting the cablegram from Arthur that he went away,” remarked Mr. Orrock: “it would hardly be the cablegram that caused him to go.”

“Only five days: — it took him that time to make up his mind,” said Anne.

“You make the man out to be mad,” now said the old lady coldly, “for he must be aware that if he is not here on the wedding-day, Rosie will at once be banished from someone’s reach, just as she was being banished when he intervened to stop her from going before: so, if he has run away, his motive can’t well be Arthur’s good, and it is quixotic to think of such a thing, inasmuch as Glanncourt is not Laputa, nor is the world a town of gold up in the clouds, and game-kippurs do not act out of the normal for their master’s good. There is undoubtedly some sort of amity now existing between Arthur and O’Shannon, as that cable seems to show, but — what is it all about? Oh, it is not fair of Arthur to puzzle me! But O’Shannon will be back tomorrow,

I know, for the man is keen to marry Rosie, and therefore will marry her, and must; only I wish he wouldn't cause me all these headaches."

"Neither this uproar nor this odour of paint and paste can be good, since you have a headache—" began Mr. Orrock.

"She doesn't mean physical headaches!" screamed Dr. Blood, "she means a spiritual—"

"She means a — physical — headache," insisted Mr. Orrock.

"That she doesn't, then."

"Ah! She does."

"How tiresome," mourned Mrs. Gordridge, now rising, "come, let us go..." and she made her way back to the mansion with the painfully slow progress of grub.

That night at ten she sent down to the cottage to find out if there was any sign of Shan; but Shan had not come back, and during the next day, the Wednesday, there was no coming nor news of him.

Meantime, the bridal preparations went bravely on, as if no Shan had vanished, the old lady believing what she hoped, that he must reappear: Rosie beheld herself in mirrors in hats which rolled with ostrich-feathers furnished from the Rue de la Paix, and in a new robe of sable as heavy as a bear; the wedding-day was nigh, the wedding-cake already waited white on the morning-room table, and Chuckabutty, the chef, who already was affording foretastes of tipsy-cake, rout-cakes, and meringues, had now mayonnaise of salmon in the mind's eye; the cottage, too, was almost ready, the electric light, the piano, Satsuma jars were installed, and Dresden figurines costumed like milkmaids en fête and like gallants Louis XVI: Shan alone was wanting, and several days rolled by, but bore no tidings of Shan.

Each morning, each evening, a horseman was despatched to his uncle away up on the Chase to enquire for tidings: the uncle had nothing to tell.

“Never mind,” said Anne to Rosie, lacing Rosie in a fairy pair of stays in front of a mirror, “don’t fret, he will come....”

“I should like to catch myself,” replied Rosie: “may be never come.”

“Be quiet, you know that you will be awfully annoyed if you are disappointed,” said Anne, now tickling her with fixed teeth.

“Oh!” shrieked Rosie, darting off, shrieking with laughter, “don’t tickle me when you know how ticklish I am! Oh! don’t!” but Anne Hine with her long finger hunted her to the bed, on which Rosie gave up shrieking, and Anne tickled her there, till, kissing her, she said: “You see, you have altogether forgotten poor Arthur for O’Shannon, or you could never be so crazy with gaiety.”

“A girl has got to giggle sometimes,” answered Rosie, “according to the moon; if I laugh it is because this other one is gone to Kingdom-come.”

“Never mind, he’ll be here for the wedding-bells.... Poor me, I have no wedding-bells, you see.”

“I should willingly change places with you, if you would with me,” said the other, and Anne turning her face away, answered nothing.

But Shan did not show his nose, and Rosie, half-drowsing in her bed, had him now in the thoughts of her head, marvelling... for he was to be her husband, after all. She thought of death by accident over the quarry-cliffs, of suicide, of an arrest by the police for his recent riots: but all these seemed far-fetched: he could hardly be dead, inasmuch as his dog, which had gone with him, had not come back. With regard to Anne’s guess that some sort of a league existed between Shan and Arthur, this was so very far beyond the scope of Rosie’s comprehension of the heart of man, that it had no part in her thoughts at all.

But Shan did not come! “If he doesn’t come,” remarked Mrs. Gordridge angrily on the Sunday, at about the hour when the banns were being published for the third time, “I’ll make him pay back every penny both of that first £75 passage-money, and of the second £75 that I shall have to spend: that is, if I can catch him.”

“I doubt if Shan O’Shannon would prove quite a drowsy fish to catch!” replied Mr. Cochrane, her land-steward, with whom she was taking counsel.

The old lady had a face of care.

“Was there ever anything so unsearchable as this fellow’s behaviour?” she asked. “What do you think? — you are a man of the world — will he turn up or not?”

Mr. Cochrane, gazing down upon a ground made up of Persian Yellows just outside the conservatory-door, shrugged without answering.

“I have got three anonymous letters,” observed Mrs. Gordridge, “two giving me to know that we are never again to behold O’Shannon, and the third that we shall — illiterate scribbles: I take it that they have no weight?”

“Oh, no,” was the reply; “of course, the country-side, being in a fever, will write, but the notes mean nothing.”

“I dreamed of fires last night,” muttered Mrs. Gordridge, “and first thing this morning, on glancing out, I watched a crowd of crows going... Oh, well, we must only wait and see what the morrow brings forth.”

But the morrow did not bring forth Shan, and still the morrow after, the wedding-morning, wrought and dawned, but brought not Shan forth — a heavy November day, the third of the month, burdened with drizzles and breezes yearning in music through the yews and the dreary old cedar, with the sun low in Cancer at Hallowmas; and Mrs. Gordridge, learning the morning’s ugly news as she was getting her fingers manicured in her chamber's recess, made the observation, "Well, I am quite done now... if he comes now, he shan't have her, for he was never half good enough for her."

But this was only what the fox remarked of the grapes! and, on going downstairs an hour later on Rosie's arm, a telegram which was handed her changed the old lady's temper to the opposite pole; the telegram being in the words: O'Shannon says will arrive in time for wedding; earnestly begs you go to church. Davis." So what was now to be done? That was hard for the wit of woman to argue out! for though Mrs. Gordridge gladly rushed from despair into elation — who was this Davis"? No one knew at all! All that one could say of him was that his wire derived from Winchester. And why, if O'Shannon actually meant to come, could he not wire himself? What could bind him? Anne Hine was certain that the whole business of the wire was a hoax, akin to the anonymous letters; of a like view were Dr. Blood, Mr. Orrock, Mr. Cochrane; and in the council which lasted for hours into the afternoon they all argued roundly against Mrs. Gordridge's faith in the telegram; in vain, however: for when the clock struck two, she, too, struck her stick on the floor, and said:

"Come, let us go, as he begs us to: it will be lucky to be actually in the church, waiting, and then he will come."

"Ah, he is sure to, Aunt, since you say so," murmured Anne Hine: "but to go and wait in vain will be very distressing."

"Oh, timorous people always believe there's a lion in the way," pshawed Mrs. Gordridge: "let us venture to go, and one's very boldness will bring him. He knew that the wedding was fixed for two o'clock, and he is conscious that one can't be married after three, so that's his motive for enjoining us to be at the altar, so as to avoid delay when he comes. He will come, if we go."

“There is, however, no train for him to get here by between now and three,” observed the clergyman.

“Ah, Mr. Orrock, do not argue with Aunt Margaret,” sighed Anne Hine, “since she is sure to be right.”

“I am only sorry to be the occasion of all this care, I’m sure,” now remarked Rosie with a saucy pout, seated near her mama all in silvery grey with a great white hat, waiting to be a wife.

“Never mind,” said Mrs. Gordridge, kissing her cheek, “don’t be angry with your mama: he’ll come.”

“But even if he is coming,” said Dr. Blood, “why not postpone the wedding for one day — ?”

“No, thank you,” replied the old lady: “there never was a postponed wedding that didn’t end in misery: either he has her to-day, or he never has her. So, come: he’ll come. The man is keen to be married, and therefore will be: come.”

She stood up, and within two minutes the carriages were off through the drizzle, to meet round St. Jude’s a great crowd from far and near, whom Morgan could hardly induce to keep off the bright carpet spread for the bride’s steps, many of whom, even when they had invaded the nave behind the bridal train, still found themselves crowded out in the rain.

And now in the chancel itself that stout heart of Mrs. Gordridge began to falter within her, and had in it the thought “be bold, be bold, be not too bold nor, when it became half-past two, and no news yet of Shan, could she any longer endure to sit tamely there regarding the gaunt laughs and shrugs and giggling shoulder of Rosie and her bridesmaids, but stole away into the sacristy, where, as in hiding, she sat shamefacedly facing Mrs. Orrock’s shame.

However, she had not been ten minutes seated there, when with a beaming countenance she was bounding out of her chair, breathing: “Thank heaven! just as I said...!” for old Pruie, a flurry of palish flesh, was there before her with the news: “Mr. O’Shannon, mum! at the cottage dressing — !” and Pruie had barely spoken, when in broke Anne Hine, saying very excitedly (for her): “Aunt, O’Shannon is now running down the village-street!...You are always right, dear Aunt, and I must always henceforth measure men by your standards.”

IX. SHAN AND SONGS IN THE NIGHT

THERE, THEN, ALL among the palms of the altar, before ever the old church-clock groaned three, was Rosie united to her perspiring bridegroom by Mr. Orrock, who afterwards at the lunch asserted, to Dr. Blood's annoyance, that "the main functions of a clergyman were, after all, to be a joiner and an engraver": and before God they were joined.

As for Rosie, in what way she passed that day, in what world she roamed, she could never afterwards remember, for it is no fun to carle or girl (with only one life) to be married for the first time, and the Burgundy with the pheasants made all whirl in her girl's-brain; but all went off bravely enough without her consciousness, for throughout the afternoon into night the marriage-bells were breaking out into brabblings; when it was dark a bonfire blazed on the tump of the Morplepiece; and left alone with Anne Hine, Mrs. Gordridge said then, gratified: "Well, it went off very well: Rosie Jones is married: and O'Shannon is just the man that I should have chosen as the ideal husband for her."

"Ah! but Arthur when he hears!" sighed Anne Hine: "for I am still convinced of a compact between O'Shannon and Arthur, only poor O'Shannon's back broke under it."

"All gammon," replied Mrs. Gordridge; "I have told you that Utopia is a curio for cranks, not usual in Europe; anyway, Arthur won't be getting to hear of the marriage for — months, it begins to seem, with these Boers fighting like fiends."

“But if there was a compact,” said Anne, “poor Arthur will be fighting on the strength of it, and then he will come home with the D.S.O. to claim his reward, only to find his bride shaking up fat baby O’Shannon in her arms.”

“Poor Arthur, it is rather rough on him,” admitted Mrs. Gordridge: “but, after all, he lost her in fair duello, and the Gordridges always did beg for a stronger head than theirs to check and rescue them.”

Anne nibbled a taste of cake-ice in silence, living on air, but delighting in tiny clandestine tit-bits that she nibbled like a cat; and presently she sighed: “So Shan O’Shannon broke down...

Human nature is a poor old pork-pie; but ah, Aunt, I don’t mind admitting now that if this fellow had only proved true to Arthur, I might have lost what I call my heart to a man.”

“Oh, you call it your heart,” muttered the old lady; “never mind, my poor Donna Quixote, some other mirage painted on haze will arise some day to entice your admiration.”

“You call it quixotic because the man earns wages,” answered Anne, “but the heart is a red republican, pale as the red may be. We are all alike diseased with the need to ‘desire and admire,’ and those of us formed with robust digestions desire bullock’s flesh and rosy-rich squires, and those formed with sicklier gorges have their greeds tickled by mirages and sunset gauds, and the kindred glories of the souls of heroes. We are things who crave and hate as we are made to: there’s nothing quixotic in Nature.”

“What about the Gordridge males?” asked Mrs. Gordridge; and she added: “knowing them as I do, it is a marvel that I didn’t foresee when I adopted Rosie that Arthur would be going gushing some day after such a sugar as the child was — but then people never do foresee anything, except crops.”

“We foresee, but are not too deeply concerned about our future self,” answered the analytic Anne, “and so leave it to fish for itself.”

“Anyhow, it is all over now,” said Mrs. Gordridge, “and Rosie Jones has turned out a good dutiful girl, doing without a murmur whatever I told her in all this marriage and China how-de-do, for she has some nous and sense in the pretty nut, ça se voit.... I should imagine that she has arrived now....”

Rosie, however, at that hour was still travelling, though now close to Clovelly; and remote, each in a corner of her compartment, sat she and Shan without speech, till Rosie remarked: “Well, you have got what you wanted now, yet I don’t know that you look irrepressibly gay over it”; upon which Shan, rising from depths of reverie, looked at his bride, and he sighed, saying: “You little know, Rosie: they are not far out those who say that ‘there is a peace which the world cannot give.’”

“But — isn’t it precisely ‘the world’ that has given me to you?”

“Yes, but it isn’t quite you that I am thinking of now,” observed Shan.

Now the bride’s brows prettily puckered, and she answered with “side”: “I fear it requires some sublimer mind than mine to pursue you in your higher flights.”

“You will some day, dear,” he said softly. “What I see and say at present is that there’s one certain star in the sky that’s sparklinger than all the rest, though all are sparkling, aye, and one certain lark in the Spring prattling prettier than all the rest — thank God for that.”

At this the bride’s left eyebrow cynically waved in despair of comprehending her spouse, for from the moment when they had found themselves alone in the train till now, he had proved foreign to her understanding; and she cast off her stole, for it was close in the compartment, and she flung open her mink coat with a jangling of things of gold hung at her wrist, and turned the leaves of her Graphic; and his eye-corners saw her lips split and reveal her pearls when what was comic in the paper tickled her, saw her face framed in her hair that was frivolous and buffo in front, though behind on her neck there was a gross club to it that was tidy, and her face framed in it looked so suave, like a dove in a grove, and the eyes so large and arch, she looked like winking at one almost, and her bit of a chin had a knob to it like the tump of the Morplepiece, and it broadened and stretched, everything stretched easily, firmly, like guttapercha, when she grinned at what was droll, and her bit of a nose turned up a bit: she was more like a picture-postcard, with an actress in colours on it, than like the ordinary bits of girl-flesh going about, she that was sprung out of peasant stock, too: it was wonderful.

With such thoughts Shan eyed her with his eye-corners furtively, till presently, glancing up, she asked him: “Did my Mama Gordridge question you to-day as to your queer disappearance last week?”

“Yes, she wanted to know,” said Shan. “Well, you haven’t volunteered the information to me, but naturally, being related to Eve, I am dying. Where were you?”

“Oh, a fairish way off.”

“A secret?”

“Not so very much of a secret.”

“Then, I am all ears.”

“No, you are partly eyes as well, and you know it, too, don’t you, by gad.”

“Don’t swear over it.”

“No, I said ‘gad.’”

“Better say Asher in order to be above suspicion.... But I am all ears — and eyes.”

“Not omitting the bit of a nose.”

“Nor even the two bits of a mouth.” But as she said this, Shan, from leaning keenly toward her, sat up sharply and rubbed a round of vapour from his pane to look out at Devon darting darkly past him.

“Is the task of forming your manners, too, among those reserved for me?” asked Rosie.

Shan span sharply round anew toward her, asking: “What can I do to please you now?”

“I was asking where you were for over a week?”

“Are you sure it is ‘over’?”

“Quite.”

“Shows how you notice my goings and comings, doesn’t it? I couldn’t go a step without your hungering after me, could I?”

“Do I look pale and gaunt to you? Do I not seem to have taken all my meals?”

“No, you look pretty plump.”

“Ah, you see.... So where have you been?”

“Oh, a bit beyond Oxford.”

“Oxford? whatever for?”

“I said ‘a bit beyond’: open your ears and you will hear.”

“They are buried in my hair, that’s why a lady can always be a little deaf when she wishes.

Well, it was ‘a bit beyond’: was it a big bit or a little bit?”

“Whom are you getting at? A bit about the size of you.”

“That all? Why, you could carry it all in your arms” — at which on a sudden Shan muttered something, turning away with shy eyelids.

“Well, why a bit beyond Oxford?” Rosie wished to know.

“Oh, a bit of business,” said Shan.

“What, another bit? and what was the business? I’ll have it bit by bit, if I can’t in one bite.”

“You won’t have it any way, for you are a bit too curious.”

“Is it a secret, then? Did you tell Mama Gordridge?”

“No, I didn’t tell Mrs. Gordridge.”

“Did she ask?”

“Yes, she asked.”

“Tell me.”

“Oh, everybody going to be married has a bit of business to get through: I won’t trouble your head with it whereat Rosie remained stiffly silent for some moments, till she said again: “But by what means did you get to Glanncourt between two and three, since there’s no train?”

“I bicycled the twenty-five miles from Gloucester,” replied Shan; “yes, and I should have been at the church-door a quarter of an hour earlier, only my front tyre broke.”

“Gloucester?” said she, “I imagined you were at Winchester, whence the wire was sent.”

“No, I wasn’t at Winchester.”

“Who, then, is this ‘Davis’ who sent a wire from Winchester to say that you would be in time?”

“Don’t you remember James Davis who used to live up on the Chase? That’s the same.”

“So you must have telegraphed to this Davis, telling him to telegraph to Glanncourt—”

“That’s it.”

“Whyever didn’t you wire direct yourself?”

“Curious, aren’t you?”

“Don’t you like them like that?”

“I like you! — rather well, that is.”

“Do you?”

“Ah, Rosie.”

“Well, what?”

“I know that you will be the death of me yet.”

“Why so?”

“I can see that you will be killing me dead before we’re through: but I perceive and see that though you were as sweet as wild honey, there is what is sweeter yet than you.”

“Why, what’s that?”

“Rosie, I’ll give it into your ear: it is what people call ‘the peace of God’ in the heart, Rosie.”

“Don’t swear, say ‘Asher.’ You are hardly very understandable, Mr. O’Shannon, and I had no idea you were religious before, since you have a reputation among the natives for gallantry... Be good, be good, be not too good... But may be the religion is only a reaction from that roaring Sunday evening two weeks ago, the edifying story of which duly reached my ears.... Is it true that you threw Griffiths’ necessary nag into the village-well?”

Shan sat with shy eyelids silent.

“You must be really terribly strong!” she said.

“Aye, in the back and limbs, I dare say; but it’s the pheasant’s head that the guns go for.”

“You can’t be very weak, even in the head, if that be true what you said in the book-room that evening that you haven’t kissed a girl since you kissed two one Sunday evening when you were thirteen.”

“What, you remember my saying that?”

“But is it quite true?”

“True enough: for very soon after that I started to fix my heart upon you, you see, where it has been fixed ever since; and that, and the wild-fowl, and the night-winds somehow, have kept me wilding and sound betwixt them.”

“Well,” said Rosie, and now, her pretty grin going out, her face was grave, “I am glad of that, for I’ll tell you now, Shan, that I am not such a goose to be altogether indifferent to what you are, or are not, in yourself, since I have to wear your ring on my finger, after all. Of course, some girls in my place would be crass enough to hate and spurn the sight of you, as I was nearly doing, for I have been having my little interior whirled in such a dream — ah, dear Lord, you can’t fancy it! — it was pretty stiff; and it was you that shattered it. But it wasn’t your fault, for it was not to be, it could never have been, the thing was a great deal too thundering grand to happen. So, though you are not likely to be under any delusions with regard to my sentiments toward you, for a girl’s soul can love only once in a lifetime, you know, still I don’t dislike you. My mama, but for whom I might have been a peasant, quite like yourself, I suppose, has seen fit to heap me upon you, and I mean to try to take you with a curtsy, though with a certain mental reservation, and to make you as piercingly sweet a little wife as may be, if you on your side will always show a sense that an honour has been done you. There — isn’t that a sensible little speech? Aren’t I a good little thing?” But almost before the lips of Shan could open to reply to all this, the brake of the train began to grate, and he was up, shifting rugs and hat-boxes and the belongings of a lady.

They then drove to a hotel, and, as it was now late, by the time the bride, who was tired of her day’s experience, had eaten a taste of supper, it was the bed-hour, the waitress looked drowsy, the town was drowned in the silence of night; so Shan led Rosie to the door of the chamber engaged for her, and, as he glued his lips to her hand in bidding her good-night, she felt the ague of his frame, and within, when he was gone, lingered a long time standing, gazing down with raised eyebrows upon the brush of eye-water which he had left on her palm.

“Now, there’s no good our staying in one place,” he said to her the next day when they were out seeing the town and “Nature,” “for there’s nothing like going the whole hog when you’re once in for a thing, and, as we are out to see England, let’s see it. What a glorious day it is, too! — one of your grand scenting days for going out with a boy and a brace of setters that know how to retrieve, so as to beat broken ground and outside copses for old cocks, as I’ve done many and many an early November day when a boy with — Lieutenant Gordridge, we two alone together all the day long, and then the dogs. Glorious! I feel this day as if I could shout for joy, God knows...”

“No, don’t shout,” murmured Rosie, “keep it down till it bursts out of itself.... I never noticed you in a Trilby hat before, you look rather natty. Just tilt it a little on one side.”

“Like that?” asked Shan.

“Yes, that will do... Oh, well, as to moving about, let that be as you will, for this place is silly, I don’t like it a bit.”

For weeks now therefore they strayed about, roamed in those streets of Bideford down whose steeps Queen Elizabeth had stepped, and licked cream from their fingers in Westward Ho roadstead, having forgotten their spoons. Rosie was very restless, and Shan, ever boyishly blithe, eager to please the bride, galloped her here and there, noting the character of each bit of country with his knowing eye, spending days in secluded picnic with her, for the weather continued good, and amusing her more museful moments with cargoes of yarns — no end to Shan’s yarns, though all were in the same vein of poacher and pothunter, of this white China, and that black cock. At Newton Abbot, where they passed all an afternoon in the hay of a Dutch barn, he gave her the tale of the affray in the beat named "Deechley's," where when a boy he had got his thumb shot off, and cringing together from the rain under a rick in a coomb near Ottery St. Mary, she said to him, "you really know much more than people who have only read books," when, under the umbrella which sheltered them, he had told her of a hen that he had caught nesting one Christmas on an old wall in a spinney, of hens that assumed the plumes of the cock, and yet continued to lay, of a grouse-cock that he had found sitting on pheasant-eggs, a thing in a hundred thousand. Before many days were over Rosie began to gain glimpses new to her into the very hue and tone of his soul, into the lode of poetry that innately veined the ore of his nature, his old mateship with the winds that storm in March, and with stars of the dawn, and the seasons of the year, she was ever anew amused at his enthusiasm for his youth, that adoration of the romance of his boyhood which made him yet a boy, at his disdain of the "gun" who struck a bird astern of the wing-covers, his stern brow and rancour against the brown rat. When, the honeymoon over, the train drew up at Albington, and Shan, pressing into his pocket the paper in which he had been conning the war-news, asked her if she was glad to get home, Rosie replied with a shrug and a sigh, "I don't know, I liked the going about: it might have been worse on the whole."

It was nine o'clock, the moon bright in the sky, and when the brougham that awaited them at the station had put them down at the Meadows-gate — for no carriage could get down to the cottage in its dale — they walked down to the pheasantry, to find before the cottage-door a small crowd of gardeners, watchers, woodmen, beaters, servants, waiting to cheer the ever-popular Shan and his still better half, and within, with arms half-opened for the smiling bride, smiled Mrs. Gordridge, and behind her — Anne Hine being absent at a neighbouring seat — peeped old Pruie and the new maid, the cottage now looking fairily strange to Shan, with electric jets showering down shimmerings of azure over a table laid with snow and silver.

Nor, in the days and weeks that followed, was Rosie left without honour and satisfaction of soul, since some quite nice people came to call at the keeper's cottage, aware no doubt that this would please Mrs. Gordridge — Mrs. Blood, Mrs. Orrock, the Cochranes, the bridesmaids' families, and other good friends, to whom ice-cake and wine were given, and Rosie was gay, though all remarked that she had a cast of thoughtfulness and pale roses, strange to her.

It was not till mid-December that Anne Hine, who had been “spending time” in Monmouthshire, returned, and within ten minutes was hurrying with her smile down to the keeper's house, to cut a curtsey to Madam O'Shannon. It was evening, and the table down there stood laid for dinner, for Rosie could not yet bear those mid-day repasts of her spouse's past; but Anne found there only old Pruie, who, smart in cap and apron, broke into gaiety, crying: “Well, now! glad I be, miss, to see you again, and looking so hearty: why, I declare there's a touch of colour come in your cheeks.... Well, now! Be you just come?”

“Yes, but where are they?”

“Him be wire-fencing that new bit o' broom aboove the top side of that nook-shotten bit they do name Newnes Covert, and her's gone to meet'n, for er's late.”

“Good little wifie!” smiled Anne.

“Aye, to-night her's good, but wait, I got a lot to tell you, only it must be for nobody's ears but your own — a lot.”

“What, isn't she always good?” asked Anne. “Her do have her bad days and her tantrums, the same as anybody, look, but that bent what I do mean:

there be something remarkably funny here, miss, oh, remarkably funny, and I've been itching for you to be back, just to hear what remark you'd be making when I did tell you."

At this those perfect nostrils of Anne that could discern from afar stirred and quivered, as she murmured: "Tell me now."

"Oh, not now," said Pruie, "they'll be here — Why, miss, it 'ood take me hours to tell you all, as only to-day Mary her said to me, 'I wouldn't do it,' er said, 'for it be double the work,' er said, 'doing the two bedrooms where I did only expect to have to do one, and I couldn't do it,' er said, 'no, nor wouldn't' — Here they come, I do believe."

Anne stood staring at Pruie, hearkening, too, to a sound of feet, a murmur of talk, coming down the Morplepiece, and for a brief space, during which her brow flushed a pink as faint as vision, she could scarce fetch her breath, nor stir, for the pale pearl-colours of fantasy which now strangely circled in that workshop of her brain; then, moving to the door, under a growing moon she beheld Shan and Rosie approaching, he with gun and bag and dog, looking big to her, like a lithe god stepping down in the greyish light, Rosy gipsy-like in red and black with a wrap rolled about her head, and seeing them thus, without contact, though moving arm to arm, Anne Hine with her eyes fixed on the moon sighed: "Ah, that's a lad," and commenced to throw off kisses to them, which Rosie imagined were meant for her.

X. SHAN AND NO SONGS

SNOW LAY GHOSTLY over the arches of the Old Garden, and whitened its paths, the night was dark, and the stable-clock tolled one on the ears of Rosie and Shan going home from a servants'- ball at the Hall, to which Shan, ever popular when fun was going, had been asked to act as M.C., and Anne Hine had opened it for Mrs. Gordridge (who had fled from it all), by dancing with Dover the butler, and then with the M.C., and Rosie also had waltzed with her lord.

Now, Rosie knew how to make herself look now a maid of sixteen, and now a lady of twenty-four, and that night in her evening-dress and white roses, with her waist cut out and rounded as by a sculptor's taste, was no day more than sixteen; so Shan, in adjusting her wrap, as they passed across the Old Garden, gave her a kiss, and was startled in it when the stable-clock tolled one.

"No, don't," murmured Rosie, when he kissed her, turning her mouth from him, but still he worked about and kissed her, till the clock tolled one.

Not a syllable was spoken between them now till they were down at the cottage, which was all in darkness, though Pruie had left them a wood-fire which lighted up their faces when they sat on each side of it, and there at last the silence was broken when in a low tone Rosie asked: "Why did you?"

"It's nothing," answered Shan.

"I'd rather you didn't," she murmured.

"Why so? It's nothing."

“Well, we have been married for months now, and as it has never once before occurred to you to do it, let us go on now in the delightful old way.”

“Can’t I be a good husband to you without all that foolhardy bullsquitter?” asked Shan.

“Precisely what I said.... Isn’t that the very thing that I said? So why did you to-night more than any other night?”

Shan in his easy-chair stretched his frame and writhed ill as ease, answering: “I don’t know —

It’s time to make a move to bed; I’d better turn on the light.”

“No, I like this light.... If you want to kiss anybody, why don’t you kiss Anne?”

“Why, Rosie!”

“She’ll let you.”

“Rosie, you had better mind what you are saying, hadn’t you?”

“She haunts you enough, and I feel certain that she suspects that you and I keep pretty clear of each other — I don’t know how she knows, or what right any human being has to pry into my private life, and if I only find that that old Pruie has breathed one word to any other woman about me, ah, won’t the old beast skip quick out of my house! As for you, Shan, listen, Shan, there was no need for Anne to dance with you to-night, and if ever you do again, or touch her hand, or glance at her, it’ll be all U.P. between you and me, away I go, and you never see my face again.”

“Why, Rosie!” cried Shan: “well, I can’t help laughing! Rosie jealous of Miss Hine....!”

“There can’t be any jealousy where there’s no love, can there?” asked Rosie.

“No, I — suppose not. But don’t get into such a fury over nothing! What, Miss Hine? A lady like her?”

“Is she more a lady than I am? If you are good enough for me, aren’t you too good for her, with her face like a corpse, and her figure like a chair-leg? Did she never kiss you?”

“Miss Hine, Rosie? Oh, this is laughable!”

“Well, I believe you; but she wants to madly, and there’s some sort of mischief going to come of it, so I warn you in time.”

“There’s not even the shadow of a shadow—”

“I know better, you see, for a man can’t see things as a woman can.... Well, I suppose I’d better be getting up to my bed now.”

“It’s pretty late, too,” said Shan: “I’ve got to lime and sand that upper aviary-run again in the morning....”

“Have you?... So, then, that’s understood between us: I’d rather you didn’t.”

“Would you? Didn’t what?”

“You know.”

“Oh, well,” went Shan, stretching, “such is life.... Very well, since you’re so stuck up, my lady, that settles it.”

“You see, I have been congratulating myself so greatly on my immunities — all the more because I was so ferociously threatened.”

“Did I threaten you?”

Rosie breathed through the nose two streams of smoke. “If I remember rightly. I think you said one night before the wedding that, though a snowflake, I was to be made to flush, and you chucked up your chin and clucked your tongue, and said Lord! I didn’t yet know Shan O’Shannon, and I was to be fused like wax in a wildish fire, some rot like that.... You frightened me. But providentially your bark has proved far worse than your bite, for you are not really very terrible, Mr. O’Shannon.”

As she spoke, a little clock by Boule just above their stooped heads hooted Two at them.

“Ah, well, there goes Two,” said Shan, stretching, “I suppose I must be making a move now; I mean to have a hard day of it, sowing those open spaces in that east-covert bit of gorse with buck-wheat, and wiring them in from rabbits, and then liming that upper run... Well, I don’t know, you might have a worse husband. Husbands are funny things, you see: you know nothing about husbands. Some husbands don’t look at their wives after leaving the church-door — didn’t you know that? Don’t look at them. Not that I myself am such a very cold husband, if the truth were known, but — didn’t I beg and implore you not to smother yourself in perfumes as you do? God only knows what it is you put on yourself, but it’s something that gets to a man’s brains, I tell you, aye, I can scent it from here now, strong. I’d be a better husband to you — but for that. It isn’t as if you were some other girl, but — you’re over and above; with that fire-light jiggling about your face you look like a gay she-fiend leaped up out of—”

“Hell,” said Rosie in a gross tone. “But I’m sure I don’t understand you one bit, for sometimes you talk like someone come from the moon.... At first it was all religion, and the peace of God in the heart, and going to church on week-days, and now that these raptures seem to have all gone cool, I am treated to a series of equally queerish moods, now fierce and storming, and now weepy and maudlin. You don’t really wish me to give up perfumes, I don’t understand why I am a ‘she-fiend’... Do you mean that in some way I tempt you? But you are married to me, after all, and though I do value my immunities, I have a pitying heart, Shan — Or do you mean something else? I never know how to take you! Aren’t you happy, Shan? Is anything wrong? Aren’t you well?”

“Well?” cried Shan, starting: “well, aye. I! One of the strongest men in England? Well, aye.”

“Don’t get excited over it,” muttered Rosie. “Something must be wrong, or you would never talk such a lot of rot, my husband, calling your wife a devil because she smells divine.... Do you know, I have always thought that you have a rather high sort of voice, anyone listening to us would take you for the woman, for my voice is deep, and yours—”

Shan started afresh, saying: “Well! Did you never hear me howl down a fox that sprang a beat of birds just as we were nicely pushing them into a clump, to shew to the guns? Womanish voice? This is adding insult to injury...!”

“Where’s the injury, or the insult? I don’t mean that it isn’t strong, but it is high-pitched, and your eyes twinkle like a girl’s reading a love-letter.”

“Well, what does that prove?”

“Heaven knows.”

“Ha! this is laughable! Ha! ha! ha! Rosie, don’t make a man out to be a fool.”

Rosie shrugged a shoulder, gazing over the failing flame, her naked arms on her legs, and presently their little clock told Three, and a storm arose in the dark morning.

“Well, I suppose we must be making a move,” said Shan.

“Yes, I suppose,” said Rosie; “though I don’t feel sleepy, my toes are cold, and feel my hand.”

“Better take off your shoes and toast your toes, if they are so very cold.”

“I think I will... and just fetch me a glass of chartreuse — or stay, I’ll get it myself,” and Rosie rose to go to a cabinet close by, soon to reappear in the fire-glow holding forth to Shan a glass of spirit that leered as greenish as bile.

“For me?” he asked.

“It’s nice and warming,” said she.

“None for me, thanks,” said he.

“You don’t know what it is like,” said she, her mouth now full of pound-cake: “you try, it’s nice.”

“I think I’d rather not,” said he.

“What, refuse a lady?” said she: “I have had some, so you have some.”

“Well, if I must,” said he, taking the thing, and raised it to his mouth, but before ever he had tasted, had the whole shot out upon the blaze, where it shouted and flamed. Rosie looked up from over the shoe which she was stooping to remove, asking: “Why, what is it?”

“It’s nothing,” said Shan.

“Well, I am cross!”

“No, don’t be that,” said Shan, “seeing that my head said yes to it, but it was my arm that” said no, knowing may be that two drops of that draff would have me all in a flame.... That’s tricky, too, mind you! for it is just touch and go with everything, but things are made just to scrape through on the whole. That’s canny, after all! that’s fly. Perhaps each organ of us has a life of its own, and, given a good habit of action, they just muddle through by one another’s help, like those chaps at Waggon Hill on January the 6th.... Ah, now, talking of fighting, there, now, was a fight for you — At first there were only the Manchesters on Cæsar’s Camp, and some Imperial Light Horse and Sappers on Waggon Hill, then, one after the other, up came the Gordons, the Devons, the 2nd Rifle Brigade, and at point-blank range it lasted all the day long in a storm, those grand Boers fighting like devils, and our little beggars like gods, and just behind the hill the 53rd Field Battery and Blewitt’s 21st—”

Rosie, chewing cake, was holding up her toes to the flame. “How you keep it all stored up in your head I can’t even conceive, it becomes grotesque this minute memory of dates and names! Pity you didn’t go out yourself with those Yeomanry, as anyone could see that you were wild to do.”

“What, I, a man just married?”

“I think your wife could have spared you without sighing in her sleep,” said Rosie.

“But suppose I had got killed — I say, would you have cried for me?”

Rosie rolled her eyes gravely round at him a moment, and then with a shrug said that she dared say that she should, since he was not bad on the whole; upon which Shan, leaning keenly forward, called her a blessed sweet, and Rosie muttered: “It is coming on again.... If I am so blessed sweet, why did you chuck my chartreuse on the fire? Let me give you another glass now....”

“No, dear,” moaned Shan tenderly, “some other night, not to-night... What was I telling you? Oh, about that Waggon Hill affair! Now, you must know, Rosie, that, some time before this, on December the 8th, the Natal Carabineers, the Border Mounted Rifles, and the—”

“Oh, I am so sick of the war,” sighed Rosie; “When is it all coming to an end?”

“Not yet awhile, it seems!... Ah, they are masters those Boers, I love them like brothers, even though they are bitterly hard on me.”

“How do you mean, on you?” asked Rosie, anew rolling her eyes round at him.

“Because — it is so, dear,” he replied. “We all believed that the war would soon be over, didn’t we? not keep on for months, and months, and months, and months, like this. May God help us all! When will it ever be done, so that one may say ‘it’s over and done now, and here’s a day come in which a man can breathe free of the job of it’?”

“But why should you trouble particularly?” Rosie wished to know: “You are not even an Englishman yourself—”

“But who is doing this fighting mostly but the Irish?” asked Shan: “and if ever you hear of a deed more giddy gallant than all the rest, be sure there’s a dash of Irish somewhere about, as on that February the 22nd on Pieter’s Hill with those Inniskillings, and that Talana Hill affair on October the 20th, with the Dublin Fusiliers in the first line, and the—”

“Was the lieutenant in that battle?” asked Rosie at random, to stop the war-story.

Shan looked scandalized. “What, on the 20th, Rosie, when he only left England on the nth? Wasn’t Lieutenant Gordridge at Magersfontein at the other end of Africa almost?”

“Oh, well, one can’t remember dates and things,” said Rosie, “I only know that he is somewhere, Mama Gordridge herself couldn’t tell you quite where on the map, only you and Anne, so that’s why she is in love with you, because in some ways you are birds of a feather, and it is a pity you did not marry her instead of me, she would have enjoyed your style. How she manages to be in love I don’t know, for she has no vitals; but she is, wildly; it is like a corpse going whiter with passion. Perhaps it is only to imitate you that she is so well up in the dates and things, while Mama Gordridge takes it easy, though getting pretty disgusted, too, that the lieutenant hasn’t distinguished himself—”

At this Shan started, crying out: “She be — hanged! Is there any sense in that, now? What do women know about campaigning? Let her wait, let the whole world wait! he will soon enough shew them the stuff a Gordridge is made of.”

“But she has waited, and he hasn’t done anything,” murmured Rosie: “it strikes me, he is more for wounding girls than for shooting off guns, if you ask me.”

“He is good at both, I dare say, as a gallant lad should be,” said Shan, “but he! you don’t know him as I do — well, you couldn’t: he is the king of the lot of them, he is—”

“Well, I like you for saying it, Shan, after all the fury there was between you two, but I suppose as the victor you can afford to be generous, though you’ll change your tune, if, when he comes back, he—”

“Well, what?”

“Carries off poor innocent me by force of arms!”

“What, you, a married woman?”

“It isn’t pious, but such things have occurred on this little earth: there was one Helen of Troy, not to mention the late—”

“But Helen, she consented, she helped the lover, didn’t she?” asked Shan, eyeing her askance; “but you, now, you would say no, you wouldn’t go, would you?”

“Perish the thought,” said Rosie in a gross tone, and she siffled to herself through her teeth-edges the tune of “Over the Garden Wall.”

“But suppose he does take you” — Shan snatched his chair a foot closer to her—” I say, suppose — Well, when you are with him, and I am far away somewhere where no wave of the sea was ever swelled with Severn-waters, will you be remembering poor me, too, at times, Rosie? saying to him some night may be over the fire: ‘there was once one that loved us both well’?” Rosie answered nothing, for, gazing now at a vision which she saw in the grate of the gallant lieutenant’s return, she had scarcely heard, till now she found his brow bowed to her knee, when she pouted: “O my, what now?” and then more gently, “Are you sad about something, dear?” upon which

Shan sprang up, walked through the room, and sat anew, saying “hark at the wind.”

“What was it?” she asked.

“It’s nothing.”

“Funny chap you are,” said she, “I seem to have married a mystery. Who would have supposed that you are like this? as full of changes as April days, so that you become one’s occupation, and one hasn’t the time to think of anything else when you’re there.... Something’s wrong somehow, and, as it is my right to ferret it out, I will: I’ll tease, and tweak, and flog, and plague you, till I get it, for there’s some secret — Why, for instance, wouldn’t you tell where it was you went to for three days a fortnight ago? That’s one thing I’m going to have explained, and also why it is I have to wait for the birthday pearls when, by your own shewing, you should have lots of oof to fling away? Are we hard up? and if not, why the waiting, and the eyes too shy to look me in the face? There is something.... And, by the way, who was that old woman — ?”

“Old woman?”

“What a start! yes, old woman, Shan. What, is she another one of the mysteries, too?”

“I am afraid I am not aware what old woman—”

“Oh, there’s a fib now! so why did you start, as if I had stuck you with a red-hot poker? And you have gone quite white — Why, what’s up?”

“It’s nothing,” said Shan, cowering now closer over the dying fire, whereat Rosie cast a calf over her chair-arm, twisting round to stare at him, saying: “So who was she?”

“I have told you, Rosie—”

“But Pruie actually saw you with her!”

“Pruie? Where?”

“Under one of those clumps of spruce-firs in the middle of the west home-covert.”

“Pruie did? saw me with whom?”

“Why, with this old woman!”

“Oh, you keep on. Pruie must be raving mad!”

“No, Pruie isn’t, then: there is something in it, and I mean to have it. She says that last week some very old woman appeared from somewhere, took a room at The Grapes for three days, got awfully tipsy on the second day, collecting everybody round her by jigging the cake-walk in the village-street, and on the third day was seen talking to you in the covert.... Why on earth do you deny it? I meant to ask you, but forgot, not dreaming that there was any secret.... Pruie assured me that the old thing jigged and snapped her fingers into your face, and you grew red, and raised your arm at her, but afterwards gave her a brown-paper parcel out of your pocket—”

As she spoke the clock struck four, and “there goes Four,” groaned Shan; “Oh, God knows, I shiver with cold.”

“Tell me first about this old girl, and I’ll go so far as to warm you with a —”

“With what? What will you warm me with?” said Shan with an intense intolerance, starting straight: “not one instant more do I stew in this sty!”

Rosie stared up at him, asking: “Why, what now?”

“Rosie, it is four o’clock in the morning....”

“Well, you could have gone to bed! Why didn’t you? You must like dissipation, or you would have gone.”

“Why didn’t you? Do you like dissipation?”

“I love it.”

“Ah, you, you’re a one inside, if the truth were only known,” said Shan with an accusing eye askance; “ah, you’re of a deep dye, the brose of Satan's own baneberry, if one was but in you to taste you, I dare say."

"Don't you like them like that?"

Shan sighed helplessly to himself. "But it is four o'clock, what is one to do?"

"All right, let's be good and go now," said Rosie, "the fire's almost out.... As my shoes are off, I'll allow you to carry me up."

Her words were hardly uttered when Shan had her in his arms, and though he made quite a dash with her to escape kissing her, he had not the time, for midway on the stairs his mouth found out and was confounded with her mouth to the moment when at her door he dropped, or rather cast her from him, with such repugnance, that she went staggering, and he was gone, not to his chamber, but down and out into the air, where he ran some way into a belt of timber.

Out there with many eyes the heavens kept wake and saw a storm of wind whooping within a vault of sky all dizen'd with stars," for the halfmoon had passed away, leaving the west as inflamed as a womb with after-heat where for long her warmth had bloomed, and born in the east so far was no daub of dawn; so here he breathed easier than in that atmosphere of fog that he had been undergoing for three hours in the house, an inferno of vapours working foully without vent, like confined fire-damps, and smokes which smoulder hotly within the holds of cotton-ships. With Shan of late it had fared but too shabbily, since that Comforter of the renouncer, who at first had regaled him with carouses and secretly feasted him with gods, was gone now from him, as is Her wont, to test his soul, so that alone now he found himself dull on the mountains of endeavour. But out there where the wind blew through the cover, that was better, where, seated on the roots of a beech, he could watch the gale shiver greyly here or there over the grass, as it were thousands of mouse-ghosts arush with outstretched throats, and the grove roared to it in rondeaus, for now it was that yew-group yonder that took up the fugue, griped with the music-fury, and now it was this group nigher by that furiously took it up, as obeying the bâton's pointing, voice calling to voice, and now with a joyful noise all roistering joined to beshout the wind-shower's outrage — a hurricane so high, its flaws seemed, sweeping athwart the twinkling bowl of the sky, to blow the stars all aflickering, Albireo and Aldebaran and the Great Bear, street-lamps in the Babylon of God; and Shan, seated with a drooped head on his beech-root, thus communed within himself: "It is late enough for such a gale, and for this snow, too, for I've seen three full clutches of eggs already, celandines are all out, flowering Sunday's gone, and the first broods of woodcock will soon be flying: but, then, this year is like no other year. May God have compassion upon a poor chap! I never thought it would be such a torment, no peace day nor night, like living in nettles till you are weak and shriek with hysteria, like trying to jump from your own shadow every minute, for months, and months, and months, like this. God knows, I'd fight a tiger, I shouldn't shrink, I am no coward, I'd fight five tigers, and worm out of it somehow, but by what droil is a man to wriggle out of the gripe of his own groin, get outside of himself, and flog his own soul? No doubt there have been chaps canny enough for suchlike kinds of job, like that Julius Cæsar who overran France, and then he seized upon Britain, not to speak of him that went sweating up the steep o' woe that day underneath his weary cross; but I! Am I one like that? Not likely. Do I look like it? Have I the walk of it, and the stalk of it? Do the chaps in the village see it about me when they shout out 'hello, Shan'? Not likely. So what am I, to be able to bear this bale on my back? Sprung from a dung-hill! My mother Martha O'Shannon was no angel, my father was just an average labourer-chap, born up there above the Chase, and though the pair of them did make me pretty quick on the pins, with a fair pair of optics, and a long lung, did they put just a pinch of sage, too, into the stew? I'm not sure: that will be curious to watch: but however that may be, I'm bound to it now, and though the blaze of a thousand devils devour my bowels, I'm bound to it now, I'm bound to it now.... Twice in this one night of sin and misery I've kissed her: twice: never again! that's death: death for her, death for me: never again! if ever once again, I glut my gullet with her, and end everything with the gun... but, God, spare us; spare us, good God! give a poor loon grace! and bring me not into temptation," upon which Shan's brow dropped down upon his arms, where it remained a long time bowed, till, staring up amazed, he saw that the night had transformed itself, and was broad morning.

XI. SHAN AND ANNE

THAT SAME FORENOON, before Rosie had risen from bed, Anne Hine sat by her side, as was sometimes her way, bantering the bride, being indeed now far more frequently down at the cottage than Rosie liked in her heart; and when she said to Rosie: “Is it the dance that makes you so late in bed, or did you sit up after?” Rosie, with her own motives, replied, “Oh, we both sat up over the fire — such a jolly time we had! didn’t come up till after four, and even then the gander kept on teasing, and wouldn’t let his poor girlie sleep” — words which brought the interview sharply to an end, because Anne, irritated to the heart by them, now lost her temper, which she rarely lost, and making a lip-sound of impatience, muttering to herself, “futile little fool,” got up, and was gone.

“Did she notice that I was enraged, I wonder?” she wrote in her diary that night — and let us picture this poor maid, her poor feet now erring fast toward tragic regions, writing there at a table late into the night in a soundless house, her head, as she wrote, bent aside for her left hand to smooth down and down the left lobe of her hair — the emblem itself of musing. “Did she notice that I was enraged? Absurd of me to be angry at anything that that girl chooses to say, and still more so to shew it, if I shewed it. That’s hardly likely though, for it is my little way, I take it, to see the heart lie clear in the bosom like a pebble in a brook, but to remain unseen myself. I wonder if Shakespeare or Homer ever had such lucid interviews as I with the obscurer movements of human souls? Homer possibly, but scarcely Shakespeare, I fancy, for Shakespeare had sex, and sex, I feel certain, must infect the clearness of the perception, while I, without sex, am just like a being instinct with purged eyes of ice, sent down to the earth to observe the loom of the human bosom at work. And I seem to be as unseen as I am seeing, for how little do any of them know me! Miss-Mrs. Rosie, for instance, how far from any shadow of suspicion that all this time I am enamoured of the lad, and how far, if she did suspect, from being able to comprehend the springs of this craving, those nuptials of the grave which alone can console my hunger, that dark Dourga of death into whose arms I yearn to throw my girlhood grossly, the lad and I together, he and I. Even if I were to explain myself, I should probably remain abstruse, since even to myself I am abstruse. Which, for instance, is it that I love — the hero or the heroism, the man or the huge manhood? If the man, why did I not love him before I knew of the manhood? Always, indeed, I have had a sort of desire in my eye-corner toward him, a leering, a leaning, something: but nothing of this craving. So it is the heroism, not the hero? or the heroism in this hero, because it is this hero's? Heaven knows! We can wash other people's backs, and watch other people's interiors, but not one's own well. And with what do I love him? There's only mind and body, and since I assume that I love only with the mind, then, should not my love be of a cherubic purity? Galba! The thin throes of the ghost of Galba returned to earth to gloat over the bones of his old gluttonies! I am a saint who prefers death to saintliness, I struggle in vain against my better nature, and the evil that I would that I do not. What an imprisonment! Fires of ice!—" the parching air burns froze well, but there's a way out, and an hour of espousals certain for me also.

"This morning on coming back up from the cottage, I had such a fright, for like a goose I had left the hat-box with the books drawn out from under the bed, unlocked, and when I got into my room, there was Nancy, sent by Aunt to see if I was there, staring at the books! I was awfully scared, but when she made some remark about “a lot of paper books,”

“paper books” made me laugh in a reaction of relief, and I mentioned that they were foreign tracts. I am now seriously thinking of burning them all, for really they do me no good, and are only a danger there. When I went down to Aunt, she wished to know with what motive I am for ever down at the O’Shannon cottage now! I answered something nonchalant, upon which she said: ‘You are not so very fond of Rosie, so I don’t understand, and on the whole there’s something quite odd and unworldly about you lately, like a girl stung with the gad-fly: I hope you don’t mean to go crazy, for I am responsible for you.’

‘I thought I was too lucid to go crazy, Aunt,’ I said. ‘Well,’ she said, ‘your grandfather, Professor Morgan, was a great mathematician and lucid enough, I dare say, but he ended his days in a lunatic asylum.’ I had forgotten about that, and somehow a cold something ached within me.... A mad mathematician! like sunlight changed into the lunacy of moonlight! like ice rushing ravingly into avalanches! Then Aunt began to ask about the O’Shannons, if I thought O’Shannon a good husband, and Rosie happy, because when Rosie dined at the Hall on Monday, she had asked if Rosie was happy, and Rosie had too eagerly answered: ‘Oh, quite!’ though pale, and admittedly sleepless. Poor Aunt! she isn’t a bad old sort of matriarch, and I’m sorry for her now — growing quite grey about the temples lately, had rather a shock about that scratch on Arthur’s arm at that Abraam’s Kraal engagement on the 10th, and will suffer no doubt to lose her Anne and her Shan in one swoop, and to see Arthur marry Rosie, after all — if he ever comes home. Ah, it was a canny, outwitting lad that you had to do with, my Auntie, wise as serpents, patient as God, good as a child, the bird-beguiler: and I like him well.

“But why do I? Can’t the hound in the head scent out the fox in the heart, and Anne effect the analysis of Anne? Is it because he is wholly unlike me? his soul so male in form, mine so female? I a sneak, intellectual, non-moral, sensuous, pigmy as a mouse, he a hero, hearty, all-moral, big as a mountain? There’s at least this one certainty about it: that the saint, the self-garrotter, is ever magnetic: ‘great multitudes followed him,’ and ‘I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men after me.’ It is so; and I can see why, inasmuch as a man, having said ‘no’ to the legion in himself, being now a chieftain and king, the kingless mob flock to his standard, for it is as if a mainspring had been wound up somewhere, a force all taut, rebounding, and this draws, as the pebbles rave after the withdrawing wave; or it is as if his inward friction breaks into flame, round which the moths crowd to burn their wings; so that perhaps, to compare the things of the spirit with material things, I am merely a shallop racing in the wake of a great ship, beguiled by the nose after all the throb and groanings of those gigantic engines. And not I alone: Aunt, not in the least knowing why, no longer regards the lad as a menial; Rosie, starting with her prejudice against him, and engaged all the time in dreaming of Arthur’s return, still owns the big ship’s suction, and dreams not of Arthur only, but of King Arthur. Of course, when Arthur comes, since to be mistress of Glanncourt is more glorious than the moon, the little goose will swoon into his arms, but for the present, anyway, my white wife is pretty hot after the elusive vessel’s draught; and the same with us all: Shan O’Shannon walks taller, there’s some aura, some astral body, exhaled out of that travail of his soul, a halo about his head, which one feels without seeing; and the truth about me, I suppose, is, that with all that gorgeousness and its sunset my meanness is eager to associate itself, the shallop eager to go down in the foundering of the great ship, to degrade his death-bed with my body on it, to marry him in the grave, somehow to have him grandly, to drag him down at the last to my level, or mount to his, to die with him; for, dear, I do love you a lot, or at least strain to love you, longing ever so to fling my soul upon your strength; and you will indulge me, and be good to me, dear, letting my head be on your breast on the bed, admitting me once to be your bride, and I shall have one throe at last, sublimely guilty, and we shall go aslumbering.

“Yes, there’s a principle of explosion universal in the process of Nature, the earth having its volcanoes, the animal its rages, and whatever cannot explode at one vent will explode at some other, the philosopher exploding in tomes of philosophy, the poet in an epic, Hodge in a progeny of children, I in dying licentiously: for, though a philosopher in your fashion, you can’t garner your thoughts into an organon, Anne, you are a poet, but can’t express your poetry, you draw and draw, but never really well, you would be breeding like Leah, but can never yean a breese, you are all null and neuter, and can only explode deathward. Let it be so. I have seen the sky at night, and by at least this one mind of mine in the deep of Time, if by no others, that sight has been highly admired: but why keep on seeing and admiring? Through that south casement there I can see it now again, now while it is still to-night, and my life has not yet glided into to-morrow, a sky as thick as a cornfield with stars, though the sickle of the moon is in it, and has reaped a rood amid-field: anew now, while it is now and to-night, I view it, soon to view it no more, and it with all its orbs will look for its orphaned child, but no more shall find me: for I be aweary, my hearties, foredone with spurring and spurring o’ myself, being neither good ghost nor good girl, but an uneasy half-and-half; and I’ll end my trouble when the lad ends his.

“But when? It seems clear that he does not mean to kill himself until after Arthur comes home, fearing, may be, that, if he should, Aunt would banish, the widow away beyond Arthur's reach. But, since Arthur may not come for months yet, it will be monstrous, both for me and for Shan, to wait till then, for I can remotely guess at the agonies that he must be hourly undergoing, and suppose at any moment he breaks down in this strain? If I could somehow spur him more quickly to the act, or separate him from Rosie, I would — in mercy to himself; and just possibly, by keeping my eyes open, I shall find the means, for he appears to be involved in difficulties outside the white wife trouble, since, if what Pruie says be true there's some mysterious old woman with whom he seems to be in some way ensnared, and, what is more, is he not at present stealing from the estate? Really, it looks so to me from what I can make out of the pheasantry-account! I wonder if he would do such a thing really, for any reason? That would be amusing! For though his reason for doing it is sure to be grand, still, stealing is stealing, my Shan, and that's grotesque to discover the angel Gabriel turned burglar. Certainly, the pinch of scarcity is in the cottage, I can see it — a rather astounding thing considering Aunt's bounty to the bride! So what has been done with all the money? I'll look into it and see."

XII. SHAN AND AN OLD WOMAN

AT A LATER date Anne adds: “Why is it nice to do naughty things? What a nick of perversity in the world which urges one to hearken and peep, to stick pins into people, to please oneself with tattlings and slanders, and the working of small mischiefs! for, if one can’t be perverse in one way, one will in others. It is that same centrifugal vigour in man that causes the orbs to vault on their orbits: for there’s a centripetal, or good, and a centrifugal, or perverse, and to the perfect working of the two the universe is due, since when one or the other rules ruin ensues, as I through being super-perverse will die, as Shan, Socrates, Jesus through being super-moral. At any rate, on the morning of the 29th I was listening at Shan’s chamber-door with a pleasure all the sharper because of the danger I was in, for after being early out, and sketching Barclay’s waterfall, I went down to the cottage just as the servants’ call-bell commenced to sound up at the Hall, and there found Pruie and Mary up and about, with Bates who had just brought over the milk from the home-farm. Pruie told me that Rosie was’awake, though not up,’ so I was going up to the white wife’s levée when I caught sight of the tail of a scarlet dressing-gown aflaunt up there — she rushing out of her room down the passage, and I suppose I must possess a pussy-cat’s step, or she would have noticed me — unless her mind was very preoccupied; anyway I heard her tap at Shan’s door, heard him drone from his bed: ‘Who is there?’ heard her make answer: ‘It is Rosie,’ heard him cry: ‘What, you? Come in!’ and this made me mad, for I knew that she had never dared do this before, so I stole up to the door, just in time to hear her grumble to him something about coming to get her brown gown out of the wardrobe, upon which, hearing her open the wardrobe, I fled back a little, waiting patiently now for my maiden to step out; but she didn't come, and understanding presently that she had planted herself upon his bed, I stole right up to the door, which she had left slightly ajar, and hearkened.

“I was there over an hour, and so profoundly agitated I never was, I felt so wickedly, and moreover I was being pulled each moment between fear of being found lingering there, and eagerness to hear. Once Snout paced out to me, his tail pounding against the door as he adored my hand; and from within everything came out clearly, the talk being all about the war first, then all about cocks and hens, pairs and breeds, Rosie sitting on the bed with her face turned to the window-roses, Shan always stretching his body, yawning, ‘ah, well, such is life.’ Lately she has been quite making the aviary her hobby, learning to treat the birds’ diseases, to give them their green-feed, to seek ants’ eggs, so that the pen-birds have got to know her well by now, and now this was all the talk, she first wishing to know, ‘by the way,’ how a certain cock came there, since there were no others like him about, to which Shan answered: ‘Such things do happen, seeing that in the pheasant-farmers’ pens birds of different species pair — unknown to the farmer sometimes — then those eggs going all over England hatch out hybrids, which hybrids are always changing their haunts: and three Autumns since a pure-white cock lived in that Newnes clump, that disappeared, and I’ve never seen’n since.’

“‘That’s funny,’ remarks the white wife, ‘perhaps he failed to acquire any lady-friends in this country-side owing to colour-prejudice, for some ladies do shrink from albinos.’

“‘Do they?’ says Shan, ‘are you one of them?’

“Her whiteship shuddered, going: ‘Gur-r-r! I could not stand a very fair man within a mile of me.’

“‘That’s why you will have none of me, I suppose,’ says he, stretching, ‘because I am fair.’

“‘Oh, you,’ says she: ‘well, your eyes are a very light blue, certainly, three shades lighter than mine at least: but, then, you have quite a dash of dark in your hair and moustache, which rather brings you into the running.’

“‘What, will I pass?’ he asks.

“‘You might, at a push,’ says she.

“‘That’s one for me then, and I’ll storm the fortress yet, if I only keep on trying hard’ — and he stretched: it is strange he didn’t drag his frame to fragments with stretching—’ but, as to that white cock, that wasn’t it why he went away, you may bet, for he left his mark pretty well behind him among the wild-bred fowl in the belts and brakes about, not to mention — you know Jim Price’s lot of domestic fowls?’

“‘Well?’

“‘This albino fellow came and drove away a Cochin China cock of Price’s, and also a black bantam — fought like a fiend — and then paired with the hens’; upon which Mrs. Rosie reached out to the window to pluck some honeysuckle, saying: ‘But did the domestic hens meekly bow down to the conqueror?’

“‘They were all right.’

“‘Oh, women are too treacherous!’ says she with a shudder and a pout: ‘treachery’s in the very grain of the wretches. Myself, I hold with sticking always to one, don’t you?’

“‘I do,’ says he; ‘but this was a case of a white man marrying a black woman, and the hens’ heads were turned by it, no doubt, as even yours might be if the Prince of Wales, say, or a certain person, were to say to you, 'leave this miserable gamekeeper man and come and be mine.'

"At this she ogled him archly, asking: 'Think I'd go?'

"'No,' he answered, 'I don't think that, I only see and say that the offer would be dazzling, though I would bet any day on you against it, seeing that men and women are made in the image of God, after all.'

"'Men are, may be,' says she, 'but women, I'm afraid, are made in the image of Mrs. God, who has an ancient flirtation with Satan, so that's why Satan was chased—'

"'You do say things, Rosie,' says the lad.

"'I quote Mama Gordridge, who by "Mrs. God" meant Nature, I suppose,' says Rosie; and fingering up her négligé knob of hair behind, which drooped half-loose under the violet tassel of her scarlet tarboosh, she asked: "But how did they get on, the hens? Those must have been outlandish looking objects that came from the resultant eggs.'

"'Aye, things with a fowl's legs, and a pheasant's tail,' says Shan.

"'Puts me in mind,' says she, 'of that blackcock you have, how he has disported himself with those three pheasant-hens — O, really, that was too much, one couldn't help laughing.'

"'When was that?'

"'Yesterday afternoon. You should have seen them.'

"'Should I? So what took place?'

"'Mrs. Rosie pores over one of her morocco sole-slippers in her hand, smiling to herself, as I could see, though a mist was before my eyes, and my knees weak beneath me; and she says: 'Darts and daggers took place, for first of all the blackcock dug his beak well into the pheasant-cock, and chased him clean away, and then he came stalking back to the ladies like a lord.'

“‘Did he?’ says the lad, and, peeping, I could see him lying with his head raised on his arm, not looking at her at all with his dead eyes that gazed straight into vagueness, his face grey but for one daub of scarlet like a brand over one cheekbone, his bosom moving beneath his woollen night-jacket; ‘did he?’ says he confidentially: ‘so what took place then?’

“‘You should have seen them,’ says she in a little voice, grinning: ‘the blackcock began to court the pheasant-hens, as if they were birds of his own feather — oh, great Golgotha! he did carry on.’

“‘Did he? How did he?’

“‘Well, you know how blackcocks do throw themselves about when they want to be irresistible — he tossed his tail on high, and went stalking about with it arched in the air like a turkey-cock, turning out all his charms for admiration, calling the love-call, and those scraps of crimson skin over the eyes, they poked right up, growing more gross, till his head got quite a crested look with it.’

“‘Fancy,’ says he.

“‘You should have seen him,’ says she.

“‘Oh, well, such is life,’ says the lad, tearing his frame in a stretch like a wretch on the rack, and I could almost feel with him how easy just to reach out his arm and reap her, and, ah, how hard to love an hour hence more than now.

“Now she, leaning round to him, her elbow on his knees, says: ‘What’s the matter? You don’t look well.’

“‘It’s nothing,’ he answered: ‘I don’t sleep at night.’

“‘Neither do I: and, Shan, I can’t bear it much longer, I must see Dr. Blood, for—’ but at that moment the breakfast-gong began to clang out below, and now she pouted: ‘Oh, silly! why, we haven’t even had our baths —’ “‘Go, dress, sweet,’ he panted at her, smothered.

“‘The breakfast will go all cold,’ she almost whispered, ‘I had better order it up, and we will have it here on the bed, and make a holiday of it — shall we? shall us? Say yes, and, Shan—’

“They were pretty breathless, both of them, though I couldn’t see the look in their eyes, she was leaning so over him, her fingers combing the tangle of his hair; and there, though I knew that she might be rushing out at any moment, I stood rooted, unable to swallow, waiting for the outcome, till, to my amazement, without one shade of the agitations of two moments before, he was uttering the words: ‘Rosie, you smell badly of onions—’

“Poor white wife, she had not a syllable to say, was so taken aback, that she at once raised herself up, and though I was at once away, came out so quickly that she saw me at the stair-head, and said a ‘you?’ that would have made milk sour. I called her ‘lazy’ and ‘luxurious,’ said I would stay for breakfast, then went down and spent a few minutes in gossiping with Pruie, and in glancing at the white wife’s diary, which she leaves about — such a diary! nothing in it, pages taken up with attempts at housekeeping accounts, others full of nothing but her name, ‘Rosie O’Shannon’ repeated a hundred times, and thrice there appears ‘Rosie Gordridge’; then, looking out of window upon the garden for a while, I stood thinking of ‘Rosie, you smell of onions,’ and couldn’t then, and can’t now, help marvelling at this man’s craft! his wit, his nerve, his squirrel versatility, the virtue and vigour of the working of his divine sagacity! The highborn! For as though it was some god, his Father, who breathed the words into his ear to say, they seem to me now when I turn them over, perhaps the only words in the whole of speech which could have really rescued him, and wrenched sudden victory out of the very mouth of rout. Well, down Rosie rushes presently in her old roan-velvet robe, looking flushed and morose, but just as ravishing as a rose, one must admit, the tarboosh still stuck a jaunt on her head, and soon after her, in his Norfolk-jacket, in strolls my saint all haloed and smiling; so we sat to the warmed-up eggs, but had hardly begun, when there was a knock at the door, and Mary came in to say that an old woman who gave the name of Mrs. Graves wished to see Mr. O'Shannon. Oh, Shan! whatever is the matter there? I never saw anyone go so ghastly all in a moment! 'Graves?' says he, 'all right, tell her—' and his whiteness suddenly rushing into red, out he dashed, while the white wife and I stared after him with wonder, she getting up to go half-way to the room-door, where during fully eight minutes she stood hearkening to the altercation outside the house-door: and, whoever Mrs. Graves may be, she is evidently a very gay old body, for I could hear her giggling, and Shan frequently going 'sh-h-h,' in an anguish to her, but I couldn't catch anything else, save an exclamation of 'Gawd bless us' from the old thing.

"Presently Shan returns to us looking gauntly stern like one come through an ordeal, and Rosie begins the questions in a 'may-I-ask' sort of tone: Who was this Mrs. Graves? the same old woman who had previously been seen with Shan in one of the coverts? 'It's nothing,' was the sum of Shan's answers, and though she got him to admit that this was the same old woman, he soon grew angry, put his foot down, and shut up the questions.

"Well, we had hardly breakfasted when Cuthbert ran down to call me for Aunt, and I spent most of the day over accounts and letters, seeing or hearing nothing of the O'Shannons till after eight in the evening, when Pruie, in a state of excitement craved 'to have a word wi' me,' and at the conservatory-door I saw her, bursting with the news that Mr. O'Shannon had had another meeting with the old woman at the same spot in the covert, a stormy meeting at eleven in the morning, which Pruie herself had witnessed—' since it bent much that can go past me, miss, and I be as sharp as a needle with two points,’ — after which interview Mr. O’Shannon had come home, only to go out again about noon taking with him — a parcel. What was in that parcel? Pruie had found out — a good half of the household silver — part of Rosie’s dowry — kept in the bottom drawer of the small wardrobe; and as Mr. O’Shannon had taken the 2.16 train to somewhere — everyone in the village knew it — and as he had not come back — without the parcel! — till seven, Pruie could only conclude that he had gone to some town to pawn the silver, in order to give the money to this unknown old woman.

“What a thing! What a mystery! Pruie’s ancient flesh shook palely at it; and then the tale of what had taken place when Mr. O’Shannon came back weary and grumpy at seven o’clock... Pruie had never seen him at all like that, except that once when he went wolf-mad with the drink before his marriage. The white wife was at the piano playing when he came in, so she got up to him, and began to ask him where he’d been to, but he, without answering her questions, began to thee her and to thy her in the broadest Gloucester, smiling down bitter upon her, telling her, ‘yes, thee thinkst that I do love thee, but thee dussn’t know how I do hate thee, thee dussn’t know all’; so she looks up at him in astonishment, going paler about the nose, and er says to her, she being nicely dressed for dinner in her green with the hanging sleeves, ‘yes, thee thinkst thyself a queen because thee’s clothed in these gaudy bits of togs and gold, but dress thee in rags, and thee’d be nothing to look at, for it be fine feathers that make fine birds’; then he throws himself down on the sofa with his legs stretched out afore him, and after a time er says to her: ‘My feet are sore, get me my slippers,’ upon which she couldn’t speak, she was so taken aback, then she calls out: ‘Pruie! get Mr. O’Shannon’s slippers,’ but he now flushed up, crying out: ‘Get them yourself!’ his cry tripping out tremulously high like a trumpet, ‘am I your husband, yes or no?’ and again she stood silent, eyeing him in an ugly way, with her lips glued malignantly together; but his command could not be disobeyed, so she went, got his slippers, threw them at his feet, and ran and locked herself into her room. Pruie heard him later on implore her outside her door to come down to dinner, but she would not, nor would he have any dinner, and before eight o’clock went out in his rough clothes; soon after which, she, too, started out somewhither from the cottage in a flurried way with her lips fixed, and had not come back since.

“Such was Pruie’s account of things. I sent her away, read Gibbon aloud all the evening to Aunt, and at about two in the morning, the house all soundless, just as I was getting drowsy myself, nibbling a bit of biscuit over my sketchbook, there greeted my ears, like guns going off, an agony of knockings at the front, giving me quite a fright. Divining at once something of the truth, and running out of the morning-room to the hall-door, I found Shan there, and, the moment I saw his face, thought to myself ‘Rosie has run away,’ my heart bounding with joy, though I had a twinge of sorrow for my boy, too, he looked so bad. ‘Is Rosie sleeping in the Hall, Miss Hine?’

‘No.’

‘But are you sure?’

‘Quite sure.’ Down dropped his head, his gun dropped to the ground, and Snout, gazing up into his face, growled thinly.

‘Never mind, Shan,’ I murmured, ‘no doubt she will be found’ — first time I have called him Shan. He told the story: had left her locked in her room, for there had been a tiff, and soon after he had gone out, she, too, as Pruie recounted, had gone out — he now knew why, evidently in order to induce someone or other to remove one of her trunks, which, after Pruie and Mary had gone to bed, had been very quietly taken away; and he, on getting home near two, having reason to suspect that she was not in the house, had peeped into her room, and found the bird flown. Poor white widower! he tried to be brave, but the words wavered in his throat, and I passed my palm over his hand. ‘So what next?’ I asked. ‘I’ll knock up the village!’ he suddenly trills, with that gallant high tremolo of his cavalry-commander’s voice, and he turned, and was gone, taking my heart with him, I gazing after him all the way across The Meadows, seeing him quite clearly to the very gate, for a moon as full of moon as a drop of fluid is full of fluid bloomed bellying through a welkin without one cloud in it, where stars were faint and few, suffused with her glory, she looming some huge ghost-Argo cruising bemused through countries far remote from home all among gold-rock and opal archipelagoes of Esmeraldas and Eldorado. I was kissing my hand after him, when there came Mrs. Macfadden soft-footed and belated behind me, in answer to his knock — must have seen me kiss my hand! concluding, of course, that I was kissing it at the moon....

“Well, by the first post next morning, Aunt had a note from Rosie asserting that, having been grossly brow-beaten by her husband, she had fled to the Waggon-and-Horse, at Greames: at which my Auntie makes a great show of indignation, though I told her that it wasn’t true, and says, ‘O’Shannon must be given a lesson.’ So, soon after breakfast, groom Bassett was called, warned that what he had to do was as secret as the grave, and I wrote a note to Rosie, giving her to know that the brougham would be sent for her at midnight, and gave it to Bassett to take to Greames, Aunt entering with zest into the game, not caring that what was game to her was woe to the poor widower; so, with as many secrecies as screened the flight of Marie Antoinette, half-an-hour after midnight alights my white wife to our arms, taking herself pretty seriously, declaring that she’d ‘never go back,’ giving at Aunt’s bedside the cargo of her injuries, though ne’er a hint as to her whiteness, that, I suppose, being a sore too secret even for ‘Mama’s’ treatment, though when Aunt said: ‘Forgive him this time, you will like him better when he buys you a nice big baby up in London,’ I heard her murmur to herself: ‘Yes, when he does.’

“Meanwhile, the widower was away on some wild-goose chase after her, and did not get back to Glanncourt before noon the next day, when, comforting himself no doubt with the half-hope that she might have come home, he flew to the Hall for an interview with Aunt, who accorded him an audience in her cosy-corner, listening with those cold glances of hers to the story of his tracing of Rosie as far as ‘The Waggon,’ where he had lost her, while the white wife and I took turns in eyeing them through the key-hole. Oh, he looked careworn and browsick! and I thought to myself that his great heart had enough to bear without that girl’s absurdities. ‘Dear me, where can she be?’ wondered Aunt, and ‘what can be her motive? I hope that your behaviour to her has at no time been overbearing, O’Shannon, for in that case it is no wonder—’ Poor lad! you, too, had to undergo King Arthur’s greatest indignity, to be lectured by an old woman; and you took it as greatly. ‘The marvel is,’ says he with a brow all one crowd of troubles and crosses, ‘that she hasn’t written you a line, since she must have very little money with her—’

‘Ah! there’s the marvel,’ says my Auntie, and so they kept on, till finally he gets up grimly with: ‘Well! she has got to be found, if she is anywhere above ground,’ and the silly game came to an end.

“This thing was kept up for three days till the evening of the nth, when I would bear to see him in his agony no longer, for near three in the afternoon of the 11th I saw him on the lawn from a window, and he looked so castaway, that though in my heart I revelled at his separation from Rosie, I made up my mind, since I knew that the separation could not be maintained this time, not to be selfish, but to finish it that day: for such a silence had been imposed upon the household, that I knew it might be some time before the secret leaked out to him; so, passing with Aunt in the motor-car that afternoon through St. Arven's, I suddenly remembered an important postcard to be written to Mr. Cochrane, entered the post-office, and sent the lad a telegram from 'Guess Whom': 'Your wife is at Glanncourt.' I felt pretty treacherous, but, then, 'treachery is in the very grain of the wretches,' as my very elementary white wife has declared, for the snake must have stung Eve in Eden, leaving its virus in the vein of her, so that her girls remain snakes-in-the-grass ever since, for certainly we do find it nice to act 'on our own,' and outdo folks on the sly. Anyway, we hadn't long got back to Glanncourt, when a most agitated lad was before Aunt, panting:

'Mrs. Gordridge, Rosie is in the Hall and you've got to give her up to me.'

"Aunt, for her part, was tired of the game now, no doubt, so Rosie was called down, and oh, the mountain of cloud that rolled from that lad's brow, and the light that arose on it, when his eyes beheld her at last! and while my white wife stands stiff by Aunt's side, glowering gravely at him, he gazing mainly upon the ground, fingering his cap round and round with a chronic smile on his mouth and little glances upward at her, Aunt gives a discourse, and, pronouncing them happy ever after, blesses them both.... Ah, my Auntie, there's a grand old mass of humbug agrin somewhere in the grain o' thee.

"So away they went, Adam and Eve, he as humble as a babe, I peering after them till they disappeared behind the stables, and during all the seven hours between then and now, it being now half-past two in the morning, my heart has been heavy for him, thinking of those oceans of temptation which must have broken over that brain this night above every other night: for the joy of finding her fell so suddenly upon him, that it must be enough to upset the poise of a giant's mind, and then he must feel that she expects him to shew his pleasure at finding her in at least kissings and pettings — as a mere matter of politeness. How awkward and hard for him! Has he refrained from even one kiss? Even one kiss is treachery to Arthur. Yet how is flesh to attain to so much as this? And if he has allowed himself kisses, what then — ? Ah! unless he is built through and through of the very swartest sort of basalt, if there's one smallest flaw anywhere in the water of that diamond this night, then, it's all up with the applecart by this time — and through my own doing, too.

“But I think I know in whom I have believed, and bet that to-morrow I shall see him lean, but smiling. Only, how long? Is Arthur never coming? It is three months now since Lord Roberts entered Pretoria, and still our little war roars prettily on to everybody's surprise, Arthur, by the latest account, refitting at or near Zeerust in the far Western Transvaal, after taking part in Methuen's futile pursuit of De Wet; so I shan't wait for his coming, if I can rush Shan faster forward to that death-marriage of him and me, as I think that I can: for, let me only once get him really separated from Rosie, and he will be only too eager to hasten a little sooner to that grave to which he has appointed his youth, just at which point Anne will come forward to join him as consort and convoy toward that goal to which he thought to voyage alone, and will go far with his ghost.

“Or am I a little ninny, dancing mad in a castle in the air? There was once a little girl of thirteen at Carlington named Louisa Hastings, who, seeing Dr. Blood go by grandly dressed every day in his trap, conceived the idea that he was the king of somewhere who only went by daily so as to exhibit himself to her, meaning some day to make her his lady-queen; and in this sweet disease the little dear's wits revelled in secret for weeks and weeks, till one evening her father revealed to her that it was all a dream: so the next morning early, walking in her nightdress down to Severn, she sat herself down on the shore, and patiently waited till the tide rose and drowned her. Though I was only a nipper at the time, it made such an impression upon me... O, waning moon, wasting like a cloud at your upper edge, quite spoiled now, like a Madonna's countenance anguished with a goitre of gumboil and swell-jaw on one side, you are unwell of too much light in your monthly way, like that mad, mad mathematician, my worthy ancestor: for a germ of turgidness and dissolution lurked in the most lucid moment of your fulness, aye, and there's a taint of lunacy, ma'am, in all your family "But, if I am a dreamer, I cannot quite see at what spot the dream commences, for it doesn't seem unreasonable to believe that an elementary body like Rosie will abandon a too white husband the moment she sees him in disgrace; and his disgrace I can easily bring about by simply revealing about the stealing: for that he is stealing, both eggs and fowl in a big way, I no more have the least doubt, and though I couldn't quite clearly prove it at this moment may be, I'll soon be able, if his lack of money keeps on. What excuse the fellow can possibly make to himself for doing this laughable thing, Heaven only knows! it is far enough beyond my wits to divine, I only know that his motive must somehow be as white as snow. But the lot of money that he must have run through within the last months! How? How? It seems to be really to this old Mrs. Graves that he gives it...! Who is she? How gross of me not to guess! It is as though he had committed ten assassinations, and this old jade, knowing of them, were able to wring blackmail out of his very brain. Anyhow, the old thing is doing good for me, for, though I do grieve for my dear, the more money she drags out of him the nearer grows the hour of my throe, and I am so keen now on speeding the wheel even more quickly downhill, that I seriously mean, if I can find out where he keeps his money, to sneak it from him: for the poorer he's made, the more he'll steal, and the more he steals, the nearer his disgrace, and in the hour of his disgrace Rosie will leave him, and he, once left alone, without any reason to keep on living, will gad gladly down with me, down, down, in that hour of our outing... unless by chance I be reeling dream-drenched in some region of dreams..?"

XIII. SHAN BANKRUPT

“THE RESULT OF Rosie’s flight,” Anne adds at a later date, “was a day of extravagance at Gloucester, whither she and Shan took a journey the morning after her return to him, and there made their money fly like a pair of children, she buying two new brooches, breloques, a wrap, a pèlerine, a kimono, two gowns, he lavishing upon her whatsoever her heart desired, the fact, no doubt, being that his delight at seeing her about him once more had half-turned his brains, and, unable to express himself in caresses, he exploded in this spree, hearing no doubt all the time with one ear a whisper from to-morrow that he couldn’t afford one penny of all these orgies, and with the other ear hearing that street-organ of to-day to which he was jigging.

“She, for her part, I suppose, remains ignorant of the pawnings, and can’t have any notion of the pass he is in with regard to money, or, not being a bad-hearted one at bottom, she would hardly let him rush into these sprees to please her. But neither of them is much good at money-matters, though he is said to be a rather sharp bargainer in the market, while as for that girl, if she was a millionaire, she would soon be poor. If Aunt hadn’t taken her up, I can trace exactly what would have been her fate and story: she would have been blown in some storm to Bloomsbury, bloomed into a music-hall star, and ruined a man per annum.

“But what must have been his remorse and bitter after-taste when, just as he was going out of doors on the second morning after this Gloucester bout, little thinking of his ghoul, may be, there she was again before him, the gay old thing. I was running round to the farm at about ten a.m. when, at the bottom of the north home-cover, I saw Pruie standing with a cocked ear, and, stealing near, I startled her so, that she had to clap her palm over her old heart! ‘Him be wi’ the old woman this minute in there,’ she told me, and instantly, though I was in a hurry to get back to the guests, a greed took me to see and hear, so I chided Pruie for playing the spy, and the moment she was well away, was on tiptoe in the covert, nor had gone thirty yards up the grass-ride when I heard the old girl cry: ‘ Good reason why!’ and a moment afterwards Snout’s nose poked out of a thicket at me. I got sideward through a lot of gorse, and, stealing forward by degrees, spied them together under one of that group of roosting-evergreens, she at that very moment cutting a jig, arms akimbo, he smiling down upon her, snarling bitterly, ‘pity you’re such an old boozier, after all; why, you are half-seas over now.’

‘Am I an old boozier? Am I? What price that?’ and she snatched and dashed straight into his face one of those pieces of meat that they hang up for the poults to peck maggots out of. He took it smiling, though with such a flush and lightning eye! ‘Oh, I’m not afraid of you,’ says she, ‘so don’t think it,’ — talks Cockney, and, I conjecture, belongs to the lowest of the lower orders, wearing still a shawl like a law of Nature, though otherwise quite dressed—’ but what about that money? I don’t see why you couldn’t let me have it now.’

‘I have told you,’ says he with passion, ‘that I shall have it here at half-past eight to-night: just ask yourself how in the name of God a man can give it you now, when he hasn’t got it to give’ — and I saw his mouth go weak, and work. ‘All right,’ says she, ‘I won’t be hard: half-past eight it is.’ ‘On the condition, mind you,’ says he, ‘that you keep sober all to-day, leave by the 9.3 to-night, and let me hear no more of you for the next three months.’

‘Garn,’ says she, ‘not so much of it: you have it here at half-past eight, or over goes the apple-cart.... Ta-ta,’ — and with airs of the absurdest levity she turned and went, he glowering after her down the grass-ride till she vanished, then, as if shot, dropped to the ground under the fir where he had stood, and fast though my heart was thumping, and all in me urging me to fly, I could hardly turn my gaze from the sight of his grief, till I heard him sob with such an outburst of distress, distractedly shaking a brow bowed low beneath his burden of adversity, when, able to bear it no more, I stole away.

“How great must be the power of that little old thing over him when at that very hour all the guns and beaters were awaiting him half-a-league away! and a poor day’s sport, too, they had of it, as I gathered in the evening, for the very good reason that so many of the year’s birds have been privately turned into money by the head-keeper! O, Shan, your feet be pretty deep in the meshes....

“But not for long now, I think: for after what I did to him last evening some sort of crisis seems certain, since he can’t have much that’s portable left to pawn now, and what I have done to him now must reduce him to penury. I knew that his rendezvous with Mrs. Graves at eight-thirty must mean more pawning, so near dinnertime I smuggled myself from the house-party, hurried down to the cottage to see his return from his pawning trip, and was chaffing Rosie about her huff at not being asked to join the party, when in he walked. She wished to know where he had been, and as he shuffled and was sullen, I was sure now what he had been at; but though long ago I had made up my mind that, if ever I got the chance, I’d take money from him, that day such a thought hadn’t entered my brain, till I observed him rather furtively push a pocket-book behind the clock, and at once I felt myself turn white at the whisper of something wild within me that I was going to pilfer it. Oh, never again, Anne! the effort of soul is far too great, the derangement and shock to the whole organism, like going under chloroform; and yet it was nice, too, perhaps because of the very storm, the business, the sin and pity, of it. I got straightway into a harsh sort of mood against him, short-breath'd, like a schoolmistress going to flog a girl, thinking, 'it is for your good, and you have to be well peppered,' and when, on their dinner-gong sounding, we went out of the room, I ran back to get my handkerchief, which I had left behind, and laid hand on the pocket-book.

"When I sped away up to the house with it in my blouse, it was now night, a wind was sounding, and there in the south-east swam the moon actively moving in and out among masses of cloud-vapour with the genius of some scene-painter brandishing a cherub's brush; and I felt myself more a creature of those countries which she sketched than of this earth, for it is one thing to dream and purpose, and another thing to act and to have acted, and I felt like anybody but myself. Oh, I was off my little chump! and all last night, and all this day, I have been far out of myself, a thousand miles from the scene in which I have been smiling and chatting and reading heartlets, nor have I dared go down to the cottage to witness that anguish which is undoubtedly there. The pocket-book is stuffed with forty pounds in notes, with them being a sort of receipt from a Bath pawnbroker for a number of articles, including Rosie's two just-bought brooches! How urgent must be the spur, how throttling this rope that's around his throat! And when he went back to the clock to take this money, obtained at the cost of so much shame and care, to take it to the old trapes at half-past eight, and could not see it there, and could not trace it anywhere, so pale must have been his despair! Really, I have half a mind even now to let him have it back! but then, no, for your sake, dearie, and my own, I being aweary now of waiting and living, for a spring in me has run all down, never having been tautly wound, the very mainspring of me and spring of my being, and my arms hang dead, my spine gives way, I begin to yawn at God. For the last three weeks I have been keeping in my pocket a sheep's shoulder bone at which every now and again I give a peep, having gained now such a consciousness of Nature as to view living things as nothing more than clocks, and man I regard through a glass on Mars.... 'Thou hast made me of skin and flesh, and fenced me with bones and sinews': beautifully done, of course: but there may be more enjoyment to the watchmaker in watching his toy tick, than to the toy in toiling on and on, and, as for me, I have a desire for the society of the host of the dead, and for the manners and customs of that other coast.... There goes dressing-bell, I suppose I must drag myself and go: it is after six o'clock, the dark-grey hour of Moghreb on the very brink of night, and outside the casement there I can see drizzle-rack drifting south like a funeral-train before the Autumn blasts in a mood as drab as bablah, moving like a crowd of ghosts all cowled, all towering tall as ghosts of the old gods, bearing to the grave one of their barons who has drained to the dregs the grail of the second death. Of that very grapewort and wormwood is my mind and purpose..."

XIV. SHAN DEEP IN IT

ALL GLANNCOURT, ALL Gloucestershire, was asleep, except perhaps a watcher on his beat, some fox, or poaching hound, or prowling house-cat in a cover, a screech-owl in the cedar, and Anne Hine, with a sheep's bone by her side, musing over her sketch-book in a book-room; far in the south-west the half-moon like an eye half shut was drowsing droopingly down in a couch of clouds, no more heeding that her beauty was all unmarked than when during eras of years, before men began to breathe and kiss out their fingers at her, she had made her couch in beauty: and the night sighed: or rather the morning, for it was three o'clock.

All at once, Anne, seated on her hearth-rug, seemed to hear a ghost, a life in the night, for her ears like all her senses were as sharp as light, and she started and rose to her feet, going very white.

There was a creak somewhere in the scheme of things, something sneaking uneasily through the kingdom of sleep, and as she now stood hearkening with both her ears near the door, she was aware of the bump of a foot, soft-sounding in the carpet of the stair, and at once decided within herself that it was made by a foot without any boot on.

She quickly took off her slippers, crept quite quietly to the electric light and turned it off, then, opening the room-door, out like a mouse she moved.

When she had made her way to the bottom of the stairs, she could see nothing: it was dark about there: but as, with her heart in her mouth, she waited, there was a sound like the vibration of something shaken, and gathering that the sneak had butted against the Shakespeare statue up there above, up she moved, stooped low down on hands and knees, as privily prowling as the cheetah's paw, more secretly creeping than the sneak.

On the left side of the corridor above was a room which was called "the Boudoir," but was rather an office, for there Mrs. Gordridge did much of her governing, and kept many papers; and as just there a beam of moonlight that had passed through the cedar dappled the carpet with a pattern of leaves, Anne was able to see a foot in a sock lifted to pass into "the Boudoir"... "I knew at once in my heart who it was," she wrote of it: "and I had known before." Now for three minutes she half-lay, half knelt, at the stair-head, staring, hearkening at her heart which stormed within her chest, thinking it out. Then she moved: crept past the boudoir, up another stair, her speed increasing every moment till in the remoter regions of the mansion her heels were fleeting fast, and passing into a small room, she stooped at a bedside to breathe into an ear: "Nancy, wake up, but don't say a syllable...."

"There's a man in the house," she added, "and you are to come with me, but are not to meddle with him at all, nor utter one word...." Nancy, a still-room maid, got up. Anne did not give her the time to slip on a petticoat, and the pair of girls spurted out together, going hand-in-hand, till they were on the stairs, when they stole in detail down to the boudoir-door. Just here stood a pedestal and a large divan among some palms, and by kneeling on the divan the two, peeping, could see between the pedestal and the door-post into the boudoir, which was dark, but not all dark, because of a diffusion of moonlight through the blinds into the room: and with bated breath they knelt there, staring.

Anne put her lips nearly into the ear of Nancy, instigating into the organs of her brain, rather than breathing, the thought: "Can you see?"

Nancy put her lips into Anne's ear, answering: "No."

Anne put her lips into Nancy's ear, dealing to her the meaning: "Can you hear?"

Nancy put her lips into Anne's ear, answering:

It was a scratching of which they were aware, going on as patiently low as a rat's gnawing, though again and again there was a moment of impatience, a raising of the rate of the fumbling, or filing, or prising, that was being done, and suddenly something snapped and popped with a sound so outrageously rousing, that the house seemed conscious of it throughout the realm of its sleep, and the two peepers shivered at it; after which there was a silence which lasted and waited not less than five minutes, in which the night itself seemed to wait and stare, till a match was struck within the boudoir, and Anne made room for Nancy to see.

"Did you see?"

"His back."

"Come."

The two moved off.

"Oh, Miss Hine, it is too awful!" chattered Nancy's jaws at her door.

"You try and fall asleep," panted Anne in answer, "and don't breathe a syllable to a soul, until you are asked."

And not one word was heard of the matter till after eleven the next morning, when there occurred an outcry from Mrs. Gordridge, who, four days before this, had drawn two hundred pounds out of the bank, of which she now found forty pounds vanished, and both a drawer of her cabinet and her cash-box broken open.

Anne, on being summoned, stood by the boudoir-window, smiling with an under-look at a death-mask of the late master of Glanncourt, and made the remark: "He's an honest old thief, since he has left a great deal more than half."

“You take it coolly!” said Mrs. Gordridge: “this is the first time that I have ever been subjected to such a barefaced outrage... telegraph instantly —”

“Ah, Aunt, better let the matter drop,” murmured Anne.

Mrs. Gordridge let her two arms fall, contemplating Anne with reproach, saying: “Well, if this isn’t a fantastic young woman!”

“I happen to have a meaning,” answered Anne: “I happen to know all about the theft, I was awake, I saw it done—”

“And you said not one—”

“Aunt, it would only have grieved you.”

“Who was it?”

“Aunt, it will only grieve you—”

“Tell me this very moment.”

“Well, if you insist upon knowing, ask Nancy, who saw it all with me: I’d really rather not tell it myself, Aunt” — whereat Anne ran out, leaving Mrs. Gordridge agape after her, and in a few minutes Nancy stood in the boudoir, rendering up the secret that the night had carried in it.

“So who was the man?” asked Mrs. Gordridge.

Nancy hesitated, looking down at her nails, and said in a low tone: “Mr. O’Shannon, mum.”

“Shan O’Shannon?”

“Yes’m.”

Mrs. Gordridge’s eyes dwelt on the girl, her fingers touching her brow, and she gazed out of window at boughs bare now of all their foliage.

“But are you sure?” she asked.

“Yes’m, I think so,” said Nancy.

“Saw his face, did you?”

“No, mum, I didn’t see his face, but I saw his back.”

“And you are quite sure?”

“Yes’m, I think so.”

“Don’t mention it to anyone: — mind you, see that you don’t. Tell Miss Hine to come” — and Anne, having come, heard by the window the winds yearning through the yewen and oaken thickness of the west shrubbery close by, and discussed the tragedy a long while.

“So what in God’s name am I to do with this young man?” Mrs. Gordridge wished to know.

“I wish I could suggest something, Aunt,” was Anne’s answer.

“But are you quite absolutely sure that it was the young man?” Mrs. Gordridge asked pettishly.

“I can only say that I saw him, Aunt.”

“But I should as soon have thought Arthur capable — it is merely incredible!”

“It is, really, Aunt — though true.”

“Then, it is your fault—”

“Oh, it is sure to be, Aunt.”

“Yes, it is, for why didn’t you give me to know long ago that the man was probably turning the birds into money? — not spring everything upon me in this fashion? I had no notion that he was in money straits! but you, by your own shewing, had, and kept it dark in your dark way.... How is it possible that he should be in straits? And if he was, why did he not come to me and say so, since he knows that I give freely?”

Anne looked out of window without answer, and the old lady added: “But don’t you see any way out of this sudden bad dream? My duty, of course, is in the direction of the police—”

“Ah!” sighed Anne, with irony.

“So what is the ‘Ah’ about?”

“He will be taken to prison and to judgment, Aunt,” answered Anne, with a certain fervour of closed eyes.

“But why the quotation?... I’ll take my oath that sometimes lately your observations give one the impression of a girl quite off her nut and gallivanting in Cocagne! I say that my clear duty is to hand the young man over to the police — Where does the quotation come in? And I’m sure that I should do it ruthlessly, too, only I am so truly sorry for him, so truly, and the young man once declared to me that he loves the name of Gordridge—”

“He does, Aunt, I am convinced.”

“So what is one to do in such a case?” asked Mrs. Gordridge.

“I suppose you will have to turn him away,” murmured Anne, gazing out at the bare boughs.

“That without saying. If the young man is a felon how is one to have him about the place?”

“And as to Rosie?”

“What can Rosie do, except remain with me? I am responsible for her bit of a life, I can’t have her exposed—”

“No, of course,” muttered Anne.

And this was the sense of what was said to Shan that same gloaming when he sat by the boudoir-window before Mrs. Gordridge, looking most gaunt, while Anne Hine all white, hearkened outside the door, Mrs. Gordridge first asking him if he had heard that some money had been stolen, and when Shan said no, he hadn’t heard, she shewed him the wrenched cash-box and cabinet-drawer, at both of which Shan looked with no little interest, asking: “And what steps do you intend to take about it, mum?”

Then, with dwelling glances at his face where he sat, Mrs. Gordridge told him that she was not wholly in the dark as to who the culprit was, and, having a great regard for the culprit, she did not, though it was her duty, mean to prosecute, believing as she did that this step into which the culprit had been betrayed by some money-strait would never be repeated. But what she had to say to Shan was this: that she had lately determined that she had no further need for his services, so he must straightway make preparations to leave the estate.

“I see, mum,” said Shan, and Mrs. Gordridge groaned for him, for he was groping all about the ground for his cap, but could not find it, though it was quite near his feet.

“I need not say,” remarked Mrs. Gordridge, “that Rosie remains with me — for some time at any rate.”

“I see, mum.”

“That is all, I think, that I had to say to you for the present, O’Shannon.”

“I see, mum.... Strange to say, I, too, have lost some money — forty pounds, too, the same as you — that’s funny.”

Mrs. Gordridge, hardly believing this, made no answer, waiting for him to go; but he sat there where he was.

Suddenly he started, asking: “What is your reason for treating me in this way? Have you any reason to imagine that it was I — ?”

“Ah, I don’t want to answer any questions, O’Shannon.”

“Then, that is it,” he said in a groan: “I’ve got no luck at all.”

Still Mrs. Gordridge waited for him to go, but there he sat bowed down over his cap, which he had now found, gazing at the maker’s name in it: he looked very sad: and after a time he remarked again, moaning so very low to himself that not half his words were heard: “I seem to have no luck... to be looked upon as a leper... to be cast out as one... without having one heart to guess at one, and be friends with one, a stranger in life, like a ghost going about in the crowd at a fair, lonely and out of it. There’s Rosie who regards me as a fool, so I suppose I must be one, and there are those who regard me as a rogue, so I suppose I must be one... I wish I never had been born, and I wish I was one of those dead men who were buried ages ago, and nothing of them but their bones any longer remain in their graves, then I should be dead and at rest, and my grave would know me well. To lose all my life, and upon that my good name, too... to be looked upon as a thief... I appeal to God, if there's a God. Some of them are spreading it about now that there's no God, but that's all my eye, I know, because there's an eye in the breast that knows Him, and upbraids Him, aye, and He can hear when I speak, though I can't catch what answer He is giving, and I only wish er was a man, a King in London, so that I could go by rail in a train to Him, and spread out my case before Him face to face, and — but now, may be, I'm talking—” whereupon Mrs. Gordridge, who had caught some few of his words, stooped forward, wooing to him: “Never mind, O'Shannon, be brave, and you will outlive it all yet—”

“Mrs. Gordridge,” answered Shan, with eyes peering pig-tiny and red toward tears where tears were desert-dry, “you can't feel with the grief of a man who's like a man doomed to work at some burden in a world all by himself, but you are good to me, and I forgive you from my heart.”

“Well, it is he who forgives me now,” thought Mrs. Gordridge, stooped sideways to pull a dog's hair, and without looking up she added with some shyness: “I do feel with you.... Why are you like a man working in a world — ?”

“It doesn't matter, mum,” said he in a mood as drooping as Gethsemane, “since life is soon over, and then the grass grows green over every grief.... All I beg you, for God's sake, Mrs. Gordridge, is not to take her from me —”

“Rosie? But I'm afraid—”

“But, Mrs. Gordridge—”

“No, not that, O’Shannon—”

“Oh, but not now, it would kill me dead now, when I am losing everything else, driven out, to lose her, too — I know I am selfish, but, Mrs. Gordridge for God’s sake now — husband and wife—” He had stood up to plead, but those lips of Mrs. Gordridge, going harder with opposition, said: “I have already decided, O’Shannon; I have said that I grieve for you, but I do not feel at all like making any money-provision for you at present, and you are going out to hardships to which that young girl is not inured, so it is useless—” at which word “useless” Shan suddenly threw up hands and eyes, making his escape from the room, whereupon Anne Hine, who had been listening outside, hid on the divan behind the pedestal, till he was half down the stairs, when she hastened out after him to ask if it was true that he was going away, and when was he going.

“At the first moment that I can, Miss Hine,” he answered: “within the week—”

“So soon?” Her gaze hung languishing on his face. “But you won’t be too, too forlorn, will you? for it will all be well — And don’t forget that before you go you will be giving me the sitting for your head that I begged you for—” He stared, her prayer at the moment seemed so frivolously unrelated to that reel of his sorrows, and a memory arose, too, somewhere in his brain that he was forbidden by Rosie to have any friendship with Anne; but, as there was no saying no to such a wish, he gave her an absent-minded “very good, then,” and was gone.

Down at the cottage, Rosie in more than half undress, her head all little horns in curling-pins, was lounging before a fire when he entered and without saying anything threw himself down on a couch, where he lay with his brow on his arms; she, too, without saying aught, continuing to look at her book.

Presently he smiled, and remarked: "Rosie, you smoke too much lately."

"Don't let that interest you," she retorted, "you know I always decline to be dictated to."

"Surely you are not cross because I say that?"

"Not a bit. Why does it occur to you that I am cross?"

"It seemed so a bit."

"But, then, you never understand me, as you know."

"Don't I? So deep, and dark, and hard to understand, aren't you?"

This tender sarcasm had no less power to cause Rosie to sit up than a pin-prick, and she remarked to her spouse: "So do you imagine that you know me? There isn't a soul that does! I am such an actress — I love to pose as a pretty, shallow, little pet, but how about my real, deep, complex self? I'm so fearfully complex, that, if you could know me so thoroughly as I know you—"

"Do you know me thoroughly?"

"Thoroughly!"

"Sure, now? Positive? Sometimes you say just the opposite. But if you do know me, throw an eye on me now, and tell me — am I happy, Rosie? or is my soul sad?"

"You look a little curious — is anything wrong?"

"Rosie, you won't be able to be smoking so much soon."

"What do you mean?"

"You won't be having your own way in everything as in your own home: you are going to live up at the Hall."

"Hip! But what is it all about?"

"Well, I have just been turned out of Glanncourt."

“Turned — How do you mean?”

“Turned away, just as any other servant of the estate might be.”

“You are joking.”

“No, I’m not joking.... I will put it before you, Rosie: Last night forty pounds were burgled out of Mrs. Gordridge’s house-service cash-box, and she has some reason — I don’t know what — I can’t dream what — for believing that it was I—”

“Who — ?”

“Yes, stole it.”

Rosie gaped at him, going pale round the nose.

“You?”

“So she thinks.”

“She said so?”

“As good as.”

Rosie looked as if she saw a ghost, and presently bending over her book again, she read without understanding what she was reading, and the cigarette went out between her fingers.

Then when the stillness had long lasted, Shan said: “Rosie, don’t you ever believe such a thing of me.”

“Oh, indeed!” said Rosie, throwing an eye round at him.

“Rosie, I say that because I know that you know that I am hard up, and because Mrs. Gordridge would hardly have charged me without having some sort of grounds—”

“She wouldn’t have said it to me, though,” thought Rosie with a hard lip over her book.

“Well, that is how it stands,” murmured Shan: “I am turned out of Glanncourt, and you will be going to the Hall, so that’s why I say that you won't be smoking quite so much, and being your own mistress, as when you are with me in your own home, Rosie."

Keenly he expected her reply now, but Rosie only shrugged her shoulder, and went on reading, without grasping any of the sense of her book; and presently got up to go to dress for a dance.

And she had just got through a waltz about midnight when Mrs. Gordridge came up to her to take her out into the book-room, for though Rosie had dined at the Hall, no chance till now had been found for a talk, and there, sitting by her mama's chair, the situation of things was detailed to her.

But, owing to Rosie's attitude, the interview was soon over, for "It's all a lie, Mama Gordridge," she said.

"No, my poor dear, listen—" began Mrs. Gordridge.

"No, it's all a lie," said Rosie with a blind shake of the head.

"Rosie! But haven't I told you — ?"

"Who are these two people who say that they saw him?"

"I have told you, Rosie, that I do not desire to say, for—"

"Then, don't believe them, they had some motive—"

"But, Rosie, do you want to displease me? If I am convinced, isn't that enough for you? There is no doubt, my poor dear, it is perfectly certain, so there is no way out, he will have to leave, and you must come back to your mama."

Rosie, gracefully bent over the grate, with the mounds and curves of an hour-glass now, no longer of a girl, had a pouted mouth, thinking within herself: "She forgets that I'm not a child any more, but a married woman," and when Mrs. Gordridge added: "You had better leave him to make his own arrangements, and come up at once," Rosie said: "No, Mama Gordridge, I can't do that."

“Can’t do what?” Mrs. Gordridge wished to know.

“He is my husband, after all,” muttered the white wife in a stubborn way.

“Dear me. So what then? Who made him your husband?”

“You did.”

“Well, and I take you from him when he no longer deserves you.”

“It is all a lie, Mama Gordridge.”

“Nonsense! Don’t say that again. Just do as I tell you.”

“I couldn’t, Mama Gordridge, nor wouldn’t.”

“But explain yourself! wouldn’t what?”

“If he goes, I go with him.”

“Oh, you go with him....”

“I should have to.”

Mrs. Gordridge’s eyes mused upon the mutineer, so long securely her own, due to her by so many years of pettings, and a pang of jealousy and that tooth with which ingratitude grubs so bruised the old woman’s bosom, that after half a minute she deigned to say to Rosie:

“Which seems to mean that you choose him rather than me....”

“Isn’t he my husband?” muttered Rosie.

And now the talk ended.

“Go,” said Mrs. Gordridge, calmly, though her stick lifted, “get out of my sight... make haste.. and, all inflamed of face went the white wife, venting with venom the breath “selfish!” and as she threw on her wrap in the vestibule, she vented with venom the breath “selfish!” and as she went away down the vale she vented the breath “selfish!” vexed with her mama, and so till she came down to the cottage, where Shan, letting her in, heard her vent some word under her breath.

“What’s the matter?” he asked in their parlour where he had kept a nice fire for her, “you are home sooner—”

“Selfish!” went Rosie.

“Who is?”

“She is only tired of Anne, and it is only for herself that she wants me back—”

“Who? Has she said — ?”

“Selfish!” If she thinks that I’m still a child — I’d sooner live with you in a sty—”

“With me?” — a brightness of surprise sprouting like day-spring on his brow—” do you say that you will be coming with me?”

“Aren’t you my husband?”

His eyes sprang water.

“Oh, you, you,” he cried to her, “so cross, so cruel at times, but when one is in bitter trouble—” his throat choked, but on his knees he washed her hands with his tears, while she slapped him on the side of the head, smiling down upon him, expecting him now to stand up and kiss her....

XV. SHAN NIGHT-WALKS

THE NEXT AFTERNOON at the hour fixed Shan marched down from the hills to the Hall to have his head drawn, sighting, as he drew nigh the house, the last trunk of the guests going off, and at the front door stood some moments, giving ear to the organ bleating bleak concords from the inner hall — Anne Hine rendering Mozart's "Requiem." She came quickly to meet and lead him into the billiard-room, which was an out-room at the side of the house-front where the light was fair, and where a square of paper, pinned on a piece of deal, waited on her easel.

There Anne, taking crayon in hand, sat and began; but it was not well: she got up to him again, her two palms suggesting his head to a juster angle, a touch at which to his heart he shuddered, it had such a churchyard chill; and she sat anew to draw his head, but still it was not well, it was very far beyond her, her hand was pallid, her voice was pallid, her eyelids pallid, her lips, her gums, her heart, that like a pallid horse galloped.

Shan wondered within himself why she wore white clothes on so cold a day, all pure white and not too warm-looking — with flurries of early snow fluttering every few minutes in the air; and why on earth he wondered was there that old grey bone of some beast lying in a grave of white orchids on a corner of the billiard-table, all as neat as might be....

They were talking about his going from Glanncourt, and she said to him: "You suffer, and you seem to yourself a man doomed to work at some burden in a world where there burns neither sun nor moon, where there breathes no other being but yourself; but that is not wholly true, for there is one who knows you — how you start at it! but it is true, and don't be afraid that I shall betray you, since I have known so long—”

“What have you known?” he asked sharply.

“This,” she said, “that you are one of the best of men.”

“Well, now!” he went, astounded.

“Greater than most of the greatest heroes of history.”

“Well, now!” he went again, his gaze suddenly affronted with a prickle of tears.

“All that you have undertaken and have undergone,” said she, and she flushed from the ghost of lily to the ghost of rose, “the weight of it, and the twelve labours of it, your inane days, and your days of storm, doubts in your heart's heart about the being of God, and about the meaning of things, and the grave, sudden rebellions of your rabble against the no from the throne, your great passion, and your great patience, all your loneliness and famine for sympathy, all this and a lot more I have divined and known of you—”

“O!” — he covered his eyes, moaning, some nerve in his breast wrung with strong passion by this balm after all his journeying and sore feet, feeling that here at least was one, that of a host who ignored yet one at least, did recognise and prize his soul, and with molten eyes he moaned, thinking that twice now within two days had tears of ease been twisted out of the iron of those eyes of his, last night by Rosie's faithfulness, and now by Anne, and the wilderness was not without its rare oasis after all, here or there a coolness of greenery and sluice of water, that a man may thank God, and take heart.

Anne moved her chair to his to say with an agitation that was painful: “And I have loved all that, and loved you for it, as I love the moon, and sunsets, and storms—”

“Miss Hine, you are good—” he began to say, and then he had a start!
“but — but I trust you, Miss Hine, you won’t breathe one syllable—”

“Oh, but haven’t I known from the first — ?”

“What have you?”

“That you are keeping her for Arthur—”

Again he started, glancing in alarm at the door!

“There’s no one about,” she said, “everything henceforth is quite safe for you: Rosie will be here, for, of course, a girl like her will not follow you into poverty and exile — I am not judging by my wishes — she won’t — and she will be here till Arthur comes, for Aunt, believing that she is your wife as other wives are, will have no fear that Arthur would marry a keeper’s widow, so will keep her here, then Rosie will tell Arthur of her whiteness, and he will marry her: so that you can die now quite assured that all is safe—” she spoke gallopingly, panting now faster and faster—” You have no motive to live a day longer, and I am going with you — do you know? — giving my heart on the same altar — if you will have me—”

Once again Shan shuddered at her, struck by the impression that he was seized by some dream-creature more sprite than girl, more of Hades and the grave than of this earth, and with shy eyelids he muttered: “Really, Miss Hine...” She did not hear, and clutching his sleeve, speaking in a whisper that eagerly galloped, she said: “Shall it be so? I propose that we leave for London — when you will — to-night — be married by special licence — you will indulge me in this, for though I see the mummery of it, for months my mind has been given to it — then, once married, we go back to the bed, and do it—”

“Miss — ! do what?”

“Take the poison....”

Shan stood sharply up, and she, remarking now the look of alarm that widened his eyes, asked: “Why are you horrified? Do you think me too young, and too happy, to die? I am not happy — oh no. Listen, I will tell you: my life has been one long hunger, for I am not a girl like others who love and are beloved, since I can love nothing, except love, nor has anyone loved me. Even my love of beauty and of you, though it is something intense, is not really love, I think, but a thing all light and no heat, a love in my eyes, which are like eyes washed with eye-bright to see and love; but the love gets no further than my eyes, for as if the telegraphic nerves between my eyes and my heart had broken down, though my heart is dimly conscious when love is going on up in my eyes, and lifts and spurs and urges itself to love, too, it can’t, the connections being all cut, and falls back sick. And this is bitter, for I am Tantalus standing by the water of life that all slips through my fingers when they go to bring it to my lips.... May be on the other brink of the rivulet there is a ewer....”

He could only gaze at her with the gravest eyes of sorrow, the young lady all in her white garb looking to him quite “fey” abandoned to all the death-dances and fantasticalities of the land of banshees and bode-bats and kobolds in which she was bewitched, and when she said to him: “Do not censure yourself for my death, for you cannot help, you are just a ship plunging into a maelstrom, and taking a wherry in her wake,” he replied with some resentment: “Really, Miss Hine, all this does not seem very serious talk on your part” — at which word “serious,” Anne turned up to him a yet pastier face, whispering: “Do you mean that you won’t have me with you? Or do you mean that you won’t do it at once?”

“It what, Miss Hine? Kill myself? Fantastic idea to have in your mind!”

“Why— ‘fantastic’?” — with an effort to swallow—” since you do mean, some time, to do it.”

“I never in my life had such a thought,” declared Shan, “I have always looked upon it as a wicked and mad thing for a man to go and do.”

“Mad” — her eyes fixed on his face — her castle all collapsed— “mad!” — after which she walked two steps to the billiard-table, and laid her face down sideways on the little mound of flowers there and the brown rib in it, while he with eyes that swam in a passion of pity stepped to her, saying: “Dear Miss Hine,” and touched her hand an instant: but at the same time from the dining-room near there reached his ear the coming of a stick which meant Mrs. Gordridge, and he felt an instinct to be away which was quickened when Anne, glancing round at him, murmured: “Yes, go,” upon which he passed away out through the outer door.

All that evening his mind was full of fear for her, all that night he could not sleep; nor, somehow, could Rosie; and they sat into the morning hours in a state of awe for which they could little account over a fire in a room without any carpet now, their things all strewn into confusion round them, for their moving; and once when the white wife about one o’clock went out to find some wine, she flew back with wild eyes, all blanched, and, clinging to Shan’s arm, declared that she was aware of something walking in the kitchen....

“It must be the wind,” said he — for quite a hurricane was raging—” make an effort not to be too frightened, now.”

“I can’t help it,” Rosie replied, “I feel cold all over — O, it is ominous, Shan, that strick-owl screeching out there hour after hour in the beech-tree, for as sure as ever you hear it, so sure there’s a burial.”

“Lieutenant Gordridge may be killed....”

“God knows.... Yes, that is it, you may be sure.”

“No, that isn’t it, for the strick’s never a certainty, and you were nervous before.”

“That’s true, I was feeling queer all the evening.... I wonder if it was what I saw Anne do that upset me.”

“What was that?”

“It gave me quite a queer feel — I am certain that that girl can’t be all there. This evening — I was waiting for you in the shed near the farm-hedge, when I saw her all in white on the other side though she didn’t see me. She had seen Cook Basset and Martha bearing between them a tray with a great forty-pounds piece of beef to bury — Lucille always says that what’s wasted at Glanncourt would keep two French families going — and she had followed and watched the burying of it; then, when the other two were gone, what do you think she did? Set to shaping and arranging the grave with her hands, then put grass and sprigs on it, smiling to herself...

At this Shan, who was already rather wannish, went wanner, leaning over the fire; even the dog, with its weird sympathies, whined; while the white wife, seated on the rug against Shan’s leg gazed with grave eyes into the grate.

“So finish telling me,” she said presently.

“It will only upset you more, Rosie.”

“No, let’s have it.”

“I didn’t see it myself,” he said, “it was my father — when I was nine and a half years old it was, and I’m never likely to forget that night. You know, Rosie, the story of Miss Grover, how she got on a vicious horse one day against the advice of her father, saying that she would ride it to hell, how it threw her against that stake-gate up there on the Chase, and how they say that her ghost walks there, though I know of no one that ever saw it — only my father that night. He and a man named Joe Higgins had gone to Tintern to get paid for some work, and walked back together on just such a moonlight morning as this with a storm of wind blowing. Well, mother had made me sit up for father in the kitchen, and soon after two in he walks to me.... I'd almost rather have seen the ghost itself! for though it was two miles from the stake-gate where it had stared at him to our house, I could still see his hairs sticking out stiff about his head — actually see them—”

“Oh, good God....”

“Aye, I shall ever remember that night.”

“Shan,” whispered Rosie, “have you ever seen anything yourself?”

“No, nothing: I can't honestly say that I have ever seen anything. But my father, he was pretty eerie, he'd see things. One Sunday midnight, going home from courting my mother, he saw a tall man in a frock-coat with snow-white gloves behind him, so, as it was a very lonely road, he thought he would stop for the man, but every time he stopped, so the man stopped, too, and at last when father's cocoa-nut began to grow, he scattered and ran, but, as he madly ran, so the man ran after—”

“Good Lord, Shan....”

“Such things are.... Did you ever know a man called Pendix Ball?”

“No.”

“They call him Pendix because he had appendicitis.... Never heard his name?”

“Yes, I have heard his name.”

“Well, when you were a child of — let me see — seven and three months, this Pendix Ball saw something one night — nobody knows what — nobody could ever discover what: but the next day he left Woodston — cleared clean away — and swears that to be King of England he would not range within fifteen leagues of this place again so long as oak and ash do grow.”

“What could he — ? Oh, God, Shan, what's that?” Now with a milk-white face twisted round in affright the white wife sprang straight to clasp her spouse, for at a casement of the room there had sounded a rapping.

“Wait here, and I will go,” he whispered: “Don’t you fear — you wait, and I will go.”

All his nerves thought it a ghost, but it turned out to be only a ghost-countenanced man, named Price, a keeper, who came to give into Shan’s ear the tidings that he had just seen a ghost, or something extremely like a ghost, something in a night-dress with long-flowing hair, that left footprints of naked feet in the snow, something fleet, seeing that Price had chased it a good mile up toward the Chase, but could not catch it... something which the dogs would not bite....

“Stop, I’ll come,” said Shan, and within ten minutes, having got Rosie to go to bed with old Pruie, throwing on an ulster and flap-cap, he set off with Price, the wind slamming the door behind him, for it was, in truth a wild and white night, snow on the ground, the moon full somewhere in the sky, though for clouds no trace of her could be anywhere seen, and all in between ground and clouds storm-winds wheeling, all the night showing quite lethal whitish, like the visage of a negro grey in death; and on for four miles, up mountain-paths, then down along a road, the two men tracked the footprints, till, by a bit of wall on the edge of a quarry-cliff, from Shan’s heart leapt the breath: “There she is...!”

Ninety feet below flowed the Wye, winding between cliffs of forest and mud-banks: all cliff and forest on that farther side, but on this quarry-side where they stood a droop of the cliffs higher up revealed a wide scene of valley, and five hundred yards away up yonder on the river-slime and its dark seaweed-twine was seen a white speck in the white night....

“That wouldn’t be she,” breathed Price peering, “that’s one of the swans —”

Shan peered deeply afresh, and suddenly crying, “It’s a woman!” flew.

For the tide was fast rising, had already half-filled the river, and they had a détour to make — up the road anew, then to the left along a park-wall, a spray of snow spraying their faces, then through a gate, down a lot of broken ground, through an enclosure of brown bracken surrounding the ruins of a church, and now a run through rushes to the river's brink: and there, in truth, they found brooding high up on the bank — a swan: hissing serpent forward, bird astern: musing there in solitude by the Wye upon the moonlight and upon all the wild mood of the night, warbling swan-music in her heart: but beside her — nothing.

The two men stood and watched her: and still Shan maintained his belief that what he had seen from the reef-edge was no swan, but a woman seated there....

They now by a two hours' trudge got back to Glanncourt, and Shan, as day broke, crept up to his bed: but only within four hours to be roused out of slumber by Rosie, the white wife with eyes of wildness recounting with sobs on his breast how that Anne Hine had been found drowned down by the Wye-mouth with the out-fallen tide, and had now been brought mortal to the Hall.

Shan uttered not a word, but all in a shiver and flurry from head to foot threw on his things, and sallied headlong out of the house, he hardly knew why, with a casting up to heaven of his eyes accusingly.... As to his interview with Anne the previous afternoon he had so far told Rosie nothing.

XVI. SHAN DECAMPS

DURING THE AFTERNOON after the inquest Mr. Orrock, with crape on his arm, walked down to the gamekeeper's house with a grave face, meeting there men who were bearing away furniture on their backs, to have in the drawing-room an interview with the white wife, white by nature, quite black that day by costume.

"I can still offer you a chair, Mr. Orrock," she said with a smile, as she shook hands, and he with a sad smile answered: "Ah, this is not well, my dear... London this breezy day is all one gala of flags to greet Lord Roberts' return, but for us here the poms of death, and hearts that are as smart with partings. Has Dr. Blood called? No? Then, I am before him, for that he purposes coming I am confirmed."

"About anything special, Mr. Orrock?"

"Yes: Rosie, my child, you must go straightway up to your Mama Gordridge."

"Has she sent you — ?"

"No, I can't say that: but she expects you to go up and make your submission."

Rosie, who stood leaning on both her arms over a chair-back, answered deliberately: "Mr. Orrock, I am a married woman, I am no longer a child, and I shall go to the Hall when I am sent for, not before, nor have I any submission to make to anyone, for, as I dare say you have been told, my husband has been accused of a shameful act, so it is I who expect an apology from other people."

“I see your point of view,” said Mr. Orrock; “but, then, consider: you are young and she — older.”

“I am a married woman,” muttered the white wife wilfully.

“Quite so — a young, a charmingly young, married woman; but remember, Rosie, that your Mama Gordridge is at present plunged into such a gloom of mind that it is only her strength of character, I am confirmed, which keeps her from a nervous crisis: she needs your companionship, she needs your care — you seem to forget that.”

Rosie prettily shook a low-bowed head, answering: “No, I don’t forget, and I am truly, truly sorry for her, but she must not make statements and then stubbornly stick to them, for that is her manner, to think herself infallible, and to treat everybody like children, so she must be taught now: if she really wants me, let her send for me, and not be stubborn.”

“Rosie, I could never have believed that you you would prove so recusant.”

“Oh, I have a most complex character, Mr. Orrock,” said the white wife; “no one quite knows me.”

Mr. Orrock, smiling fondly at her, said: “What you have, beyond question, my dear, is a marvellous store of health — such a garden of roses grows in those cheeks, Rosie!” at which Rosie’s nose secretly twitched disdain at him, compliments of her roses being so stale to her, whereas if he had but complimented her “complexity of character,” as to which she was less certain, she would have worshipped her clergyman.... “I don’t know,” he added, “if it is your habit to take camomile at this season of the year? Ah, you don’t, no, well.... But to return — Rosie, this is most grave: can it be that you know so little of your Mama Gordridge as to be waiting for her to take the first step?”

Rosie shrugged without answering, inwardly angered now with him for ignoring her complexity.

“But you don’t mean to go away without first going to her?” he asked: “Ah, no, you could never be so blind to your own interests, my dear.”

“She can speak to me at the funeral,” answered Rosie: “otherwise I shall go.”

“But, Rosie, she never forgives — I tell you so — she never forgives! you had better be careful.... The wonder is that your husband himself does not insist—”

“He has told me to go, Mr. Orrock, but one doesn’t do everything that one’s husband tells one: besides, he is too cut up now to think of me or anything else, it seems — one would imagine that it was his lover who was dead, his lover and his wife, and his mother, and his father all in one — hasn’t tasted even a cup of tea ever since.”

“Indeed? Well, that may be somewhat excessive, but, then, over all the country-side this too awful thing has cast its pall; for us all the very atmosphere seems vibrative with a remembrance and echo of the bell that has tolled, and the ear at every moment expects a knell. Oh, Rosie, this is sad... in four days’ time she would have been twenty-five. She was not popular in her life, since there was something too aberrant, too unique and solitary in her being, and she knew very much too much of the minuter movemerits of her neighbours’ bosoms to be bearable in society: but her sarcasm was hardly ever cruel, only tart, frequently kindly, as light is, and now I hear that many of the poor people here are saying that she was generosity and sympathy itself in her sly way: and now she lies drowned.... Well, good-bye, and if Dr. Blood comes, just tell him that he is an age too late, that the whole ground has been gone over, and he needn’t waste his precious breath,” upon which the clergyman took his departure for the Hall, where Mrs. Gordridge, having that day for the first time gazed upon the features of the dead, had indeed need of her friends.

Dr. Blood, for his share, bent upon the same end as Mr. Orrock, came not to Rosie, but made for Shan, and gleaning in those back regions of Glanncourt that Shan had taken train that day, he placed at the station to await Shan's appearance a lad who, as the shades of evening deepened, led Shan to the doctor's place, where the doctor impressed upon Shan that it was his duty to induce the mutineer to speed immediately to her mama; to which Shan made answer: "It shall be done, Dr. Blood."

"What is the matter?" the doctor then said; "you look downright bad."

"It is nothing, Dr. Blood," answered Shan, the muscles of his countenance all sternly drawn, "but I have to ask you, sir, since I do not wish to apply to Mrs. Gordridge, if you will procure me a sight of the body."

"Certainly," answered the doctor, "I am now going up to Glanncourt, if you like to come."

Soon, therefore, Shan was standing in the state-bedroom of Glanncourt, that one over against the cedar, whose near branches darkened its largeness. The evening was dreary in there, the sun having set, and desolate, for the flunkey who had led him up had not come in, nor did the two candles that towered by the bedside throw out their radiance much farther than the aureole round their own flame, or than the coffin covered by a sheet-drapery on the bed between them, and the chamber's air reeked of eternity. But full of awe as was that place, no fear was there for Shan, since perfect pity casts out fear, and he uncovered her, putting the wedding-ring which he had purchased with two of his precious pounds that day inside her shroud by her hand — for she had wished to espouse herself to him, and here was all he could do now to please her — and he pushed, too, a bunch of snow-of-the-mountain beneath her shroud, and in the space between the two curves of her hair brushed downward he kissed her large brow with a sound of heart-break and of a hound's yowling, and after gazing upon her face, upon her poor lids glued down a little in a mood of musing, and upon the pouted mouth of her drowning, his countenance worked, and dropping down there by the bedside, he prayed without any words.

And the following gloaming, holding his umbrella over Rosie, he followed the procession of broughams to the grave, heard the tolls prating of eternity, heard Mr. Orrock's funeral-words falter in his throat, for all was as usual in the burying, since the jury, though conscious somewhere within them that Britons never shall be slaves, had not dared to bring any other verdict upon a lady than that of "found drowned"; and now when the earth had covered her, and the last words of parting were uttered, and they all turned away from her, Shan, going up the lane to Glanncourt, handed Rosie her parasol, for the mist was frizzy with drizzle-spray, saying to her: "Now, Rosie, you are to go to Mrs. Gordridge, and if she wants you to stay with her, you stay, and I'll go my way alone."

Rosie muttered something stubborn to herself, but went, and before long was kissing her mama's cheek, though in the very act she felt that it was a kiss through a wall between, hard now to break down. Mrs. Gordridge, seated by the French window of her cosy corner, gazed forth in silence at the gadding haze, lonely of soul, sore at the way of life and the moan of death, but still cold of eye, and after a time remarked to Rosie: "So you have come."

"Yes, Mama Gordridge," replied Rosie, sitting listlessly, with a giving way of the spine, her eyes on the floor, "I thought I'd come."

"Oh, you thought so: so what made you think so?" asked the old lady.

"I knew you are by yourself, and I thought—"

“Oh, you knew that I am by myself. But in coming to me you have left your husband.”

“He doesn’t mind.”

“So I mind? I was sitting here longing for you to come, of course.”

“If you were, you would have sent for me long ago.”

“What, to lug me about? and give me my gruel? And drag the old thing out of the fire?”

“You are too proud, Mama Gordridge.”

“And you have allowed yourself to become very far too out-spoken!”

Rosie with down-turned eyes twirled her parasol without reply, until Mrs. Gordridge asked her why she came now rather than before, to which she made answer that she had come to say good-bye.

“So, then, are you really going from Glanncourt?”

“With my husband, Mama Gordridge.”

“You had better not, you know.”

“Why so?”

“Because, firstly, of the reason for which your husband is going—”

“Oh, Mama Gordridge, don’t repeat that thing!” — Rosie laughed a little. “I don’t say it because he is my husband, for you know I am not one of the femmes amoureuses, but, of course, we women do know our husbands out and out, so you can accept my account of the matter; and if now you could get yourself to admit to him that you made a mistake, no doubt he would forgive and the difficulty would solve itself.”

The old lady’s gaze rested on those droves of ghosts in the haze that roved over The Meadows before the blows of the gale, and they implored her to forgive, for “life,” they said, “is short, and, like us, its crises and chances roll eternally past, no more to return,” but at Rosie’s word “mistake” she hardened her heart, and only muttered: “Oh, he will do the forgiving, will he?”

“It is he who has been aspersed, you know,” answered Rosie.

“But you appear to be very certain! Yet what has been asserted of your husband is not an impossibility.”

“No, an untruth.”

And now this assurance of Rosie’s, so solid as to cast upon Mrs. Gordridge’s mind a shadow of doubt, gave rise to the question within her: “Could the two witnesses of the theft have been at fault?” And she said to Rosie: “Why are you so sure? Has he sworn to you — ?”

“No, Mama Gordridge,” Rosie replied, “I haven’t given myself the pains to make any inquisition—”

“So, then,” answered the old woman, with a new hardening of the heart, “you spurned my discernment, you may say my word, in favour of a person who hadn’t even asserted to you — ?”

“He had no need!”

“Didn’t he? Still, he is going. And you are going also?”

“I suppose so.”

“But, I tell you, better not: for the relation between you and me which has never been broken since you were a child of five, may, if once broken, not be capable of being resumed.”

“Wasn’t it rather broken when you made me marry, Mama Gordridge?”

“May be; still, you have been about me, and if you sever yourself now —”

“I shall be quite glad to stay with you for a time, Mama Gordridge, since I know that you are lonely—”

“I!” Mrs. Gordridge stopped her with a chuckle: “so it will be for pity of me that you stay, not for your own good? Because I am lonely! Am I so very, very lonely, my God? And afraid of ghosts, I suppose! And eager for you to sleep with me, to keep them off me! Who gave you to know that I am afraid of ghosts? You have forgotten yourself, you have forgotten me, you have turned out a proud and an ungrateful girl!”

Rosie stood up with a pout.

“I am going,” she said.

“Good old dog,” said the old lady, tugging a Jap dog’s hair.

“Don’t part with me in anger, Mama Gordridge,” said Rosie over her parasol: “I am quite willing to stay with you, for a time — if you ask me.”

“For whose good?” asked Mrs. Gordridge, gazing up now not without a gleam of pleading in her gaze.

Rosie hesitated, and then she said: “For yours.”

“Go — go from me” — And Rosie, hastily putting a kiss on the old lady’s face, went out with a doubt and ache in her heart, nor did Mrs. Gordridge look after her, till after she had gone beyond the door, when she started up a moment — but sat again.

There she remained in her chair a long time after this, watching the funeral-train of mist moving and passing away whither it would in its strange mood, brooding on her life from its birth, and the folly-fire that it was, with its turns and pangs and works, asking herself if it had been worth living, and if life was not all a scurvy thing, and death not better; and she thought of Shan, whether there had been any chance of a mistake, whether, in any case, she could not have found means to forgive, and not for ever act as some goddess under instructions to mete out strict justice to men; in the midst of which meditations, seeing Shan and Rosie making away under the same umbrella over a remote bit of The Meadows grounds, her soul groaned, recognising herself as alone in a crowded house of slaves, Anne Hine pouting in her grave, Rosie gone; and she was on the point of allowing her eye to moisten when a flunkey handed her a telegram which, on opening, she found to convey the message: “Profoundly regret to announce death of Arthur just posted in Whitehall, his column convoying returned empties engaged with Delarey midway between Zeerust and Krugersdorp. My profound regrets. Derby” — whereat the old lady threw up both her hands in a tremble above her head, and, oblivious of her stick, hobbled briskly from the room.

XVII. SHAN RELATES

THE EVENING FOLLOWING this Rosie, chin on palm, sat ruminating at a window so low and small, that one had need to stoop to look out of it — diamond-paned, half of it fixed, half a sideways slide, and the roof a smaller square than the room, and the room so small! not space enough in it for the display of even half of all those liquids, pots, little sponges, polishers, mysterious creams and lotions, feminine delicacies, with which Rosie kept that flesh of hers as dainty as a daisy, the chamber being a cabin enclosed in oblique planes, and like a real ship's-cabin in this, that, perched high there in the heart of its girdle of mountains, it ever heard round it voices and sounds of gales joined in many an organ-harmony of alto, and grave diapason raving, and vox humana calling, centuries of years of euphony so embalming its old beams in music, that now like old violin-woods they every moment resounded to those vowel-sounds, and of themselves were vocal.

It was the house of Shan's uncle, and Rosie's pout and wrinkling-up of the nose on entering it had been playful, for it was bohemian, and a spree, but already now after twenty-four hours of it the white wife was beginning to recognise that white love in one's uncle-in-law's cottage is not all fun: and Glanncourt had its merits.

And as she sat there ruminating on it at her bedroom window, a little maid looked in to say that tea was ready.

"But Mr. O'Shannon hasn't come back," Rosie said.

"Yes, mum, he has, for I saw him," replied the child.

Rosie stood up, went down and out of the house, and looked down the road — below the level of which the cottage crouches in a bower — and up the road toward the Chase two hundred yards away, but could not see Shan; and she walked down the steep of the yard, which sheerly overlooks a ravine clothed all in firs, and beyond the ravine a world of vale with Severn in it trailing itself away through haze: but still could not anywhere see him. However, in coming back up, on peeping into the dark of an outhouse that was half-full of hay, she could see a form in there lying face downward on an old door, so she climbed in, and it was he.

Sitting by him on the hay, she pulled his hair, saying: “What, asleep?”

“No, I’m not asleep....”

She could scarcely see his face, though he had sat up, but by his tone understood that he was in pain, such pain that she had to inquire several times what was wrong before he told her that he had received evil tidings, and was feeling bad.

“Come and tea,” she said, “and then tell me.”

“Rosie,” was his answer, “you have to go back to Glanncourt.”

“I? Why?”

“You must, you must, ah, you must,” he wailed, shaking his bowed brow in his two palms.

“But why?”

“Let me tell you this,” he answered with a great dreariness and drooping: “that you are an unmarried girl living with a man.”

Rosie thought this over, and after some moments replied: “Am I? Who unmarried me? You aren’t well — !”

“No, that’s true, I am not well, for I have enough to make me crazy.... Aye, there’s the gunner in God, and He will set up the lad that He chooses as a target, and shoot darts at him, patiently, dart after dart, on this face and on that, till He has him dead and done. But don't suppose that I'm doting, Rosie, for what I've told you is true."

"Whatever do you mean, dear?" said Rosie, peering, her hand on his shoulder, into his face.

Several minutes of silence reigned before from Shan's bent head came any reply, till he moaned: "Stop, I will tell you, Rosie; wait, you shall have it; listen, and you will know. You know already, don't you, that I have a fondness for Lieutenant Gordridge? But you don't know, may be, how far it goes, for it began when I was barely thirteen, seeing that in that plantation of firs above Burton's there was a white wood-pigeon which a pheasant-hen had turned out of its nest, and she herself had laid six eggs in it, so I, knowing of this, went to clutch the eggs — three days after my thirteenth birthday it was, on April the 17th, 1885 — and I was nicely in the tree getting the eggs when underneath I saw Mr. Grace, the head-keeper, gaping up at me: I'll ever remember it: without saying a word he grabbed me by the collar when I got down, and dragged me off to give it to me, no doubt; but when we got to the spot where the New Garden now is we found Mr. Gordridge strolling about there with Mr. Arthur, so old Grace, lugging me before them, told how I'd been copped in the act. Mr. Arthur laughed and slung his finger at me, as much as to say 'aren't you going to catch it hot,' but he begged his father to let me off, and his father went one better, for after talking aside with old Grace, who told him that I was a good one at most things, he asked me if I'd care to come on the estate, and from the next day till yesterday my life, you may say, has been given up to the pheasantry at Glanncourt."

"Yes," said Rosie, "and after all those years of faithful service, to be turned off on a charge of taking money—"

"Well, but I did take it," said Shan.

“Shan!”

“No, don’t be shocked—”

“Oh, but don’t say to me that it was you who stole—”

“No, Rosie, I didn’t say stole, I said took. Wait and you will be told, listen and you will know, how our lives can be like rocketers caught broadside-on by a wind, and hurled, with a curl on, a thousand yards awry out of our course: and does the bird know what causes the blow that’s caught her? or can anyone tell me the tale how the earth was made out of air, and where the dirt was delved that made it? Ah, there’s an answer to it all in the air, and you can watch the cat’s ear twitch to catch it, may be, but men’s ears are not artful enough for it. Anyway, from that April the 17th when Lieutenant Gordridge and I came together through my trying to get a clutch of eggs we were like hand and glove for years. Is there a belt, or heath, or turnip-field, a brake, upland, or gorse, a river or stream, anywhere for miles round that our feet haven’t haunted together? I don’t think so. He had a tutor who didn’t too much care, Mrs. and Mr. Gordridge gave him rein, and it was kill, kill, with us, like two young tigers on the prowl together, a regular carouse of prey. One day it came into his head to take out the South Gates fox-hounds — Oh, he was a crazy one! — so he contrived to get Squire Sinclair, the master’s, consent, and, starting a fox, he and I alone, mind you, after a grand run, you can hardly credit it, yes, we killed’n. Guess, now, whether we were pleased with ourselves that evening! So, going home, he says to me, ‘Bull’s-head,’ he says, for that was his name for me, seeing that I wore my hair long, and my head was more than my body, so to say, I being lank for my age, ‘Bull’s-head,’ he said, ‘what’s your age?’ So I told him, on which he called out: ‘By Jove, we were born on the same day!’ aye, and within two hours of the same night, too, as I now know, he in a mansion, I in a cottage, yet out of the same darkness, under the same night-stars, into this same stew. Rosie, I remember going tingly all over me! and from that evening we were still dearer friends. One afternoon going home with our kills — his father was dead then, he himself had gone to Rugby, and this was in the holidays — I asked him if he liked me, so after looking me frankly in the face, he said, ‘Bucephalus’ — for ‘Bucephalus’ is the same as ‘Bull’s-head’ — ‘there’s no one anywhere that I like better’; then he told me that I was ‘archaic,’ and when I asked him what that meant, he told me that I frequently reminded him of Abraham and Moses and that crew — I have never been able quite to fathom what his meaning was. Well, the very next day he gave me that palish photograph—”

“But, Shan,” murmured Rosie, “I have heard most of these details before, dear, and it is raining, and spray spattering in through this roof, so make haste and tell me what you were thinking of in saying that I am ‘unmarried,’ and that you — took the money.”

“Sit on this side where it is dry,” replied Shan... Well, then, I won’t worry you about all that, and I’ll skip over the years in which I began to fix my heart upon you, and in which I got Mrs. Gordridge to say that she would see if she could give you to me. During those years Lieutenant Gordridge and I were parted, and how much he remembered of all that had been between us two I don’t know, but as to me, Rosie, it has all been hoarded in my heart, as a Jew treasures his jewels, and as a grouse remembers the number of her brood where they wait on the ground in the broom, aye, it has all been hoarded in my heart. Then he came, ill — a year and three months and three days ago, on September the 24th. I was at the station waiting, but — he was too ill to notice me. He must have been still ill when, seeing you anew, he fell in love with you. On the Friday before he arrived you had as good as promised to marry me... he must have known it all, yet he courted you... Lord God Almighty forgive me! I broke in his ribs for it....”

“Dear, it was a fair fight,” breathed Rosie.

“Yes, dear, a fair fight, but you don’t know — my holy one — my heart’s brother — born both under one moon — and I bruised him like a mark, and most damnably broke his bones.... Well, never mind — what was I saying? Oh, but I had some excuse, mind you, for I wasn’t too sure then that he meant quite well by you, and it was only after my three-days’ knock-about with the police, and after he had come and rescued me out of their claws, that she who is in her tomb this night came to me where I stood underneath the cottage beech, assured me that he had meant to marry you, and showed me that I had been most cruel to him; upon which I just snatched up one of the bobbies’ bykes, and was away to the station, where I came just in time to make friends with him: and, Rosie, I vowed to him then that I’d renounce all hope of marrying you—”

Now the white wife’s heart began to beat more wildly as a sort of dawn-twilight broke in upon her brain, and she breathed: “Strange thing! Anne once told me that it was so...

“Aye, she knew, for she knew what was in each one’s mind, you see, though she wasn’t always right either, poor sweet, she ran riot here or there. So that was settled, Rosie: he was to go to the war, and I to guard you—”

“But he accepted such a promise?” Rosie asked.

“It was freely made! he didn’t force — !”

“Well, go on.”

“The very next day Mrs. Gordridge had me brought to her with the bandages still round my bruises, to offer to give you to me. I refused you, threw up my job, not wishing to be too near to you, and moved up here, not meaning to be too far from you. Well, six days afterwards I was sawing up wood on the well up there under the road when Yotty Perkins, the fish-pedlar, told me that you were off to — Persia, he said, not China; but it was five days before the possibility that it might be true suddenly struck me one night, and you know how you were actually going when I flurried up, halted the carriage, and vowed to Mrs. Gordridge that I would marry you—”

“And you did” she put in.

“Yes, but wait. You may think now that I was happy, having you without quite violating my vow to the lieutenant: but, if I was happy down my right side, so to say, my heart was far enough from it, for this world is made, not of one dirt, look, but of two, and the grass, now, that the cow eats, though you may think that it is green, it isn’t, for it is scarlet, too, and the cow casts out all that’s green of it, and keeps the red, and how could a rose-tree throw out roses as scarlet as the cow’s gore, if the leaves are green alone? No, the ground’s scarlet, and the sun is, and mortal men are. So I was pretty sad and mad, in spite of my heaven, and you know how on the Sunday of our banns I broke loose in the night, doing sixty pounds of damage, which sixty pounds I should be glad of now, God knows, and on the Monday forenoon I tore his photograph to shreds.... But on the Wednesday I got a cablegram from him, asking me to give his mother the news of his arrival at the Cape, signed ‘Arthur,’ signifying that he hadn’t forgotten one hour of our youth, and was still in a closer union with me than with his own mother.... He thanked me for my faithfulness to him.... Rosie, could I marry you after this? and yet I couldn’t let you be shipped abroad, so, after thinking it over for five days, I determined in my head to break the law of the land, and without saying a word to anyone, I took the train for London, purposing to marry some girl up there first, and then, returning, go through the pretence of marrying you....” With wide eyes the white wife clung to his arm at this, frightened at the audacity of this manhood, trying to see his face in the dark, hardly yet finding room in her brain for all that this meant to her life, or for the deluge of radiance that now drenched her consciousness, while outside the hay-shed the rain rushed down now with a grave sound, and touched their faces with sprays to which they gave no attention.

“Shan! and you did it?”

“Yes, I did it. At first I meant to marry a girl.... but, then, the injustice to the girl.... I married the first old bag of rags that I met in a pub in Bethnal Green, that same Mrs. Graves—”

“Shan!”

“Aye, she’s my wife.”

“Dear one! Never mind, dear!”

“No, it is nothing: I was only—”

Suddenly Rosie clapped palms once together.

“I am to be mistress of Glanncourt, after all!” “No, Rosie, stop—”

“Ah, wouldn’t Mama Gordridge eat out her heart at it.... O! that would be sweet.... The only pity is that Anne’s dead, she’ll never know now—”

“Oh, Rosie, stop, I have not told you, my tongue shies—”

“But why didn’t you let me into it all along?” asked the white wife, her mind all too flighty with excitement to collect itself to hearken: “you might have told me — !”

“No, Rosie, I might have, but I could not breathe it even to you,” said he, “I felt so creepy of the least fear of a hint of the secret leaking through to the mistress’ ears. I am not one for airing my cares, as you know, and then again I was weak, dear, I couldn’t resist the greed I had of seeing you regard me as your master and owner — oh, it was my reign, my fling, you don’t know, my usurpation of you and term of office, fast-fleeting, as when a head-boy is appointed to look after his school, and he stalks like a cock, his heart sinking each time he thinks of the teacher coming back, and the collapse of his kingship; but in spite of this, I think I should have told you, only I was shy of it, oh, I shrank, Rosie—”

“But the old woman knew—”

“Aye, to my woe, I had to tell her: for when I asked her to pass through the form of marriage with me, she wants to know why, the Cockney fox, and, as I had only four days, I had to let out to her that I wished to marry-without-marrying someone else, whereupon with that cunning twitching of her eyes, she said aye, she would, on condition that I signed a paper; so I signed to pay her nine shillings a week, without, however, letting her know from what part of the country I had sprung, meaning always to forward her the cash through James Davis in Winchester: and how the old hound’s nose eventually contrived to track me out down here I even now don’t know. Well, that was on the Thursday night, and on the Friday, going, as I was directed, to a place which they call the Vicar General’s Office, in Ludgate Hill, I got a licence with a stamp on it, and the same evening, after rigging her in new clothes, carted her to the superintendent registrar in Bethnal Green, to give notice of it. No marrying the following day, for one day must pass; no marrying on the Sunday: on the Monday at noon we were married: on the Tuesday at two I had to marry you. But I couldn’t get away! My wife clung to me, insisting on seeing me off, which was just what I didn’t mean her to do, nor would I wire to Glanncourt, I was so chary of letting a soul dream that I had been anywhere near London. But stealing clear of her on the Tuesday morning, I first of all wired James Davis, beseeching him to wire my coming to Glanncourt, and, on getting to Gloucester, hired a bicycle—”

“I see it all now,” said Rosie: “this old being, when she found you out down here, threatened to inform against you for bigamy unless you kept her pocket always full, is that it? and that’s why we were often poor, and why you took the money: for if she had only opened her mouth, I might possibly have been shipped away out of Arthur’s way, and it was Arthur’s money which you took to disburse for Arthur's behoof, is that it? But, dear, mightn't you have applied to Mama Gordridge for money, or to Arthur, rather than suffer all the tortures you must have gone through?"

"Apply to Mrs. Gordridge I couldn't," Shan answered: "I was too shy of having her even dreaming that I was in trouble for money, for she would immediately have been set questioning how that could have come about; and to Lieutenant Gordridge I did write — three letters in all, the first two to let him know that you were going all right—"

"I wondered why you would never let me see his letters to you! So what kind of words did Arthur discover to unburden his heart in about all your bounty toward him and me?"

"Rosie, he never knew what I have done, he was never to know."

"But why haven't you told him from the first?"

"What? When I myself at one hour wasn't sure of myself for the next hour, just think in what a stew he, if he had known, would have lived at the thought of his future wife living as a wife with a man, ever doubtful in his heart at what moment I might go dog-mad and damn all our lives. Besides, Mrs. Gordridge, shrinking from letting him know yet that you were married, had got me to promise to be mum: so I locked it all up in my heart, and wrote to him with a hard rein on my pen, waiting for him to appear that I might relate it to him face to face, and hear what he would say. But finally, when I felt myself being strangled by Mrs. Graves, and when, though I kept turning both the eggs and birds of the estate into money, I couldn't appease the woman's greed, I just wrote the whole story to Lieutenant Gordridge, asking for funds—"

"Ah, he does know now, then!" said Rosie gladly.

"I wonder?" he went, and groaned.... "Not from that letter anyway, Rosie, for that letter, as it happened, was with those same mails in that same train which De Wet burned after making a shambles of the 4th Derbies on that Rhenoster kopje, and after gunning Rhoodeval station, and looting those great-coats—”

“So even now Arthur doesn’t know?”

“He may now.”

“Oh, you wrote again?”

“Not that I wrote again.... Oh, God, I suppose I must tell you—” and now, Shan, catching out of his pocket a copy of the Star and a box of matches, in the glare of a match showed Rosie the name of Gordridge in the paper.

“Missing!”

Shan hastily caught from his pocket another paper, a later edition, struck another match, and in its glare showed Rosie the name of Gordridge.

“Killed!”

“Yes, killed,” said he, and now he dropped down again upon the old door on the hay.

“Oh, but poor Mama Gordridge!” Rosie breathed, shrinking.

From the breast of Shan there escaped an outcry of distress: “my brother....!” while ever down with a showery grave sound brushed the rain outside, drowning the shrubbery, the ground, struggling through spouts, with gulps.... goblins sobbing in the night....

XVIII. SHAN AWAITING

THE NEXT DAY it still rained, so when the pony-cart came to the gate to take Rosie's trunks, which were already packed to go back to Glanncourt, Rosie, sitting on one of them, said: "No! I will wait till to-morrow."

On the morrow Rosie, instead of going down to Glanncourt, pouted at her pretty nails, wrote to her Mama Gordridge on the death of Arthur, and now awaited an answer which, slow in coming, came cold; Shan, for his part, being most hard-worked in those days, having taken over the thirteen acres of farm from his uncle, who had flitted, would be with her hardly twice a day at meals, and, waiting now to see what she would do, breathed not another syllable about her going back to Glanncourt, for she was eye-bright to his eyes in the cottage. But one day in late January, coming in and finding her with her skirt turned up and her hair frowsy at housework — for though half of their old luxury of furniture had been sold, half had been brought up hither, and she was keeping it neat — he got angry, saying to her: "Rosie, if ever I see you doing such work again, you must only go to Glanncourt."

Rosie puffed out smoke into his face, replying: "You pronounce it like a threat, as though Glanncourt wasn't a more pleasant place to live in than this hole in the ground. And if I don't do things, who is to? Who does most of the cooking — ?"

"Do you?"

"Fond male! so do you imagine that Jane does all the work?"

"Then, I shall have to get a second girl."

“What, want a whole zenana?... No, Shan, you are nothing to me, you are sheltering and nourishing me, so I earn my living. Besides, I am going home in a few days, for I am only injuring the last rags of my demireputation by lingering in this den.”

He made no answer to this, gazed out of window, till in some minutes he said: “Whether you go to stay or no, you really should go now to see Mrs. Gordridge, Rosie.”

“Has Mrs. Gordridge written to ask me?” asked Rosie.

“As good as!... Rosie, do take care, now, that you don’t give folks grounds to accuse you of ingratitude — she is good, she is very good, and her soul is very sad. And now there is this new thing to make her wretched.... Haven’t you heard yet? Look—” he showed her a newspaper huge-lettered with the words: “The Queen Dead.”

“Oh, she’s dead.... But for what reason should Mama Gordridge be wretched at that, since she was not at all a gossip of the queen.”

“But isn’t everybody more or less sad at it, especially those, I suppose — ?”

“I am not, then, I am sure,” said the white wife: “she wouldn’t have been wretched if I had died.”

“Oh, Rosie, you have a hard heart,” said Shan. “Sure, now, it hasn’t got one little soft spot in it about the bigness of a pea?”

“Has it? For whom is that?”

“For people that I like, then, and for people that like me, not for my queenie. Women possess more sense than men, you see.”

“And less sympathy with the earth’s thirst and throbbings, probably; still, Mrs Gordridge will grieve, I am sure, if there is any room at all in her for greater grief.... So, Rosie, you are going to her in a few days?”

“I be.”

“The very best thing that you could do... To stay, or only for the day?”

“To stay.”

“Best thing — ! But, then, will you be telling her everything?”

“At any rate,” said Rosie heatedly, “I’ll be telling her enough to make her eat her nails for accusing people of stealing money!”

“As if she could help doing what she did! Why tell her anything at all? Her bad opinion of me I can still bear, for you can’t explain why I took the money without explaining that you aren’t my wife, and, that once out, good-bye to your ever being allowed to be with me again.”

“Ah! won’t that be hard to bear!” sighed the white wife with eyes cast up white: “I can just see myself weeping in my widow’s-weeds.... No more Shan, girls, the sugar’s all done.”

“Well, it is well to be young, Rosie, and to have a laughing heart that throws off things.”

“Hark! Methuselah declaims. But I am not so young as my teeth, Mr. O’Shannon, if you but knew it: you see, I’m pretty complex inside, a regular enigma underneath my what-do-you-call-it; and, if I wasn’t gay, a gloomy little pair we two should make together, shouldn’t In fact, the white wife, in showing more jollity than she quite felt, was in those weeks a little “complex,” feeling underneath, as she did, how complete must be Shan’s grief at that death of Arthur, from whom he was never now to receive that grasp of the hand and glance of gratitude that he must have looked forward to as the reward of all his work. And the boomerang of that bigamy of his! He had broken his life for Arthur — the Boers had doubly broken it in breaking his obligation to Arthur; he had kept the white wife white because of a living man — though the man was dead, she had still to be kept white because of a living woman; and though the woman was old, being seventy, she might still for a score of years live a vampire at his blood, not only with a claim upon his pocket, for maintenance, but with a threat of imprisonment held over his head, for waste. As for Rosie herself, that death of Arthur was the death of a lover who wanted to make her the lady of Glanncourt, so that, on the whole, her gaieties whenever Shan came in were gaieties with a purpose, and in divers other ways she had turned very good, going on Sundays to the white chapel a mile down the road, whose score or so of devouts congregated to it from great distances, giving, too, to tramps, showing her face in cottages where sickness or want was, and in those long evenings singing and playing "Lead, Kindly Light," may be, or reading to Shan from the books which he liked, from "Progress and Poverty," from "Paradise Lost," and "The Pilgrim's Progress," and the Old Testament, till her big empty head nodded toward slumber. Meantime, she watched with much quiet interest in what fashion Shan bore his grief, with what groans, with what glooms, with what broodings of the brow, how far his manhood failed, how far it succeeded, in concealing his heart-break, how now a nimble Achilles he rebounded to his feet from the knock-down, till now afresh the surges of his adversity redrowned him, and now he harnessed himself as a horse to his fate and drew hardily in the traces, till now he found the way waste, and wailed. In her heart Rosie called him the carle of sorrows. But time ivies every abruptness, and then, moreover, those old pains of struggle against the gripe and virus of Rosie's graces were over now for him — or not wholly over may be, but now he knew and trusted himself, as he never would have discovered and recognized himself, had not those words of Anne Hine's: "great as the greatest heroes of history," once greeted his ears, words which were as a revelation to him of a dream once somewhere dreamed and nearly forgotten, giving him to be never thenceforth quite the same kind of simple Simon, but ever thenceforth a firmer stepper on the earth. And when that last year of the century which had yielded him so much tribulation had passed away, and the new era's first Spring was blooming, he threw off that mood of brooding, turning anew to the love of a universe whose face just there has a fay's fascination. The death of Arthur — or rather the report of Arthur's death, for in this as in some other known cases a death was reported where no death had taken place — was both made more baleful by the Spring, and tended to increase Shan's feeling of luck at being alive and present at such a show. "I saw a dead starling on the shed this morning," he told Rosie, strolling with her over the Chase one night, "and felt so sorry for it, that it had just missed this day!"

"That squadron of clouds sailing up there behind the mountain," he informed her one lowering afternoon of March, "are just newly arrived in Britain from the Brazils, and are now eastward bound for Siberia: they have a high time." The Comforters returned, his heart was enlarged. He saw the fields grow suddenly hairier-rough than Esau under grasses; over the meadows he watched dandelions like stars cast their hosts in constellations, and daisies in milky-ways, making of two acres a universe; those groves hung above the Wye, almost visible from his windows, wildly wantoning, grew to resemble some seraglio all gracious with rugs, draperies, waving Valenciennes, given up to toying, a life of joyance, languished orgies, in which morning or midnight the voice of the organ darkling walks; nor of all this was he a spectator only, knowing well that he was it, it he, vein of his vein, and when, lifting up his heart, he hailed, calling out to it "well-beloved!" the mountains all with dumb mouths calling babbled back to him: "well-beloved!" In the midst of which new zest there was always still, nevertheless, his thorn in the flesh, the old woman sending for more money than he had to send her.

“I don’t intend to bear it much longer,” he said to Rosie all within a little bower of gorse on the Chase whither they often strolled together hatless of a gloaming, “for now that Lieutenant Gordridge is dead I am no longer so shy of her tongue as I have been, seeing that all that she can do to me now is to get me into prison for a month or two, and, since I have broken the law, I often feel disposed to undergo it of my own accord.”

“The law be jiggered,” said the gay girl, “if you did such a bêtise, you would not only force your judge to commit a crime, but you would force me away from you, since I could not, of course, stay with a gentleman generally known to be the husband of the prophetess Anna. I only stay with you through bad habit, and, if I once go away, I am bound to fall in love with someone or other, I know, forget all about you, and never see you ‘more.’ So I vote that you even keep on paying — it won’t be for long, for a lady of seventy who dances the cake-walk can’t last.”

“Well, I shall do as you advise me, dear,” said Shan, “and God keep me from hungering for the death of a fellow-creature. I only wish I had that forty pounds now — Wasn’t that, now, a mysterious business how I lost that money! I can’t even dream—”

“I believe that it was Anne who took it,” remarked Rosie suddenly; and Shan started.

“I don’t, of course, mean,” Rosie added, “that she stole it in an ordinary sense: but we now know that she was brain-sick about that time, crazy after you, and so may have had some motive — that is, if you really did leave it on the mantelpiece.”

Shan was silent; then he said: “Yes, it may have been she, and, if so, I can see her dear motive: she wished, by making me poor may be, to push me sooner to end my troubles, for she judged that you would never come with me if I was driven away, and there her fine scent ran riot, as she ran riot in conjecturing that I meant to commit suicide. Yet what else was she to conjecture, since she knew that I was guarding you for Lieutenant Gordridge, saw me marry you, and was just not fly enough to strike the idea that my marriage might be null.... The dear!... She died because of me, but don't talk, Rosie, about her being 'crazy after' me; she wasn't made of the common clay; she believed that I had done a noble deed, and her love was as pure and beautiful as that moon that you see moving up yonder — purer, for the moon's rolled up in a struggle with those pitchy vapours which she throws her glare on — look at her, like the combustion of a bonfire — on earth it is May, but in heaven it's the Fifth of November.”

“Look at the Chase,” said Rosie, “one would imagine a conflagration with the fog rolling like smoke... funny....”

“Yes, and it is getting pretty cold, too, we had better be going back” — and along a footpath they passed in single file through a waste of bracken, where a scraggy nag or two browsed in God's eye throughout the reign of the night; and hence down a road they roamed to their home.

XIX. SHAN IN LUCK

IT WAS ONLY three days later that Shan received a letter even more pressing than usual from his old woman, praying for twenty pounds without delay; it had, however, two strangenesses: that it made no threats, and when Shan showed it to Rosie, she said at once: "This isn't her writing."

"Perhaps she is ill," replied Shan gravely.

"Hip!" said Rosie; "over-much jigging—"

"No, Rosie, don't be hard-hearted; she hasn't a bad old heart on the whole."

"But I have? The first wife better loved than the second, girls, as usual! You don't know me, Mr. O'Shannon."

"Rosie, have you a good heart?"

"I can pity; yes, I can pity."

"Is that so?"

"Oh, I can pity. You little know me: pity is the grand thing in me; with a white anguish and shut eyes, from the pit of my soul to the tip of my tingling lips I can pity."

"Well, now!"

"That's Rosie."

"Rosie, do you pity me?"

"A little bit like that."

"Well, that's a lot. So what shall I do now about this thing? There is something muggy about this."

“I should send her the base gold,” said the white wife, “for the more you send her the more she will jig, and the more she jigs—”

“No,” said Shan, “I know what I shall do: I won’t send: I will wait” — a decision which turned lucky, for, as when one by starving worms causes them to squirm forth, some days afterwards Shan, in walking on his business down the mountain, encountered a man who asked him whereabouts Mr. O’Shannon hung out, and when Shan gave him to know that he was O’Shannon, the man said: “I am from Mrs. Graves.”

He was a thing young, lank, pink of trunk, and his being stank of drink.

“Who are you?” asked Shan.

“I am Mrs. Graves’ nephew.”

“How is Mrs. Graves?”

“She is all right.”

“So what do you want?”

“I come about the money.”

“Which money?”

“Why, the twenty quid, mister.”

“Why didn’t she write for it herself?”

“A nasty touch of the influenza she had; got a pal to write it for her, poor old girl.”

“But why hasn’t she come for it herself?”

“She’s got the influenza very bad.”

“What, still?”

“Aye, still, poor old soul.”

“You said that she is ‘all right.’”

“Well, you understand my meaning, don’t you? I meant that she’s still in the land of the living — that sort of thing — poor old soul.”

“Well, I would never have thought that you are her nephew.”

“How’s that, then?”

“You aren’t half so knowing, now, as your aunt.”

“What’s your meaning, mister?”

“It’s nothing. But twenty pounds isn’t the right amount.”

“Well, I’m well aware of that, but she told me, if you won’t tip her the twenty, then make it fifteen. It’s worth something, too, working up these here hills. Lord! talking of hills, you’ve some hills about here — mountains I call ’em.”

“But fifteen isn’t the right amount either.”

“I know that.... I forget what is; she did tell me, too — poor old girl.”

“But if I don’t choose to send it — what then?”

“Oh, but you’ll do her twelve, anyway — she lying ill, too, poor old soul.”

“Twelve isn’t the amount. I won’t send more than eight.”

“There you are! Eight will do — I’m not hard.”

“Seven is the right amount really.”

“Seven? But by the time I have paid my fare—”

“I doubt if I could let her have more than seven to-day.”

“Seven let it be! There! I can’t say fairer. I’ll have the seven, provided it’s down.”

“Ah, but you are not your aunt’s nephew—”

“What can be your meaning?”

“Tell me this: why ought I to give anything at all? What claim has this Mrs. Graves upon me?”

“You have often given her oof before, that’s a sure thing.”

“I admit that. But what claim has she?”

“That’s neither here nor there, mister. I only—”

“Don’t you know?”

“I do know, yes—”

“Mention it and you shall have the twenty pounds down.”

The fellow hesitated.

“There’s a pound to pay your fare,” said Shan, patting his shoulder, “you go home and get some work” — and he walked on down the mountain-steep, leaving the Cockney gaping after him.

Coming home sooner than usual that evening, he found Rosie reading in a lounge-chair underneath the cherry-tree, and was met with the exclamation: “But tea isn’t ready!”

“Rosie,” said he, “I am obliged to leave you.”

“For aye?” says she.

“Two days. Think you won’t be too lonely, now, — with Jane?”

“Oh, I am inured now to manlessness, you know, and so, I don’t doubt, is Jane. But what’s up?”

“It’s nothing....”

“Wild retort! and your eyes sparkling and crackling like a whirl of circus-girls all in spangles. One would imagine that someone was dead—”

“No — don’t say that of me: no one is dead to my knowledge.”

“So where are you going?”

“You will know when I get back,” and no more could Rosie win from him. Having hastily packed a hand-bag, he made off down the mountain.

The white wife was left now with a mind at work upon a crowd of surmises, and lived in a vacuum for two days, during which not a line came from Shan. On the evening after, she keenly expected him; but it was not till the following morning that she got a telegram — from London — and at ten that night was in the garden hearkening to a nest of nightingales warbling, when the gate swung back, and, bag in hand, in he hastened.

“Oh, I am glad,” she said to him, as she shook hands. “Why didn’t you send a line?”

“Vision that she is,” Shan’s lips muttered, for the white wife like the cherry-tree shimmered all in garments of white that night, with wide sleeves, and gauzes, and white shoes in the moonshine, and she reeked with aromas more rich than the cherry-tree’s. Shan kissed her hand.

“Supper’s ready,” she said, and they went into a small room, rudely built, but refinely furnished, where while he ate in a kind of haste, Rosie, with her elbows on the table, sat waiting with a pale nose that showed up the four old-gold freckles, giving brief replies to his questions, and in the midst of a silence said: “Don’t keep me, dear.”

“She’s dead,” said Shan.

“Mrs. Graves?”

“She’s dead.”

Rosie went quite white, then threw up roses, which soon perished once more, then confounded the rouge and white, like a flower-show of roses reflected in a freshet. She had fattened and bloomed out in the bosom of these mountains, and feasted deep. Shan looked at her changes of colour with a shy eye; and presently in strained accents she uttered the words: “Dust to dust, jigger to digger, Graves to grave.”

“Really, Rosie,” said Shan, laying down his knife and fork to underlook her with reproach, “that seems rather heartless of you.”

“My dear,” said Rosie, “your anger at my gladness is due to the fact that you are secretly glad yourself. She was an expense, and the enemy. And since I did not know her, why should I be sad? Someone dies with every tick of the clock, and one is not too sad.”

“But to this woman I owe something,” said Shan. “She was crafty, she looked after Number One, but she wasn’t bad: for though she squeezed me all she could for her own good, she refused to give my secret away to her friends, though they entreated her to, and she remembered that I was her husband, and was true to her word.”

He then told how he had found out everything, how the old lady in mounting into a train to come down to him, being in a drunken state, had tumbled and dislocated something....

They sat in lounge-chairs on the footway between the flowers and the front-door, Rosie's chair two feet further removed from Shan's than usual, heard without hearing the night-birds' burden, and conversed of one Tom Price, a wight of that part, as to whom Shan in walking up the road had just heard that, having been invalided home from the war, he had a week before returned to Woodston: and Shan meant in a day or two to look Tom up, to hear what Tom had to say for himself; after which, conversation, usually fluent where they two talked together, grew grudging, and when Shan went to hold a match to Rosie's cigarette, she took the match in her own fingers, and when he jumped up to replace her fallen lace-wrap round her shoulders, she murmured “it is all right,” and wrapped it round herself.

He did not that night, as always, put his lips to her palm in saying good-night, for she gave to his shy organism the impression that he had somehow gravely offended her, and “If she thinks,” he thought within himself, “that now that I am free I mean to take advantage of her finding herself here with me, which is due to her kindness, to force myself upon her, she is very much mistaken, for a man has some pride.”

The morning after, the white wife, on bounding down to breakfast, though she was generally later, said to him: “Do excuse my lateness”; at meals their politeness to each other became ideal, and their conversations, feats of invention, were on botany and the state of politics. Shan, meanwhile, that whole week, was extremely miserable, he who, on hearing of the death of the old woman, had dreamed of being so blithe. Infected with melancholy, inert, all restless, he could hardly work, would not give himself the trouble to go for a chat with Tom Price, the new-corner from the war, and shirked the gossip of the passers by his turnip-plot. His being was thronged with one thing only — Rosie: what Rosie had said last night, and what flower Rosie had chosen to pluck an hour since, and what could have been her real meaning in saying or doing this or that; leaning over the thole of his snathe, on a sudden he started, and found that he had lost half-an-hour of profound reverie in going over in his head the ins and outs of the brigue between him and Rosie the previous evening. What was wrong? he asked himself: the old woman was well dead, the stone-wall down that had kept them apart; and lo now, a new wall, made without hands out of the stuff of their own frames, fantastic, rarer than air, tougher than stone. Was it some adder that had addled Adam's blood with its dart? For each day the gulf broadened, she holding her head more haughtily aloof from him, he making believe to be thinking of anything but of her, and it was all a bitter pity, he thought, a thing to wring a tear out of the drought of scorching brass, since it just happened so without reason, and mortal power could not stop it.

After five or six days of it his face had become quite drawn, for he could hardly eat, though the thirst that burned his inwards caused him to drink enormously. To be away from her was to be a castaway on a raft, and to be near her was to be sick of a fever. He thought that, if he could tell her all, she would shew him some pity, for she had said that she was most pitiful, but tell her he could not, seeing that there was some kink or other in him, he being made like that, no doubt, too shy and proud to bring himself to it, for it was she who had begun it, and he would die sulking of his hunger, like the vulture cribbed in a cage, whose heart knew its own heart-break. If with thoughts of this sort he maundered on Tuesday, all inert and maudlin, on Wednesday he would rend up handfuls of grass in an agony, and it lasted till Rosie one evening broke a silence between them by coming out with the announcement that she was just about to go back to Glanncourt.

“So you will be leaving me?” replied Shan in a tone of polite regret at the going of a guest.

“Yes, I am so awfully sorry,” said Rosie, “since I have liked being up here so much.”

“Why not stay on, since you like it?” Shan asked: “I need hardly say that I should be delighted, if you did.”

“Yes, I only wish it was not wholly impossible; but, of course, after the death that has lately happened, it is hardly any more quite — comme il faut, is it?”

“Well, no, I suppose that that is so.”

“I wrote to Mama Gordridge to-day, duly making my submission, and saying that I am going” — and now Shan became as blanched as a ghost.

“There’s the letter in the rack,” remarked Rosie, and she rose and shewed him the envelope with the address on it writ large.

“Oh, it isn’t posted,” he remarked.

“No, I haven’t been out.”

“Shall I run down the road, and post it for you — now?”

“If you will be so obliging.... But, after all, no, I have something to add, I will post it tomorrow.”

On the following evening he noticed that the letter was no longer there, and when she gave him the information that she had been arranging her trunks during the twilight, this caused him anew to whiten and wince. Then followed a discussion as to the pony-chaise, and as to who was to take it down the mountains with the trunks, he promising to look to it, and when Rosie complained of the carman who had brought her up, Shan said that someone else should be procured, and in the end it was mutually agreed that each difficulty would disappear, and the trunks duly reach Glanncourt.

And during the ensuing evening but one the trunks, by the ingenuity and thews of Shan and a driver, were duly squeezed down through the stairs, taken out to the gate, and placed upon the chaise; and now Rosie with her gloves and hat on, parasol in hand, stood alone within the house-door with Shan, Jane standing out at the gate, waiting there to see her go.

“I think that there is nothing more to be said,” Rosie said: “I have given all instructions to Jane, who will look after you.”

“That will be all right,” said he.

“So good-bye.”

“Good-bye.”

They shook hands.

“You can come and see me sometimes at Glanncourt,” said she.

“I shall be glad to do that,” said he.

“Besides, as I shall be informing Mama Gordridge of everything now, she will henceforth no doubt be on her knees to you to come back, in which case we shall see each other occasionally.”

“Let us hope so,” said Shan.

“So good-bye.”

“Good-bye.”

They shook hands.

“I — regret to have to go away from you just at present,” said Rosie, “for you don’t look over-well.”

“It’s nothing,” said he.

Bent over her parasol, eyeing the ground, her mouth trembled, as she whispered: “I enjoyed being up here.”

“Yes, the air’s so fresh,” he muttered.

“Oh, Shan, don’t be so proud,” said Rosie, fixing him with a look of reproach.

“What can I do?”

“Implore me to stay....”

“Have pity!” he now shouted at her in a passion, upon which the white wife turned in haste, and fled away up to her chamber, in the middle of which she stood all laughters and sobbings like a dying light that flickers wildly up alternately and burns low with sobs, while lying on a sofa below Shan also was piping his eye, with whinings; and thus by one bold blow the bowls of bewitchment which had imprisoned them were broken, and the boxes, by dint of brains and of brawn, were brought back up the stairs.

That evening they made a gay pair, and Shan kneeling in grass at her feet beneath the cherry-tree, asked her what could have been “wrong between us these last ten days?”

“I don’t know,” Rosie replied: “some fly must have stung you.”

“Oh, yes, stung me!” he laughed. “But now that we are engaged, it is I who ought to be going away—”

“How long will it take?”

“Five days anyway, I gather.”

“Don’t you trouble to go,” she whispered: “I’ll trust you!”

“And are we to live up here? You know, Rosie, that we are pretty poor....”

“We shall live up here all the summer,” said she, “for I like being here now, and then we shall go down, and you will start kippuring again in our old cottage.”

“God’s good, after all... his brow bowed down; then, looking up sharply —” I say, do you remember that old threat of mine to make you flush, if you were a snow-flake? It isn’t Tom, Dick or Harry that you are having for a husband, mind: I seem to be somebody, an ancestor of Ansons and Nelsons...

She bit his chin.

“My difficulty is,” he added, “to marry quite on the quiet about here, for, if old Fitchett, the registrar at Ebbstow, knows me, that will be awkward; but I don’t think that he does, and as to the licence, that I shall be getting from Mr. Beth, the surrogate, beyond the Forest, who, I’m sure, never heard of my having been married to you before. It will be all right!”

“Five days, is it?” asked Rosie.

“So Mr. Carter told me to-day. I’ll see if by wit or work one can’t turn it into four!”

The next morning, hurrying down from the mountain to go to the surrogate, he saw a wooden leg stumping through Netherend village, and grasped the hand of Tom Price, with whom, as he was rather late for the train, he did not stop to talk, but, calling backward that they should shortly meet each other, hurried onward. The same day he made the affidavit as to “no impediment,” and on the third day, returning to the same surrogate, got the licence, with which he went straight to the Ebbstow registrar, and, elated that the registrar, whom he knew well, had not known him, came home to find the white wife almost as occupied with lady’s-work, repairing this, changing that, Jane aiding, as if this was her first marriage. The next day he was in possession of the registrar’s certificate and licence to marry.

That evening, the marriage-eve, he brought her home the tidings that Mrs. Gordridge had hurriedly left Glanncourt for London that day; brought her also a card-board box crowded with bridal flowers, lilies with stiff bright pistils couched in maiden-hair, anemones japonicæ as odorous as the Orient — stolen goods out of Glanncourt hot-houses — thinking to surprise her who rather surprised him by the fête of garden-flowers with which he found the house all garnished, and by the white cake which waited, so that in nothing the second wedding might hang behind the first, or leave a feeling of incompleteness on the nerves.

Before supper he had again to go out, for in the activities of that day he had nearly forgotten, what was his business every Friday evening, to visit Anne Hine's grave with flowers: so, taking some of the bride's flowers, for she had stripped the garden, he started out — a two-mile jog down the mountains under a moon which, newly-risen, was illuminating above her a beach of cloud brindled in streaks and crinkles, like ribbed sea-sand, where moon-babies bathed; and in Woodston churchyard he was placing his pious garland when he heard a stump, stump, and there legging among the graves came Tom Price, searching for the grave of one Gertrude, dugged during his journeyings at the front. "Come on, Tom, I'll shew you," said Shan, and led the way.

There Shan excused himself for not having looked up Tom before, and demanded of Tom why he had not been up to him, to which Tom answered: "You don't know how bad I be, for er bent only the leg wi' me, now, but worse still be the effects of that breath of lead I did get in the Megalienbergs in this left breast."

"This is the first I have heard of it," answered Shan.

"But you know, no doubt, that I was with those details with Little about Zeerust before I got my billet in the leg?"

"No, I didn't know."

"But you know that I was officially reported as missing in January — come."

"I didn't know. The fact is, I have not been following the war closely since December, or hearing any news up there."

“Well, that’s so, Shan,” said Tom Price, and he proceeded to give the story of a column three hundred strong, the guard of some empties returning eastward toward Pretoria, which, after undergoing an ordeal of snipings for two days, was attacked in force from the ambush of a donga on the 19th of January, by a commando of Delarey’s gang. After being shot in the shoulder Price had climbed up a kloof to escape capture by a Boer who chased him, and there in bush had fainted.

“Well, now!” went Shan, “and what next?”

“After coming to myself about ten hours later,” answered Price, “I wandered about in a bit of a daze, till I fell in wi’ a laager of waggons by a drift, where they dressed my wound, kept me for two days, and then, breaking camp, stripped me of my bandolier and rifle, and turned me adrift like a cur. Well, I was away on the trek to get back, and didn’t do so dustily on the whole — richest bit of the whole karoo that bit up there, mostly orange-groves and brooks; the women-folk, too, were fairly good to me; and it was on the fourth afternoon, at a farm called De Geijerstam’s that I come across Lieutenant Gordridge struggling on the stoep—”

“What, was there another Lieutenant Gordridge?” Shan wished to know.

“Our Lieutenant Gordridge, I do mean,” said Price.

“He was killed on December the—”

“Him wasn’t that, now, if you’ll excuse me.... So you haven’t heard what’s been all the talk since I come back?”

The other returned no answer.

“Er wasn’t killed, look,” said Price, “for I saw’n a living man a month afterwards — not much of him left, that’s true, and that little as mad as half a bagful of march-hares with fever — it took two Boer women, big as London bobbies, to hold’n! I have been giving it all to Mrs. Gordridge to-day, for it didn’t come to her ears what I had to say till three days ago, and then er wouldn't believe that there was any truth in it, forgetting that, if the lieutenant hasn't written to her all this time, that may be because er's too bad to write, for er got an explosive bullet in the groin, and that's how it come about, no doubt, that, as er was known to be wounded, and was missing, er was first reported as missing, and then it was taken for certain er was dead. Anyway, this morning I was sent for to Glanncourt, and now Mrs. Gordridge is off to London—" Now Shan, without speaking, went away, gazing on the ground, leaving Price in a state of surprise and gaping, till he disappeared in a timber-belt beyond the graves.

He did not go home, for he wished to hide his head, as the ostrich does, and the white wife and Jane, making a hundred guesses, sat in a state of terror, waiting to see him come till after one of the morning. When at last he entered the little fête of flowers and tapers that the house now was, it was with precipitate steps pressing through to the stair, and with no syllable but the three: "I am ill"; whereat the white wife, far too paralysed with affright to fly after him, to cry after him, stood rooted, heard him lock his room-door above, heard his tumble upon his bed set the room atremble, then heard that rumour of the universe and eternity that hums dumbly upon the ear-drum in the silence of every midnight.

XX. SHAN SULKS

ALL THAT NIGHT, all the next day, Shan, it must be admitted, played the poltroon within his locked room. It was his will not to marry, but he lacked the grit to go and say to Rosie “I can’t marry,” or “I won’t marry on this our second wedding-day.” He did not wish to see her, or to speak to her at all, or to anyone, and, finding solitude a roof to refuge in, and hunger good, he hid himself, lingering in the warmth and ease of the bed, getting brief sleeps sweet with forgetfulness, closing his eyes to Rosie’s trouble, to to-morrow, to everything, except to the fact that he, for the moment, was cosy in bed: for it cannot be true that misery is valuable for character, but, if only miserable enough, will overthrow Cæsar himself into a ne’er-do-well; and when at nine of the wedding-day the white wife for the fourth time besieged the key-hole with beseechings, from Shan within came no reply.

“Shan, I have brought you a cup of tea.”

No reply.

“Shan, won’t you speak to me?”

No reply.

“This is our wedding-day, Shan!”

Then from quite near on the other side a voice said: “I have told you that I don’t want any tea: can’t you leave me in peace?”

“Aren’t you any better, dear?”

“No.”

“Aren’t we going to be married?”

“Not to-day.”

“Won’t you let me go in to you?”

“I will later on.”

“Won’t you give me some notion what’s the matter?”

“I will later, on condition that you go away now.”

“Jane asks you what about the cow?”

“Good God! can’t you let me be?”

She moved away pale, and, waiting chin on palm during most of the remainder of that day for something to happen, left him alone into the gloaming, when, on going again to him, she was again sent away. About midnight, however, when he believed her asleep, he sneaked out of the house, meaning to clear quite away and never more see her, but at nine the next morning while she was eating, he walked in, said “Hallo,” and sat.

A smile curved his lips, a furnace of malice burned in his eyes.

“Don’t you come nigh me!” he cried with a laugh, when Rosie half-rose to approach him.

“Why, Shan?” she asked with reproach.

“Free country! I simply want to have nothing more to do with you, somehow. I seem to have turned right dead against you now.”

“What have I done?”

“Nothing! Couldn’t tell you! Only I don’t approve of you — that’s frank! I don’t believe you’re a good girl.”

“Dear,” said she, “those are words that could never be forgiven, if I did not know that you are not yourself.”

He smiled bitterly upon her, saying: “Faith, I believe you are tainted.”

“You won’t after you have had something to eat” — and she sprang up to get him something, but he, too, springing up, forced her by the wrist into her chair again; upon which she, covering her face, began to cry, while he, sitting over against her, begrimed her with irony, smiling, telling her that he could not think that she was much good, must be pretty light-minded, her love not having the value of thruppence, since she was as eager to marry him at present as she had been eager to marry the lieutenant not yet two years gone, and it was “first come” with her, for she had soon forgotten the lieutenant, as she would soon forget him, Shan, if only the lieutenant could possibly come back from the grave arrayed in his grave-clothes, and she was one of those pheasant-hens which followed a fresh mate every May; and though the whole day long this brutality continued, for absolutely he could not move a moment from her, refused to see to his affairs, would not taste food, and though from time to time he handled her with no little roughness, the white wife after her first few tears endured it all with a perfect quietude, looking at him under her eyes, patiently waiting till his throat should be choked, and the kind of hydrophobia which drove him should wear out nature; and down at last at her feet near evening he dropped, his face buried in her lap, begging her with sobs to forgive him, seeing that he was not a happy man, and things were ill with him.

“Don’t you think that I do?” she asked over him; “so will you have something to eat at last?”

“Ah, yes, do, for God’s sake, give me a glass of water,” he wailed.

After giving him food, during the taking of which she refrained from asking any questions, she persuaded him to go to bed, and, having led him up like a child, sat by his side till he slept. The next day he came down mum but better, and without waiting to eat anything, went out to his fields, leaving the white wife still without any shadow of a notion why she was not even now a wedded woman. However, when during the afternoon a brougham drew up at the gate, and Dr. Blood and Mr. Orrock, going home together from a death-bed, came in to her, she was soon able to conjecture the truth. "You have heard the news, of course," said Dr. Blood the moment he entered.

"Yes," she answered, "by chance: for not much of earthly news is heard up here in heaven. You mean as to Mama Gordridge having gone to London?"

"Ah, she knows," sighed the doctor, with a glance at Mr. Orrock.

"No, she doesn't know," said Mr. Orrock: "I can see by her eyes that she doesn't."

"That she does, then," replied Dr. Blood: "you can tell by the look of her that she does." And Rosie stood glancing from one to the other.

"Very good," said Mr. Orrock, "I am open to bet—"

"I don't bet: not used to betting," replied Dr. Blood.

"He is too religious and good to bet, Rosie," mourned the clergyman with a girding eye at the doctor.

"But why bet about it?" asked the white wife: "just ask me, can't you?"

"Stay," said Dr. Blood: "do you or do you not know that Arthur is alive and coming?"

Their eyes fixed upon her face, awaiting a word which did not come, saw her turn quite sheet-white, saw a light leap to her eyes, the meaning of which they could little divine. In two tickings of the clock she knew that she was being anew reserved for Arthur, and furiously her eyes burned, and her heart beat.

Going to the window, she forgot her visitors who forgot her in a new wrangle over drugs and God, and the moment they were gone wrangling, hatless she ran, blanched of face, with a blazing eye and lips as fixed as iron, down the road, till she reached a field where a labourer was grubbing up swedes out of the ground, and, "Rhodes," she said to him, "I want you at once to take me and my things down to Glanncourt — can you?"

He scratched his head, and “Not to-day, I don’t think—” he began to say.

“Oh, don’t say that, you have to, really,” pleaded Rosie, and when he said at last that he would see, with this she had to be content, ran back up to the cottage, at once tumbled all her belongings into her trunks, and with Jane’s aid attempted to bring them below, there to await the trap. But as the trunks mulishly refused to budge a foot below the stair-head for her, she had now to sit waiting for male aid, watching for hours those faded flowers with which four days before she had filled the house, nor for one moment did that fire in her eyes die down to the time when, at two o’clock, Shan walked in, looking wannish and worn out, asking: “Why have you told Rhodes to come — ?”

“Because I chose to,” was Rosie’s answer—” because I desire to be at home.”

“How is that, then?”

“Because I do.”

He sat by the table, Rosie being bent over the grate, a blaze of anger in her gaze.

“Have you heard anything?” he suddenly asked.

“Yes!” she answered with spite, “I have: and I don’t wish Arthur to come home and find me here with you: he mightn’t like it.”

“He won’t mind, if it is I, you see.”

“You know nothing about him!”

“Don’t I?”

“Not one little bit! Oh, I am sorry for you — how deluded you are! This fellow, whose friendship you prefer to my love, to amuse whom you have used me like a pawn or a draughtsman, he values you not one sou—”

“Doesn’t he?”

“Not one little sou! All that balderdash about your youth, and about being born the same night, and the shootings, and the long days together, he has forgotten it all years and years ago, he has only used you as his tool—”

“Has he?” asked Shan smiling, though now his brow had collapsed upon the table.

“It is only the truth that I am telling!” cried Rosie. “Your fatuity is surprising! Why, when he and I are married we shall both laugh at you as a poor quixote — often we shall! Don’t you understand, really, that anything like friendship is quite impossible between such as you and such as he? Look at how Mama Gordridge regarded the thought of his marrying me, who have been brought up with them — ! and though he, under the influence of passion, is mad to marry me, you are far out of it: he looks down upon you as something amiable made of mud....”

Shan stood sharply up with a visage all wrenched, all blanched, but very calmly he said: “No, that can’t be true; but even so — give it as true — still there is God in Heaven, who sees.”

“At any rate, here’s off for little Rosie!” she cries.

“No, I’ll keep you till he comes,” said Shan.

“You wouldn’t dare!” — springing up.

“I am a daring one, you know.”

“So I’m a prisoner?”

“That’s it.”

Covering her face, she dropped back sobbing upon her chair.

XXI. SHAN HAS A VISITOR

TWO WEEKS BEFORE this scene the watchmen at Table Mountain signal-station, Cape Town, gazing out in the direction of Rodden Island, saw there going down into the sunset a Castle liner homeward-bound, in whose smoke-room reclined Arthur Gordridge, talking to three eager listeners to the story of sorrows that he told, an Arthur in khaki, meagre more than half-way up the legs, then stout with sudden puff-out, and over the khaki a steamer coat in frieze, for it was cold, and a cap darkening his pallid dark nose — coming home quite alone, for months before this his company, its term of service expired, had returned to Britain.

Though the story that he told was told in phrases that ever fainted and sighed with weariness, fever seemed to glare out of those eyes of his which loomed even owlshly big, as it were two moons of bluebell blue; fever! for when in the middle of his story his servant bore him a glass of wine, he first, on sipping it, groaned, for it was not the wine that he required, then with an eye alight with excitement, crying “this is the third time!” he hurled the wine at the man; and on the man turning in flight, Arthur was after him. But he had hardly run twelve steps when he faltered, turned white, and had to be supported by his friends, who with smooth words induced him to return to his sofa.

All the while the voyage lasted he was the tyrant and the spoiled child of the ship, the tyrant by his peevishness, the spoiled child by his feebleness. The farther North he came, the warmer it became, and then it was his habit, when the coolness of night, soothing his humours, induced a lassitude in him, to muse on the poop, eyeing the spuming pool of milk and moonlight commixed which was the ship's wake and he would then take out Rosie Jones' photograph to glance at, and would say to himself: "I deserve to be nursed now, and to have a decent time"; and he would say: "As to that O'Shannon, I mean to be rather decent to him."

He reached his Brook Street home during the evening of the fourth of June after an absence of almost two years.

His mother was descending a stairway in Buckingham Palace, where she had been munching muffins with a friend, when a messenger handed her a card: Arthur come! She had had an African cable — not from himself, but from a friend — to say that he was "coming," but had not understood from it that he was at sea.... Home in a flurry she hurried, and "Ah, Arthur, thank the good God!" she said, her two hands on his shoulders, though her heart smote her at that pallor under his tan, at that lamp alight in those eyes, and when among his first words she heard those dreaded ones:

"Why have you not brought Rosie up with you?" instantly her heart boded within her that she had done wrong, and now she would have given everything that she owned to have Rosie now to give to her son.

"I am not in Town for the season," she said:

"in fact, this is a year without a season (the queen's decease): but on hearing from a private named Price that he had seen you alive at some farm, I came up to hear what the Whitehall people could do as to seeking for you.... I had no need to bring anyone with me."

"That's all right.... She's all right, I suppose?"

"Rosie? Oh, yes: quite all right."

"I have just sent her a telegram...."

"Have you? she will be glad.... Oh, Arthur, dear, sit down — come, sit with me, will you?" for Arthur, his two hands in the jacket-pockets of a dinner-suit, was restlessly throwing his legs from end to end of a narrow long drawing-room with that straddle of the gait which cavalrymen get; and he threw his face from side to side, whining: “Don’t worry, mother, I’m not very well.... How vilely hot it is in this place!”

“But if you would but sit down, if you could, I should feel easier, dear,” wooed his mother.

“Well, here I am: now tell me everything: what about the man — what’s his name? — O’Shannon.”

“O’Shannon is no more on the estate, dear.”

“Ah? For what reason?”

“Arthur, he stole some money from me.”

“Oh, I say! that’s bad.”

“And about Anne — you haven’t heard?”

“I haven’t heard any earthly thing.”

“Well, never mind now, you will know in time.”

“No, tell me.”

“Well, then, she is dead.”

“Little Anne? Oh, I say! What of?”

“Angina pectoris....”

“Poor chit! She was a genius, that chit... Oh, mother, I can’t stand this, really: don’t you feel it insufferably hot?” — and up anew started Arthur to stalk from hearthplace to hearth-place through the room.

“It is rather hot — so unfortunate!” groaned Mrs. Gordridge with a face of distress: “what is one to do? Arthur, let me take you to a quiet dinner at Lady—”

“Dinner!” cried Arthur in the treble of querulousness: “do I look like dinner at Lady Anybody’s?”

“Arthur, it would be new to you, it would rehumanize and distract you —”

“From what? I don’t want to be distracted; I am already distracted. In fact, I don’t see why I should stand London at all, I shall go straight down to Glanncourt, that’s what I shall do.”

At this Mrs. Gordridge, her eyes hanging abashed on the trouble of that brow, went pale, then, looking down at her hand, smiling, she asked: “When you say ‘straight,’ you don’t mean — ?”

“Yes, I do — to-night, I mean — by the something-or-other-train. I can’t stand this.”

“But, Arthur, you will at any rate wait to take me home, and as I have engagements for four days—”

“And why the smile that conceals some meaning, mother?” he asked, stopping with a sharp eye in his walking.

“I, Arthur! I am far enough from smiling!”

“Mother,” Arthur now said solemnly, “I only hope that everything is all right about Rosie, for you can see that I am hardly in a fit way to be badgered and baulked — ah, I warn you, mother! I am capable of shooting myself or somebody dead....”

Now Mrs. Gordridge’s eyelids closed pale, and out of her heart there rose the prayer: “God give me to be wise now!” — this being, indeed, one of the worst things about war, that, after the war, the sinews of the shooters, used to shooting, are apt to keep on shooting, and we remember how, when the Boers were finally brow-beaten, the sound of the rifle in homicide and suicide was rife in our land.

However, Mrs. Gordridge got Arthur to consent to wait in London for her till the next afternoon, soon whereupon, making an excuse to go from him, she flew to her room, and “Quick, Lucille,” she panted, “we have to go to Glanncourt at once, and forty minutes to get to Paddington in.” She then stole out of the house, and before long was journeying westward, her purpose being, by humbling herself at last to Rosie, to get Rosie back, by prayers, by tears, to Glanncourt, and by elaborate precautions keeping Arthur in the dark as to Rosie’s marriage, so put off the evil day of revelation until he should be better able to bear it. It was not very wise, not very proper: but the case was so desperate as to make her a coward, and, her cunning roused, but roused in a flurry, she flew womanlike, as to a refuge, to the first ruse that was offered to her mind. She did not reach home till after two in the morning, for, on getting to Ebbstow, five miles from Glanncourt, she had to telephone home for a brougham, and then to wait for it, so she then abandoned her thought of calling Rosie to her before daybreak, and, whispering to herself that she had anyway a clear day, fell weary to sleep.

She little thought that Arthur might find out her flight that very night!

Anyhow, in the first hours of the morning a note was sent off up the mountain to Rosie. Rosie was not at home. The horseman brought back the account that Rosie had started out upon the walk to Ebbstow to watch the yeomanry march, and though he rode some considerable distance round the Chase upon the Ebbstow road, he had failed to overtake Rosie. Now, it was already after ten when this messenger returned, and as Rosie’s journey to Ebbstow meant a delay of hours more, a brougham was urgently turned out toward the town, in the hope that it would be hitting upon and bringing her. It did not, however: and when two hours, fevered with a thousand fears, doubts, hopes had gone by, and noon was sounding from the stable-clock, and no sign yet of the brougham’s coming, Mrs. Gordridge, in order now to send another messenger up the mountain, turned inward from the drawing-room window whence she had been watching over The Meadows for the brougham. Now, a moment before she turned about, she had heard a step behind her, and had supposed it to be a servant's; but, as she turned about, her heart bounded into her mouth at the sight of Arthur standing there, staring with a bright eye at her. She dropped upon a chair, panting something at him, her palm on her heart.

“Where is she?” he sharply asked.

“Rosie is out...

“How long has she been out?”

“How long? Not long.”

“Why, then, hasn't she received the wire which I sent her last night? — here it is.”

He spoke with some show of calm, though the wrath with which he flogged his leg was ominous of eruption, while Mrs. Gordridge, for her part, her fingers folded before her, sat quiet with a rocking of the body backward and forward, a motion of one mourning over a burn. She had forgotten that the telegram would still, probably, be lying there in the hall; nor was there any reply to his query: the game was played.

“I will let you know,” she said on broken breaths, “on condition—”

“No conditions!”

“Yes, you are hardly quite well: on condition — that you sit down — and let me lock—”

“Well, here I am sitting down — waiting patiently — sitting down. Now tell me.”

“Arthur, dear—”

“No, tell me. Here I am — sitting down — waiting patiently.”

“Arthur, listen—”

“By Heaven! the very thing I feared that's the very thing I find. She isn't here: for some reason or other she isn't here.... God! the very thing I feared.”

“Dear, you will soon see her” — seated on a stool at his feet, soothing his hands, wetting them.

“Where is she?”

“Not far — Arthur, you have my assurance — believe your mother—”

“But she isn’t here, that’s the misery; she may be in Russia for what I care, if she isn’t here.... Where is she?”

“Arthur, dear—”

“No, tell me: here I am — sitting down.”

“Arthur, dear, have I not said that Rosie isn’t far? really, that should be enough for you: I have sent for her, she is on the road now — coming — near—”

“Where was she?”

“Dear, in Somersetshire.”

“What doing in Somersetshire?”

“Arthur, she was spending a few days with the Marstons.”

“The Marstons? Did she ever before — ? I hope it’s true, mother!”

This he said with a threatening nod, and up now he sprang and ran, she with a pang of panic calling “Arthur!” after him, for not having expected him down for hours yet, she had not as yet admonished the servants to be mute, and, in fact, out of the mouth of the first footman whom he encountered in a vestibule, in a few seconds Arthur knew all.

And there during what was to her an age sat Mrs. Gordridge, all paralysed, waiting upon the silence to utter a sound, gaping at the door-way through which he had gone out; till on a sudden he was once more with her, no longer red, but now most grimly exsanguined, dead but for the life that rioted in his eye, in his right hand a gun, in his left his stick; and “Heartless!” he hissed: a word that withered the heart that heard it.

Ghostly as he, mute, her gaze gloated upon his face, her soul musing upon the fact of the gun —

But not for long: for, as if he had come back only in order to hiss at her that one word “heartless,” almost at once he turned again to go, and she heard him say: “I’ll have her from him....”

Now she found a mouth to shout to him: “Arthur! take care! that man will kill you....!”

“No, I’ll do the killing,” he cried out: “the hound vowed to me....”

“But, Arthur — here! listen! one word!”

“Heartless! A burglar, too! He shan’t have her!” and he was gone, she struggling to her feet to rush after, bawling “Arthur!” but, her feet getting entangled in her gown, down, staggering, she dropped, and now shipwrecked lay on the ground, calling still “Arthur!” and again “Arthur!” after him, though by that time Arthur, bolted out of the house, was on the way to speed down the steep that leads to the Morplepiece.

Thence it was a two-mile climb to the heights, and twice he enquired his way of girls who wondered what he was going to kill, and once, feeling faint, he had to lean against a kiln a little.

It was one of those June noon-days that are like the face of Jove, fatherly, blue-eyed, and broad-boned — more jovial than beautiful, since no breath blew its foliage to make it “strange,” and its cloud-masses, reflected in Fowle’s Lake, floated without motion in an arch of so large an architecture, that Shan, surveying them over his hoe, marvelled in his heart how without pillars it was all upheld. He had been “hacking” (i.e.. hoeing) an acre of potatoes in his field, but, feeling the heat fierce, was now taking it easier, his eye domiciled in cloud-town, and in his mind that hymn —

These are Thy glorious works, Parent of good, Almighty, Thine this universal frame... when he heard the gate-catch jerk, and now down dropped his hoe, and a “Ho!” of happiness hopped out of his heart, spying Arthur: of happiness and surprise! for though it had been everywhere said of Arthur that he “was coming,” Shan had no knowledge that Arthur had left South Africa: but there now was Arthur, flushed and fresh: and “it is finished” was the thought in Shan’s heart, as he ran....

Till suddenly, midway, his eagerness reeled dying, like the eagle pierced in mid-career: there was that severe air, the rifle, that unfriendly eye; and, as he paused, Arthur pelted ten paces to him, and they stood face to face.

Shan’s eyes light-blue, narrow, long, quickly twinkling with kindness and humour, though now with doubt, too, and apprehension, under a broad low brow; Arthur’s darker, large, and now ardent with wrath under an arch of brow: eye to eye they looked.

“You cur!”

“Who? I? Wait — !”

There was no waiting: Arthur raised the rifle, whether to kill, or only to fell, he himself most likely could not have told, and though in two ticks the rifle was lying on the ground, wrung out of his grasp, there remained the stick, a stoutish stick of ebony, which Arthur brought down with so barbarous a brand across Shan’s brows, that at once Shan stumbled backward, and on one bended knee half-lay, half-knelt, upheld by his left arm; the second stroke, delivered with lips venomously fixed and with all the virtue of a man’s arm, felled the poor victim flat; the third stroke splintered the stick into two; and with the stump the others were administered. Arthur seemed never to have enough of it, feebly beating and still beating the bloody head, himself all bloodless. From Shan’s mouth broke and grew a sound, a most lugubrious groaning, and from Arthur, repeatedly, as he feebly beat, a gasp of “shan’t have her”; till now Shan won his weight to one knee, then raised it to the other knee, as laboriously slow as though ground down under a burden, and, still hammered, having manoeuvred himself to his legs, ran staggering, Arthur hatless after. Near the high side of the field, the side remote from the road, stood a shed toward which Shan turned his flight for refuge, and even as they reached this, the beating ceased, Shan pitching sheer beneath a steer's belly in the shed, while Arthur, reeling in a sort of blindness just before he reached it, leaned his shoulder on the doorframe, and there with shut lids remained.

Minute after minute now passed, and never a sound was there, save those of sparrows twittering round, and now and again a groan from the frame on the ground.

Then with the same slowness as before Shan got himself up, took his jacket from a peg, contrived to draw it blindly on. He patted the steer's head, smearing it with red, leaving a tooth on it; and drooping upon it, he smiled foolishly with it, and shook his head at it, and slapped its face with a dead hand, while it mildly eyed him. Arthur, meantime, was leaning on the door-post, silent, till, hearing Shan pass out, he opened his eyes to say: "You shan't have her," upon which Shan stopped with his back to Arthur, a bowed back, a bowed head, and after a minute, without looking round, through blood and rheum he bubbled: "You can have her. She is in that cottage up yonder in the grove under the road. But me you don't see again. I see that you have hardly loved me, nor your heart ever guessed.... But be bringing me to her remembrance a bit, and you, too, may be...

Now he moved away down, stanching his wounds with his handkerchief, and the other saw him stoop amidfield to pick up his hat, and thereupon saw him go through the gate, and down the mountain to the right, and out of sight.

After which Arthur sat for fully half-an-hour at the shed-door, and then, all at once in a heat, was hurrying down the steep to the road, and up the road, and down three board-steps into the bower which surrounded Shan's house.

The door lay open: and there at a table sat Rosie, who, having only a few moments before come back from Ebbstow, hat and gloves still on, had in her hand the mandate from Mrs. Gordridge, which she had found awaiting her, and now was considering it, when, lifting up her eyes, she saw Arthur regarding her; and up she sprang to him, crying: "Oh, I am glad! I was told in Ebbstow that you had come, and you have come au galop to see Shan, that's quite grand of you.... When did you arrive in England?"

"Only yesterday.... I say, Rosie, you are looking awfully well...."

"Married life and balmy airs! You, I see, are looking a bit pale and Boered — not a pun! though I would undertake soon to make you well, if you would deign to come and spend just two weeks up here with Shan.... Think you could manage to squeeze your immensity into a cottage? It is better than tents and battlefields, anyway! and this girl, personally, would not give it in exchange for a score of Glanncourts — the air's so fresh and rich. Sit on this chair before the door, and let me offer you a hospitable tumbler of — shall we say milk? Milk is a beverage in these heavens, nor be they wholly bereaved of honey. No milk? Well, I've got some wine, a kind of wine, half wine, half vinegar, call it garwine or winegar.... None of that even? Glorious idea — a cigarette! No? So what shall I do to please you? Only mention it—"

"You are awfully bright and well, really," said Arthur. "I expected to find you—"

"Peaking and lean? Dreary and drooping? I fain would be! but between this brisk air, the native bacon, married life—"

"But, dear" — he seized one of her hands —

“we have to be quick, if we mean to escape beastly scenes: I have been brutally robbed of you, and I mean now to break through everything—”

“Oh, that’s naughty,” she murmured, her eyes cast down, smiling to herself.

“It isn’t even naughty! it’s a case in which it is even perfectly right!... he shan’t have you.”

“I fear, though, that you will hardly find it easy to take things away from him,” remarked Rosie: “he has rather a grim sort of grip. But it is queer that you didn’t see him in coming up the road! then he would have told you... he ought to be in his field....”

“I did see him,” Arthur said, “and this, as you see, is all that is left of my stick....”

At this she, snatching her hand free, started from him.

“Oh, you struck him?” she asked, and Arthur was far too amazed at the sudden redness of fury that inflamed her, to her very eye-whites, to reply.

“Oh, you dared? You struck him, Arthur?” Rosie asked: “and he, what did he do? Did he fell you to the earth, as he did once before? Oh, don’t tell me that he took it quietly, I shall be so ashamed of him!”

Nearly crying with rage, she trembled throughout, from crown to feet, like the little tongue of a morrisco-bell which is shaken. From the very first, indeed, even when she offered the milk, etc., some nerve of Arthur’s had been aware of a hardness, a sarcasm in her towards him, due to her will of self-retention, and to her jealousy, angry as the malignancy of a gangrene, lest Arthur should come to lord it, or should continue to regard himself as the superior, or the equal, of the man whose flag she flew; and her keenness to make him feel his inferiority, and her despair of wholly destroying, all in a hurry, a point-of-view centuries old in him, added fuel to his fire and fury to her ire. Arthur half stood up, upholding himself with one arm on the arm of his chair, staring, stammering: “I am sorry.... The fact is I am hardly very well....”

“Oh, I am sorry if you are unwell,” retorted Rosie without one sprig of pity, “though that seems to be no reason why you should go about rendering other people unwell. But didn’t he mention anything at all to you before you hit him?”

“No, your husband—”

“He isn’t my husband! Listen to it! You two fellows — most insolently, I must say — after making a bargain as to which of you I was to belong to, as though I was a brandgoose or a brach, have led me a nice dance for nearly two years, and are still at it, it seems; but he, though he has slighted me whom he loves more than his own life, has been true to you, and you have broken your stick on his head. It was your purse-proud mother’s intention to ship me out to the wilds of China out of your way, and I was going, when he, in order to keep me for you, went through a form of marriage with me, after marrying someone else — a grey-head, a greedy, drunken hag, who has sucked the very blood from his being, and you have beaten him with your stick for it. Since then, for nearly two years, I have lived with him, under the same roof, his room and mine on different sides of the same corridor, and all the time he loved me, and more than half of the time I have adored him like the lord of all the Heavens, but I still remain to-day as I was born, and you have drawn his blood, Arthur. Do you imagine that your mother loves you so much as this, or could? Would any father do one half of all this for you? Then when we understood that you were dead, we waited for his wife, the old woman, to die, and she did, and we were just going to be married, when he got to know that you were still alive, and he wouldn’t have me, no, not though it almost made him crazy, and you have cracked his skull with that thick stick.

.. Oh, this would be a bit funny, if it were not so bitter! Just because you possess a few thousand roods of land which people are saying now that you have no real right to.... But why doesn't he come? Where is he, please?"

Tears of passion and pity shone in her eyes, unseen by Arthur, who, leaning now against the door-post looking outward, answered: "I heard him say that he was going away permanently: I hope that he did not mean it...."

"Permanently?" she muttered; then with a shriek of passion: "But men do mean it when they say things! You have no idea what a man is like! He is gone for good!"

One moment afterwards she was torturing her shape on her knees before him, wringing her palms together, beseeching him with a face pierced with an anguish like neuralgia, "Tell me how to find him... life's no good to me without.... I shall just go and throw myself—" and suddenly, before he could reply, was up and gone flying toward the gate, but half-way toward it doubled back to supplicate him with a crying face: "For God's sake, lend me some money, I have got none...."

Arthur's eyes slowly opened; and slowly turning them upon her, he said: "Stay, I'll come—"

And together out to the gate they hastened, down the mountain road, Rosie, however stoutly he strode, still to be found a foot before him...

Some way down some labourers answered to them that Shan had taken the way to the station, and to the station they two hastened — a great way, there to gather that he had taken the 1.8 train to Ebbstow; so, hiring a fly from a farmer, to Ebbstow Arthur drove, five miles, arriving before two; but only to find that Shan had left by the 1.25 for London.

"Just as I thought," Rosie wailed: "he is gone for good!"

"Wait," said Arthur, "we shall find him."

“He is gone to Africa or Australia!” cried Rosie: “I have heard him say that he would.”

“Then, I will find him in Africa or Australia,” declared Arthur.

There was no difficulty as to tracing in Ebbstow the movements of the fugitive Shan: he had first entered Burke’s the chemist to have his wounds dressed, had then drawn to the amount of forty pounds out of the bank, and then had taken the train; after tracing which, there was naught for the two investigators to do, save to luncheon, to send a telegram to Glanncourt, and to wait for the six o’clock train; and gazing down together over the bridge into those brownish Wye-waves, where the white wife beheld only Styx mixed with staring vacancies and abysms of widowhood, he proposed to her to go home, undertaking to find Shan alone, if she would confide in him; but she made answer: “Even if you found him, I doubt if he would come back, unless I was by to beseech him to”; so at six she and he set off for London.

After breakfast the next morning in Brook Street, as he was speaking to her of his plan of action for the day, she suddenly kissed his hands, saying: “You are good; forgive all that I said to you yesterday in the heat of passion, will you? He and I are two poor people of the working-class, who have nothing in the world except each other.”

“You are not poor,” he said: “half of all that I have is this man’s, and the other half, if you will say so, is yours.”

“Well, he knew you more accurately than I,” replied Rosie, “and it was not without grounds that he regarded the Gordridges as grander than kings.”

Arthur now started out for the City, and early in the afternoon returned to her out of the whirlpool’s noise and turmoil with the heartiest presage, like the bird with a branch to the Ark:

Shan had taken a second-saloon berth on the China, to sail at noon on the Thursday! whereon there was nothing to do but to wait two days, during which Arthur went to his bed with an ague, and Mrs. Gordridge, hastening to London to nurse him, heard the whole story of Rosie. "Well, you are an unmarried girl, as it turns out," the old lady observed to Rosie after dinner on the Wednesday night, "and I personally should be glad now, Arthur being in the way he is, if you would be good to him."

"There are no less than two impossibilities against it, Mama Gordridge," replied Rosie: "Arthur undoubtedly possesses too noble a mind to have me now that he knows all; and, secondly, I'd defy any female creature to cohabit two years with Shan O'Shannon as I have, and not find him irresistible. He's as imperious as a rope. One can't swim up Severn, after all, when the river is falling."

"Well, I think that you choose wisely," said Mrs. Gordridge; "I told you before the marriage, that you would be growing fond of O'Shannon, and, you see, I was right: for I always foresee everything."

The next forenoon, though his skin burned with fever, his teeth stuttered with cold, and it was very rough weather, Arthur would take the white wife to the Albert Dock: and after they had waited about half-an-hour on the quay, pigmies pacing beneath that busy burgh which the ship made, there, burdened askew on the queerish side by a bag of brand-new leather, with petty steps came Shan in haste, patches of sticking-plaster fixed on his face, until on a sudden he saw, and started, and stood stock still, and with an underlook contemplated them two: upon which, she, for her part, darted at him, and laughed, and pinched his arm; and as he looked at her, full of her, all his manhood thrilled, hearing near his ear from a full heart breathed, "Bucephalus"; and Arthur added, "Cœur de Lion."

One at one arm of Shan, one at the other, the white wife and Arthur then pulled — away from the ship, and had him in the brougham moving West through Holborn, when on the top of an omnibus the white wife's eye remarked two men talking in a sort of fury: excited, glad, she waved, she hailed at them: it was no good; Shan tried to attract their eyes, Arthur tried: all in vain; Dr. Blood and Mr. Orrock, preoccupied with their quarrel like two wights blind to the precipice's brink, dead to thunder and lightning, took no notice; but just then a rougher rush of wind, snatching off the clergyman's shovel-hat, whirled it quite away upward, turned it to scoff, made light of it, worried it, dropped it; and Dr. Blood, seeing in this the finger of God, following its flight with his eye, while with a bowed back Mr. Orrock in rickety career was critically creeping down to the street to recapture it, saw, as the shovel-hat reached the street, the three in the brougham: so the doctor and the parson, squeezing themselves in, went with them to Brook Street, to take part in all that passed during the ensuing days. They were the days of that gale which raged from the eighth into the twelfth of June, on whose third midnight Shan and Rosie heard it from an old tavern-room, like a garret, close to Grange Court, heard its surgings grow to augustness and roar with a great prolongation of argument, intriguing as though struggling through impeding gross media, like a period of Cicero and the career of Cæsar, then, those struggles lulled, lagrimoso roll low its roar, and go, solving and dissolving itself into mere pleadings, appealings, weariness of bereavement, streams of grieving too drear to dream, and brief last brigues, fatigued intrigues, and musings, last broodings, and musics too weary-sweet to breathe; then again heard it surge and grow to grandeur, and roar through a long contention, like a sentence of Cicero, and roll its roar low, and go, oratory of God. Such was Shan's íó, íó, go it, go it, high Hymen-hymn, and marriage-oration. But when on the fourth midnight they were walking in sight of home, the storm on a sudden was wholly over, all was quite calm, and, casting up their eyes to the sky, they beheld it like some begum-bride brightly arrayed for her bridegroom, all gaudy in veils of gauze with brilliants glistering through from beneath, without any moon or a single cloud around God's throne, only clouds of glory; and pacing up their mountain-side, it was so still, they beheld the poplar and pine-tops about their house standing outlined without a motion against the darkness of the sky, like towering ships that after great groanings far out in the ocean's roarings find their griefs riding finally at surcease, asleep in the port and peace of God; nor in all that calm and darkness was any ray anywhere to be marked, save the star-rays and that ray which rayed out of Shan's house, where Jane, and Pruie, too, who had been warned by a wire to be there, kept wake, awaiting the wedded pair.

The Isle of Lies (1909)

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I.
CHAPTER IL
CHAPTER III.
CHAPTER IV.
CHAPTER V.
CHAPTER VI.
CHAPTER VII.
CHAPTER VIII.
CHAPTER IX.
CHAPTER X.
CHAPTER XI.
CHAPTER XII.
CHAPTER XIII.
CHAPTER XIV.
CHAPTER XV.

The first edition

CHAPTER I.

THE STELE.

PERHAPS ONE'S HAPPIEST manner to begin the history of the remarkable boy whose moral we have to point is to give, as we can, that part of Professor S. S. Reid's diary which has to do with the matter. The professor writes:

I have this morning the tidings that a son is born to Dr. Lepsius, and as the fact may possibly come to prove momentous in the history of experiment, I am about now to jot down just what I was in the way to know of the story.

In the dog-days of '68, close on two years gone now, our bout-at-arms with Theodore III. of Abyssinia came to a close with the capture of Magdala by Napier: and the victory was still in everyone's mouth, when Lepsius one afternoon strolls into my study to notify me that the British Government was about to send out a mission to that country, and that he, Lepsius, was to accompany it in some rôle or other. I was quite surprised, in spite of my familiarity with the manifold activities of this man.

"You going to Abyssinia?" I exclaimed.

"I am," says he.

"But what for?" I asked.

"There are the Jurassic limestones for one thing," he answered, "and you surely know that some more or less valuable MSS., especially Bible MSS., already derive from Abyssinia."

He then proceeded to tell me that in the rage of the Mohammedan invasion of that region in the sixteenth century, the Abyssinians heaped most of their Ethiopian and other manuscripts into a certain museum on Debra-Seena (an island of Lake Sana), where they remain guarded by clerics, who regard them as idol relics. “Abyssinia, then,” said he, “might not be a bad four-months’ abode for a bloke like me; at all events, I am off.”

And off, in some weeks, Lepsius was.... Never let it be said that the doctor was any shade of a scatter-brains! for in my lifetime never did I meet so essential a sage; all the same, I do admit that to some of the heats of Lepsius the word “flighty” has been applied with some meaning, he was ever so fevered, seeming always to keep vastly too many irons in the fire — “Jack of all trades!” I don’t say master of none. The man was tinged with both physics and biology like a Janus-head, was an educationist and an Egyptologist, all in the ardour of the same day. Modern learning — he made that his domain. Of course, his thumping fortune had much to do with such a mental posture and manner of life, for, like the free-lance that he ever was, his relation with the mill of science was mainly honorary. I never met him steaming along the streets, mopping his pink brow, but he was eager to drag me to the meeting-of-council of some society, or to drop at my ear some spanking scientific tidings. Old Lepsius! I fancy that I behold him anew, not a beauty assuredly, with his shortish form, bold nose, and thin lips, his burning straight hair brushed back flat from the forehead, and curled up a bit at the nape! At the time when he started for Abyssinia he was a man of perhaps forty-five, of established fame in the western world, and a hardened old bachelor — I almost said old maid!

What surprises me is that a man like Lepsius, a tender wight at bottom surely, should have let himself become the excuse for bloodshed during this exuberance of his, and should have been led into committing an act which the common man might well consider wonderfully like pilfering — at the spur of a whim! Learning, may be, has a claim to make its own code of morals, but I am convinced that in, say, Madrid, Lepsius would have shrunk with dismay from doing what in that savage country he did with the coolest self-assurance.

The mission reached the town of Gondar at the end of August — a world of mountains now, after a camel-journey of some weeks across the lowlands from Somaliland. By September, Dr. Lepsius had won sufficient favour for his purposes with the viceroy, or ras, and, with his usual rashness, ventured out with only one Choan servant on an ass for Lake Sana, twenty miles south, to examine the MSS., etc.

It appears that in these regions the rainy season is from June to the tail-end of September, so that now it was pouring without pity. However, one forenoon Lepsius comes to the lake, and is rowed, as he related it to me, in a buffalo-hide boat to one of the islets.

On this island was a kind of double monastery, half occupied by sisters, and half by brothers, to which latter Lepsius had a letter of introduction given him by the abuna (or father) of Gondar, the head of the Christian-Coptic Church of Abyssinia; but the scientist's welcome at the monastery was hardly hearty, since, having landed on the island, he had to hang about a whole hour without beholding his hosts. This, however, as it turned out, was owing to no cursedness of the monks, since it appears that, the prior of the monastery having recently died, the monks were even then intent upon the rite of electing his successor. This once over, Lepsius was fairly well received, and soon thereupon was rowed through the rain to the library by two of the monks: those monks, he told me, being dark-skinned carles with crinkled hair all in plaits, and the library being a kind of mosque on another island half a mile from the monastery-island.

Here, then, on this second island, Lepsius abode most of the day, fereting and feasting his curiosity. Onwards from the sixth century of our era Abyssinia, he has told me, was a bold and expansive power, having dealings with India, with Ceylon, with the Greek Empire, and overflowing by far the greater part of Arabia: so that this mosque place was crammed with all the gimcrackery and dust of the ages — scriptures, urns, relics, cartouches, taliput-books, mostly modern and of small importance, but still of interest; and the only thing which badgered Lepsius' peace of mind at being turned loose into these pastures was the continual presence of the two monks who had rowed him over, seeing that they did not leave his side a moment. One of them, he says, was a particularly swagger chap who carried over his cotton garment two falchions in scarlet-morocco scabbards, and his aspect appears to have smacked nastily of the fact that in Abyssinia the Church is burningly militant. Ever and anon he would grumble something to his mate in Amharic — a kind of Arabic lingo with which Lepsius was pretty well acquainted, though his ear lacked ease in striking quite what was said.

Toward sunset he went down some steps to an underground corridor into which a series of grilles and doors opened, having in his brisk fashion already made a survey of the treasures above, and wishing to run over those below while there was still some twilight. Midway in the corridor, at a moment when, as it happened, the two monks were whispering together, he noticed a half-open grille, and passed in, whereat the grimmer of the two fellows stepped sharply up and tapped him on the shoulder, saying, "Not in there!" But Lepsius was already in, and making out that he didn't understand, took another step, and looked about him.

Three sides of this apartment were piled with papyri and many book-like objects dark with dust, together with pictures of saints all painted full-face, whatever the posture of the body, and with idols, weapons, beads, and other suchlike gems and curios. One wall of it, however, was almost bare, and there, in the centre of that wall, hung a little basalt stele, about as thick as one's wrist, and about six inches long; it had a copper cap with an old hole in it, through which passed the banyan string with which it was hung up. Lepsius could see that it was covered with a singular enough mixture of hieroglyphic, hieratic, and demotic figures; and his curiosity seems to have been at once fired to a high degree by this sight, especially when he saw marked on the wall over the stele in the Geez jargon the curious runes, "Riches of Jerusalem."

Meantime, while peering at the little stele, Lepsius with half an eye had observed on the floor, immediately under the stele, a coffin only half covered by its lid, so that he could spy the body of a very old man who looked lost within it — the coffin was so large, and the corpse so small — and at the coffin's foot sat on the floor a gigantic Galla, armed to the teeth, his shield garnished with human hair, these Gallas being, in fact, the blackest and most malignant of the Abyssinian clans.

"Well," Lepsius said, "may I look about?" addressing himself to the milder of the two monks. The answer was, "No, it is the prior's room."

"And who is the dead man?" Lepsius asked.

"The prior," was the answer.

"Who died yesterday?"

"Yes."

"He died here, then?"

"Yes, in this chamber, where he mainly passed his time."

"Why did he pass his time here?" Lepsius wished to know.

"Because," was the answer, "he wanted to contemplate the sacred stele. For fifty years he was poring upon it, and dropped dead before it."

"Oho," says Lepsius, "and what is the history of the stele, my friend?"

“It fell from heaven,” replied the monk; “the prior found it here when he was a very young monk, and hung it there under that picture of the Virgin, who was looking when he found it.”

“Oho,” says Lepsius, “but can’t I approach a little and examine it?” The answer was, “No, the irreligious could not approach it.”

But the irreligious had approached it. Lepsius could already make out two or three of the phrases, could tell that it was mainly an imitation of the hieratic of the nineteenth dynasty, mixed with some intentionally secret writing; and, as he stared at it, he mumbled on absently, saying, “Oho, one can see, one can see, its date; and what is the meaning of those marks on it, then?”

“No one knows,” was the answer.

“And yet you write over it, ‘Riches of Jerusalem’?”

“Yes, for the prior discovered this much, that it tells of the riches of the City of God.”

“He was a learned man, I see.”

“We shall not have another like him! a learned and a saintly man. He made the stele the study of his life, and mined out much of its meaning, for which reason it is to be buried with him.”

“Buried with him?” cries Lepsius.

“Yes, by his own instructions.”

“And when?”

“To-night.”

“Ah! At what hour?”

“At eleven.”

“And where?”

“In the monastery.”

But at this the more truculent of the two monks stepped offensively before Lepsius, blocking his view. The Galla warrior, too, who kept guard over the corpse was eyeing him disagreeably, so Lepsius moved off, and after sauntering through another room or two, started off for the monastery-island, to be at once afresh drenched through by the rain. Darkness had suddenly come.

As he now passed up the steps towards the monastery, he made minute note of everything: a number of boats lay close about the landing-place, with some monks baling them out; from a chapel some way off he was aware of the chaunted vesper-psalm of the nuns.

After a repast with the new prior, a portly man of middle age, he was conducted for the night to his chamber, where for a while he waited, sitting on a bed made of rushes mixed with raw cotton; but at ten o'clock he got up and stole through his door. Lepsius by this time had fully informed himself of the minutiae of the dead prior's funeral, and had resolved to pilfer the little stele.

I think that I never knew quite so insolently plucky a nut as this of Lepsius. His impetuosity is extreme, and his tenacity is extreme; so that whatever happens at any time to fascinate his mind fascinates it in a quite unbalanced manner, to the banning of every other concern in the world. When this blessed stele had once seized upon his fancy as a thing likely to prove a scientific find, his subsequent action was so very in character, that I shouldn't wonder if he went stealing the thing, about to be buried and lost as it was, with an overweening sense of propriety, and perhaps, in setting about it, whispered to himself the word "Science," or perhaps only the word "Lepsius": I don't know.

But no man surely ever rushed into a job bristling with dangers more horrid, for he was alone among all those martial fanatics, and, save for a razor and a penknife, if I am right, quite unarmed.

He crept out of his room into a corridor and down some steps, there being no light apparently in that part of the building, though the place was full of the sounds of busy footfalls and people passing about with lime-torches; and when one of these approached him at a rapid walk, Lepsius had to snatch himself into a kind of carrel, only to find a monk praying in it in the dark, who, at the sound of his entrance, looked round and addressed him: Lepsius droned some mutter in Amharic, and slipped out into an alcove opposite.

He knew very well that he had only to be noticed prowling about in this way to set the whole place in a hullabaloo, and no doubt bring on his instant death; but the floors, covered with cocoanut-fibre, facilitated his flights and escapes, and he contrived to run the blockade to the landing-place. There his ears were aware of a priest baling rain-water from the boat meant to bring over the body of the prior, but so deep was the darkness of the night, that nothing could be seen a yard beyond one's eyes. With elaborate stealths Lepsius stepped down into a boat almost swamped with rain-water, put out the oar, and paddled off for the library-island.

His hope, derived from certain answers already given to his inquiries, was that the corpse might by this time be less closely guarded, that he might thus perchance be able to stretch a clandestine arm to the stele, and then, hastening back with it, steal into his chamber. But when with bare feet he had got down into the underground corridor of the stele and corpse, and had peeped into the prior's room, there still lingered, brooding, the armed Galla. Lepsius was the last man alive to be baffled! He simply said to himself, "Well, the other way, then," went up afresh, towed his boat away from the landing-stage, sat down on a rock, and waited, his ear cocked to hear a sound through the showering of the rain.

Presently over the surface of the lake appeared three throngs of lights approaching — torches made of lime-wood saturated in spirits, borne by the priests; and amid the splash of their oars there floated forth the burden of a Coptic dirge. One by one, however, these torches were seen to cower out, quenched by the shower, and by the time the boats had reached the library-island where Lepsius lurked, not one remained burning. Upon this Lepsius had counted.

The monks landed and entered the mosque.

After some twenty minutes they returned to the quay with rekindled torches, carrying the coffin: and though the largest of the boats was a craft as big as a Red Sea lugger, so overgrown was the size of the coffin, that they were obliged to lay it crosswise over the gunwales aft. Lepsius, himself unseen, could, by means of the flickering torch-lights, see all. He stole along the shore closer to the landing-stage. The placing of the coffin was a longish task; and out into darkness, one by one, cowered the lights, so that no more than two remained burning when the first of the boats pushed off, and the dirge was afresh lifted; and when at last all the boats were abroad on the water, the priests intoned in a complete darkness. Lepsius was then hanging to the transom of the boat which bore the coffin, she towing his length in her track.

He knew that in the monastery a rite had yet to be performed over the prior; he had been told that the corpse would then be exposed for the last time to the looks of the assembled fathers; he was certain, then, that the lid was not so far fastened to the coffin. All he had to do was to lift his weight up on the transom, raise the lid, whip the little stele from the dead bosom, where he had been told that it would be, and bolt with it into the building, to his bed. They couldn't see him; the chaunting should drown any chance sound which he might make: and he felt secure, save for one vital fact — he could not swim; he would have to hang on to the boat till it came to the monastery landing-place before he could attempt to make his escape.

Midway across, judging the moment come, he raised himself cautiously up; one stiff arm held up his weight on the transom, while with the other hand he groped, grasped the lid, tried to lift it. Lid wouldn't stir: it was fastened.

Another man might now, perhaps, have renounced the attempt, not knowing what string next to pull; it was in just such a plight that Lepsius was likely to show fight.

The man's a born theorist: would never dream of abandoning a conclusion based upon reasoning, because, perhaps, appearances should happen to combat it; and he had already reasoned that the lid was unnailed. He raised himself still further, felt with his hand over the surface of the lid, and was soon reassured, seeing that the priests, in order to keep the two pieces together during the passage, had tied two cords of banyan-twine bodily about lid and coffin; finding which, Lepsius dived into his pocket, took out a penknife, and cut the cords, deeming that the monks, when they saw the cords cut, the stele gone, would set it all down to a miracle of God. By this time the boats had floated the funeral-hymn pretty close up to the monks' home.

Lepsius could now easily insert his fingers between lid and coffin, and, on doing so, found what he had opined, that the stele had been slung round the dead neck by its string; so, manoeuvring with the fingers of his left hand, he managed to urge and win this string upward from under the dead head: and he had begun to draw forth string and stele, his fingers being still within the coffin, when the poor man's stiff right arm, weary of his weight, gave way under him with a shock, whereat he, in an involuntary movement to check his fall, caught the coffin-rim. It was a disastrous business: the blessed coffin tilted, and slid with a sideward dive into the water, while Lepsius, having clean lost his hold, found himself adrown in the deep, as an outcry arose among the crowd of monks.

Lepsius splashed about, catching at the vacant air; but even in the very plight and fix of his death his reasoning mind was not drowned. He judged that he must now be very near the monastery, so that if he could find even a minute's support in the water, he might by such means manage some way to come at safety; but the boats had forged on well away beyond him, and there was no making out anything in that thickness of blackness. There was, however, one hope — the coffin: for, though he could not see, he knew perfectly the course of its sideward dive, and it was assuredly only the coffin, or the coffin-lid, which, if he was to find salvation, could save him. He quite well knew the science of swimming, though no master of the art: so, taking care to keep his lips closed, he made a few strokes, sinking and rising indeed, but moving, and his strokes proved in the duly right course, for very soon now he found himself on the coffin-lid, the little basalt stele hanging still to his forefinger by its string.

Still awash and struggling, he began to urge the board toward the shore. The hubbub of monkish tongues had now come to land, while a number of them had rushed out of the monastery, all carrying torches, with outcries, so that the landing-stage was now in a nice state of commotion. Lepsius, in the gloomy deep, steered his struggles in a changed direction, making for another spot of the shore, though he does not seem to have known what he was to do when he got there; but his feet touched bottom in a minute, and at the same time he entered the region of the off-shine of the lights, which showed up his white visage, whereat at once a perfect hullabaloo of howls broke out from the priests, and they all dashed forward to catch him, foremost among them being the fierce monk of the daytime, with his sword flashing, and the new prior, and the huge black fellow.

Lepsius scrambled up some rocks, and started slantways away from the throng of lights toward a wing of the building; and as the priests appear to have had no firearms, it became an affair of darting, Lepsius being a fairly nimble fellow, though, I fancy, without any wind to speak of, and already very weary. However, he reached the monastery-wall, and hastening along it, happened upon a small doorway, into which he darted, slammed the door, and was away anew through darkness; whereat the monks ran round to the front, and scattering there, rushed with rekindled torches in all directions through the monastery, scouring it for the fugitive.

Well, a scene of sufficient wildness seems to have ensued. Lepsius, divining that the monks would leave the door which he had slammed in their faces to fly to the front, ran back to the door; but his slam had locked, he could not open, it. So back afresh he turned, ran to the bottom of the corridor in which he found himself, and now heard the sound of the onrush of many runners. Happily, it was no longer a question of legs and lungs alone, but of eager, quick wit as well, and here Lepsius was in his element. He saw that he could only rescue himself by hiding, and that he could only hide by continual wise movement. On hieing thievishly up some steps he heard more pelting feet behind him, but he had the advantage of being in shadow, while his hunters were well lit up, and away he went again, choosing his way with good instinct; only, the priests had split up into such an intricacy of pickets, that he should have possessed six sets of wits to elude them. Still, he did for no little while elude them, guided not only by their lights, but by the sounds of the groups, their faint footsteps and outcries: till on a sudden one of those aids was cut off — that of sound — when out roared the abbey-bells, drowning everything else. Just afterwards, he was running down a corridor when behind him he saw coming a bunch of torches; there was no harking back this time; so, hoping to hit upon some door or side-passage somewhere ahead, forward he sped, his wind about done for now, and his wits all bewildered and badgered by the loud bedlam and brabblement of the bells throughout the building. At the corridor's end his course was stopped by a wall with what he took to be a door in it, and a cocoanut tapestry hung before it; there was no side-passage anywhere; the door was fixed, and his hand, feeling behind the tapestry, could find no handle; the throng of torches, too, were now trooping down the corridor towards him, and he thought himself dished and taken. However, he found by touch that the door, too, as well as the tapestry, was of cocoanut-fibre, not a door at all, but a mass of matting fastened over an opening; and inasmuch as the corridor was long, he had time to snatch his shaving-razor and slash a rent in the tough stuff, so that when the monks arrived at the spot they must have been astonished (if they had spied him) to find their man vanished. Lepsius says that he next hastened over a species of bridge or hanging gallery, at the end of which he hacked a hole in another door, got himself through that as well, and was away ardently again, no more caring whither, through darkness, when all at once he was in the very midst of a lot of people, of a flood of light, for he had pitched through the doorway of a chamber before ever he could check his flight. This chamber was full of beds, for which the people in it must have been making ready when the pealing of the bells had flurried them; they were all women, as Lepsius saw at once, all half-undressed, with their hair floating loose; the two door-mattings through which he had slashed his way were manifestly the doors which separated the monastery from the nunnery; and at the apparition of this white man among them, that multitude of women whooped out one unanimous yowl, which Lepsius tells me he is not going to forget. Out they rushed pell-mell, clutching their garments about them, he after them — with the grave consciousness meantime in his eye-corner of a big floor-bed on fire, for one of the calabash-lamps had been dashed to the floor in the out-rush, and how the whole show, built mostly of touch-wood, was not burnt to the deuce was, he asserts, a wonder. After a little Lepsius pulled up and listened: all was still — for the simple reason that the priests would not at once enter upon the part of the place sacred to the nuns, and presently coming to a staircase, he sped down, and soon found himself out in the open, unpursued. Running now round the rim of the islet in search of a boat, he heard all round about the shores a buzzing sound on the lake, the cause of which he was unable to imagine, and when, having found a boat, he paddled away, this sound swelled upon him, until he was all in the thick of it — a host of tongues hubbubooing, not in Amharic, but in Ethiopic; not monks, then, but chiefs, or dejamatshs, with their troops, who, at the call of the bells, had come to beset the islet with a cordon of boats; and Lepsius declares that he passed through the thick of them, thanks to the darkness and the rain, by something of a miracle. After this the banks of the lake were not far off; and there, having made rapid paces for the deeps of a forest, and presently feeling himself safer, he dropped to the ground, giving out.

Toward morning, it being still pitch dark, the Englishmen at Gondar who composed the mission were startled by the bombardment of the place set apart for their abode: for the priests and natives, failing to find Lepsius, had posted northward to seek vengeance upon the mission; whereat the British, in danger of their lives, were obliged to barricade their doors and defend themselves; and before the intervention of the ras was able to reach the residence, three Abyssinians were shot, so that this matter of the basalt stele had something of a grim beginning.

Not till six days later did Lepsius succeed in coming up secretly with his comrades, after seeing the lion and the hyrax, and a score of escapades; and on the sixteenth morning they all started eastward and coastward under an escort of the ras. The terror of the anger of England was, of course, extreme at the moment in the mind of the Negus and his Court, or it might have gone ill with Lepsius and his companions. However, all's well that ends well; nothing graver than threats came about, and Lepsius, having his basalt stele, could afford, I suppose, to grin his grin.

CHAPTER II

MOLLY O'HARA.

PROFESSOR S. S. REID'S history thus continues:

Well, I saw old Lepsius very shortly after his return, when he showed me the little cylinder of basalt, and related to me for the first time, not the last, the details of his adventures. He was blithe and fit, if a bit bothered in mind about the three shot Abyssinians, and about the drowning of the aged prior's body, due to his rage of research.

"And how about the stele," said I to him; "have you made out the meaning?"

"I am going to," was his answer.

"I suppose it is worth the pains?" said I.

"Reid," says he, "it would be worth the pains, if all the Orientalists in the world applied their wits to nothing else than that one thing."

"What makes you think that?" I asked.

"Well, but haven't I already read part of the thing?" says he. "True, it is no cartouche of Darius, nor Rosetta-stone; its date can't be earlier than the thirteenth century, and not only is it the oddest mix of Memphitic with hieroglyphs, but, what is really remarkable, this Coptic stone is the record of an Indian incident. Its comparative-philological value will hardly be high, perhaps, but I am convinced that, once deciphered, it will prove a priceless document from the historian's point of view."

Well, I wished him joy of his new toy, and we said adieu for that time.

Then for some few months I did not see much of Lepsius, nor, I imagine, did anyone else of his world, till his seclusion began to be remarked upon by one and another of the gossips. “Where was Lepsius, what was he pottering at at present, why the father of lies...?” and so on. On three or four of the occasions when I called upon him at his Hanover Square house, I found him looking far from so well and sprightly as usual, nor did the good fellow give himself the pains to hide from me that I was somewhat heavy upon him. I understood that he was in the grip of a fit of study — a certain grimness of his looks and gauntness of his face informed one of so much — and that in that same little stele lay the secret of this too great zeal. By this time the blessed stele had been reproduced and distributed among the savants everywhere, and it may be that a race was being run in its deciphering, I don’t know; but one thing was obvious, it made Lepsius lean many days, so that says Matthews to me, “serves him right for picking and steling, there’s some black spook in the basalt thing that’s paying him back, and making him its victim”; and, in truth, I never saw such a thing, for one by one Lepsius threw every social, every scientific obligation to the winds to give himself day and night to this one object. Such, however, was the man: whatsoever his hands found to do, he did it with a fraction more than all his might or right. Then all at once I learned that he had fallen ill and had gone off to his castle in Galway, from which region, after some weeks, he once only wrote me a few words.

On a sudden one morning, say ten months after his coming back from Abyssinia, Lepsius presents his old phiz before me, looking as brisk and light as you like, with a smile on the thin lips. He had got back from Ireland only the day before, and, after some gossip, said I to him, “Come now, one can really see that we have laid bare at last the secret of our basalt stele.”

“Do I look like it?” he asked rather sorrowfully.

“So I thought,” said I.

“Just failed, sir! just failed!” sighs he, tossing up his hand.

“Tell me about it,” said I.

“That’s all I’ve got to say,” says he; “I’ve only just failed. The epigraph, as you know, consists of signs of very diverse dates, with a quite hierogrammatic vowelling, but Memphitic aspirations, and a jumble of true idiographs and true rebuses. Well, within five months I had deciphered it all — every syllable — save fifteen signs, making, I think, three words at the very finish, which are purposely ‘secret’; but, as it chances, those three are the important ones.”

“That’s hard luck, certainly,” said I; “but why, then, are these three of such particular importance?”

“You know,” said he, “that the stele is the record of an accumulation of riches heaped up somewhere by a host of Hindu princes during the period of the Mohammedan deluge — this where and when is exactly what remains dark. Fix place and date, and you have sextupled the value of your stele as a piece of history, quite apart from the pile of lucre in question, supposing it still to exist.”

“Well, that’s tantalising,” I said. “Of course, Thibaut has seen it?”

“You may bet,” was his answer. “Who hasn’t seen it? They have all seen it. But the fellows can’t make it out! I question if any one of them has read as much of it as I have. Reid, there’s not one single living man who can do it!”

“So much for stolen goods, then,” said I. “Still, you seemed to me a good deal more like your old self just as you came in, quite a youthful step and jaunty air, I thought! so I made sure...”

He laughed, saying, “Well, perhaps you are right, for I am relieved, and I have reason.”

“How do you mean?” I asked.

“Look you,” says he, “I am going to read every syllable of the writing on that stele.”

“You said just now that you couldn’t,” said I.

“I am going to, though,” says he, “for it can be done, if not by me, if not by any living man, still it can be done; and if I look relieved it is because I know the means of doing it, and because, two nights since, lying in my bed, I suddenly decided to use them.”

“Very good,” said I, swallowing my puzzlement; “and what are the means?”

“I am going, Reid,” says Lepsius, “to make a man who will read the secret.”

Quite at a loss to make out what the deuce he would be at, no doubt I smiled, for he added quickly, “No, don’t smile in that fashion, as if you hadn’t known me until to-day, since I assure you quite seriously that I can and will successfully accomplish this job.”

“The making of a man?” said I: “those are your words.”

“The making of a man,” says he, “who will not merely read the rebus, but do it without difficulty — without effort.”

“Quite so, Lepsius,” said I, “for though you choose to express yourself in terms of x, I am quite sure that in due course some explanation will be offered by you of the matter which you meditate, and of your meaning when you speak of ‘making a man’ to read this stele.”

“Lord,” exclaims Lepsius, “what a speech! How sweet the smile, but how icy the meaning! as if I were some rash, fantastic talker. No! at present I haven’t the time to go into prolonged explanations, moreover doubting Thomas ought to be tortured; but in about four days I shall probably lay my plan fully before you, when I shall have seen the initial stages of it well under way: and meanwhile, I invite you to take part with me in watching the accomplishment of these stages.”

“Where?” said I.

“You come,” said he.

“To the end of the world,” said I, “if you are serious and scientific.”

“I am quite serious and strictly scientific,” says he.

Well, I went with him. First we drove to his club in Piccadilly, where we took two seats at a window to look down upon the passers on the pavement beneath, as to whom Lepsius remarked that we might have to keep an eye on them for two, three, four hours, and — did I mind? “No, didn’t mind,” I replied, feebly chewing my foolish feeling. However, after half an hour of this watch, he changed his mind, said that that was hardly the proper place for his object, and suggested that we should drive to Westminster Bridge, if I would. I should, I said: so thither we drove, and there by the parapet of the bridge we stood, under the July blaze of the sun, two hours. I was at first simply amused by this open-air sentry of two venerable persons like ourselves, then I became a little vexed. However, I stuck to my task, while of the river of people that passed by every one stared at us two standing stupidly there, Lepsius speaking of everything except of what had brought us into this exhibition, mainly, I remember, of the necessity, by a law of probability, that every variety of human type should move past us within a number of time-units equal to the number of type-varieties which exist in the city. At last, when it was close on two o’clock, he stopped suddenly in his talk, and pointed.

“There, I think,” he says, “comes the right age, the right race, the right trade, the right body and being — the very lady.”

It was a passing woman at whom he pointed, a woman of the lower orders, with black hair, black eyes, high cheek-bones, very cheaply dressed, but not unclean, long in the leg, lean and fit, some twenty-five years old. Her nose was not red, her teeth were regular. She was going, under a heap of soiled clothes, toward the Surrey side, and one could make quite sure that she was an Irish washerwoman.

Well, Lepsius stepped out and addressed the woman. She was startled! I heard her say, "Sure, then, it isn't me that has the time to be showing your worship around the town this day."

I remained waiting at the parapet, absolutely astonished, much amused, while Lepsius walked on with the woman, talking pressingly, quite a confab, one could see, taking place between them, he all suave insistence, the woman curtseying, till, presently turning, he beckons me to come. So I ran and overtook them, to find them already fast friends; and Lepsius effusively introduced me to "Miss Molly O'Hara."

This woman turned out to be the heartiest, best soul in the world, and in some half-hour we had won from her the whole simple history of one who was orphaned and friendless, save for a sister, a fruit-seller, who lived at Ballihooly. In the course of our discourse it was discovered that she had never visited the Tower, the Crown Jewels, nor the whispering-gallery at St. Paul's, so we soon got from her an engagement to meet us on the Bridge the next day, in order to go with us to inspect these glories. She showed us the slum and the house in Southwark in which she occupied a room, and we parted.

Well then, the next day, at one o'clock, behold Molly standing in holiday garb with her landlady for guardian, and the pair of professors before them with doffed hats, like characters in an opera! We had lunch in a restaurant, and I spent a pestilent day in the "chamber of horrors" and other suchlike places, winding up with a play in the evening; after which, at about midnight, we sent our ladies home in a cab, and Lepsius, coming back to my house with me, disclosed to me that night the design that underlay his conduct during the last two days, so that we were still talking in my study when the dawn stole in. When I said to him that I had well earned his secret, and asked what in the world he meant to do with this Molly O'Hara, his answer was, "I mean to make her read my stele for me."

"Quite so," said I, "but then, Lepsius, you persist in speaking to me in riddles."

"I mean to marry her," says Lepsius.

I was so startled, I couldn't help crying out a "No!"

"And why not?" says the doctor coldly.

"Oh, Lepsius," I couldn't help saying, half laughing, and half shrinking with reproach, "this is ridiculous, this is absurd."

"Ridiculous enough, certainly," says he, "but very far from absurd. We differ there."

"But, Lepsius," said I.

"Pooh, man," says he, "don't be excessive; there's no law to prevent me taking a female to the altar, if I like, and, as to the particular lass in question, if it isn't the right of men like you and me to look at facts in their true light, where's the use of us? Molly O'Hara is a better human being than I, you may bet, with all my learning, sound from her topknot to her toes; I don't doubt she will make a pretty fairish wife — and a most splendid mother."

"Well, I never was so astonished," I said.

"That," he answered, "is due to the fact that you have not yet acquired a scientific interest in my motive, for as soon as ever you have, your interest will quite quash your astonishment."

"Well, I am all ears," says I: "what is your motive?"

“You know, Reid,” was his answer, “that whatever else I may or may not be, I am by nature an educationist; the world calls me educationist, and with justice, if a lifetime’s work and warmth are worth ought; and you know, too, my notion that no son of Adam so far has ever been educated, or been half educated — that education is an affair of the future. Well, my thought, cherished for many years, and now brought to a head by this stele, is to turn out by certain quite sure modes of education, a man, or why not a woman? who shall be not so much a man as a kind of — god. The methods, however, have to be such, that I should not venture to employ them upon another man’s boy, nor, unless the child were in my absolute power from a very early age, would they be of any use. You now observe where my Molly comes nicely in: the first needful work for a man who would build a mansion or a fane is to make sure that his marble and beams are at least good.”

“I see,” said I: “given fair materials to start with, you undertake what you say.”

“Aye,” says he, “and without so much as the shadow of a doubt as to the result.”

“What an enterprise!” I cried. “But as to the means.”

“The means,” says he, “will be simple enough, being based purely upon the known fact that human beings are what their environment makes of them. We know that an English child, abandoned by its guardians in China, will grow up, hardly a mental Englishman, but a mental Chinaman: never by any effort will he be able to row like a Cambridge-man, or do business like a jobber; but he will, without effort, make finer porcelain than could be turned out by the life’s devotion of ten thousand Cambridge-men or jobbers; it is a question of environment, of the mental hue and house about you. Be sure that every brat born into ancient Athens was straightway an artist, and if children to-day were born into a world in which everybody as a matter of course played violins with perfect skill, then every average child would without conscious effort be a pretty perfect fiddle-player — and, indeed, is so in some regions of the Bas-Pyrennees. It is a question of environment.”

“Quite so,” said I, “and, if you add heredity—”

“No,” says he, “let one get on; what I am trying to tell you is that the faculties of a human child’s mind and body can be made to stretch a hundred miles — almost indefinitely — I half said infinitely — according to the ideal, the standard and life-idea, that he finds about him; and I should doubt almost any limit which you chose to lay down to the possible activity, exactness, and acumen of the human mind and senses; we here are limited merely by habit, by the iron rod of mean ideals. Primitive man in his atmosphere of reindeer could run very like a deer; he had his hound’s scent, could speed his spear with the sureness of a machine — and without toil, that’s the point, without dreaming that he did anything astounding. A modern British child, abandoned in Africa to that same atmosphere and life-ideal, would also run like the devil, shoot like a machine, track like a dog; born into a world of gods or godlike beings, he, too, would in general be stretched into a god or godlike being; if he believed that everybody about him could read rebuses without effort, then he, too, would read them without effort. It is an affair of environment.”

“Quite so,” said I; “one has no difficulty in following you so far, for even monkeys that have lived long in an environment of men become manlike, and get to do many things; so, given your ‘environment of gods,’ your undertaking looks all in bloom. But where, then, do you mean to find this environment of gods? On the moon? In Venus?”

“Oh, as to that,” says Lepsius, “surely that much is simplicity itself. The environment may be real or it may be merely imagined. A child placed in isolation may be made to believe in an environment, a world, which does not exist, and so long as he never comes into actual contact with the imperfect world, and has no suspicion that it is not a perfect one, you will have all the elements of success: his life-ideal and standard, his idea and atmosphere, will remain quite unaffected by the actual world round about him; and having been made to conceive man as a god, he will not himself be vastly inferior to his conception.”

“By George,” I cried, “I see what you are at!... But, my friend, aren’t you preparing a nice little shock for some poor devil of a child, supposing he ever does come into contact with his actual, as distinct from his fancied, environment?”

“May be,” says Lepsius, with a shrug; “or may be the shock will be to the environment, not to the child— ‘so much the worse for the coo,’ as old Stephenson said; but really, Reid, that’s looking too far forward for me; the practical point for us is to make out the meaning of our stele.... Lord! it is broad day, I’m away.”

Such is something of the gist of my talk with this radical mind that morning. I can’t recall a hundredth part of his ratiocinations, but when he had finished I was convinced. I made him stay till with our own hands we had found and cooked some coffee on my tripod, whereupon the doctor went home.

As to the end of this business, I have already, under September 13th, 1869, recorded the doctor’s marriage with Molly O’Hara in the church at Lambeth. As usual with him, Lepsius has given himself up heart and soul to the grip of his caprice, the married pair going off at once to his Galway castle, where, for the past twelvemonth, they have lived. Some months since I received tidings that Lepsius was in a fair way to be a parent, and that he had then leased the island of Shunter (one of the uninhabited islands of the Hebrides), which he was busily preparing at a crazy cost for the habitation of the child shortly to be born. Now this morning comes the joyful news that a boy was actually born about two weeks ago, and with it the gloomy news that our poor good Molly is no more. She died of milk-fever five days ago, and it had been better for the good woman not to have passed over Westminster Bridge just at that particular hour of that day twelve months ago. However, so it was to be. The fellow who is to read the famous stele is to be named Hannibal... etc., etc.

CHAPTER III.

THE ISLE OF LIES.

IF WHAT HAS so far been given by Professor Reid be read as a sort of prologue, nearly nineteen years may well be passed over in silence, till, patching artfully into one a number of letters of Dr. Lepsius to the professor, we watch what then befell. The doctor writes:

The bubble's burst then. We two, Shan Healy and I, have passed over to the island of Barra in the boat, this being the first time for over seven years that I have left the shores of Shunter; and at Barra we now are, my head bound in a handkerchief, aching, and this same fond Shan Healy looking as sad-hearted as a man handed over to be hanged. We really lack the grit for the moment to go to the mainland, or to take any course to get the matter looked into. But you, Reid, will do what you can at once. I am sure the police should be disposed to take an interest in it, if you can make them know the peril implied both to the public and to the poor fellow himself. And there can be no mistaking him! Middle-sized, swarthy, kind of dusky sallow, blackened over cheek, chin and lip by a bluish shade of hair which he would oftentimes shave twice a day — he's so mighty hairy; and by the smile you should know the beggar — that cruel smile which hardly departs from his lips, and those dark eyes, with a glance, Reid, just so wild and sharp, I assure you, as the glance of the rupicapra gazelle. For the rest, no jacket, rough shirt of bauge-like stuff — but where's the good? No police could ever get nigh him, I suppose. He's gone, perhaps he's drowned — he may be, I doubt it; but God knows. On the sands of the little bay at the north a lady's handkerchief has been found; can't tell how it or she came there.

My friend, it was just on his nineteenth birthday, the 21st of July, that, strange to say, it was to happen; the day which I had long determined in my own mind as that on which I should present him the little stele to read.

All was as usual the evening before; we ran the usual race. For the past two years, you know, his highest ambition in life has been to be able to beat me at running — I, a poor old wreck of sixty-four years! I believe that this was his great dream and hope of glory. For four years an almost daily race has taken place, and Mr. Hannibal has once or twice come gallantly nigh victory, but has never won. Well, at 7.30 p.m. this eve of his birthday, down he bounds from his study, and stands in the castle courtyard, waiting for me to come, with the impulse, I dare say, to dart away pricking in his high health. The climate of these Outer Hebrides is a great deal too humid to be ideal; the ground is mostly of gneiss, too shallow for much culture, so drammach, with some barley, potatoes, and buckies, have formed the main part of our maintenance, apart from what provisions Shan Healy has brought over in the boat from Barra once every four months. But on this thin gruel my man has greatly thrived; is fully grown now, having the shoulders of a man, but a shape as limber as a Grace, sir, and about as supple as any greyhound pup.

Well then, aware that he is below waiting, I pull myself together now, put a bit of go into my gait and glance, and down I go to him; together we stand at the gate of our little home — alas, for the last time — my grey head reaching little higher than his shoulder, Reid, for the old spine bows a bit now, you know; and from the kitchen Shan Healy looks up to watch the race for the thousandth time, while away in the west the sun is going down all in a wild of clouds and glories, as often in this wet place. The sea is dead, just lapping the beach in a weary way; the sky grey, with a curlew or two skirling under it. It gives a little relief to live it over again....

There then, we stand, ready to renew the old, old trial of thews. You know that it has ever been my policy to speak as few words as possible to this creature, so now I only say to him, “Well, ready?”

“Ready, sir,” answers my man.

“Then one, two — Three!”

We are away, he to the left, I to the right, the goal of the race being a little flag-staff standing on the sands to the north of the island, two miles off, and so placed that the boy going over the east shore, and I over the west, we should run about equally far, the castle, our starting-point, being right at the rim of a bluff of rock at the south of the island. A very few instants after we start, we are quite hidden from each other behind the saddle of the hill, which, being all hard rock just by there, makes hardly any record of the foot-prints of this part of the race. So now, no sooner has my man lost sight of me than I pull up, and pant, and wipe my old brow, and turn back, just in time to catch a glimpse of the flying heels of Asahel going thirteen to the dozen round a corner — a sight, Reid, fit to make soft the eyes of an artist at so much charm of form, and such a pelting puissance of swiftness. Well, I imagine that you have already heard the rest of the business, how I climb back at my leisure to the ridge of the hill, where Shan Healy makes me the wink which means that the mare is ready, and how I descend to the bush in which she is trained to await me without budging, and take her quietly in my hand to the entrance of the tunnel, where I mount and am away. You may be aware that what we call the tunnel is a sort of gut or gorge, which, half natural, and half due to my re-organisation of the features of the island during the fellow’s first youth, was specially arranged for the purposes of this race. It runs pretty straight across the island, from south-west to north-east; is thick with peat-moss, so that hardly a sound of the mare's hoofs is to be made out in it, and is fairly shut in by bushes at both ends. So, having galloped straight across to the north-east end, I get off, give the mare her hint to go back to Shan Healy, dive sharply and quietly through the growth of leaves, and am off like the devil afoot for the goal, only some seventy feet distant, but still hidden from me behind a bluff of rock: and as my right hand claps the flag-staff, with the wild eyes of a hart Hannibal darts into view, to fling his flying impetus at the post — a good half-minute or so too late.

No change in the smile, but a shadow now in the eyes, and I know just how my man is meditating in his head, thinking in himself, "It is so, then, that 'Man' can run, and how far beneath Him must I be, when this old being, who is one of 'Man' can beat me, a youth, can beat me always and completely at running and at all else": for it was never so much with me, I'm sure, that the fellow fought for victory as with "Man," those angels and giants inhabiting the sun-set of whose existence he knew, whom eye of his had never viewed, at the idea of whom in their lurid rule over nature his soul swooned with selfdisdain.

Darkness was beginning to fall rapidly, the winds to pipe up a bit, as he and I together strolled back homeward in silence all over the western shores, upon which the waters were just moving themselves to moan and spume. I willed it so always, for along the eastern shores, where I was believed to have passed, there was ever a certain absence of foot-prints! And Mr. Hannibal often seemed to have the knack of seeing in the dark.

Have I done well? Have I done right? Never did a question of that sort arise in my mind till within the twelve months gone, when I have had to ask myself, "Have I, who forgot nothing, forgotten one thing — one thing needful?" God Almighty forgive His faulty ones. I am an old man now, with the back bowing down, and a head of white hairs, meekly aware of my own weaknesses and aches....

You know, my friend, something of the kind of life that during eighteen years nearly has whiled itself away on that island of delusion: like the shadow of a vapour it is vanished now. Not without the sacrifice of my career did I tackle it, Reid: but because of the thousand eyes and the acrobat activities of mind by which alone it could be accomplished, the years have been so packed with interest, and have passed so far from unhappily, that though the task has too soon done for me, yet when I look back over them they look to me more like two years than like eighteen; and, if after all one's travail, one could only be certain that the work has been truly good, that one has not somewhere mishandled and bungled, then one could go to bed. Indeed, in some points, there need be no fear as to the meeds of my toils, for in his intellectual and physical features at least there breathes on the earth to-day (if he still breathes!) the highest human feat, a peerless being, at whose feet all the peoples of this planet may very well kneel, and wail because of him, crying, "Here is what we might have been."

But oh, the web of imposture to which this being owes his soul! He is the child of lies — and I am his father. At every moment of his life, from the age of four and before, the fellow has known my mould. Nothing was left undone, nothing for me was a bore, or more than I could afford. You know that his books alone cost me a sum of more than £14,000: for, owing to my purpose that his notions of the soul of "Man" should grow from his study of only the most glorious of human works, and owing to the fact that even those works as they stood would never do for those pure eyes, his whole library was formed solely of purged volumes, specially prepared for him, almost before he opened his eyes upon this world; and when he was old enough to study them, it was sown into his skull that only men made of very poor stuff ever wrote books. And so in everything; everywhere the same whip of deceit: the mass of principles, for instance, which we call mathematics, due to the shrewdness of fifty thinkers, adding and adding, each of them, to the achievements of the past, was for Hannibal, his books were so doctored, the discovery of a single ordinary wit, a certain “Peter Pitt,” who, as I had to give the lad to believe, lived in the ancient ages. His study of history, above all, was minutely nursed: wide, yet much pruned. The story of the ingenuity, zeal, and success of masterly adventurers like Alexander, Cæsar, Napoleon, he knew by heart: but he had no suspicion of their chutes; doesn’t even now know that Cæsar was assassinated, nor that Napoleon was plucked down at last, so that their victoriousness and force remain measureless in his imagination. He knew well the proportions of the pyramids of Shufu and Shafra, but he was not allowed to know how many multitudes, nor how many moons, were used to build them. And so on. It was dropped into his ear at a very early age that among men some few may be born with feeble bodies and wits, that these are called “idiots,” and that poor Shan Healy, who in reality is a rather sharp chap, is one of the feeblest of these: so Shan has always passed with us under the name of “The Idiot.” As to myself, Hannibal now at the age of nineteen cherishes, if he lives, a belief, ploughed into his brain by ten thousand stratagems, that I can shoot like doom, can swim like a fish, can run like a roe, can watch like a dog, can see like an eagle; and that this skull is the dome of all skill and of all wisdom.

Frauds. But the outcome, I say, is (or was I) without doubt a success, something of a success. What the father feigned to be, that the lad was led to be. I fancy that an average acrobat, after regarding some of the pranks of this young man, would be asking from what moon the beggar had gadded; he has a damnable habit of chucking about little dynamite or other bombs, which he turns out himself, and carries in his pocket — five, ten times a day for years have the curlews heard the burstings of this turbulent being's play — and I am pretty sure that any other runner than he would long since have been shattered to the deuce by it. As to his mere knowledge, it is of a vastness which you would certainly call marvellous, though to me, who know the cause of it, it is hardly so: for if, for instance, he knows a good deal of most languages from Japanese and the Dravidic dialects to Portuguese, it is because he never, I think, forgets a word or thing which has once come within his consciousness, and so has learned a language within some weeks. I remember to have heard it said that Lord Macaulay could repeat word for word a book once read, a statement the truth of which I beg leave to disbelieve: but, even if true, his lordship differed from Hannibal here, that Hannibal, I imagine, is not quite clear with regard to the meaning of “forgetting”; I never heard him utter such a word; certainly, he never heard such a word escape my lips. Forgetting is, in fact, mainly a loose habit into which humanity has lapsed, for to observe vividly is to retain rigidly; and Hannibal, with his over-manly mental habit, observes each fact presented to him with a vividness which seems to be pretty absolute.

You will say, then, to yourself, my friend, that it was a strange pair of men that paced by the seashore in silence that evening, the eve of the young man's nineteenth birthday — old Jack and his young giant; the giant in the meekest subjection to his Jack because of delusion, as all a world will sometimes meekly lie in shackles under the will of the weakest lie. My thoughts as I walked were of the morrow, of that dawn toward which for long years I had looked forward, when I should hand over to Hannibal my old problem of the stele to conquer for me, and I wondered in what manner the young man would manage it. Little doubt, however, had I as to the outcome, seeing that I am even now about to compile into a book quite a crowd of new scientific principles dropped from the mouth of my man in the course of his Studies, with a thousand little observations about things in general, most of them bound, I should imagine, to astound you. So, then, that my man would read the stele I could readily believe; but indeed, Reid, I was no longer deeply interested in this miserable bit of a stele; I'm afraid it is too true that my interest had all shifted from the lifeless thing to the living fellow, all too much so, all too much for my peace....

Sometimes lately, Reid, I may avow to you, I have stolen out of my room in the dead of night and stood before his door, stood for hours, hearkening for a sound; couldn't at all tell you why — bound there somehow — and I have shaken my poor head, saying to myself, “No, surely, I have to cure myself of this folly: a purely scientific interest in this savage, nothing more”; but still I have stuck at his door.

Do you understand that this boy is in some points an idiot? It is only lately that the amazingness of it all has struck and made me a wrecked man! To a thousand throes and heartburns, learned in a thousand social niceties by men who dwell with men, he remains a stranger. The different ways in which one should bend the mind toward one's brother, toward one's mother, one's friend, and so on, seem to be unknown to him; I don't know who is to blame. Never a little tenderness, never a sign. I couldn't, of course, bring his mind into contact with the Christian faith from the very nature of the case, the Man of Christianity being a sorrowful type, while the Man of his fancy was bound to be a type of power; so that the name of Christ he has never heard; but his mind was presented with such naive nature-worship as that of the Rig-Vedas, Genesis and Job: I thought that it was well....

But to return to this birthday-eve of his. We two had made our way back together in silence, nearly to the castle-gate, when out darts Shan Healy, wringing hands and crying, “Oh, Master Hannibal, do forgive me, sir, the glass pot has boiled all over, while I was attending to the dinner”; whereat Master Hannibal, without waiting to hear another word, threw Shan out of his way, and rushed into the house, no doubt to see for himself how the matter stood, for he seems to have left some mess simmering in his laboratory, had bid Shan look to it, and the thing had had some mischance.

“Now, here’s a go for a poor chap, doctor,” says Shan to me, in great distress; “believe me, I couldn’t avoid it, the thing boiled over so quick, and what’ll Master Hannibal say now?”

“Say?” said I, for I was angry, “what can he dare say? Let him go to the devil, you couldn’t help it, and I order you not to distress yourself in the slightest.”

“Ah, doctor, it’s all very well for you to talk,” says he.

Well, we went into the house, and Shan went down to his kitchen; but I still hung about the bottom of the stair, being a bit anxious as to what this being might take it into his nut to do now about his blessed chemical. All was still during some time, so presently I called sharply up to him, “What are you at, Hannibal?” No answer, no sound; only the faint sounds of Shan’s preparations for dinner downstairs. So now I ran very thievishly up the stairs, and peeped into the laboratory, but he wasn’t there, and I can only think now that at the sounds of my steps oh the stair, faint as they were, the monkey must have passed out of the laboratory window, and slipped down the turret by the ivy; anyway, the next thing that I heard were Shan’s howls coming up out of the kitchen, upon which I ran down, to find myself locked out, and to hear within the kitchen the sounds of a head being beaten against the ground, mingled with Shan Healy’s exclaimings.

Beside myself with anger, I pounded upon the door, and now at once the row stopped, and in a moment Shan opened, saying despondently to me, poor chap, "Oh, doctor, he do use me cruel, sir, cruel, cruel, cruel. Oh, my poor head — what does he think anybody is made of?"

My own head was hung with shame; I could do nothing but silently pat my old companion on his shoulder.

"Where is he now?" said I.

"Gone like a shadow through the window, doctor, and down to the shore, the minute he heard you pounding," says Shan. "He held me down on the floor with one hand, and with the other he banged my poor head... cruel, cruel. I shouldn't mind if it was done in a rage, but smiling as cool as a cucumber, as if anybody's head was a block of wood he was playing with."

"Well," I said bitterly, "all your own fault, Shan Healy; you're too faithful and good." And I left him there and went up.

Well, I dined by myself, my fellow keeping culpably aloof perhaps; and during the rest of the evening I saw or heard nothing of him till, near ten in the night, I heard some long way off the bursting of one of his bombs. A gale was then raging, and it had grown coldish, with that wet chill which marks this part. So I went to seek a little sleep, but at about three in the morning rose and went softly to stand outside the observatory door, to see if I could detect a sound of his through the row of the storm; and as I so stood, to my surprise, he called to me, praying me to enter. I did so, to find him sitting at a window, looking out at all the dark strife of the winds and waters, and at the bethundered bluff down there below: whereat, without the least mention of Shan Healy, my man began to blab about the moon, which just then struggled through into a channel between two cloud-bogs, saying that our globe, as it seemed to him, might have been made a more suitable place for living beings, if provided with two moons instead of one. Being grum and out of sorts at the moment, I told him not to trouble his small head about that, that things were well as they were, and I quoted dogmatically to him that “God made two great lights, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night.” At this my chap turns up at me a gaze of the greatest astonishment, asking if I did really think that some purpose of providing a lamp to the night had anything to do with the birth and being of the moon. I said yes, I did think so; on which he anew turns at me a certain searching look of astonishment, and murmurs something about not daring to question the truth of my words, but that as a lamp the moon undoubtedly appeared to be a failure, since she did not shine most nights; sometimes shone for a short hour only; sometimes shone uselessly during the day, but left the night orbless — a rather mad sort of lamp — whereas two moons with such and such parallaxes, of such and such masses... “Well, never you mind that,” said I shortly to him, for I thought that I’d better be mum as to the moon. But he was moonstruck that night, and after saying that just as she then was, near her full, but not quite, she reminded him of “The Idiot’s” face when he had gum-boil and swollen-jaw some years ago — for he’s as simple as a baby in some respects, mind you, and many things said by the boy that you might think said in fun, are, in fact, quite grave statements, devoid of any grain of humour on his part; for though he smiles ever, he hardly ever laughs, so that one’s cheeks are apt to puff out on a sudden with laughter at his words, as at the artless freaks of a child’s remarks. Anyhow, after likening the moon to Shan’s gum-boil face, my boy goes on now to wonder for the thousandth time how it is that his “Man” never managed to range so high into space as the moon, for I had soon found myself compelled to confess to him that man had never yet landed on the satellite, nor did all the reasons which I could adduce for this fact, such as the absence of an atmosphere on the moon, and so on, ever suffice to abate his wonder that the moon should remain unvisited: for little did the man dream that even the north and south poles of our own planet remain even now all unknown, let alone the moon! Well, sir, he was thus droning to himself as to the moon, and specifying the modes by which her surface appeared to him attainable, when in a foolish heat of tenderness I, standing behind him, let my hand fall on the flesh of his neck, inside the broad flap of his shirt-collar, and I allowed myself to murmur the word “Boy,” about to say, “Boy, I am fond of you,” or some such futility, when my fellow gave me such a gaze of Arctic-cold astonishment — for sheet-lightning and the strangled moonshine both beshone the darkness of the room, so that one could see anon — such a gaze, that I was glad to slip away to conceal the wet in my poor eyes, and I went to sleep.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SHIP.

THE MORNING AFTER, his birthday, on meeting him at the breakfast-table as the clock struck eight, I observed to him that he couldn't have had much sleep: to which, glancing up from his book, he answered, "Enough for the needs of my nature, sir, I think, though I was at work at four minutes before five. The old have greater need of repose, it appears, while, as to the young, the demagogue Cataline, it is written, could dispense with sleep almost altogether."

"Oho," said I; "well, let us be eating," and we sat to the old jug of porridge and oaten loaf.

Presently, as we ate, I said to him, "By the way, I want you now to understand that you are not to knock my servant's head about any more."

His answer was that he had discovered that such occasional visitations had the effect of slightly heightening the functioning of the idiot's wit.

"Never mind your discoveries," said I: "you are not to do it, sir."

"I will not, sir," says he with his formal bow, and buries his brow anew in his volume.

I for my part could hardly eat, for I was uneasy and excited, and my fingers kept on going to feel the old stele, which I had in my pocket; so, fidgeted by his cool reading and feeding, said I to him, "Didn't"

I beg you some time since not to be for ever eating and reading together, since it is injurious to the digestion, and there's a time for everything, as the mightiest minds among men well know.”

“True, sir,” says my man, “you did speak to me on this subject on the third of June two years ago, but your words did not give me an impression of great urgency, so I have dared to disregard them, since, after all, the digestion of the young is hearty and strong, and the days are hardly born but they are fled, and it is hard to the foot to race after the fastness of the horses of time; hence the greater masters, the minds of white-hot ardour, like Cæsar, always delighted themselves in the most entangled exercises, like the dictating of a vast host of letters at once, so as to harbour in their mood a habit of keeping pace with the fleetness of the passing days.”

“So true,” said I, “so true; still, it is as well not to eat and read together; nor are you any longer so ‘young’ as you have been; you know, of course, that to-day is your birthday.”

“So I calculate, sir,” says he: “I have now existed apart from the womb nineteen times as many as three hundred and sixty-five days, less four; that is to say, six thousand nine hundred and thirty-one days, without counting some odd hours.”

“Oho,” said I; “and how are you going to spend the day?”

“I am engaged in a chemical investigation, sir,” says he, leaning back now, and balancing a plate on the edge of his fore-finger nail, for he always speedily devoured his food, though with complete mastication, I believe, and was generally done before I was nearly through.

“Ah, and what is the investigation?” I asked.

“You must have noticed, sir,” says he, “the agitation I call it, with which bismuth acts—”

“I know exactly what you are going to say,” said I — God forgive us—” quite so; but look here, before you go I want to show you something, something that will amuse you; just read me that.”

On a sudden now, Reid, the moment long waited for had come, for I now caught the old basalt stele out of my pocket, and laid it before him; whereat immediately the fellow seemed to feel an interest in the mere sight of this object, took it up, looked it up and down and round about, smiling his smile, his brow twitching into momentary frowns.

“Why, sir,” says he suddenly, “where did you come upon this stone?”

“That’s not the point,” said I; “I got it in Abyssinia, but that’s not the point; just read it.”

“It is mainly enchorial and alphabetic,” he breathes aloud, peering into the thing, “but with a great number of syllabary signs, and vowel matres lectionis—”

“Yes, I know; read it,” said I, painfully conscious within myself of being pale in the face.

“Strange,” says he to himself: “both Sahidic and Memphitic, but mainly Memphitic—”

“Yes, I tell you, I know,” said I; “read it, read it, boy.”

He hesitated, sir, and I felt growing within me an agitation almost too great to be any more restrained.

“Have you read it, sir?” he suddenly asks, raising his eyes to my face; and I was foolishly conscious that my eyes drooped before his, even as in a tone of protest I answered, “Why, naturally! I only give it to you as a little exercise to amuse you; just read the whole thing right off.”

Now, sir, he puts the bit of a stele on the table, and he bends his brow studiously over it, supporting his head between his hands.

“Seven of the words are purposely secret,” says he to himself; “it is not an easy cypher....”

“Well, I know, I know that,” said I, deadly anxious now,” that’s why I give it to you — for a little fun on your birthday; just read it off, boy, to please me.”

“Ah, I see,” says he all at once: “this whole halfline is a long rebus or pun; the sound of each ideograph combines with the third following to form a word: that is clearly the idea of the inventor; I can trace his thought; I see. Oh, it is not difficult, sir!”

“Good — very good,” said I; “then just read it right off, and go up to your science, boy,” for I felt my face growing white with excitement, seeing that, in spite of his brave words, the man’s manner showed some hesitation, and lower and lower bent his head over the thing.

“A moment, sir,” he murmurs, “one moment; your servant is slow and dull, but” — something; and another minute went by in a silence that was most bitter to me to bear, till, all in a scare, I called to him, “Well, but haven’t you done it yet?”

“Yes, sir, I think—” he falters.

“Then read it!”

“In Coptic?”

“In English.”

Now, very deliberately, my man begins to utter syllables, his brow between his hands bent low down over the symbols, and, syllable by syllable, says he, “It is graved on a golden brick within the grave of Arunzebe, that when the white strangers from over the Great Hill came with fire and warfare, then did eighty princes bear together their braveries for safety, and they heaped them into the grave of Arunzebe. Even a spirit (nat) could scarce penetrate to their secret place, nor could a rain of men, straining through many days, attain to them. There is the Silence that annihilates. Let no man strive to visit them at—”

There my man stopped short. “At,” he repeated, but couldn’t go on, and there in the shameful silence he sat now frowning into the thing with a sort of haughty, excruciated self-surprise, but without progress.

“Well?” said I, and my looks, I know, were ghastly, for all that he had read of the thing I, too, long ago had read, though I admit that it had cost me some few months of effort.

“At, sir,” says he, more to himself than to me, “at — something; fifteen other ideographs remain, making three words, I am certain. But they are without determinatives, and their outlines are so blurred, they bring no meaning, no meaning — to my mind; they seem to belong...”

“Better say at once, Hannibal, that you can’t read the epigraph!” I cried out.

“You have read it, sir, no doubt?” says he for the second time with, I fancied now, just a touch of scepticism somewhere.

“Why, naturally, boy!” I cried, with such a noise that, at the moment, I almost believed it myself. “Can’t you, then?”

“It is strange, sir,” says he, “it seems to contain htar, and the old verb secha, to write.... Pray, bear with your servant a little, sir, I shall read the words, I see clearly that I can, if you will only vouchsafe me a little time — down by the seashore.”

“Time,” said I, with some disdain; “why time?”

The human mind should strike and divide like the very scythe of the lightning!... And how much time?”

“If I may have half an hour on the shore, sir,” says he, rather downheartedly, and as I knew that his mind usually rose to the height of any problem which bothered him with a lighter spring down there amid the droning of the waves, I said nothing when he took up the little stone, and passed out through the door. And so, Reid, we parted without one last clasp of the hand after nineteen years, for that was four days ago, and neither Shan nor I have since seen him. He is gone, he is no longer on Shunter, that is our one certainty: he may be drowned, or he may be living, but on Shunter he no longer is, I'll vow. After waiting in suspense an hour, nearly two hours, for him to return with the basalt stele, I despatched Shan Healy from the castle to seek him over the shore, and to command him to come back to me. When Shan was gone on this errand, I took my stand at a window, looking anxiously out over the eastern shores and over the rolling ground of the sea: and while there I chanced to catch sight of a schooner, about the size of a dove, some two leagues to eastward, breasting southward through that gaudy kind of haze that shrowds with a gauze of azure the bridal and gala glances of the brighter days on these islands. But little did I heed her then, nor to this moment do I know that she had anything to do with the vanishing of the young man. Meantime, Shan did not come back, Hannibal did not come back, and at last, angry and anxious, I ran out of the castle, and had got some half a mile over the western shore before I encountered Shan Healy dashing back to the castle in a white heat, with a wild countenance, hardly able to gasp out the words, "Found this, doctor," as he paraded before my marvelling gaze a paltry square of cloth and lace, a lady's handkerchief, marked with the initials "R. V.," and tainted with some effluvium of stale perfume. That thing on Shunter shore! My heart failed me, Reid: for the young man's notions of female man had so far been gathered only from certain Greek and Egyptian urn-traceries, meagre things; and I thought that if eye of his had indeed fallen that morning upon the carnal fact of womanhood, then it would be small wonder if all were lost, and his parting from me an everlasting parting. For fourteen years, so far as we know, no human foot but those of us three has passed over those peats and marshes of Shunter; no spar nor oar has approached within even half a league of its shores; but when Shan and I had run together to the little harbour at the north, where the bit of a flag-staff stands, we found the boat empty of the two pairs of half-tame motacillae lugubres which had made nests in her, and half-way down to the edge of the low tide I found the sands much trampled. Unknown to us, some craft had put in there, had anchored, and had departed, perhaps taking with her what far surpassed the understanding of those on her. Shan and I, having separated, searched each of us one of the promontories which enclose the harbour like claws, since, being dark with growths of bush, they seemed worth the searching: and on the east side I found, far out toward the last rocks, a track of footsteps going down to the sea, going, alas, without return: and they seemed to me, though I could hardly be certain, rather like the track of sandals than of boots, in which case he may have chosen that place to swim off to the craft in the harbour, so as to stow himself away below — I don't know. If so, it is remarkable that he should have acted in that fashion.

At first we fancied that, maddened by the sight of man and woman, the boy might have started to swim to Barra, and have been destroyed by a shark or a narwhal en route. But we are still quite in the dark as to the actual truth. Shan afterwards discovered half a bon-bon — a bitten bit of chocolate — amid the kelp on the shore, and no more know we of it....

Such, then, is the close of our eighteen years of the cloister on Shunter. Without a message of good-bye to his father the boy is gone. But, after all, I should have known beforehand, I should have guessed: for latterly he has been most museful, given to porings over the ocean through half a night, with more, perhaps, going on in the soul of him than I had any notion of, for we least of all see and know those that are nearest us, Reid; we see their faces and only fancy that we see themselves. Anyhow, it is all passed and over now; the little castle that was our home, that I had grown to love, and hoped that he, too, had grown to love, stands now lone through grey days, and darkling through nightlongs of thunderous weather without us: for, as I have told you, we have passed over to Barra in the boat, we two and the dog, and the poor mare and cows and goats will go hungry now, no doubt, or will soon grow to the humour of the guillemots and herring-gulls on the crags, and become sea-things, goblin of eye, like the tangles of kelp on the shore, or the stench of the ocean's throat, or the pools remote from the foot of men with little bleaks brooding in their green glooms, or the inclemency of gales that gather over this sea. I tell you truth, man, I am sad, for nineteen years of life is not nothing, Reid. The young man's gone, and how he is going to adjust himself to the world, and how the world is going to manage to adjust itself to him — God only knows. His books will become covered with particles of peat now; our little garth, with its darg of peat heaped in one corner for our fire next winter, will hearken now no more, alas, to the echoes of our passing; our little garden will grow wild; and Shunter will forget the unlasting foot of man and boy, to go back anew with joy to the largeness and boisterous ocean-mood of her past, and the charm of her harsh old solitude. To-morrow, I hope, we shall be able to take boat to Uist, and so to the mainland, but I'm not sure, this poor Shan Healy is so beastly seedy and down in the mouth... etc., etc.

CHAPTER V.

“MISS EVE.”

AT THIS POINT the statement of Dr. Lepsius becoming devoid of interest for us, we may next take up that of one Jeanne Auvache, where she writes (in French, with no eye to us, but quite for her own behoof):

... The next (Tuesday) morning, near nine, the yacht anew dropped her anchor within the claws of a creek in an island called Shunter: for the weather was fine and the sea smooth, so Miss Ruth and Miss Eve, each wishing to seek for more dolomites, weeds, and other suchlike things of the sea, and to place their feet on still a new shore, were pleased to land. I had already massaged, bathed, and coiffured Miss Eve, brought the two ladies their chocolate, and now had sat to costume yet another doll for Miss Ruth, when Miss Ruth comes to give me to know that she is about to go to land, and suggests that that should amuse me to come too with her: for she is ever good, as befits one who has the reputation of a saint, and who feels bound, no doubt, to keep it up. As for me, I little believe in saints, since all beings are as alike as two drops of water, the one to the other, at bottom — all save one, perhaps; and though it is a thing hardly to be questioned that, if a true saint does live, then it is this Ruth Vickery, still, I little believe in saints, I. Nor is it such a great matter that Miss Ruth should do me these little graces and goodnesses, inasmuch as I am not really her maid — I am the maid of Miss Eve — and not bound to be for ever sitting down dressing dolls for the brats in the hospitals of London; and if it were merely Miss Eve, I should have very little to do through some hours of the day: but Miss Ruth finds ever some charitable work to which to bind me down, and if thou wert now so young as thou once wast, it is not thou, Jeanne, my cherished one, I think, that would long endure this demure quietude and existence of a recluse. But patience, do not yet despair; thou hast been beautiful, thou hast been loved! Yes, and now, it appears, thou art anew beloved. It was not, then, all in vain that I have lived, and the world may not be altogether so dirty a bog of egotism and rotted dogs as I have lately grown to regard it. Heavens! that is droll — I feel myself anew young! The sky looks bluer, my feet would be almost dancing, and I am no more morose within myself at everything: for with a few touches of art there is nought which may not yet be hidden, and it is as if all the mirrors had of late years conspired to make me appear to myself plainer than I really am, since, as a matter of fact, I find the flesh under my jaws yet firmly plump, my eyes glow as gaudily as a girl's, their creases have existed chiefly in my fears, and each day I appear to myself to grow more fit to please.

But how little does one know what is before oneself! The boat had been already lowered down into the water when, having put aside the dressing of the dolls, I went up on deck and saw Miss Ruth, Miss Eve, Lord Astor, Miss Savage, and Monsieur le Comte de Courcy ready to descend to go to the shore, though Mr. Vickery did not go to the shore, but abided on the ship's poop perusing his big Bible through his glasses. When we had come to the shore, the ladies were taken out of the boat both by the sailors and by the gentlemen, and Monsieur le Comte de Courcy, one may be sure, took care to be he who lifted out Miss Eve, while, as for me, I was left to be taken out by a mariner who, in doing it, embraced me, I think, with intention. In the boat it had been said that the island was uninhabited, but, to our surprise, we found a “coble” or sail-boat, with a brown sail, with the rags of a philibeg, and with a pair of the sort of shoes which they call “brogues” in it, lying in some bushes; also a little inland, on some waste land over which many peewees and moorfowl were chattering their screeches, we found the ruin of a long shed, built of loose stones, with a roof of turf; also on the sands a sort of post or flag-staff: all showing that there were, or had once been, people on this place. On the shore the party split into two parts, Miss Ruth and Miss Savage marching off one way, and Monsieur de Courcy and Lord Astor following after Miss Eve as insects infest a feast of sweetmeat, while I was left to wander as I would. I therefore walked alone over that claw of the coast which was to the left as one looked toward the sea, where I paced in shade over a species of peat between bush and briar, which was deep on either hand, though little higher than my head, with thousands of gulls and whaups whistling and crying together in the air around me; and meantime, whatever seemed rare or strange, such as a weed or a piece of flint, I picked it up to keep for the ladies’ pleasure. In this manner I was engaged, waging war on the fog of midges that sang and stung my face, when, at a place where the “ glow of the morning’s sun was quite extinguished under the shade of the bush, I all at once felt within myself the instinct that two great eyes were regarding me from the darkness of an ambush. I sprang up from my stooping with affright! And it proved no fancy, for there, a yard before and to the right of me, I beheld, yes, two ardent eyes, glowing huge and close to the ground, it might be those of a tiger crouching, only that they were as dark as night. No second glance I gave, but with my heart in my mouth ran my hardest back toward the sands, awaiting at every instant the devouring teeth of a beast in my rear. Nothing, however, pursued me, and at length, seeing this, I halted, even ventured back a few feet, peering forward: for I have never lacked bravery, I, and am not to be terrified by a mere pair of eyes like that; but I could now see nothing, though, as I stood peering, my ear seemed to catch through the leafage not far from me a sharp rush which afresh had the effect of putting me to flight. However, I was about once more to stop to pry round, when the whistle of our boatswain sounded to summon me, and I ran down to the boat, where I found all our party already come back to embark.

When the ladies had been again placed in the boat, and we were all again on the water making toward the yacht, Miss Ruth, noticing my looks, remarked to me, “Why are you so pale?” and I then related to them my adventure in the dark of the bush, how two eyes had glared strangely at me from the ground, and had scared me. At this all the talk stopped short, and no small astonishment was shown at my hap: for all had thought that the island bore on it no form of life except those of the smaller sea-fauna, as seabirds and suchlike, so that, in short, I was the centre of the interest of all the world for a while, and every eye looked toward me. Miss Savage took the view that it must have been my “fancy,” but I at once quashed such a notion by a gush of assurances, whereat Monsieur le Comte de Courcy gave his opinion that it was the eyes of “the genius of the place” which I had seen, Lord Astor thought that they were “the eyes of Hermes searching the island for the nymph Lamia,” and Miss Eve believed that “more of inhabitants crowd in the village than count in the census; each grove harbours its ghost, heart-sighs and eyes are about — —” in the midst of which argument the boat reached the yacht, and at once our anchor was tackled, our canvas thrown to the breeze, and we started out upon the last part of the voyage, no more to tarry till our craft should be at her buoy on the coast of Scotland.

Well, now, I come to the event: I am about to write it! During the hours of the forenoon I had been mainly bound down to the dressing of Miss Ruth’s dolls; during those of the afternoon I had found my hands full enough with the making ready of the trunks, and with the thousand other little last cares that crowd upon one before a disembarking: and it was now evening, about half-past eight o'clock, when, passing out of Miss Eve's apartment, I went in a hurry round into my own to get and bring out her older brown gown. My wee apartment was quite in darkness; I was able merely to see the circle of my window, near under which, it being on the lee-side of the leaning ship, one was able to hear like a dirging the seething of the sea's surge sweep by toward the rear. So now I reached out my hand to switch on the light, and at that moment it was that it came upon me, while I, in a blue affright, gave up everything, recommending my soul to the good God, for it was as if thirty-six tigers flung their weight against me, and in the very same breath, as it seemed to me, I found myself lying on the ground, my feet bound together, and my mouth gagged with my apron; and so instantly were all these different performances done to me, that I understood, I remember, that I must be under the power of at least three ruffians. Heavens, that moment! I lay as it were given over and drowned far down in the gloom of the tomb, and I said within myself, "Jeanne, thou art finished now," for one could not catch one's breath, nor cry out, nor see anything! However, by a cunning move — for I was ever astute and deep in an extremity, I, and not to be done for so easily like that — I managed to jerk myself sharply upward a little, remembering that the switch was just above, and by a feat of luck my free arm, reaching wildly up, chanced to touch this switch, upon which the apartment was flooded with light, and I saw, to my bewilderment, that my tormentor was not many, but one. At once I had a sigh of escape and of regained hope, for though his right hand still held the gag, I could understand at the flash of the light that it was not a butcher, but a suppliant, who knelt at my side; and at once with that flash of light his lips were passionately at my ear, panting words so warm and queer, that I half questioned whether I heard him well when the young fellow whispered wildly to me that he knew that I am a woman and wanted me for his wife. Heavens! of the two surprises of my situation here was the greater! For I could scarce believe that he was jeering at me, seeing that he gave utterance to his words with so earnest a naïveté, so that I wondered whether I had to do with a lunatic! And even in the thick of my fears, I was so pierced with a feeling of the queerness of the young man's remark, "I know that you are a woman," that I had to laugh within myself! for I was suddenly light-hearted and relieved in that he wanted me to be his wife rather than to be his victim. Again he made me hear his demand in a pant at my ear, this time with a glance in his gallant eyes which made me afresh apprehensive, and gave me to guess that the penalty of hesitation might be grave; so with my finger I now indicated the stuffing in my mouth, whereat he told me to nod my yes or no, so, to humour him, I nodded yes, I would wed him! He now demanded of me a vow that I would not betray him "to Man" (as he said), till the ship should come to land, and this, too, I vowed with movements of my head and with my uplifted hand. But little did he trust me! for, on releasing me, he flew to the door, and had it secured before I was yet even on my feet. We then stood staring the one at the other, both bosoms labouring, and during some moments my tongue seemed to be unable to dare to address this being, till on a sudden I said to him, "But you are deranged! Who, then, are you?" to which his answer in the lowest whisper was that he was "Hannibal Lepsius."

"Little that imports to me, your name," said I: "I wish to know, since you are not one of the ship's company, how came you here?"

His answer was a whisper at my ear that I already broke my vow, since I spoke loudly enough, he said, to be heard by everyone throughout the vessel; but that since he was now certain that he was more powerful than I, therefore he would throw me down, and bind me anew, if I betrayed him “to Man.”

At this I stood scared, half-laughing within myself, for I seemed to have to do with a quixote or one crazed! but because of the beauty of his young face and form, and of some naïveté, and of some power, that was all about the young man, I could not be cross with him, for I declare that in some way he at the same time touched my soul with compassion, with mockery, and with awe of him, so that I craved at the same moment to become his mother and his love, his protectress and his slave. Something odder than anything in the world — in his looks, his words, his being — widened my eyes with the wondering of a babe, and made life a new thing to me... he had sandals on his feet, a belt, no jacket, no hat... he seemed to me fleet enough to leap up and fly with pinions. At this menace of his to bind me anew I said to him, “But you must have taken leave of your senses, as it seems to me I for I spoke scarcely above à whisper, which no one could possibly hear.”

As I said this, my young man, without saying more, drops on a sudden down, with his hands outstretched to me: and when I said to him, “Well, what now?” his answer was a prayer not to be untrue to him, but to hide him “from Man” and be his wife!

I laughed anew at this within myself! for he seemed to be blind to my forty-one foundered summers, and the flowers that withered in them, he a youth of hardly twenty years. So I said to him, “Get away with you, for you are crazy; how do you know that I am not already a married woman with a husband?” on which he told me very secretly that in any case he believed it to be possible that he should be able to make me one of “the most sovereign of ladies,” and with that he presents me with a piece of stone, resembling an ink-bottle, saying to me, “Read that.”

“What is this now?” said I, turning the thing round in my hands, since I could see nothing to read, only some holes cut in the stone; upon which he repeated his demand that I should “read” it, telling me that it was partly in Coptic and partly in — some long expressions which I did not comprehend.

“I know nothing of this,” said I to him, handing him back the piece of stone, whereat he peered piercingly at me a moment, and then all at once a light seemed to dawn upon his mind, and he rose up from his knees saying to himself, “I thought so.”

“Thought what?” said I to him, but to this he made no reply, only smiled upon me.

He gave me an impression of some young god gone mad! “You are hardly very polite,” I said to him, “and another woman might think you a little crazed, since at one moment you crave to be my husband, and at another moment you smile upon me as upon some ninny,” to which he replied something about being bound to adore me, ninny or no, inasmuch as I am so adorable!

“Why, get you gone,” I said to him, “you have hardly had time to see me yeti.”

He asked me how much time was necessary, and if he had not gazed at me through the bushes?

“Those, then, were your eyes that gazed there at Shunter through the bushes at me?” said I; “and you found me beautiful? What, then, could you have found so very beautiful about me, my face, or my figure — or both?” to which he replied, “Both.”

“And do you mean,” said I to him, “that it was merely through love of me that you concealed yourself in the yacht? What a sudden flame of passion! But I am at a loss to know how you could come here!” on which he explained that he had swum under water from the shore.

“But how could you possibly steal down here without being seen?” I asked him, to which he replied that “that question of itself charged me with a drowsy consciousness.”

His little smile of a superior man (petit sourire d’homme supérieur)!—“Well,” said I fondly to him, “you, for your part, are of a wakeful consciousness, and I, for mine, am beautiful both in face and form, is it not so? and it is a pair of us, is it not? But since we are now about to come to land, tell me this—” but before I could utter another word I heard the call of “Jeanne,” and was recalled by it to this world. It was the voice of Miss Eve who called me, and ere I could find my tongue to reply she called again, “Jeanne, where are you?” but I could not answer her, my eyes were fixed upon the boy, who now appeared lost in a joyous attention to the call, and with his finger held up gave deep into my ear a whisper of “Sweet voice.” Whereat I, being a little perturbed, turned from him, switched off the light, whispered him to await my return there, and went out in haste to Miss Eve, wondering within myself how in Heaven’s name I was now to restrain him from making the acquaintance of other ladies.

CHAPTER VI.

THE TOWERS.

JEANNE AUVACHE THUS continues: It all went beautifully, the landing. He had the wit, on appearing suddenly, to take upon his back the trunk of Miss Eve, which he bore over the pier to the little station, and in the dimness must have seemed to the sailors a porter, and to the porters a sailor. He did not see anyone in the light of the station, save a stationmaster in his uniform, and I praised Heaven that the train was a special one which carried none save our party. As she moved, he ran from the outer dark to the door of the compartment in which I stood beckoning him, and skipped in beautifully, so that we two went quite alone. Ah, but he trembled — all the way, so that one could see his jaws chattering anon. When I kept on saying to him, “But why do you so shiver?” he confessed to me that he felt fear. “But fear of what specially?” I asked, and when I pressed him he replied, “of Man and of my father.” I compassionated, but could scarce comprehend him, and I felt myself abashed and banished from contact with his soul, for though we were side by side, yet he was alone, and I was alone. I could only console myself with the thought that I had to do with an ingénu — a beautiful fault soon enough to be cured. But such an ingénu I one dropped down from the moon, as it looked to me. His curiosity about the train! for, to begin with, it was his terrors and tremblings that were uppermost, and then it was his curiosity struggling with them. His eyes were wide with an amazement which at first I took to be the natural amazement of a rustic suddenly plunged into the thick of the wonders of civilisation, until I learned that his amazement was not at the speed, but at the slowness, with which the train was creeping! This caused me to laugh within myself! “Why, we must be flying at fifty miles an hour,” I said to him: “how much more do you wish?” But he did not appear to pay much heed to my statements, and continued to rush about the compartment, touching this and that, now springing up to peer into the lamp, now darting down to lie and pry under the seats, gazing into the make of the window, tapping the woodwork with his fingers, all with so eager a zeal, my God! with the omnipresence of a monkey imprisoned in a crib, and trembling all the time with excitement, as I could see. What most of all amazed him was the size of the train! Why, he wished to know, was this particular train so miserable a thing, seeing that its largeness could be vastly increased with only a paltry increase of the motive force. “But are not all trains of the same size?” I said to him: “they are of a certain size, that is all; one does not know why they are so, and this is no smaller than the others.” But after starting and staring at me, in a moment, as if he regarded me as an ignoramus that did not know what I was saying, he told me with disdain that most trains were raging palaces, though this one, for some sage motive that he did not understand, was not so.

I began then to recognise that he must have lived wholly buried away from actualities amid those islands of the sea, for his ignorance of life could scarce be greater, since he harbours the most laughably large notions of the glory and achievements of beings: and I was glad within myself at this, and resolved that he should be kept like that up to the day following my marriage with him. But even as I was thinking this within myself, what was my astonishment when he informed me that I am a Frenchwoman, and spoke thenceforth to me in very passable French of Bordeaux! So that here is a rustic with a difference.

When we had arrived at Thring we found that, though the sun had not yet risen up, the night had now been replaced by daylight, and the birds were loud at their works in the silence of the world. I had by that time told him by what way to make to the brink of the river, and where to await my coming to him there under the ruin: so some moments before the train stopped he leapt from the door on the off side, and hied off over the metals. A moment more and laughter was sounding on the platform, and I looked out to see Miss Eve alighted, calling out to her father, while she fingered her now withered violets of Parma, that getting home in the dawn was like dying to earth and a getting to heaven, and immediately her father was to be seen stepping down out of his compartment, on his arm Miss Ruth, and the rest of the party trooping out after. Anne and I, having then assisted to carry the rugs to the carriages outside, set out together in the mail-phaeton for The Towers some minutes later than the others: and we found a gaiety in returning once again after so much of London and the sea, for everything is good in its turn, but a curse upon too much of any one condition of being. So down the mountain through the townlet to the river we drove in a procession, and up the mountain beyond, no one yet to be met on the roads, but one constable, and the day slowly working about us toward its birth.

After our arrival at The Towers, having first perfumed Miss Eve's bath with the infusion of frangipane and ambergris, and then got her hair prepared while she perused an accumulation of her correspondence, I put her to bed, she impressing it upon me that I, too, must take a nap. I had other thoughts than napping, tired as I was! all my nerves tingling at the whispered word within me that love was now again by God's goodness about to be mine in this dog's world. The moment, therefore, that I was free,

I was down and away, tapping my face with powder, taking from the larder and housemaid's pantry a parcel of bread, meat, and preserves, and down by the river found him seated in a cavern of the cliffs, searching into the interior of wild plants which he had slit with a knife. He was still visibly atremble with excitement, but did not rise when I came to him, continuing to gaze into the make of the plants, having recognised my coming step, as I think. But on a sudden he started upright with something of a laugh, and made the remark, gazing upward at the sky and around at the girdle of mountains, that it was a world worthy of "Man" to circulate in. "It is more imposing than those islands of the sea, is it not?" said I to him, and he replied, "Yes," for that those are mostly of bog and boulders, with hags in between, but that these parts are made of stones with strange names, so many millions of ages old; only he wished to know what creatures could live in those sheds over the river, and looked dumfounded when I informed him that they are the ordinary houses of a country townlet! But he scarce seems to believe my statements. The windows, he remarked, can only be opened half-way at the most to take in the fresh air, and when I gave him to know that all English windows are of this sort, though French windows fully open, this caused him to fall into so extraordinary a marvelling, that one had to laugh! For one kind must be ideally the better, he said, so why do we find the British tied to one kind, and the French married to another? But this I was unable to make plain to him, and he remained in his surprise.

I now went into the question of our wedding, telling him how everything could be fixed up in some days, how I found myself possessed of two hundred pounds funded out of my earnings, which amount would serve nicely for our small ménage, till he should have found his niche in the world; and I engaged myself to see to everything as to getting the licence from the surrogate, as I desired him meanwhile to hide in the church-steeple near St. Peter, whither twice a day I would fetch him a meal: for I did not wish him to see the world at all as yet, and so, working on his awe as to his father, I warned him that he would certainly be caught, if he but once looked forth of his hiding; though, after our marriage, I said, he could safely range out anywhere, since the laws would not allow his father to take him out of his spouse's arms.

As to this he bent his head; but as to bringing him meals, he made the observation that that was not worth the trouble, inasmuch as he frequently exercised himself in abstaining from eating for a week at a time, and he asked if he might not remain in the cave where he was, in order that he might peep at the people passing over the opposite river-shore: to which, as I could see no reason against it, I gave my consent, and even agreed that he should come to meet me in the east shrubbery of The Towers that evening about nine. So, having given him to observe the zig-zag running down round the mountain's brow from The Towers, I ran from him.

CHAPTER VII.

THE TERRACES.

ARRIVED AT THE Towers, I first slumbered a couple of hours, and then, the day still early, returned to my mistress' bedside. She had bidden me wake her, but I just massaged her with a gentle touch, contemplating with a smile of pleasure that face whose charms I am soon no more to behold: and never did she show to me in so angel-like a light as then, for everything is suddenly changed in me, I find myself inclined to be kindly-minded to everybody, and then Miss Eve is ever beguiling, from her very breathing being given forth a breeze fraught with that fainting fragrance of frangipane, which is as essentially a part of her self as are her eyes or her smile. When her lids unclosed of their own action she once more bathed, and it was when I was doing her hands in making her toilette for the forenoon that she begged me to bear tea with my own hands to her, if she should happen to be in the small drawing-room after four that afternoon.

I at once suspected an interview with Monsieur le Comte de Courcy, and this proved true: for on looking into the small drawing-room in the afternoon, I saw the two alone at a window, and when I presently stole in bearing the tray, there they still were, Miss Eve considering something that had been entreated of her with her head bent, while Monsieur le Comte, in his grey frock-coat, spoke pressingly at her, eagerly fingering his imperial. Now, the sight of lovemaking always profoundly agitates me, causing me a shivering round my right knee; so, having announced the tea in a mutter, I could not, on stealing out, tear my ears away, but stood there by the stair-top, hung upon what was said; and presently could hear the Minister of the Interior say, “You have permitted me to hope these four months,” then mumble, mumble, and then the lips of Miss Eve were speaking, saying, “Days have their weirs and their weathers, if Thursday its drought, perchance Friday its showers: somehow to-day I am dull, empty of every reply.”

“Only whisper to me the word ‘hope,’” I then heard Monsieur the Minister implore with much agitation, though what answer was made to this I could not catch; and he then said, “Soon?” to which she replied, “Soon necessarily, since you are going.” So he asked her, “Tomorrow?” and the answer given was, “Well, tomorrow, if God will,” at which point I saw the boy-in-buttons rushing up, so went away.

For the evening Miss Eve had arranged for the party a ball, to which came a troop of neighbour visitors, though Miss Ruth and Mr. Vickery, of course, kept themselves from the levity of it. So, after preparing Miss Eve’s third bath — Miss Ruth, I have heard, considers it to be “worldly” to bathe her body as frequently as once in a week, as nuns believe! — after bathing Miss Eve anew, I advised her to put on for the evening the Chantilly overskirt and the pearls, for I knew that Miss Savage in her crimson robe would be making Miss Eve’s pink appear pale; and having aided nature one wee bit by a touch on her cheeks, her lashes, and her eye-brows, I turned her out an object chic to kiss the hand at, proudly certain in myself that she must prove the finest-costumed of the company; and still I had uttered no word to her as to my leaving her service immediately, it was so immense a step, like a ravine from which I shrank.

After dinner, till nearly nine, I was down in the housekeeper’s place, making a pretence at playing cards, and some moments after nine rose to rush off to meet him in the east shrubbery, as arranged; but just then my bell summoned me, and when I went to the shrubbery ten minutes late, with a rush of terrors I became aware that he was not there. I ran my hardest now, my heart raised to Heaven in a prayer that nothing had happened — down the mountain to the cliffs, down their face to his cave. He was not there, and I wrung my hands together in an anguish of apprehension, begging the good God not once again to bring me all the gall of the draught of frustration to drain to the dregs, and the bitterish bread of drabness to chew for ever: for there he was not, and where he could have gone to I could not guess. Thinking at last that I might have missed him in coming, I made my way back up, with runs and stoppages to take my breath, came back to the shrubbery, but failed to find him there. However, on looking out across the lake, I saw in the moonlight that laved the lawn-terraces two forms: one of them Miss Ruth, pacing there with her gaze poring upon the zodiac, and her rubric of devotion hung between her fingers; the other, whom I could just perceive, was lying flat, peeping into the drawing-room through a window, and I knew that it was he, for a rumour of the music and dancing came faintly to me there, and I knew that this must have seduced him to it. I could not but feel pleased to find him, but to my feet my being was pierced with fear to see him lying there, peeping carefully in. In a minute, however, he bounded to his feet, hearing, I presume, the step of Miss Ruth, and he ran some paces, looking back at her; but when she beckoned to him he waited, and in a minute I perceived them standing together engaged in speech.

I crept then through the bushes of the lake's edge, till I came to the lawn; and there, observing their backs turned toward me, I stalked still further forward on my hands and knees, till I was in concealment beneath the stonework of a terrace — little dreaming that I had been overheard; and thence I heard the voice of Miss Ruth saying to the boy, "But you must have lived in a strange isolation never to have heard speak of Jesus Christ?" upon which he, gazing down upon the ground, said in a low tone that he was altogether ignorant, till two days ago having never met with anyone save his father and an idiot.

"Poor dear boy!" coos the voice of Miss Ruth, who, being but twenty-five years of age, has scarcely the right, I think, thus to soothe a youth of twenty. "And where," says she, "was this?"

In a tone in his throat he replied, "On an island of the Outer Hebrides."

"Why, I am even now from there!" she told him. "But your father, has he also never known the blessed name of Jesus?"

He answered her that his father possesses the sum of worldly wisdom, but that he had never at all heard from his father any mention of this personage.

"Why, this is strange!" she cries in a maze, with her azure eyes of a child widely agape at him: "to think of such pagans living in Christian England!

Do you not, then, know the words 'Christian,' 'Christianity,' 'Christendom'?"

To this he answered that he had never heard these words.

"Tell me this, then," said she: "in what year is it that we are now living?" to which he made her the amazing answer that we are now in the year six hundred thousand three hundred and sixty-three.

At this reply Miss Ruth smiled, and during some time appeared wrapped in silent prayer, until she suddenly asked him, "From what event, then, do you date this vast sum of years?"

"From the presumed date of the evolution of human life from the ape-state," was his reply.

For a few moments Miss Ruth mused upon the young man, then threw up her hands with drollery in her little human way which just rescues her from being angelic; and she asked him, “ But are not all dates reckoned among us from the Lord Christ?”

At these words of hers he seemed extremely perplexed, and, after frowning upon the ground, asked her if the Lord Jesus Christ was a Greek or a Roman. “He was a Hebrew!” cries Miss Ruth.

“With an Arianised name,” said he:” lived, then, under the later Romans.”

“Just so,” said she: “how much you know for one of your station, and how little!”

“How little,” he said, and on a sudden knelt to her, begging her to bear with his ignorance, for that she was much more gracious and merciful to discourse with him than he deserved, as he was not only strange to the world, but his brain, moreover, was all in a whirl, inasmuch as he had only just made away from his father’s control, nor had ever before been intoxicated with strains of harmony such as those escaping from out of the house, nor beheld such blessed beings as she and those fabulous beldams moving beautifully to music over the floor of the drawingroom.... Upon this Miss Ruth raised him up, bid him wait, and, moving to a window of the drawingroom, peeped in to Miss Eve, becking her to come, too, to inspect the curiosity. I disliked her for it, since there was little need for him ever to have seen Miss Eve near at hand, save for this. At all events, out stepped Miss Eve now, very tall in the sheen of the moon, Miss Ruth seeming a midget near her, and even when the three stood face to face, still Miss Eve appeared the tallest of all. So Miss Ruth recounted now in how odd a solitude the young man had spent his existence, and then fell anew to talking of the Lord Christ, he eyeing Miss Eve steadily with the corner of his wild eye, speaking with a drooped head to Miss Ruth, eyeing steadily Miss Eve; till now Miss Ruth cried out, “He was man and God, too!” and only then did the ogler, peering in surprise at her, cease to eye Miss Eve. Immediately now, too, his meekness appeared to cease, for looking straight now at Miss Eve, he asked her if she also shared this belief.

Miss Eve had as yet uttered not a word, but now with her eyes turned downward, her lips muttered, "Why, yes."

He smiled, and at the same time looked perfectly perplexed, turning his stare from one to the other lady, until Miss Ruth remarked to him, "Do not doubt it, though it is marvellous in all our eyes, so that even the cherubic natures of the skies deeply brood with admiration upon it," and he then very impolitely replied to her that her consciousness of the size of this earth could not be alert.

To this answered Miss Ruth, "The earth? she is huge in momentousness, you know: with each tick of the clock a human being ceases to breathe—"

"A human being?" he replied with a cry of surprise: "with each tick of the clock a million worlds are burned, and are born!"

"Oh, La!" says she, startled a little at him.

Then she said, with that veiling of the eyes with the eye-lids that lends her her air of Madonna saintliness, "That cannot be, I think."

But the other sister murmured, "Ruth, it must truly be so, if the universe truly is termless: prove me one world that's been burned, millions a minute must burn."

"Let it be so, then," said Miss Ruth, "since you say so, and glory be to God, for the remotest of them, I think, His hand holds, and His right hand guides it."

"He is it," the young man said.

"He is with it, I think," Miss Ruth replied.

"And you also say this?" he asked of Miss Eve.

"Yes," she answered curtly, with a touch of pique, as it appeared to me.

Silent he stood now a while, with that smile of his that hides all the windings of his mind behind his brow, but still giving an impression of one plunged in bewilderment at the creatures he was speaking with. Then, glancing upward, he swept his fingers athwart the vault of the stars, with the remark that all that was a darksome mathematic, a perfection which was deaf.

But now Miss Eve, going rosy, frowned upon the ground, and in tones that trembled a little, she observed, “ Perfect it is, though a Heart, not a Head, was its Father and Harper; tolling melodious notes, wrung with emotion it rolls;” and it was now that the young man suddenly caused my heart to bound into my mouth by coming out with the statement that, inasmuch as the fourth sharer in the conversation would undoubtedly be found to contemplate the universe in the same sort of mood, he could only suppose that all ladies were prone to criticisms of the same quality.

The two ladies looked round, and “which ‘fourth sharer ‘can he mean?” Miss Ruth wished to know of Miss Eve, while I crouched there beneath the terrace, trembling lest he should betray my whereabouts; but when they pressed him to say where I was, to my great gladness, he gave an evasive reply.

He next requested Miss Ruth to instruct him further in her views of the universe, upon which she begged him to come the next night that she might give him a Bible and teach him of the Lord Jesus; and as to his father, after some hesitation on her part, he gained from her a promise that, if his father, or his father’s agents, should get upon his scent, the sisters would not let out to them where he lurked down there in the river-cave. And next he began to beg Miss Eve for one of the begonias at her girdle, but at that moment, before he could be answered, Monsieur le Comte de Courcy stepped out of the house, and, really as if by magic, the instant he appeared the young man had vanished. By this time I had somewhat recovered of my fit of affright, my eyes were anew at the parapet-top, and I could spy the surprise of the ladies, who seemed unable to believe what their two eyes had seen: for though the nearest leafage was quite nineteen or twenty metres away, in the twinkling of an eye, as it seemed, he was within it, and gone like a ghost at cock-crow.

L for my part, having crawled back to the lake, rushed through the shrubbery obliquely, meaning to meet him somewhere in his career downward: but he was nowhere to be found, until I was on the footpath above the cliffs, when down there in the moonlight I beheld him walking furiously to and fro before his cave's mouth. Down, then, I scrambled, calling out to him, asking why he had not awaited me; but he is not very well-bred, went on silently walking, and on marking one of the swans glide past on the water, he suddenly darted to lie on his face and gaze at it.

“But why did you fly like that?” I asked him when he returned to me, “since the gentleman could not have hurt you?” but still he made me no reply.

“And what did you think of the two ladies?” I next asked him.

Then he: “Who are those ladies?”

I: “They are Miss Ruth and Miss Eve Vickery, the daughters of Mr. Richard Vickery, who is what is called ‘An Iron King,’ a very rich and an extremely religious man, who sometimes preaches in a chapel on Sundays.”

He: “Preaches?” — and I had now to try to explain that “preaching” means teaching the people how to be devout and grave; but I failed to get him to comprehend how Mr. Vickery could have attained to greater gravity than the rest, and he struck his brow in the misery of his failure to grasp the signification of a single word that I uttered as to this. “Well, it is so, and that is all,” I said at last; “but as to the ladies, you have still not told me which of the two you most admire.”

Then he: “Which is the first-born?”

So I: “That auburn-haired one is the elder by three years, being already twenty-five, and it is she who has the reputation of a saint in society, though it is Miss Eve who is so much the more queenly; so which of the sisters do you like, the auburn or the light?”

He: “A saint?” — and I had anew to make an explanation which he little comprehended, and then anew I wished to know of him which of the two sisters he the most admired.

And now he, making that stone like an ink-bottle which he keeps inside his shirt whirl about his forefinger without attachment in a quite wonderful way, his waist swaying to keep the thing whirling wildly quick, answered with whistling lips, “I like Miss Ruth.”

Then I: “Oh, you do? You like her better, I see, than you do Miss Eve?” upon which he, putting his hand behind his back for the stone to whirl behind there, answered, “Yes.”

Then I: “But leaving Miss Ruth out of the question, since she will never marry, which of the two do you most admire — Miss Eve or me?”

He: “You.”

I: “Oh, you do?”

He whistled quietly awhile, whirling the thing wildly with a swaying waist, as it were a wheel wheeling on his hand, and he answered, “Yes” to me; but I thought that my heart would be breaking with its rankling.

So I to him: “Well, since this is so, that you like me so very vastly better than Miss Eve and than all, why go to-morrow evening to get the Bible, since there is no need, really; it is all nonsense and make-believe, and will merely mean that you will be caught by your father,” upon which he, suddenly ceasing to wheel the thing, sharply asked if she had not promised not to betray him.

So I: "She has promised, yes, but she little means it, wait, you will see, you little know women, they are deceivers all; she will betray you surely enough, if she but has the chance."

He glanced sharply at me, then said, "No."

I: "But I say yes."

He: "The lapwing says pee-wit."

What he meant I was not sure, but I was so brokenhearted that night, that with sobs I threw myself now in a passion to his breast, and on my knees, kissing my own tears on his hands, implored him like a dear boy not to leave and despoil me, but to love me for ever, for if he left me, that would be my death, I said, and his death as well.

He smiled with his fixed little smile upon me, and I could believe that he meant well by me; so, getting up now, I told him how I had that day gained all information as to English marriages, and meant on the morrow to take the first measures; but as I was speaking of this, he, leaning aside, bent his ear to the ground, hearing God only knows what sound under the grass, and when I had bidden him goodnight, and was going up the cliff's brow again, on glancing back I beheld him bent down aside, eagerly listening with his ear near the ground.

CHAPTER VIII.

IN THE GARDEN.

THE NEXT DAY the first thing that happened was the coming of a person whom Miss Ruth interviewed for her father in the morning-room. I was even then seeking Miss Ruth for Miss Eve, and on coming near the room could hear the man say that he was one Shan Healy, a servant of Dr. Lepsius, who, having traced to The Towers the owners of the yacht which had touched at Shunter, was now come to find out what he could as to his master's son.

He seemed a person of some thirty years, slimly tall, with a scar that twists his upper lip, clad in rough new clothes: a man of an alert and amiable personality, so that Miss Ruth laid her hand on his sleeve to soothe him, for indeed he was in deep dreariness, and frequently sniffled. When I went in with the message, Miss Ruth sent me to call Miss Eve to her, so I ran back, and having brought Miss Eve, hung near to hear.

It was a long talk, the stranger having been given a seat near the grate, the sisters seated on each side of him, hearing his tale. I, for my share, was kept fidgety by the sounds of footsteps going about the house, and could gather only in fragments what was said — enough, however, to inform me of the marvel of the opportunity which has brought me this gorgeous bridegroom of mine, for here, it would appear, is Aladdin, and it is the wonderful lamps that are alight in his eyes. Only sparkle crisply, do, do, my little star, and come to me some spirit of perfect luck and alertness to spur me now with whispers how only four days more to hold him, till I have safely erected myself on my thrones, and bound my brows with crowns. Oh, I am silly with thoughts. But thrones, may be; may be, many crowns, as Josephine, who was but a bourgeoise, wore: for when Miss Eve asked this man, Healy, for what reason the father is in this fever as to the son being abroad in the world, the man answered that “the doctor regards it, lady, as a peril greater than a charge of gun-cotton piled under the globe, with a child holding a glowing coal by it: for, says he, the day that Master Hannibal gets to recognise the real grade of mankind’s mind he’ll be dragging the frame of society to fragments, like a child tearing a fly, leg by leg, for mischief.” The ladies had the eyes of a child who has listened late in the night to tales of the ancient time! “Well,” Miss Ruth murmured, having heard the wonders that the man had to tell, “I am in for it now, for though I do know, I promised him not to tell his whereabouts, being cross with his parent for not having instructed him in the Christian faith.” Then to Miss Eve, who, leaning forward with her chin on her palm, sat staring at some vision which she saw in the hearthplace, she remarked, “What do you say, Eve; what should I do?”

Now Miss Eve knit her brows, and presently replied, “Promises can’t be repealed, dear.”

“But since it may do much harm?” Miss Ruth suggested.

“Still,” muttered the lips of Miss Eve, “a promise.”

“Oh, lady, do, for God’s sake,” Healy now entreated of Miss Ruth, “not that I expect him to go back with me, but he’s so green to everything, badly needs somebody, lady, like a whale run ashore, has got no razors to shave, no jacket—”

At this of “razors,” Miss Ruth placed her hand upon the man’s in a movement of friendliness: for in truth he appears to be rather like his young master's nurse than servant, and Miss Ruth's heart, like waters haunted with squalls, is anew every minute smitten with all the world's smart, as fluid and easy as Miss Eve is aloof. So she smiles with the man, saying, "Wait, I'll question my God," and gets up to go away to a window, from which she presently returns to Miss Eve with the words, "Eve, I'll peach."

To this Miss Eve at first answered nothing, but after a little asked, "What will he think of the worth of the promises made by us Christians? Knowing a first that has failed, never a second he'll trust"; but Miss Ruth continued to believe that it would be better on the whole to betray; did not, however, outright do so, only revealing to Healy that the boy would be coming that evening to receive a Bible, and instructing Healy to be then on the terraces to meet him.

But there was one who had no wish that the boy should be taken unawares, and who, not meaning him any more to meet Miss Eve, immediately made up her mind to make known to him that he had been deceived by the ladies. So, after placing Miss Eve's halfhourly hot water, down at once I started to him, and in passing near the morning-room, again had a peep of Miss Eve in solitude now, pacing there regularly to and fro with something of a frown, as it were a sentinel in a gown. But when I had got down to the cave, again my heart went aching, for again he was not there, and I thought then within myself, "It is going to be more troublesome to hold him in my prison than to keep quicksilver in a sieve, or to bind a wind with twine, and this is a wild kind of horse with wings that I have vaulted on, I think, which may chance in its raging to break every rib of my body." Louder and louder I called out after him now, and there was no sound nor sign of him: only, on the cave's floor now was a thing resembling a telescope, made of oak bored through the core; also I saw there a thing like a trap made of twigs, with the guts and gore of some animal close to it; also a hollowed stone containing water that was violently on the boil, though by what means the boy could cause this water to be bubbling and boiling there was more than one could conceive. There remained also most of the food which I had brought him, and having left what I had now brought, I had to hurry back up to The Towers.

There I spied Miss Eve still pacing in that same machine-like fashion as before, as queenly slow of step as when a lady, conning poetry by rote, paces with closed eyes. However, within twenty minutes now she called me, to ask me to take tea to her with my own hands, as on the day before; nor did I get any time to go down the mountain again, for after lunch I had to take the walk over to St. Arvens, where, at the vicarage, before a Mr. Rae, an aged curé, I made an affidavit as to there being “no impediment” to my marriage, and he promised to procure me by the 27th, from” the Bishop’s Registry,” the licence to marry, with a stamp on it for £2 3s. 6d. So far, then, all goes well, thank God; and in passing back through St. Arvens, having got my finger measured at Martin’s shop, I there gave orders for the wedding-ring, since I do not regard it as a good thing to bring my former wedding-ring into use for this new bridegroom. By the time I came home, elated with hopes, it was already late, and before long I was bearing tea, as bidden, to Miss Eve. There was an afternoon picnic at the Devil’s Pulpit, where many of the party were; a few were at tennis; Miss Ruth was in the book-room in the thick of scribbling off a basketful of her correspondence with Christendom; and Miss Eve was with Monsieur the Minister of the Interior. But this time when I bore in their tea they were less close together: Monsieur de Courcy sitting in a mood of gloom on the sofa, gazing at the floor between his legs, Miss Eve standing nearer the fire-place, fingering white violets, with a bent face. And I, listening in the corridor, heard her murmur to him that “pain like a curse or some venomous perfume infects all Eve's poor daughters: curst that they needs must endure, worse when they needs must inflict," from which I gathered that the poor Monsieur de Courcy, having been given to hope for twenty-four hours, was now definitely turned away, though, as I left the corridor, I heard him cry out crazily, "There is some reason! I know that you like me, Eve!" but what answer was given to this I did not gather.

Then, after spending some time at the wardrobe, preparing the bath, arranging four costumes for her choosing, and the perfumery and lotions for her toilette de soir, I thought I might have just time to run down to the boy, but was now anew disappointed by being summoned to yet new toils by Miss Ruth, who, having received a bale of toys from the Dean of somewhere, presents me five dolls to dress! So that is the way it is? It was always to be dressing dolls that I was born, was it not, ladies? Wait only four days more! and perhaps you will then not know your lady's-maid for the smile that will writhe her lips, and for the royalty of that rage of joy which will shine in her eyes.

For the evening Miss Eve, for some reason, would put on her poudre blue with the Borzoi ornaments, and orchids, and now I had a small hour to myself, for, as to dinner, eating was far enough beneath that sphere of fairies where my brain was in a reel; so, having merely tasted a spoonful of soup, off I hastened to him....

He was not there at the cave, still he was not there! And I could only guess that, his awe of his "Man" having already grown less great, he had roamed far, and ah, I asked my heart if he had not done it four days too soon for my fate.... I had no paper to write him that he would be betrayed by the ladies if he came up, and after half an hour's waiting returned to The Towers.

Nothing was then left me to do but to watch, and at first I lurked under the conservatory's shadow, and then, conscious that I might be observed, moved up to pry from behind the curtains of that front bedroom on the right.

Thence I soon saw Healy appear on the terraces, and soon from the drawing-room out to him moves Miss Ruth. Miss Eve did not appear, though invited by Miss Ruth, I know, to assist at the rendezvous. So Miss Ruth and Healy conversed a while, and I heard the stable-clock strike nine as Miss Ruth introduced Healy into the conservatory to wait there concealed, and then returned to pace the terrace in the moonlight. Three minutes afterwards, half a mile off on the meadow below the lawn, I beheld a runner coming with a wide stride, his elbows at his side, his head thrown back, his lips opened, pressing prone home like a beast with its ribs breathing deeply from long travelling. At once I was certain that it was no one but him by his black skull, his shaggy shirt, and by observing how with a bouncing somehow and a buoyancy in his gait the boy came gaily — beautiful! like a fabulous youth booted with something pneumatic; and soon, scaling the terraces, he stood panting before Miss Ruth, I kneeling at the window's sill with my ear low to hear him excusing his lateness: for, said he, he had had a high-day of adventures, and then had been again delayed by watching a conflagration eight miles away, and the deaths of a man and a child.

“Really?” says Miss Ruth to him, “and what, sir, is the name of this poor man who was burnt?” to which he gave the answer that he had heard the man called “George Perkins, the grocer.”

“What, Mr. Perkins, the grocer, of Up Brooming?” cries Miss Ruth shrinkingly, with eyes of alarm, “burnt to death?” and “Oh!” she murmured with ruth.

To this he replied — and I disliked him for it — that there was no need for any feeling of grief or loss, since this grocer's life, he felt certain, was a life of no value, one greatly below the human grade, his figure having the grossness of the gorilla's, and his soul on a similar level, since in the attempt that he had made to steal he had failed even to death....

“To steal?” breathed Miss Ruth; “Mr. Perkins, the grocer? A prayer-leader? There must be some mistake!”

“No,” he said — at least he took it, he said, for granted that the grocer had meant to steal, since there appeared to be no other motive for his demented rush into the conflagration.

“He rushed to rescue the child!” cries Miss Ruth.

“So,” he replies, with his smile, “the people of the region seemed to imagine,” but as the child, he observed, was not even the grocer's own offspring, and as even an ape's eye might have recognised the fatal state of the conflagration, therefore he could only suppose that the motive of the grocer was to grasp some hoard.... Whereupon the saint suddenly throws up her hands with drollery, and once more, as on the evening before, could not resist running to bring Miss Eve to hear the story of the good grocer, who, having perished as a hero, was still impeached of stealing! But Miss Eve would not immediately come, so that the other sister had need to entreat her thrice with, “Yes, come, yes, come,” ere Miss Eve, deciding, appeared on the terrace in her poudre blue, the moonlight's hue, Hannibal Lepsius making the abject obeisances of a Jew before her face. Then the three spoke during some moments, or Miss Ruth and the young man spoke, Miss Eve, with an air of musing, waiting mutely near. I heard only in fragments what was said, but gathered that Miss Ruth, having ridiculed the grotesqueness of the good grocer being accused of stealing, the young man now began to glorify and laud stealing, asking if the Spartans did not rightly regard it as an excellent art of life; and what was dishonourable about it, he wished to know, save to be of so drowsy a consciousness, he said, as to fail or to be found out in it? In the midst of which speech of his, Miss Eve, without saying a word, turned away, and went pacing westward behind the conservatory toward the garden, the young man all agape after her, and Miss Ruth saying to him, “Now, I’m afraid you have quite blundered into my sister’s bad books, though I, too, say with you that there’s no wrong in stealing, save that it does seem rather selfish, does it not? and selfishness, I think, is the sole falsity, the only fault. But never mind, it will be quite well, let us wait and pray, for I prophesy in the Spirit that one day light will spring from on high in you. I am only sorry that we have to separate, but here’s the promised Bible, which for love of me you will read frequently, while I for love of you will wrestle — Listen!” for he, half turned toward the conservatory, hardly heard her, his eyeballs all beguiled away with a hungry glaring in them the way that Miss Eve had disappeared. “Listen!” she says, “I have considered it best to betray you—”

“Ah!” now he span about to frown a second at her, into her, one may say, and some other seconds stood dumb, considering it; looked up, too (why, I do not know), at the window where I knelt hidden. At any rate, he saw now the truth of my prophecy that Miss Ruth would betray him, and that I was no lapwing that says “pee-wit.” In a moment more by some reasoning of his own he seems to have surmised that Healy was concealed in the conservatory, for toward it with his usual ill-breeding, leaving Miss Ruth, he immediately rushed. Just then the footman John ran out with some message for Miss Ruth, who went in with him, and soon out from the conservatory hurried Hannibal Lepsius, holding Healy by the sleeve, leading him to the terrace’s brink, where he caused him to sit with a warning finger. The next instant he himself was off with the fleetest feet the way that Miss Eve had disappeared, tossing aside in his flight the Bible brought him by the other sister into the basin of water where the sun-dial stands, and as he vanished I, too, though with a shivering in my right knee which shook me throughout, rushed toward the house-back, and out into the top part of the garden, all my heart in a conflagration and tremble of haste to break into some outrageous row, and shout my wrongs.

I thought I heard talking down there at the bottom of the garden, and, bottling up my rage, shivering, I crawled like a snail down the three steps into a garden-walk which lay between bowers and arches made of box-twigs. There the voice of the boy again reached me, clearly now; so down another path on my right I prowled to its end, and now could see them down there at the bottom by the seat, he on his knees to Miss Eve like a very slave, she standing still, looking not at him, but at the north shrubbery-wall with a frown on her brow, while round in cruises above head a white owl, I remember, was moving smoothly about in the moonlight, like a musing spirit cruising: for I somehow observed each little object, just as a person in going to the guillotine does, I have heard; and I observed that, though the previous day there had been bristles on his cheeks, he was at present clean-shaven, and I observed that Miss Eve's handkerchief, which she had dropped, hung from the young man's right ear; and I observed that he offered her earnestly the one half of a halfpenny, or of a penny, at which she would not look. Then I saw her lips speak, and she pointed southward, enjoining him, it seemed, to leave her, upon which up the boy sprang, and was now about, I believe, to seize her body, but all at once now was in flight — along the alley down which I was peeping! Why in flight I could not conjecture, till suddenly I saw Monsieur le Comte de Courcy appear from the north walk, with his cane uplifted in the air. He, it seems, pacing with two ladies in the north shrubbery, and seeing through the gate, may be, a male without a jacket molesting Miss Eve, had run to protect her, at which the young man, ever fearful of his “Man,” had taken to his heels; and before ever I could raise my self up to run, he, raining his steps, had pelted by me, looking back over his shoulder at Monsieur de Courcy. He seemed, when his eyes fell upon me, to see me there without surprise; and on some way he still ran, more and more slowly now, however, looking back always at Monsieur de Courcy who, cane in air, was pursuing him. But all at once the boy, making only loitering steps that halted, almost stopped, amazement painted on his face — that he was so inefficiently chased, I take it; amazement, and also, though he always smiled, a terror which stretched his nostrils as the cane of Monsieur the Minister came. I stood awe-struck at it! and Miss Eve, too, appeared to be apprehensive of something fearful, for she tripped some distance in Monsieur the Minister’s rear, and once called out after him. He, however, seemed not to hear her: still on came his great bulk of body, the cane, the eye-glass and glassy shirt-front, till he was quite near the turning in which I lurked, his teeth grinning white to bite his cigarette between them. But he never advanced as far forward as my turning: all at once Hannibal Lepsius was at him; and in that instant of bewilderment, ere one’s wits could decide what had been done, or in what way done, one was aware of the cane of Monsieur the Minister wheeling high away up in the air, up where the owl wound its flight, while the Minister himself was now on the ground, and his cigarette, no longer in his mouth, now stuck out of one nostril, the glowing end upward.... Oh, I was smitten with compunction for Monsieur de Courcy, he a man of so much culture — and with a feeling of affright! he being one whose anger it must be a truly grievous thing to bring upon oneself.... As Miss Eve hurried to him, I ran off.... The young man also had vanished, appalled, as I imagine, at the enormity of his defiance of his “Man and when I ran out to the terraces, neither of him nor of Healy was any trace to be seen, nor when I ran down to his river-cave.... I came back up lagging and agued, yes, trembling throughout in a kind of ague-fit....

Then, till my bell summoned me at midnight, I lay sullen, and, as it were, dead, though uttering a sob anon. But soon after midnight I had my mistress in my hands before the mirror, had already made ready her hair, and now after massage with the preparation, was getting on her night-gloves, when she remarks to me, “What is the matter? Your fingers quiver,” and I then replied to her, “Miss Vickery, this is because I have it on my mind to inform you that I am about to leave your service in a hurry, since I am about to be married.” I expected to feel her start a little, but even in that electric blaze of the two candelabra I could detect no surprise in her, and oh, these English with their cold spleens, how one dislikes them! She muttered to me, “Don’t be agitated; when do you go?” did not even inquire who was that future-one of mine. But as it was mainly in order to proclaim this to her that I had spoken, I made the remark, “I believe, Miss Vickery, that you have even seen my future-one, who is that young Individual named Hannibal Lepsius” — whereat as when a nerve leaps a little, it appeared certain to me that her hand stirred in mine: and I was pleased within myself at this.

She asked not one question, but I now informed her frankly of everything, how, in his passion for me, after seeing me in the bushes, the young man had swum aboard the yacht, how I had hidden him, brought him hither, and now was about to receive the bishop’s licence to marry him — keeping meantime a sharp eye of observation upon her face in the mirror: but beyond a little raising up of her palms once as in amazement, she listened calmly, making no remark; only, the moment I stopped, up she stood, went to the large wardrobe, and now began prodigally to shower out her gowns, gown after gown, upon the arm-chair for my wedding-gift, so that I stood agape at the largesse of her busy arm, and this sharp shower of her bounty — quite a thousand pounds, as I now count — for out, too, with the others flew that pearl grey, the ermine stole, that orchid-mauve silk with the spotted poplin, and now the China silk tea-gown with the Valenciennes insertions, and that great creation for the Coaching Club Meet last year, only that once worn. “And are all these really for me, Miss Vickery?” I said to her in the midst of it; “you are truly good and gracious, Miss Vickery,” I said, to which she made no answer, but continued to rain her largesse with a scornful arm. I had to make three journeys out of the chamber, submerged beneath these riches, and comforted inwardly of the pangs that rankled in me. Even when I supposed that I had taken out everything, the stole was still left, and when I now stepped in softly for this from behind the portière, I came upon the lady standing there as naked now as a lily, her outlines all slenderly long-drawn as by the pencil of a stripling painter who has never yet ventured, save in his dreamings, to be voluptuous, and she appeared to stand tip-toe stretched to spurn and desert this earth, and return to her heavens. Suddenly, chancing to catch sight of me behind her, all that marble was washed in one blush, as though I was he upon whom perhaps her heart was musing.

CHAPTER IX.

“VITRIOLISERAI.”

THE NEXT MORNING he was gone, he was not there in the cave, and as for the man, Healy, he was not there, and where to seek I knew not at all: only the thing like a telescope was there in the cave, the thing like a trap, the dead creature's remains, the stone which he has hollowed into a vase, and under some rubbish and leaves in a corner the thing like an ink-bottle that he has called a “stele”: but all the bread, etc., that I had brought him he had either eaten or taken away.

Eaten, may be; but, if not eaten, whither, I asked myself — with this food — was he off to? Ah, many questions I asked myself; and then, hurrying across the bridge, went to the cottage of Mrs. Bream, with whom Healy was lodging, to ask if the man did not sleep there the previous night; but she said no, he had merely come in, together with a stripling who wore sandals, to take away his bag, saying, however, that he would be back to her in some days; and he had taken the 10.20 up-train with this stripling, who had wished to know of her, poor sinner, if she did not know even so much as the names of the mountains in the moon.

Upon this, seeing me near to fainting, she made me sip a little of a white wine made, she said, out of cowslips. I was not, however, wholly without hope, since Healy, who is clearly a captive, and probably but repeated his master's words, had promised to return; nor did I believe that the man could mean to deceive, since he seems an honest-minded person. To this, then, I clung; though that the boy should fly off thus wildly to London without breathing anything of it to me who am his sweetheart seemed hard — to London, I assumed! for that 10.20 train stops only at Gloucester and Swindon before London, and I thought that he may have wished to behold the capital. Indeed, this is probable: for the conviction has clearly been growing upon him that his “Man,” hereabouts, at all events, is hardly all that he has thought him; and I guess that the feebleness of such a magnate as Monsieur the Minister of the Interior in that encounter in the garden may have sent him flying off to the capital to find out once and for all how things actually are. What, then, I asked myself, would be his opinion of it all? Would what he there saw fascinate or in any other way keep him from returning to me? Would not Healy find the means to communicate with Dr. Lepsius, or in some way to kidnap and immure the young man? Ah, many, many questions I asked myself....

The 26th. It was vindictive of Monsieur de Courcy to give information to the police as to his grievance against the young man, which, after all, was hardly very grave; but his no doubt is one of those hard brows that hardly ever forgive. At any rate, this morning an “inspector” demanded to interview me with regard to the whereabouts of the young man, my relation with whom, owing to my haste to crow my marriage, is already known throughout the household, just as the fact that Miss Eve is in negotiation with a lady for a new maid is well known to everyone....

My God! what is to become of me now, my good God? Have I not conducted myself like a light-headed young girl who has not yet learned to govern her nerves or her tongue, who skips into enthusiasm at the first music, and boasts beforehand of shadows as though they were substances? At any rate, I had to confess to this constable my complete ignorance of my bridegroom’s movements, whereupon he, getting up to go, said to me,

“Well, we shall make it hot for him if he dares show his nose about here again.”

The 27th. But is he such a blackguard, or is his scorn of me so great, that he cannot even write me a line to say that I am never again to see him? Still not even a line, and Miss Eve this morning would not let me do her hands, but ordered me to bed, I looked so bad. I went, but had to get up to go to St. Arven's to receive the marriage-licence, after which I took the train, as directed, to Wynton, to give notice of it to the registrar there; and now any day after to-morrow, this gentleman told me, I may be married: a statement that made me in coming down the stairs break bitterly out into tears.... In passing through Wynton I procured myself at the chemist's a vial of vitriol....

The 28th. Again to-day I was several hours in bed with my headache, Miss Ruth coming at noon to read aloud to me a fairy-tale named The Pilgrim's Progress, and after luncheon comes Miss Eve also to sit five minutes at my bedside. It was in going away, when she had reached the door, that she stopped and said, “And as to your marriage?” whereupon I too rashly indulged my shame with the falsehood that I had that very morning received a communication from my future-one, assuring me that he would immediately be here to be mine.... The house is now empty of guests, the two Gordons having departed this morning....

The 29th. Well, dear Lord, he is here, and I thank you. I now write at six in the morning, after having spent a nearly sleepless night with him and Healy, and still with no desire to close my eyes. By tomorrow evening we shall have been secretly and safely married, and within a week I shall have taken farewell of this my life here....

I was in the housekeeper's room alone, for Mrs. Bowden had gone up, it being long past midnight, and I was lying on the sofa, the vial of vitriol beside me on the table, for I had been foolishly fingering it, when there came a tapping at that back door which opens upon the passage. I get up, I go to it, I open it.... And it was he! Oh, my wild one with wings, with the light of life flying wildly in his eyes, it was he! and while one might reckon three I stood breathless, then with a cry was on his breast.

His nature is not yet coaxed over into tolerating the luxury of kissing, and even in the ecstasy of our meeting his chastity shrank from the touch of my lips; but, my faith, that will soon be “al-right”! and he patted my shoulder fondly, even while hurriedly saying, “I need light for an hour or two.”

I was too much flurried to attend to what he said! I cooed to him,” And is it actually true that you have come back to me?”

“Yes, yes, let me get in,” he mutters hurriedly, and now, seizing Healy by the sleeve, hurries in into the housekeeper’s room. He had climbed outside, and spied me alone in there through the window, Healy told me afterwards.

But his air was much changed! all bustle now, business, and aloofness from one! When I now said to him, “But where, then, have you been?” he mutters to Healy, “Just answer her questions, and see that she speaks in whispers,” and instantly sits to the table, places on it that ink-bottle “stele” of his that he had left in the cave, takes a magnifying-glass out of his shirt, and begins to gaze through it at the marks that are cut in the stone.

“But tell me—” I began to say to him, when “Sh-h-h!” breathes Healy into my ear, “I’ll tell you,” and draws me away to a corner, where he whispers me, “Mum, can you offer a body such a thing as a bite of something? He” — indicating Hannibal Lepsius with his thumb—” can do without food and sleep, but that’s a bit more than I can bring off, anyway.”

I made him sit, stole out, and in five minutes was back with bread, meat, cheese, and a bottle of beer. Hannibal Lepsius at this time could no more be said to be sitting, but was half over the table, one knee on the chair, poring with greed over that “stele,” as if he would eat it with his gaze. I was about to say something to him, when my ear was afresh reached by the sh-h-h of Healy, like a whispering of leafage fretted by a zephyr; so I placed the victuals on Healy’s knees, sat before him, and commenced to question him; but it was many minutes before his stuffed mouth could bring out a syllable.

“Why were you so famished?” I asked him, “since you had money to pay railway-fare?”

With his lips at my ear, he answered: “It was a question of time, mum — no time to eat, no time to sleep; but that’s good meat, that is, and that’s good beer, too.”

“Was he, then, in such a hurry to return to his marriage?” I asked.

The man looked at me under his eyes — strangely, I thought — and replied, “I know nothing of that, mum; but we went to see London, and we saw it in a tear, I tell you, and we left it in a tear, for by the end of the third day London had got a bit too hot for us.”

“Why, how was that?” I asked him.

“Truth is,” he whispered, “some of us have been putting into our pockets more than what belongs to us!”

“What!” I said.

“Sh-h-h,” he went.

Mrs. Bowden’s clock just then struck one, and glancing round at it, I beheld Hannibal Lepsius bent yet further over the table, poring upon that stone, and heard him whimper over it as if in pain.

“What is he doing?” I whispered to Healy.

“Lord knows, mum,” he whispered back.

“So the London police were after him?”

“That’s so.”

“What a thing!” I said in awe.

“Thrice in three days!” he whispered; “aye, and that second time it was a close go with us, too, seeing that he wouldn’t let go hold of me — a thousand people after us through London streets, if there was one, and he dragging me, thinking that I am against him, too, and want to betray him. That’s hard, too, that’s hard. Here am I, mum, Dr. Lepsius’ servant — I’d give this hand for the doctor — yet keeping the lad dark from the doctor, going against the doctor, mind, knowing that I am doing wrong, but no more able to help it than a man addicted to liquor, I am that given up to the lad; yet he keeps me as his prisoner, I who’d race after him to hell; thinks I want to run away and betray him to everybody, can’t believe in a motive that’s not selfish, it’s hard.”

“You haven’t, then, written to tell his father that you have found him?” I asked.

“God forgive me, no,” he answered with a bent head; “though I have had chances to do it, too, mum, and the doctor must be in as much of a wonder what’s come to me as what’s come to Master Hanni. God forgive me! for never I’ll forgive myself on this side Jordan. And all to pleasure the lad — but he can’t see it, keeps me as a prisoner, it’s hard.”

“But what did he do in London? what did he think of the ladies there? was he really chased by the London people?” I asked, for I could not whisper my questions fast enough to satisfy my inquisitiveness.

Healy answered yes, that the sandals and bauge shirt of Shunter Island had been chased with hue and cry all up Tottenham Court Road at midday, and twice by night in other places; and that not the London police only were after him, for that he had no sooner stepped from the train down here than a constable laid hands on him; but he had filliped the constable in the face, and run away, making to the cave to get the “stele,” which he seemed to be extremely eager to get, and then had run up here, dragging Healy with him.

“And he actually filliped the constable?” I said to Healy: “he is no longer, then, at all in awe of his ‘Man’?”

Healy grinned a grimace to himself, and throwing up his hands a little, whispered to me, “All idiots! that was the verdict on the second night — about eight o’clock, mum, drizzling, hazy night, he and I sitting in one of those recesses of Waterloo Bridge, and over the river a sight, mum, greatly like a fairyland going on in a haze, with that host of lights.... So he sits awhile there, weary from the two days’ tear, looking at the traffic rolling over the bridge; then getting up on the seat, he leans over the parapet; and presently, as he was there looking down upon the river, I hear him say to himself ‘idiots,’ and then I hear him say ‘all, all,’ with a sort of wail, shaking his head a bit, and then I see him bury his face in his hands, and a sound came out of him that at first was more like crying, but afterwards was more like laughing; and from that minute he was eager to get back down here to his cave.”

I looked round at Hannibal Lepsius, and now saw his body all across the table, with one knee also on it, for, in the keenness of his strain as to that “stele,” he had been pushing it inch by inch from him and following it; and now his brow was all brown and engorged, his eyes were glaring at the object like a maniac’s, and now also a sort of groan broke out of his breast.

When I turned back to Healy to continue our conversation, I found that during those few moments that I had been looking away his brow had dropped in sleep; and I was just disengaging from his fingers the glass that he had been drinking from lest he should drop it, when I became aware of a tapping at the little door at the back. I stole out to it, I opened it, and now, heavens! my soul faints within me when I behold standing there the big Inspector Gibbon, together with that graceful young constable of Thring with the moustache, whose name is Shooter.

“We have found him at last,” remarks Inspector Gibbon, for they had seen the light, climbed a little by the spout outside, and seen the young man poring over the stele.

“But what has he done?” I asked them, with a trembling about my right knee, hearing, as I asked it, Mrs. Bowden’s clock strike twice.

“There are no less than five counts against him,” answered Inspector Gibbon, “three from London, two down here; let’s have the beauty out” — and he steps within the doorway.

At once now with a wild heart I darted back into Mrs. Bowden’s room, to whisper to the young man, “I am afraid that two officers are come to arrest you!”

He groaned, without glancing up from his poring over that stone. I waited several seconds, hearing the clock tick, and my own heart as loudly pounding. Healy also, who had started awake, now sat staring with an open mouth.

“What shall I say to the two officers?” I asked the young man.

Again he groaned grievously, but did not glance up at me, and again I stood in suspense some seconds; till now he in an absent way, still without glancing up, mumbled at me, “Bring them here.”

I ran out, and found the officers already at the door: in another moment they were standing within the housekeeper’s room. Hanni Lepsius was now on his feet awaiting them, and the instant they appeared he stepped up to them, saying, “Now, I wish you to take me; take me — only be swift.”

“You are a beauty—” Inspector Gibbon began to say, taking the young man by one arm, while Shooter took him by the other; but Hannibal Lepsius cut short his words, saying to him, “Yes, I know: you all delight in the waste of time, the waste of words. But come, take me, and I shall know now with certainty whether you are of the smallest worth.” The boy now pointed out of the back door at the old oak tree that stands there in the courtyard about twelve yards from the door. “You see that oak tree,” he said to them: “only get me past that, and not only will I go with you the rest of the way to prison, but four hundred pounds which I stole in London shall be for your private use” — and how earnestly he spoke to them; turning from one to the other, instilling his meaning into their ears as into the ears of people hard of hearing, while they calmly smiled upon him with a contempt for him equal to his concern for them. “You are poor,” he told them, “ah, poor even to meanness, even to shame; and here in this pocket is the money. Rouse yourselves now, then! Ask yourselves, ‘How can he escape us?’ Not by strength! — each of you is as strong as I. By craft, then? Surely, only by craft!” — turning from one to the other, pleading earnestly at the ear of each in turn. “But there are at most only six possible ways,” he said, “in which, by craft, even a lord of Mars or Venus, I think, could escape you. Think in lightning — now of those ways! Rouse, rouse yourselves!

Oh, rouse, rouse, now, all those dark powers that profoundly drowse in your soul! Look round the room: for the means by which I choose to escape lie here before your face; nor are you idiots born, your brain has the same bulk, your reason is equal to mine, only it deeply sleeps — oh, dull, dull, dull — and wakefulness is bliss, wakefulness is life—”

“Oh, come, no more of it,” now said Inspector Gibbon, interrupting him with a good-natured disdain, drawing the young man away; and Hannibal Lepsius uttered no other word.

They took him to the back door, Healy and I following mutely behind, and down the two steps they went, and across the yard toward the oak tree and the swing-gate that is close by the south garden-wall. The moon was about at her full in a sky without one cloud in it, so that I could see that the boy's right foot, as he walked, was drawing part of the coil of rope from the stables which generally lies just there by the back door; and I whispered to Healy, "He has got his leg entangled in the rope!"

They were by this time not three feet from the old oak tree, Inspector Gibbon at the young man's right arm, Shooter at the left, keeping a strong grip, I could see, and a cautious guard, since they had been so warned; nor had I, for my part, the least expectation of seeing him escape them ere they reached the tree, or indeed at any time; but all at once, just as they reached the tree, without even the least effort I now beheld him easily free; and the next instant one saw a sight! — the two constables all entangled, and Hannibal Lepsius running furiously round and round the tree, ever with every revolution at a shorter distance from it, the rope in his hand, roping with many whorles the two men to the tree. I never was so curiously affected, I think, by any sight — with a feeling of religion and hallelujah, I may say, the two men's bulk of flesh looking so abject and helpless in the hands of that wit, like hippopotami with their insignificant skulls: though how he had contrived to escape out of their grasp without a struggle I still had no idea. To tie their hands, their arms being already bound, was to him not the work of a minute, and suddenly he was rushing back to the house, dashed inward past Healy and me without a word, and by the time we two had returned to Mrs. Bowden's room, he was already whining and whimpering anew over his stone, as if nothing had happened.

"But in what way — ?" I began to say to him, when Healy's "sh-h-h" again checked my tongue; so in the corner Healy and I discussed in agitated whispers what had taken place. When I asked Healy if he knew in what manner the young man had escaped the police, he answered by asking me, "What's in that little bottle on the table?"

At this I felt myself fly red to the roots of my hair! for he meant the vial of vitriol which, procured at Wynton on the 27th, I have been foolishly fingering ever since.

“How should I know what is in the vial?” I said to Healy.

“Well, whatever it is,” he said, “it is something that makes cloth rotten in a tick, for when you went out to tell the officers to come in, he dipped a match into the vial, drew with the match a circle on each of his shirt sleeves, and now, you see, the two pieces of shirt have disappeared” — and in truth the young man’s arm nearest me was showing through a hole in his shirt, so I understood that by the working of the vitriol the two pieces of shirt had come away in the policemen’s hands. I had begun to say, “Well, it was not so wonderful, after all, now that one knows how—” when one of the bound men began to shout out for succour; upon which Hanni Lepsius groaned within himself over his stone, and, without glancing up, told Healy to go and give them to know that if they made but one other outcry before the daybreak he would gag and agonise them; so Healy hastened out to say this, and thenceforth the two men remained mum.

After this Healy and I talked in our corner till the clocks tolled three, by which time both our heads were ready to nod, our words dried up, and still on in the soundless night worked Hanni Lepsius over that stone. I did not hear four strike, for I was in a little sleep; but immediately after half-past four I heard, or dreamed that I heard, a laugh somewhere, and I started awake, aware that his study of the stone was over, and that he was standing at my side.

At once, as I opened my eyes, he handed me the vial of vitriol, bowing a little, and smiling.

“What is this?” I asked him.

“It is oil of vitriol,” replies the boy.

I ought, if I had had my wits, to have asked him why he handed it to me, but, being only half-awake and confused, I foolishly took the thing and put it down without finding a word to say; and I saw his gaze linger strangely upon me. Then he said, "I am very hungry."

I ran and fetched him bread, cheese, and water, for he will eat no meat; and it was while eating that he asked me whether I had with me those two hundred pounds which I had told him that I had hoarded. I replied that I had with me ninety pounds only; he then demanded of me if I had this in metal or in notes, and on my replying "in notes," he said that he desired to see at once what a banknote is like, and would I run and bring him the money that he might see. Proud to do him a pleasure, though it was a journey through the house at that hour, I light my candle, I set off, and soon return with my roll of notes. He sat with them, fingering, holding them up to the gas, while I, with my hand on his shoulder, remarked that all that was to begin our little ménage, informed him that everything had been arranged for our marriage, and asked him when that little affair was to be. His answer was that it should be that very day at two o'clock, and I felt my heart start once and cease to beat, my right knee trembling like a string. While I stood thus agitated behind him, he examining the banknotes, requests me to give him an envelope; so I go to Mrs. Bowden's desk, I get an envelope, and, as I give this to him, he hands me back my roll of notes, takes the envelope, puts into it a piece of tissue-paper, on which he had written some words with a stump of blue pencil, fastens the envelope, and with the pencil writes on it the words, "To Eve Vickery."

I started! and I started anew when he said to me, "Hand this to that lady when she awakes."

"But what do you mean?" I said, shrinking from him; "do you, then, wish to outrage me? and do you suppose that I would do such a thing, really?”

“You will,” he said; and to Healy, “Come.”

“But stay!” I cried; “at what hour of the day do I see you?...

He was already at the door of the room, but came back a little, saying, “At noon; and the marriage at two” — whereupon he anew picks up the vial of vitriol from the table, hands it to me, and goes through the doorway — the good God only knows why he did this.

I darted after, caught him at the back door, and, casting my arms about him, wet his cheek with my kisses and tears. He made no remark, save to say, “Do not release those police until twenty minutes past five”; and he went.

The moon had set, and the new day hardly yet dawning, but I could see him go past the oak tree without a glance at the two prisoners, and go away like ghosts, he and his Healy, through the swing-gate close by the south garden-wall.

I had then to sit up till twenty past five, as he had said, to release the police, when I brought them in, gave them some breakfast, and impressed it upon them that it was useless for them to seek him, since he was “gone away,” I said; and even if he was not, they could never get him, I said: a statement which they seemed to believe, for they were very dejected and shivering.

It is now near seven, and here I still sit, even now not sleepy, for this is the day of my life. What is in my heart? Is it peace? Is it dancing? I think I have a fear....

It will soon be time to be at Miss Eve’s bedside. Of course, I shall not give her the envelope, though he said with assurance that I will; but I have not as yet opened it to see what is in it, for I fear his consciousness of things.... There is something solid in it, like the half of a halfpenny, and a chain....

The 29th, at nine in the night. He has robbed me of my savings, he has abandoned me, he is gone for ever!... No, my God, I cannot write, my head cannot hold itself up.

The 30th. I will vitriolise him. God knows, that will not be easy, he has many eyes, it will be almost impossible: but those great men who make discoveries which amaze the creation — in what manner do they accomplish this? I think it is not because their wits are so vastly more than those of ordinary folk, but because their lives are wholly devoted to one thing only, as my life henceforth will be wholly devoted to this alone. God help me in this; it will be only after years of effort that I can even hope to do it, but one day, if God be my Helper, it will be done “al-right.”

When at two yesterday he could not be anywhere found, I opened with steam the envelope addressed to Miss Eve, and found that he had written on the piece of tissue-paper in it the words, “Beldam Eve, farewell for two years, from your slave for ever, Hannibal Lepsius. Please tell Jeanne Auvache where I have laid her money.” The meaning of this last phrase I could not for fully an hour make any sense of, since my brain was reeling round and round; then it occurred to me to look anew at the roll of notes that he had handed me back, and when I now flew to them, I found that only the two outer ones were now notes, all within being mere stuffing of tissue-paper. For a long time I lay on the floor by the trunk, feeling myself ruined, for the loss of even a franc has always appeared irreparable to me, and here were two thousand francs departed by fraud, for ever, out of my life. But after a time I thought of the words in the note to Miss Eve, “Please tell Jeanne Auvache where I have laid her money,” and without stopping to ask myself how Miss Eve could know this, I picked myself up to run straight to her with the note, no more caring whether she noticed that I had opened it, for I cared for nothing. First, however, I tried to detach the half-coin from the note — it was the half of a sovereign which had been split in two, and through a hole in it passed one of those little chains such as medallions are hung from round infants' necks; but he had artfully gummed the half-coin to the tissue-paper just by the words "please tell Jeanne Auvache," and, as I could not get away the coin without tearing the paper, I ran with the whole to Miss Eve in the eagerness of my hope to get back my money — forgetting at the moment that this was even what that fiend had foretold that I would do. Miss Eve was in her boudoir alone, reading in her rocking-chair, and suddenly, without rapping, I was there before her, holding out the note and chain. She lifts her eyes, and instantly a faint flush flew to suffuse her face. "What is it?" says she, taking the thing, and in one moment her eyes had run over the words, she had thrown the note aside with a little motion of the wrist in a little hurry, like one brushing off a fly, and was anew perusing her book.

"Miss Vickery," I said, "can you tell me where my money is laid?"

Anew she lifts her eyes, looks at me silently, and from that look I knew at once that that phrase in the note had only been put into it so as to ensure that Miss Eve should receive the note; for he knew that I would open the envelope, and that Miss Eve knew nothing as to where my money is, for how could she? My money is in his pocket, that is where my money is, my two thousand francs.

The 31st. I was not allowed to get out of bed today, and ah, these English, they are frigid, they are hard on the surface, but beneath they are tenderer and better than all the world. I expected that Miss Ruth would lavish the compassion of her ever-wounded bosom upon my grief, but I have been even deeper touched by the goodness of Miss Eve. When, in one of the paroxysms, I cried, "Miss Vickery, I will vitriolise, I will vitriolise him, if it is in fifteen years to come!" she, with a look that flashed anger at me, began to say, "You shameful woman!" but then rushed to the bed and warmly embraced me in her arms, murmuring many times in words of wooing, "Poor bruised heart, poor wounded woman," with water swimming in her eyes, while I wept on her. A French lady would not have kissed me on the lips.... In the afternoon when I knew that she was below, I stole from bed, and, creeping to her boudoir, peeped in to see if the tissue-paper note with the half of a sovereign was yet on the card-table, whither she had brushed it from her; but it had vanished.

The 2nd. I must go away, and in haste, since this holy house is no place for me to linger one hour in, with my heart all a nest of hissing asps. I recognise it to be an incongruity, as a devil in disguise in high heaven might be. Miss Eve would have me revoke the notice to leave that I have given her: but I will go. In truth, thy youth is over, Jeanne, thy last hope of happiness has perished, thy very last rose is ashes. Is it not certainly a dog's world? and I will get back into it black and bitter, a hag at heart, bidding goodbye to the time of bloom, to all beauties of youth, abandoning my being recklessly to rancour and wrinkles, decay and tragedy and destruction. I do not care, I will vitriolise him, if he live as high from me as the sky, and within a week, I swear it, will have left this place and these people....

CHAPTER X.

“THE MOON.”

THE NARRATIVE OF Jeanne Auvache, which continues yet through three volumes, may here be dropped, and what else took place may be gleaned from the “Memoirs” of Monsieur Goncourt Leflô (Prefect of the Seine), and from the “Notes” of Said Pasha (Chargé d’Affaires), together with jottings and gossips of other witnesses.

In that place which used, I think, to be called “La Plage,” but is now the Club des Décavés, a crowd one afternoon sat surveying the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne. (The Décavés is far up at the top of the Avenue by the Arc de Triomphe, from which point the throngs of bicyclists who have toiled up the incline of the Champs Elysées put their legs up, give themselves to God, and by Him are taken gaily down the long-drawn-out incline to the Bois, like boats in the river of carriages which rolls droning down.) It was an afternoon in June, and everyone who knows his “capital of the universe” at all knows that sight, whose mood, in its large-minded worldliness, is rather to be recalled than to be described.

The Décavés itself, with people coming, going, sitting, sipping, gossiping, was a scene of no little vivacity; and to a new-corner, as he stepped up, one of a group of three said eagerly, “You have heard, Leflô?”

“Well, naturally, one has heard,” answered Monsieur Leflô, the Prefect, as he sat, “inasmuch as one cannot dodge the omnipresent, and all Paris is talking of it.”

“But what an indiscretion!” cried Monsieur Isabeau Thiéry.

“A public embrace at the Foreign Office, my friends! “ added the Abbé Sauriau, his plump palms spread a little.

“But, then, everything is possible at the Foreign Office,” remarked the Prefect of the Seine: “above all, dizziness of the head.”

“This, however, my friends,” now said the old Due de Rey-Drouilhet, “is an incident, not of the Third Republic, but of the Second Empire! Transfer the scene to the Bal Morel, and the lady might have been Païva, as the male Plon-Plon,” whereat Isabeau Thiéry shook backward his lion’s mane of hair with, “It may be an incident of the Third Empire, which we see beginning — unless by chance a patriot or two still exists in France.” (“He was” — to quote from the “ Notes” of Saïd Pasha— “one of the tribe of poet-politicians — the Hugos, Lamartines, Châteaubriands — and though neither his poetry, nor even his politics, was at all equal to theirs, Thiéry, as we know, took himself awfully seriously, excelling them all, since not in head, at any rate in hair, in his spread of hat-rim and La Vallière cravat, whose crimson hue proved him “ of the Left.”)

“But was it Lepsius who did this? “ now said the Abbé Sauriau, his tumbler of byrrh brought half-way up to his broad mouth: “ Lepsius, the Nazarene, reeling beneath the mead of Venus! This Puritan, whose existence is presumed to be made up of a race with the sun, to whom a speck of dust appears a heap of leprosy, and the loss of a minute the loss of a province?... This Lepsius, indeed, is a myth. he has contrived by chance to create in men’s minds a Lepsius-Phantasm, as there is a ‘Napoleonic Legend’; but oh, if he had but a real existence! Who in that case, my friends, could fail to revere this furious reaper of the tickings of the clock, who lives with one eye on a second-hand, and with the other, I am told, on a pyramid of thrones? Do you know the story that is told of what he replied to Proudhon ainé, who at that time was one of the quaestors of the Chamber, when Proudhon said to him, ‘ Tomorrow, monsieur, it shall be done’? The answer of Lepsius — as they say — was, ‘Monsieur, believe me, to-day is each man’s last, last chance, for it will be doubly impossible for him to effect to-morrow just that which he may effect to-day, since to-morrow it will be all an altered world, he an altered man in it.’... Is it he, my friends, whom we find engaging in an amour so touched with giddiness that it may not wait for privacy?”

“A propos of ‘the clock,’” remarked the old Due de Rey-Drouilhet, his little hand all aflash with diamonds in the sunshine, “Freycinet *fi*ls is said to have remarked this afternoon at Tortoni’s that then at least, during the kiss, Monsieur Lepsius lost reckoning of the clock, seeing that his eyes were tight closed! And it is now being said round about the Palais-Bourbon of Cardinal Pontmartin, who has declared that the kiss lasted a minute and eight seconds by the clock, ‘How could the Prelate have seen the clock, when those holy eyes of his must have been poring upon Paradise revealed before them!’ — a mot at which the titter and grin of the beau set his (!) teeth atremble with a rather ghastly glitter on his gums.

“But as to the lady—” Isabeau Thiéry began to say at the same moment that the old gossip exclaimed, “Here comes Saïd Pasha, one of the keenest listeners and best observers in Paris” — and a brown man with a firm lip, perfectly turned out, came up to the table, the duke observing to him, “Monsieur, one is conscious from the very blush of your boots that you bring with you much that is new.”

“But, Monsieur le Duc, they were not polished by myself,” replied Saïd Pasha innocently — a reply which raised a smile I since everybody knew that the duke, in the course of a very varied career, had had need to be his own menial.

“In any case, you can enlighten us as to the identity of the lady who is on the tapis in connection with a certain individual,” said Isabeau Thiéry to Saïd Pasha, who at that time was generally supposed to be in quite the inner coterie of the Palais-Lepsius; but in the same instant that the staid and cautious chargé d’affaires was asking what lady was meant, the due was saying, “Here, too, comes Monsieur the Englishman,” and one Mr. E. Reader Meade, an attaché at the Faubourg St. Honoré, walked up — a man who, because of his bulk, and of that mass of face on which was written “phlegm” and “judgment,” was often in the Paris of that day nicknamed “the Englishman.” As he approached, the aged gossip, holding up his eye-glass before a dilapidated eye, made the observation, “But do I read aright in Monsieur Meade’s air that he is unaware of anything having happened?”

“Very possibly, Monsieur le Duc,” replied the Englishman, sitting down, “since I only arrived from London an hour ago” — at which confession of benightedness, in a moment the old Due de Rey-Drouilhet was at Meade’s ear, leaning over, tittering forth the story with no little vivacity — Soirée last night H the Quai d’Orsay — all the Faubourg St. Honoré there, much of the Faubourg St. Germain itself, not to mention a Chaussée d’Antin mob — in the grand salon the quadrille d’honneur had already begun, the Prince of Wales the partner of Madame la Ministre — out in the vestibule, moving in, a crowd — in its midst the young Lepsius and his usual retinue — also a lady, supposed to be English, who at any rate was under the chaperonage of the English Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard; this lady and a certain individual gradually work together through the throng, by accident, say some, by design or blind desire, say others — do not, however, seem to see each other — move on with the crowd, shoulder to shoulder, without speech or look — till for some reason two of the electric jets chance to go dark, leaving the vestibule in partial gloom, whereupon that pale dark face of a certain individual turns toward the lady's pale fair face — the lady's pale face turns somewhat toward his — and, according to Cardinal Pontmartin, who was quite near the pair, their wide and wild eyes stare awhile at each other with a stare of scare, of even the extreme of terror, as in apprehension of some impending crash and catastrophe — until now the lips of Lepsius pounce upon the lady's — nor does the good girl turn hers away, gives herself gallantly up to the vertigo and whirl of it, smiling though white, her eyes closed, his eyes closed — the crowd looking on in an amazement so profound, that Cardinal Pontmartin had since declared that his hair could not but have stood on end, if he had had any, as beyond all question would the hair of the good Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard, if it had been real.”

“And we who imagined that Society under the Third Empire was destined to be as earnest and bourgeoise as was that under the Citizen Monarchy,” remarked Isabeau Thiéry with sarcasm when the old duke had concluded the story, to which Mr. E. Reader Meade replied with a smile, “But what can be more ‘bourgeois’ than kissing, monsieur, or more ‘earnest ‘ than such a kiss?”

“Such a kiss,” the Abbé Sauriau said, “is a proof, my friends, of nothing save of Lepsius’ disdain of mankind, since he certainly weighed the thirty or so pairs of eyes which observed that kiss as lightly as lovers on a stile weigh the eyes of kine which watch them. Do you know the story that is told of his answer to Marshal Macintosh, à propos of the Marshal’s remark that a foreigner, even after a hundred years, is never regarded and behugged by the French as a Frenchman? Lepsius replied, ‘It may be nice to be loved, monsieur, but what is nicer far is to be disliked, to behold yourself surrounded by people thirsting like Tantalus to hurt you, and to behold them powerless, because of your towering superiority.’ So you see, my friends: Napoleon regarded men mainly as pawns in his game; Monsieur Lepsius, in his more savant mood, regards them as gorillas in his garden of zoology” — and now the abbé’s eyes shot out beneath his bush of eyebrow a beam of bile, bush that burned, yet was not consumed, while Isabeau Thiéry’s eyes, quick as tinder, caught fire also, for company.

Saïd Pasha, however, with a frown, was saying, “Oh, pardon, Monsieur l’Abbé!... This anecdote of the reply of Monsieur Lepsius to Marshal Macintosh is, indeed, known; but I need hardly remark that to repeat is not quite to prove, and, in fact, the words are so unlike the individual to whom they are attributed, that I have even ventured to assert that they were never uttered by Monsieur Lepsius, the mood of whose converse is usually much more taciturn. As to Monsieur l’Abbé’s mention of gorillas, I think I have the honour to know that Monsieur Lepsius is far too exact an intellect to regard mankind precisely in that light, but rather, let us say, as sons of Hannaman, the ape-god of the Brahmins; and as to the alleged kiss at the Quai d’Orsay, of which, by the way, everyone in Paris is spreading about a different account, I am able to state that its occurrence, if it occurred, was the result of no world-disdain, but simply of one of those magnetic gales that deflect even the needle of the compass. After all, as was said in a certain Orléaniste salon not thirty minutes since, ‘it takes two to make a kiss,’ and since the lady is not accused of world-disdain, I do not see why the male.”

At this Monsieur Leflô — a little quick personality, whose hairs grew like a wig of bristles — ogled Isabeau Thiéry with, “We are all aware that the utiliser of the moon has a champion wherever Saïd Pasha is present!”

“But, Monsieur le Prefect,” said Saïd Pasha, sudden and quick in quarrel, “am I charged with partisanship for aught but the simple truth?”

“No, monsieur,” replied the Prefect dryly, “even though it is a matter of common talk that Saïd Pasha once shed tears of admiration at the sight of a certain individual racing with camels from a sand-storm near Khartoum, and from that moment became a hero-worshipper. So it is said — I was not there. In any case, I beg leave to question the ‘magnetic gale ‘by which you explain this embrace, since I believe that the reason of it is quite a different one than people conceive.”

At this Saïd Pasha’s brow bowed low, with the reply, “We know that Monsieur Leflô is a prefect who is a Fouché and a Réal in one.”

“Oh, as for that,” Leflô answered in his off-hand way,” it requires no spy of the Rue de Jerusalem to recognise the truth that this kiss was no result of vertigo, but of a political purpose.”

“That is only the truth,” added the old Due de Rey-Drouilhet,” since it is certain that a certain individual ‘knows his Paris’ — more perfectly knows it than Napoleon the First, as perfectly perhaps as Napoleon the Third; and knowing that your Parisian, as Victor Hugo has observed, must for ever be grinning the teeth, either in a laugh or in a snarl, the arch-gamester never permits himself to forget that there must be no flagging in the game, since in Paris to be out of sight is to be out of mind, and so seeks continually to épater les gens, keeping himself alive in the public eye by breaking ever anew upon it in a new attitude and costume, and invariably with an éclat whose radiance blinds. No, this gentleman is hardly one of those who like to shine in the dark! If for once in his life he tears his lips from the telephone to apply them to those of a lady, he takes care that there shall be as many eye-witnesses to the event as when some months ago he used to assume the rôle of Haroun al Raschid by appearing in an incognito of rags in the thieves’ kitchens of the Quartier Mouffetard, where he engaged in a knife-fight with a Spaniard, and in a cangiar-fight with two Moors who had attacked him. For here, my friends, we meet with the scenic skill of a Bonaparte in combination with the ambitious mania of a Thiers, Bismarck's steel, that art-genius for Welt-politik of a Cæsar Borgia, and—”

“All possibly true,” interrupted the Abbé Sauriau, “but the thing that this very young man lacks is a certain humanity and nativeness to the world: for a man above the world he may be, since they say so, but one discerns that, with all his worldliness, he is hardly a man of the world. How perfect, how Parisian even, his manners when he likes; but one gleans that they have been but recently acquired, and girt on externally for a purpose, as Cato learned Greek at eighty. He lacks a ne sais quoi which no one lacks. If he laughs, one feels that he has said to himself, ‘Just here I will do a laugh, in order to produce such or such an impression upon this brute-mind.’ All men, indeed, are actors: but Lepsius is an actor who acts acting, like the players in and I am not certain whether he is to be considered the best of the world's actors, or the worst: for ‘the brute-mind’ is frequently not so brute as not to perceive that his art lacks the art to conceal its art, owing to the fact that he shares in the mistake made by each superior mind in deeming the difference between himself and other beings deeper than it really is. Hence, for all his brains, a certain gaucherie in his being, a grimace, a guffaw, in relation to the world, to which he is innately a stranger. How very alien to our humanity, for example, the commercial use which he has proposed of the bodies of the dead, a use which he pretends would solve the world-problem of poverty. On that afternoon, too, when the Moon Company Bill was being introduced, and he in the Centre began to scratch his head with one finger in the manner of Cæsar — a signal to his creature Huguenin on the extreme left to scream, ‘Cæsar! Cæsar! ‘in a bogus tone of indignation — the intention, as everybody knows, was that the whole Chamber should take up the roar and reverberate it through France; but not one soul took it up! The trick was immediately seen through by each French child...!’”

“Yes, last August,” said Mr. E. Reader Meade, gazing away at all the throng and flutter of the scene, “last August, when the individual in question had not yet been two months a factor in politics; but nine biggish months of world-knowledge, of archivesearching, of worming in the Big Book [National Debt Ledger], have since gone by—”

“My friends,” answered the Abbé Sauriau, still with his Jesuit blandness, though his bush burned, “I have quite recently been in personal contact with the individual in question, and still I say that I receive from him, as previously, the impression of a being destitute of humour.... He does not please; he cannot speak to you: for though his memory which, I admit, is no bad one, should render him the best of causeurs, his uneasy feeling that idle speaking is a crime renders him the worst.... Oh, I am not demolishing any idol! Why, my friends, should I? You have lately listened to that charge brought against me in the Chamber by Maître Tombarel, the charge of intellectual egoism and envy. I cannot, it appears, be envious of a Rockefeller or a Mogul, but I go green with envy, it appears, on hearing a great epigram that I did not myself think of making. Well, I deny it.... If to my little books my contemporaries have too amiably granted the name of ‘great,’ does that impede my conceiving the possibility of some brain brighter, greater, being made by Nature? Or, can no mind really conceive, and frankly admit to itself, a mind of better fibre than itself? I — don’t know; or rather! my mind could and would, I am most sure, if — the occasion arose. Thus I can speak, I hope, of the individual in question without spleen; indeed, I have even been touched with a feeling of compassion for this poor boy, so joylessly toiling, all lone and lorn, fatherless, a stone thrown from Utopia — for who could picture him in the rôle of a son? And did he not once say to Freycinet père, ‘Monsieur the Président of the Senate,’ said he, ‘I never had a parent.’ Never, at any rate, a brother being, a friend probably, climbing his mountain-way without quite knowing why or whither, but willy-nilly climbing.... Oh, my friends, it is not through jealousy, but for pity, that men should be busying themselves in bottling up the buzzing of this bee.”

To words so bold no one answered anything, till Isabeau Thiéry observed, “From the bee honey, though, as aroma from the rose, though the former its sting, as the latter its thorn.”

“Ah, monsieur,” answered the Abbé Sauriau, knowing on which nerve to work upon Thiéry, “Brutuses, I fear, are even rarer than Caesars!” whereat, instantly, Isabeau Thiéry, with a new enthusiasm, was crying, “Still, Monsieur l’Abbé, Brutuses — exist!”

“Quite so,” said Mr. Reader Meade, with a twinkling eye on Thiéry, “but could a patriot be the Brutus of a Caesar, whose first work would be a frontier reconstructed ‘as in 1814’?” — words which had the effect of making Thiéry glance gladly at the Englishman with the exclamation, “That, too, is a truth, monsieur!” (“His, Thiéry’s, soul,” says Said Pasha, in his Paris Notes, “was like meadows over which sweep shadows that fleetly succeed each other. He had no self, this man, but only a set of stock concepts, borrowed emotions — provided only that they were pure, enthusiastic, and high-souled.

Hence he was the very serf of certain catchwords! If one breathed ‘Brutus’ nothing could keep the poet-politician from leaping to his feet to butcher Lepsius, if one but breathed ‘as in 1814,’ Thiéry was secretly ready to press Lepsius to his breast.”)

“But,” demands the old Due de Rey-Drouilhet now, smuggling a cachou into his mouth, “where is the guarantee of the promise ‘as in 1814’? Certainly, fancy pictures to us in that workshop of the Palais-Lepsius the models of many a mechanism which will whiff into wind the barricades of the next 18th Brumaire or 2nd of December, to say nothing of the corps d'armée of the Fatherland and the navies of Albion. And, indeed, 'they exist, these legions of ingenious steels! For it was but yesterday that Colonel Doumic, whom Barras, of Public Works, and I met at Bignon's, was dropping hints of another wonderful thing, a 'steerable bullet,' he said, which, it appears, is to be both a bullet and a boat, being made with a hole somewhere in its steel to hold a man, who will steer it.... It appears, my friends, that the keel of this contrivance will merely skim along the sea's surface, being upheld by the rebound of a gun or something exploding downward, I forget how many times a minute; and the boat so upheld will be swept forward rocketwise by another succession of explosions, like a motor-car; so that this thing will safely visit vessel after vessel at bullet's rate, with fatal results to all a navy within some minutes. Doumic should know, being one of the elect with the individual in question: for is it not Doumic who already is choosing the regiments to be quartered upon Paris, in order to send them back to the provinces imbued, one after the other, with this new-imperial dream? But as for me, who am hardly still a youth, I little believe in dreams that are unrealised; I have witnessed many, many things, and heard many words: I have heard Cora Pearl hum the Kyrie, and I have beheld Alfred de Musset sober. Hence to me the individual in question is mainly a directeur de spectacle forain — a famous one, it is true. His palaces that are like the blasphemous gardens built to reproduce Paradise by that king of Irim whom the gods struck blind for arrogance — then the revels — his Moon-proposal — then his riding of his Chérie to victory at Longchamp — his Exhibition-proposal — then this kiss — each seems to belong to a series of scenic—"

"Was the kiss scenic?" asked Mr. E. Reader Meade semi-privately of Saïd Pasha, upon which Saïd Pasha undid his cross-looking lip to answer,"

No, monsieur. I state only a fact when I declare that for over four months I have foreknown some such collapse of the intellectual tension of the individual in question — a collapse owing, I say again, to a magnetic gale and to nothing else. Nor was this thing at all sought by Monsieur Lepsius. He is not, we are aware, by nature a Petrarch or Ortis; he is by nature an athlete, an engineer, a financier, a juggler, a sage — what you will, save a gallant; and as others flee the pest, so he has fled this infirmity of his. All which, by the way, I can state on the authority of a man already known, I think, to Monsieur Meade, to Monsieur l'Abbé Sauriau, and to Monsieur le Duc de Rey-Drouilhet, one Shan Healy, who is known to have followed Monsieur Lepsius from England to Ceylon, to Japan, and other regions, some couple of years ago: and from this man's statement one is afraid that the blame for what has taken place must be laid upon the lady. In fact, although Monsieur Lepsius certainly knew the young girl before his departure from Europe, and knew on his return that she was then in France with her aunt, the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard, he appears to have given himself no sort of pains to greet her again; nor was it until some four months after his star had well risen over the horizon, that the eyes of the two individuals in question encountered one another on the Palais-Lepsius roof, during the morning hours of that ball that followed upon the passing of the Moon Bill. We remember the sight, messieurs: a morning all stars, the Champs Elysées all one swarm of carriage-lights from the Arc de Triomphe to the Place de la Concorde, the Palais-Lepsius looking like one of the buildings of Chilminar or Balbec which the genii are believed to have wished into being, and everyone to be met there, save Monsieur Lepsius himself. Monsieur Lepsius, it appears, had gone to sleep during the rout at his usual hour, but at the hour of three had roused himself to go up to his observatory, no one but his servant being with him; and up there he was, his gaze glued to his tube, a busy-body in the concerns of other worlds, when the lady, as ladies seem to conceive it their duty to do, smartly recalled him to this one. ‘Oh! pardon,’ says she, and with what object, or by what right, she had got herself up thither is not known, though she was not the only one of the guests who, beguiled by the desire of the eye, were roaming ad lib. through the rooms of the building that night. At all events, as her lips part to pronounce her ‘pardon,’ the other individual in question darts his glance round from the glass to her, crouches there aghast some eight seconds, gazing, dumb-struck, and — vanishes. Monsieur Healy declares that his heart all but ceased to beat, believing as he did that his master, who had darted out of a casement, had cast his body headlong down! Well, three several times since then have the two individuals—”

But now, before the anecdotist could further go, a sound arose and grew, not loud, but universal over the grounds of the Club, the Avenue, l’Etoile — a rumour in whose droning the word “Lepsius” was to be heard, as a troop of Zouaves and Turcos, riding all in their bright robes, broke into the ocean-current of carriages that rolled through the Avenue. Up from the Elysées they came, making down for the Bois de Boulogne; and up soon after them trotted another crowd of troopers — Moors, Hindoos — voluminous in their vestments of various hues, carrying javelins (jereeds), with streamers, on large chargers which caracoled; and, close behind these, three carriages with gentlemen-ushers, household gentlemen; and up behind these outriders; grooms costumed in green and gold; pigmies in jockey-caps, from which hung fringes of gold; and up behind all a phaeton hauled by Orloff horses that haughtily pawed the air, to fling far their front-hoofs, trotting. In this sat Lepsius. He was in mufti, but clearly no “mere pékin,” the insignia of the Grand Cordon of the Legion showing his connection with the Army; and by his side sat a girl who looked American, on her lap a scribbling-book, and flying in her fingers a pencil. He, as he drove up, bowed repeatedly a little to the buzz that droned about his ear, but without ever once glancing upward, his lips never ceasing to move and murmur to the girl whose fingers flew. And away to the wood swept the wind of it.

Everyone then turned anew to sip his apéritif, and the old Due de Rey-Drouilhet was anew observing that turn-outs so perfect had not conquered the eye since “the early sixties,” when a man with white hair that curled upward at his nape came up to the table of our anecdotists to inquire whether the Comte de Courcy had been with them, or had been noticed about the club. “I had to meet the count here,” he explained; and something humble, bowed down and sad in his air touched their compunction. During the moving-by of the cavalry troop he had been semisecretly eyeing the sight through trees some distance from the street; then had come out to seek the count, and now was about to fare farther, when all at once the count himself was there with a raised hat, and at once, grasping the old man’s hand, he began to present “Dr. Lepsius” to the rest.

“‘Lepsius’?” Isabeau Thiéry breathed the word.

“Need I explain,” said Monsieur le Comte, taking a chair, all business, all smiles, with dimples in the chart of his large face, “that there may be many men of that name? — not necessarily related by ties of family? which ties, in any case, can never possess much weight in the matter of politics. So that if by chance we here are all a harmony, politically speaking—”

The count’s eye ran prying with an undertook about the table from face to face, whereat Mr. E. Reader Meade glanced at Said Pasha, Said Pasha glanced at Mr. Meade, and they two got up to bow themselves out of the business, while the others, with glances at one another, silently smiled.

Then Monsieur le Comte de Courcy, fingering a crucifix of gold that from of old lay smooth from his fingering under his shirt-frills, said to the others, “Gentlemen, it is not without a purpose that I present to you now (rather than more formally at our meeting this evening in Monseigneur Piscari’s house) our confrère, Dr. Lepstus, whom you will find to be actuated by precisely the same motives as ourselves, nay, if possible, by motives still nobler, concerned not with France alone, but of world-wide anxiety. He brings with him something which, as I believe that it will prove of even extreme interest to you, I wished to lay before the Abbé Sauriau, our excellent secretary, previous to our meeting at Monseigneur Piscari’s this evening, in order—”

“Gentlemen,” suddenly rising, said Dr. Lepsius in a low tone, “I think that perhaps if I took a stroll while you talk the matter over, that might be more in order. I will be back to answer any question that may occur to you,” whereat hats were anew raised, the doctor went away, Monsieur de Courcy’s underlook peered about to see that nobody was too near, and now he drew with care from out a pocket-book a bit of paper, rather brown and brittle, that had passed through flame. He laid it on the table: and quickly, like, a congress of eagles, the intriguers’ heads were together over it, the old duke skipping like a youth closer round to it, and that lax skin of the Abbé Sauriau’s brow, which above was narrow, broad below, twitching short-sightedly over the browned words, while his bush burned. Only the Count de Courcy leaned back, fingering his secret crucifix, musing through his cigarette fumes upon the clouds, humorously dimpled. (“He was ever healthy and happy-hearted when in office-harness,” says Saïd Pasha of him, “with a no small degree of rush and magnetism when revelling in the thick of affairs; one of your true gens de bureau; an intellect essentially narrow, bigot, bourgeois, as ‘devout’ as he was profoundly irreligious; but iron; and the busier the blither.”)

And presently when Isabeau Thiéry, demanded whence the paper came, “This script,” replied the Comte de Courcy, “is a portion of a private letter written from Paris some seven months ago to a certain English nobleman who is a Directeur Publique — say a ‘Permanent Under-Secretary’ — of Her Britannic Majesty’s Government. By what succession of good chances the fragment has got itself into the hands of our friend, Dr. Lepsius, will no doubt be described by him to-night at Monseigneur Piscari’s.”

“But can we be sure who wrote it?” Isabeau Thiéry said, “when it lacks a signature?” to which the count stopped his humming to reply, “Would a signature add to our certainty, monsieur, when the individual whom you have in your mind is said to write a hundred hands a day, as it suits his purpose? But surely the internal evidence furnishes us with a certainty which is ample.”

“Oh, ample,” said Monsieur Leflô, glancing up.

“Well, he is a showman,” sighed the old gossip, rising with satisfied old eyes from the script, while his eye-glass dropped.

“But he is mad,” added the Abbé Sauriau.

“That is the definition of God,” remarked Isabeau Thiéry: “a showman who is mad” — a remark which caused the Comte de Courcy to laugh, though with one hand he was at the crucifix, while with the other he was taking up to replace in its nook the bit of paper, which had on it, still to be read through the burn, the typewritten words, “World... redistribution which I shall choose... two worlds... nevertheless, England... world’s total capital... Bank of Dresd... S. America Africa the first, Asia plus Russia the second, the rest of Europe plus North America the... Russia, too, to be included in Manchuria... the Caspian... from the Caspian to the Bosphorus... France first, then, by means of France, the world.... The ocean of blood which will flow, but that, of course... Quebec to be the capital of the world, and the seat of my... Moon... has been too stupid... shape of the ape's brain... nevertheless, moonlight will... like the eggs of the ostrich, which she hatches, not by sitting on them, but by just gazing at them, so I may... If the moon had been of some beautiful hue, and of a brighter light, and a reliable light, men... would naturally have used the daytime for slumber.... Even birds and brutes, I assume, will soon learn to prefer the mood of the beautiful night-time of my... it is for you, therefore... when the Exhibition... come to Paris at... discreet fash... afterwards... my friend and..."

"Well, it is a great and a gallant brain, after all," cried Isabeau Thiéry with a flush, when Monsieur le Comte had put away his pocket-book with the script in it.

"A great and a gallant brain," mused the Minister of the Interior, who, fingering his imperial, was smiling at the sky; "though not a Christian, not a Catholic, not a French brain."

"Tush! the brain of a precocious, pert youth," observed the Abbé Sauriau, with a burning bush, "whom it is the duty of us all to remove out of harm's way without more delay."

"Though that will not be done without difficulty, mind you!" Monsieur Leflô remarked with a little grimace, planting his fore finger-tip against his hard nut: "but in the event of a citation of the individual before the Sixth Correctional Tribunal, with a view to obtaining a decree of banishment against him for instigating civil strife, I should say that this document would be of use."

"The Sixth Correctional Tribunal," mused the count, smiling; "I thought, however, that that idea had by this time been abandoned by us all, if only for the reason that the trial could not possibly be completed before the Exhibition, during which, as we assume, the coup d'état that we dread is to take place? Personally I cannot help thinking that a court-trial of uncertain termination is no longer pertinent to the situation, especially as we have been so happy as to win the sanction of the Church (in the persons of Monsieur l'Abbé and of Monseigneur) to move urgent and more certain ways of averting this danger to the world."

The Abbé Sauriau, who had a habit of ever eyeing his right shoe and red sock, which shook up continually (the leg being crossed), struck smartly with his gloves, remarking, "A stronghold close to the coast, with grim bastions and the gloomiest of oubliettes! twelve or fifteen years of that is what the youth wants—" and he struck back his spread of hair that broadened lankly out down over the ears, the Count de Courcy repeating with approval in his musing manner, "Twelve to fifteen years of that, twelve to fifteen years—" and going suddenly grim-red, he giggled gleefully to himself.

"Monsieur l'Abbé is right," the old Due de Rey-Drouilhet said: "fifteen years of a bastille's oubliette is known to induce in a youth a definite diffidence as to using his lips in public, either in speaking or in kissing," at which speech Monsieur de Courcy, who was drinking menthe, grew crimson, gripping his glass so grimly that it cracked, the green fluid streaming from the table to the abbé's sock.

"If it can be done..." muttered Monsieur Leflô; "if it can be done...."

"Why, Monsieur le Prefect," said the abbé, "was it not a Frenchman who said that 'cannot' is a bête de mot?"

"That is a truth, too, monsieur!" cried Isabeau Thiéry, "and provided it prove necessary..."

But now a trooper, as troopers do everywhere pursue every Ministre de l'Intérieur, came to the table with a document for the Count de Courcy, who, making his excuses, raised himself to hasten away; but some yards off stopped to beckon to the Abbé Sauriau, who rolled after him with his big stick and soft hat, and together they two walked toward the minister's carriage, the abbé's top-heavy bulk, all thickness of shoulder without any throat, shambling short below the minister's mass; and the minister said to him, "Twelve to fifteen years of a bastille by the coast, you say: and, certainly, such things have often enough been effected by private effort for public purposes. But I do not blind myself to the fact that it would be beyond the Law, and — in fact — I have to consult you now on a matter of — conduct. I am now about to go through a singular interview, and I — address myself, Monsieur l'Abbé, to the ecclesiastic in you. You understand me, I think. We are all first of all Catholics and good Christians, are we not? and afterwards men-of-state. A singular interview — with a woman, who, on the strength of having been in the same yacht, the same house, as myself some three years since, has lately — thrice — addressed herself to me by letter. A lady's maid she — was; and as such knew the individual whom we have been discussing: for this individual whom we habitually associate only with the future has also, it appears, a past — aye, and a shameful past, too — I say a baleful and abominable past — which merits to be punished, which it is righteous to punish. Think of it, Monsieur l'Abbé! as a mere boy — oh, really, my blood boils to speak of these turpitudes! — he not only betrayed this poor soul, but afterwards robbed her of all, all, her paltry savings; was chased through the thoroughfares of London for petty theft...."

"The young Lepsius?"

"Yes, Monsieur l'Abbé — your hero."

"Whose hero?"

"Is it not being stated on the boulevards by Léon Bergerac in particular, who is always the best informed man in Paris, that you are bitten by an infatuation which is half an idolatry of admiration, and half a hatred, and wholly a hankering, that hardly permits you to talk of aught but of one being?” breathed the Abbé Sauriau, standing still to stare, revealed a moment to himself; then with rage, “oh, he lies, he lies: Léon Bergerac is known to be my enemy!”

“Well, well, no doubt,” muttered the minister “... but as to this woman, whose name is Auvache—”

“Not the Jeanne Auvache who threw vitriol at the individual in question at Dover on the 11th of November, threw it wide, and was imprisoned for five months?” queried Monsieur l’Abbé.

“It may,” said the minister, “be the same; in fact — it is a possibility; though the name is not an uncommon one, Monsieur l’Abbé — Auvache — men, women enough of that name, you will say. But I may tell you one thing: this woman has been spied by a clerk in her lodgings throwing vials of water at a nail’s head.... It is her hobby, it seems, having arranged rows of vials on the floor, to eject water, at a run from them upon a nail in the wall; a drill of the eye, wrist, fingers, that goes on regularly in the loneliness of that garret every day; she will also practise herself in rushing with a knife to stab a bull’s-eye on the wall — why, no one can say.” The Abbé Sauriau pondered it for some moments, and presently observed, “She must be an imbecile.”

“That is what I have said to myself, Monsieur l’Abbé,” replied the minister; “why else should the woman, in wishing to obtain an entrée into the valetaille Lepsius, address herself to me? unless by some chance she is aware that I know one Nundcumar, a functionary in the Palais-Lepsius.... This Nundcumar has risen, Monsieur l’Abbé. Eight years ago he was a lean scarecrow down oh his luck about Paris and London, pretending to be a doctor of medicine, but possessing even less knowledge of medicine than the present Prefect of Police possesses of the police. Then he became a cook, and it was thus that I again came across him at Egmond, the Brittany château of the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard. Then he remigrated to his native Agra, and was there met and admired by the individual whom we now have in our minds — so Nundcumar avers, though this person, who never ceases to speak, certainly never yet produced a word which by chance was an accuracy. At all events, I am still in touch with the man, and could easily induce him — to-day even — to introduce that ill-used and lunatic woman into the valetaille Lepsius, provided I do not definitely find in my interview with her presently that she has any purpose in view other than the search for work.”

Monsieur l’Abbé pondered it a little. Then, “Let it be so, then,” he suddenly replied, as they now arrived at the count’s brougham; “but though your interview will no doubt prove over-brief to permit of any deep probing into the woman’s motives and so on, you will very likely find the time to impress upon her that the practice, or drill, with the knife, at least, is quite offensive, while—”

“You have known how to say what I was only able to think, Monsieur l’Abbé.... Au revoir, then.” And the Count de Courcy drove away.

The abbé then turned to go back to the table of the gossips; but now a little girl who was gambolling among the trees, tumbling down before his feet and beginning to scream, immediately he had her garnered in his arms, hugging her to his bosom, his lips on her head, with whimperings of love (“for,” says a Note of Sard Pasha, “he had a most fond father’s heart, if especially for children, hardly less for all the world, whenever he was not merciless with envy of some other mind”); and he toyed before the child’s eyes one of his few coins, saying, “But look, then, all this is for thee — all, all,” and he pointed at the receding brougham, leering, breathing, “Look! that is the brougham of Monsieur the Minister of the Interior — but look! a man whose! blood boils to speak of these turpitudes’ since he has need to condone his deeds to his own shabby-genteel conscience” — and he clasped the little girl’s fingers upon the franc, placed her on the ground, and now hurried back to the table where by now Dr. Lepsius was again sitting with the gossips.

CHAPTER XI.

THE CHAMBER-WINDOW.

AT THAT VERY time Shan Healy was speeding on a bicycle (having missed a train) from Paris to Versailles, with perspiration raining over his face and swear-words vented when racing through those villages paved with old pavers, which mercilessly jerked him. It was not until six o'clock that he got to Versailles and the Villa des Medicis there, a house of the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard, where, having scorched down to the house-front through a great avenue of yews, he craved to interview Miss Ruth Vickery.

He was taken to the door of a chamber in the middle of which stood three ladies talking warmly, though in low tones — two elderly ladies and Miss Ruth Vickery; and a whirl of words was being uttered among them, sometimes all the three trying to make their opinions heard at once, all looking as exhausted and haggard as if they had been going on all the day long, while in the gloom of a far corner of the room lay Miss Eve Vickery asleep, with an appearance of exhaustion, even of swoon. Shan Healy stood on the threshold, and he could just hear the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard, whom he knew very well, cry with a casting up of her hands and eyes, "Ah, my dear Lina, you can persuade an angel or the good God himself to change their mind, but you cannot persuade a saint who is English too."

This lady, although English herself, spoke English in quite a halt way, with effort, was tall and fair, resembling Miss Eve, her niece, in stand and being.

“But, Aunt,” wooed Miss Ruth, “bear with me, since I do mean well, as in my God’s sight. Ask yourself — how can I, how could I, try to induce Eve to marry a man who, it appears, is without even morality, whose mood is pagan, whose aim is Caesarian, whose God is arrogance?... And Eve never would, I think, if I know her! You have heard her say yourself—”

“Ah, then, why in the good God’s name did the girl go and kiss him with all Paris gazing at it?” exclaimed the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard.

“Aunt,” breathed Miss Ruth, all ruby-red, with drooped lids, “you know that Eve did not—’ kiss’ him; he—’ kissed’ — her.”

“Ah, my good Ruth,” observed the third lady, one Madame Lina Grammont, “the world does not draw these exquisite distinctions, believe me: it knows that in a kiss it is generally the gentleman who both begins against the lady’s will and ends against her will.”

“Exactly,” remarked the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard; “but then, we all know our English: it is always their little mannerism to regard the lady as made of anything but of flesh and blood. The fact, however, that stares one in the face is that Eve is now bound to be married immediately; and I repeat that the scandal will be less if of the two gentlemen she chooses the one who has kissed her.”

“Truly, the scandal will be less,” Miss Ruth answered; “and you do not say, if you think it, that the worldly grandeurs will be greater; but, happily for her peace, Aunt, Eve would rather choose, I think, to live in a hovel with a Christian gentleman like the Comte de Courcy than with one whose bosom was never vaccinated with the stigmata of compassion and abnegation, though he were five times a Mogul.”

“So I hear you say, my dear,” replied the countess, “though Eve herself no doubt most accurately knows her own secret; but if it be a fact that her stomach is such as to like the Comte de Courcy better, why will she not send for him, since he is every hour expecting her reply?"

"She will send, I think," replied Miss Ruth. "What, however, was the use of summoning papa from London unless she is to hold out for his presence before pronouncing her decision? He should by now have arrived in Paris, and within an hour will be in Versailles; then, I think, she will speak, she will send, for she feels, I am sure, the nobleness of Monsieur de Courcy's renewed offer, and will not, I think, grieve him by any longer—"

But at that moment Healy at the door sneezed, and, the ladies noticing him, two of them, still speaking eagerly together, went away through another door, Miss Ruth going to meet Healy. She was just beginning to say, "I am so glad—" when Healy put his lips to her ear with "Not in here, miss! every word breathed in here all day has been heard in the palace at Paris" — whereon he showed her the telephone over the sofa on which Miss Eve lay asleep, whispering deeply afresh, "He's this minute lying on his face, hearing her very breathing, I believe"; and when Miss Ruth, as they now moved out of the room into a vestibule, asked how that was possible, Healy replied that it was by means of a whispering-gallery, as at St. Paul's in London, where anyone stationed at the part of a circular wall farthest from a telephone in the wall heard greatly augmented any sounds thrown out of the telephone-mouth, being in a focus of the sound-waves. "The telephone-number of that gallery has been plugged on to yours the whole, day, miss," Healy said, "someone here is in his pay, and he has been lying on the ground in the gallery with a crowd of tools strewn round about, modelling something and listening, smiling with himself the while. I know that he knows at what moment your papa was summoned to you, and at what moment Mr. de Courcy's proposal reached here; so, as soon as I could slip away when he went out, I made paces to answer your letter in person, so as to impress upon you that he is really in earnest in this, miss: for he has lost time and given up other things to see to this, seeing that he had arranged to go to the Chamber tonight, but isn't going any more; so he is serious, miss, oh, he means business, believe me, miss, in this, and it will be a bitter pity if Miss Eve isn't whipped off secretly this hour right out of his way somehow, though, as his spies are all about—”

“You do not believe, Healy, I see, that such a union could be good?” said Miss Ruth, her gaze on his face.

“Well, to be frank, no, miss, marriage wouldn't hardly suit him,” said the voluble Healy.” No, no; he'd be that miserable, you wouldn't believe; and the fonder he was of the lady, the more he'd hate and hiss at her for making him waste time. Time's his wife; the clock, the clock, miss. Believe me, only to be near him, people feel in a prickly heat themselves, as if they were breathing fever from some fierce atmosphere — the very Orientals in the palace, miss, only that slothful old story-teller, Nundcumar.... No, no, miss, do now, he'll be that miserable—”

“And his lady, too, I think, Healy?” suggested Miss Ruth, with her smile.

“Well, and the lady, too, now you mention it, miss,” Healy agreed; “true enough — the lady too; she'd be like a dog tied behind a railway train, couldn't keep up the pace anyhow; try now, miss, try, try; he'll be that wretched, you wouldn't believe, and everything'll be changed, and instead of me it'll be the lady may be, and I nowhere with him; try, try. From that night in the forest round the ruined town of Anuradhapura, he has been good friends with me — till two days ago when the doctor came to France. I have told you about that night before, miss. Oh, that's a forest, if you like, boundless, miss, I can tell you, and the men and brutes of that country move about in a brown, brown day, miss — big black brutes looming upon you out of the gloom with their stupid gazing, and thousands upon thousands of gods and ogres of stone broken to bits in those groves a thousand centuries ago, they say. He left me one nightfall at the top of one of the big dagabas to go all by himself into the dark of the timber, I to watch each nightfall there till he should come back with the piece of a stele; and there on the dagaba I watched and waited fifteen weeks, miss, night by night, till I began to fancy that he was gone for good. Eh, but he did come back to me all right, miss, one darksome night, under the large stars which look upon those parts, almost starved and stark naked he was, bearing forty old stone boxes on top of a buffalo-cart; and in his hand was that little gold thing made in the shape of a pear which he never lets go of, and even in his sleep keeps with him.... Do you know what's in that little thing, miss? A little key, they say; and that old story-teller, Nundcumar, who fancies he knows everything, says that this little key opens a certain casket in which there's a second key; and that second key opens a certain safe in which there's a third key; and that third key opens a certain turret at Serapis, the Brittany palace, in which there's a fourth key; and that fourth key opens a certain chamber in which there's a fifth key; and that fifth key — I can't quite call to mind what the fifth key opens; any way, it goes on till you get to the twelfth key, which opens the room in which all his jewels and riches are strewn — so says that Nundcumar, miss, and whereabouts under the ground that room may be no human being has yet got scent of, though that Nundcumar swears that he knows where; and the key to the whole is within that little gold thing made in the shape of a pear which he never lets go of, miss."

At this Miss Vickery, with her stare of child-wonder, stared at Healy, muttering, "How very much lighter and kinder would he feel, now, if he had no keys, nor any jewels to lay up for himself!"

"Doubtless, miss," said the other; "but that's how it stands — what would you have? What was I saying? Oh, about that night in the forest round about the ruined town of Anuradhapura; yes, that's a forest, miss, if you like — boundless; but I think I've told you about that night before, miss, often; and from that night he has been good friends with me, till two days ago, when the doctor came—”

“Does he still avoid a meeting with his father?” asked Miss Vickery in a voice of secrecy.

“Rather, miss; his treatment of that old man is so shocking—” Healy commenced to answer, but was checked by a” sh-h-h” breathed by Miss Ruth, who through the doorway had noticed Miss Eve moving in her sleep; and they two stood peeping at the unfolding of Miss Eve's eyes, saw Miss Eve notice a Bible which lay open by her nose on the sofa-cushion — a Bible which had been placed there by Miss Ruth with one phrase in it underlined in blue — saw her take the Book to gloat closely over the phrase in the gloaming's dusk, saw her laugh, and, after laughing, suddenly press her lips upon the phrase with ravishment, to drop suddenly afresh on the cushion with a covering up of the face; the phrase which she had read and kissed being this, “Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers.”

“Steal softly in,” breathed Miss Ruth to Healy; and softly she herself, having moved into the room, stole on tiptoe quite to the telephone, the opening of which she shut off and stuffed up, Miss Eve meanwhile seeming still asleep; and to Healy Miss Ruth now said aloud, “Continue now, Healy, to speak of your master's treatment of his poor father.”

Healy looked at her, and, discerning her meaning, whispered to himself, “Why, if she isn't as wise as a serpent!”

“No, miss,” he added aloud, “he won't see the doctor not on no account: never once seen him willingly since the day he left the island in your yacht; flies him like death, he does. Fact is, he is nervous of the doctor; nothing on earth below, nor in heaven above, is he nervous of, but of the doctor he is.

— Can't get over his youth, you see, can't get over all those years in which he used to believe the doctor a god, not a human being — shuns him as death, he does. And partly it's the doctor's own fault, I must say, for that's only the truth, you know, miss, seeing that the doctor is going all dead against him, taking part with his political enemies, and he well aware of it, — for there's an eye spying for him behind every blind, so to say; and he's afraid of the doctor, oh, he's afraid, miss, that the doctor's big brains may be digging his grave for him. So that's his excuse, look; but still, when all's said, his conduct to the doctor has been just shocking — shocking it has. Again and again has the old soul's nose pressed against his gates, and begged and prayed to be let in, but no go; and that time at Lyons when the old man tried to spring into the carriage, just as Master Hanni stepped down out of the town-hall, that was a bit beyond: for as the father made to spring in, the son darted to the reins, the horses pranced and started off, leaving a father prostrate and bleeding on the street — oh no, that was a bit beyond, that was."

Miss Vickery, with her face averted from the narrator, held her eyes bent skyward with a steadfast gaze, begging for God's forgiveness of men; but from Miss Eve, who must have heard, who was meant to hear, neither word was uttered, nor a stir seen.

After a silence the talkative Healy proceeded to remark, " Well, I can understand him, miss. I recollect that when I was a little lad ten years of age, one day a great big girl of thirteen meets me in a lane, miss, and begins to kiss and hug me — couldn't make out anyhow what it was about, so I got pretty scared, I did, and from that day for years, if I but spied that lass a league off, my hair'd go creepy, I'd take to my heels like a long-dog, and I do believe if I caught sight of her even now, I'd be bound to do a dart for it. It's the same with Master Hanni — shy, shy; the doctor's a great big bogey to him — thinks the doctor'll be digging his grave, though he knows that the doctor can't. And who suffers for it, miss? I do. Thinks I am secretly on the doctor's side against him, can't believe I'm on his side against all comers, thinks I'm always going to 'betray' him to the doctor, trusts no one, trusts no one, it's hard, because—"

Now, however, that stream of Healy's speech was checked by the appearance in the doorway of a gentleman neatly dressed in grey, with a grey top-hat on his head, a neat umbrella, and side-whiskers, with him being the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard and Madame Grammont; and Healy, seeing him, murmured, "Your pa, miss," and now bowed himself out; while Mr. Vickery, darting his eyes all about the room, and discerning in the gloom his younger girl on the couch, rushed by Miss Ruth without any greeting, his eyes brimming with tears, his mouth trembling, and on his knees garnering Miss Eve in his arms, gave way now to weeping, again and again darting down his lips at her mouth, with pausings to gaze at her face, then again darting down at her mouth, with mania.

Miss Eve sat up, breathing "papa," and laughed a little, casting back some hairs from her brow with a gesture which, undoubtedly, was not without something of hectic and hare-brained. Indeed, she appeared that day to be dwelling in a region so infected with fever, that through the day she had been treated as a patient, and on the sick list.

"Well, here I am," Mr. Vickery said to her, "just arrived by God's help — in time, I hope.... Got a headache, have you? my soul? my love?"

Miss Eve smiled triumphantly in her parent's face, replying, "No, papa; why should I?"

"That's all right, don't say a word," muttered the father, fast patting her arm, "don't say a word.... Well, here I am, you see; arrived, arrived, by God's help. — And — I have telegraphed to Monsieur de Courcy to come.

Have I done well? I thought I would, and — I did. All the way from London to Paris I was praying to be guided, and the moment I got to Paris the thought was given me to telegraph at once to Monsieur de Courcy, and — I did.”

“Did you, papa?” asked Miss Eve, smiling with her father.

“Yes. Eve, have I done well?”

“Why, papa, I think so,” replied Miss Eve, smiling that defiance which is amused, that triumph which is secure. “Monsieur de Courcy is a most estimable man.”

“He is; but still, Eve, tell me, tell me, dear — have I done well?”

“Oh, I quite think so, papa.... Have you had a pleasant trip across?”

“No, no, let us be frank now; let us make use of plain terms, let’s not mince matters, Eve; come now, tell your papa — my own, my sweet — will you have de Courcy?”

“Oh, as to that, why, I think so, papa,” replied Miss Eve with some appearance of surprise about the eyebrows. “I thought that that was rather understood as a settled thing: ask Ruth, ask aunt: they’ll tell you that Monsieur de Courcy, that model of morals, high at the head of my list, hasn’t a rival to dread.”

Upon this the father turned with an opening of the arms toward the other ladies, saying, “Why, this is well.... You didn’t tell me!”

No reply was made to him; only the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard exchanged half a smile with Madame Grammont, who just shrugged, while Miss Ruth remained with her eyelids drooped.

“Why, that’s all right, then!” cried Mr. Vickery to Miss Eve: “I knew, I knew, that my dear’s instincts would strike true. Well, de Courcy should have nearly reached Versailles by this, and — you’ll be sending him away a happy man, will you? Is that settled?” The young lady, contemplating her father's face with a calm smile, replied, "Quite settled, papa — for my share. If it can be, it shall be."

"“Can be?” What does she mean?” — Mr. Vickery threw this whisper at the other ladies behind him; but before anything further could be uttered, a bomb was hurled into the salon by the words of a servant who entered, saying “Monsieur Lepsius to talk with Mr. Vickery” — and he handed a card.

Straight sprang Mr. Vickery up, Miss Eve also raising herself by degrees, and all with blanched cheeks gaped in silence at the menial, till Mr. Vickery, his visage rushing into crimson, cried in a high and hysteric kind of cry, “Say to that gentleman that Mr. Vickery, being engaged, begs him to state his business by letter!”

The menial bowed and backed out, and immediately now there reigned a gale of breaths among the ladies, Madame Grammont and the countess making a thousand gesticulations together, Mr. Vickery standing again pale-faced by a reaction, Miss Ruth at him instigating him to be grim, Miss Eve moving about from place to place, reading the titles of books, glancing at trees outside, glancing at looking-glasses.

It lasted four minutes, which seemed much more, after which the menial was once more there, bearing a note scribbled in pencil, whose folds Mr. Vickery tremblingly opened. Miss Ruth meantime breathing in his ear, “Pray, papa, do not read it aloud!” — words which Miss Eve either heard or surmised, for now immediately she muttered with some huff, “Oh, I have no wish to hear anything,” and went away. The rest then, laying their heads over the note, read the words: “Dear sir, — I, a suitor for your daughter's hand, having run a race with another suitor to your door, and having won the race, am amazed at your want of fairness and also of forethought in refusing me an audience. Why do you? Pray question yourself. Can any king with a rope restrain the rolling of rivers or the drift of fate? I warn you that you waste your time in this, causing me also the woe of wasting mine; nor could that be just to another suitor to permit Miss Eve Vickery in a freakish humour to promise him marriage, since she has no such intention, knowing that such a nonsense is not on the files of life. — LEPSIUS.”

It was Madame Grammont who, gifted with the strongest eyesight, read the note aloud in a monotone, the gloaming in the room having now grown very heavy; and as she finished, and all raised their eyes, all started, for there afresh was Miss Eve, who had been seen to leave the chamber, hovering anew near to hear.

“I am not to be browbeaten!” suddenly cried Mr. Vickery in a high kind of cry.

“Ah, papa, no agitation, papa!” Miss Ruth called through a throat whose music broke.

“I say I am not to be browbeaten, I am not to be threatened!” screamed Mr. Vickery querulously afresh in an ecstasy, for the atmosphere was all electric, and each one present caught from all the rest a hectic cheek and a lip of quivering.

“My God, I foresaw all! and my advice was not followed,” cried the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard, with a casting up of the hands.

“‘The files of life,’

‘the drift of fate’!” Madame Grammont muttered in a maze.

“Get my daughter’s trunks packed!” cried the father; “am I an Englishman? Are there no laws?”

“Calm, papa, calm!” called out Miss Ruth anew: “ah, how disastrous! papa, I warn you, this agitation is fatal to the welfare of the soul!”

“Oh, Ruth, let one alone!” now said the countess in an irritation without restraint; “it is you who are the cause of all, at the end of the tale.”

“Aunt, I?” asked Miss Ruth, with reproach lodged in the soul of her eyes.

“But no, Margaret, but no,” protested Madame Grammont: “it is not the fault of Ruth, it is not the fault of Ruth.”

“Let me get my girl out of this infernal country!” now cried out the high-strung Mr. Vickery; “it is France that has done this!”

“Oh, but be reasonable, Matthieu, at the end of the tale!” the countess mouthed, with intolerance.

“Quite right, papa,” now cried out Miss Eve in a spirit of rollicking and recklessness, “let us clearly prove to everyone that we act in no ‘humour of freak,’ having a will of our own!”

“My love!” cried Mr. Vickery.

“‘The files of life,’” mused Madame Grammont anew; “‘humour of freakishness’!”

“Ah, but he is right, believe me!” cried the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard; “he has his meaning! he knows Eve better than she knows herself.”

“You and others may think so, Aunt,” called Miss Eve, snapping her thumb and finger daintily up in the air, with a wheel on her feet.

“But he may still be there!” said Madame Grammont; “is he still there at the door, Gabriel?”

“Monsieur Lepsius has departed, madame,” the gaudy Gabriel gave answer, who through all this had stood there with a bowed brow.

“What happened in the hall?” asked the countess. “Did Monsieur Lepsius make any attempt to enter?”

“Monsieur Lepsius desired to enter, madame,” answered Gabriel, “when I gave him Mr. Vickery’s reply that it might be better for him to state his business by letter; but on his attempt to force an entrance, both Baptiste and myself barred his advance with our arms outspread, and he then, after staring a moment into our faces, broke into a laugh, hastily wrote the note that has been handed you, and drove very quickly away.”

“Did Monsieur Lepsius utter any remark at all?” Madame Grammont began to ask, but before the words were well uttered, there had entered another flunky, who came to proclaim the presence of Monsieur de Courcy at the door; whereupon — a renewed flutter and flurry of consultation! until the ladies rushed from the room, leaving Mr. Vickery to receive the visitor; and immediately in came the Minister of the Interior with his brisk and breezy air, but about his brow now a shade of deliberation.

They two then conversed together until the hour when the dinner-gong began to sing out, whereupon the ladies in their bravery came sailing in, smirking as superbly now as personalities translated beyond the concerns of earth; and after a little small-talk the visitor stepped away with them to dinner.

However, they had not well moved out of the room when now the telephone-rattle in the alcove started to prattle, upon which Mr. Vickery with passion in his heart darted back to it, and Miss Eve also doubled back to be near, though remaining far from her father in the centre of the apartment, staring.

“Who are you?” called Mr. Vickery, the receiver at his ear.

The answer was “Lepsius,” and even Miss Eve, though hovering away off in the middle of the room, could hear it in thunder, for the speaker now no doubt lay in his whispering-gallery, where the sound-waves from his mouth, focusing themselves upon his telephone, struck monstrous rough, their grumble trumpeting unease upon Mr. Vickery’s ear-drum with the gutturalness of some grum god thundering; and, “I want to speak with Miss Eve Vickery,” grumbled the thunder.

“It is Mr. Vickery who hears you!”

“I know; allow one to speak with Miss Eve, Mr. Vickery!”

Now with wide eyes hied Miss Eve on tip-toe nigh, hissing, “Say I am at dinner, papa!”

“Miss Eve Vickery is about to sit down to dinner,” Mr. Vickery cried, with stricter accuracy.

“She will not eat much!... But as for you, Mr. Vickery, will you have me for a son-in-law?”

“The proposal sounds abrupt, Monsieur Lepsius!”

“Why so? How much waste of time is necessary? And what is your complaint against me? I quite fail to gather this.”

“It cannot be discussed over the telephone!”

“Why can it not? Is it that you are offended with me for kissing your daughter?”

“S-s-s-s, sir!... But I am being awaited at dinner, Monsieur Lepsius!”

“It was not I who wished to kiss her, it was she who wished to kiss me!”

“Eve, go! go!” screamed Mr. Vickery, warding his daughter away with one arm.

“Say, papa,” Miss Eve hissed, reaching far forward to her father’s ear with her cheeks afire, “that I am affianced to a good and gallant gentleman!”

“My daughter—” Mr. Vickery commenced to call.

“Tell Miss Eve, sir,” the thunderer rumbled, “that I can hear each word that she utters, and that I know she does not mean one syllable of any one of them.”

“I have to wish you good evening, Monsieur Lepsius!” cried Mr. Vickery with a high-pitched cry.

“Go, if you choose; but you prove yourself a feeble and foolish old pantaloon, you know.”

“And you, sir, a courteous young gentleman!” upon which Mr. Vickery put up the receiver, and went with one cheek-bone branded rosy, and one blanched, Miss Eve smiling, with her eyes alight, by his side.

The meal was then eaten serenely by all, after which, in the midst of Parisian chat in the salon, it was found not impossible to bring about, without intention, a tête-à-tête between Miss Eve and the Minister of the Interior; and Monsieur de Courcy, having come through this with success, remained still on, the merriest of ministers and men, until close on eleven o’clock, when, hunted down by a mounted officer with a cipher, he made his bows, and went away.

And now anew the family sat in council to discuss the situation of affairs, though Miss Eve now took no share in it, seated far aloof, with her cheek on her palm, looking out into the dark of the park. At midnight she bid good-night; and, having gone up to her chamber, having been prepared for her bed, and having prayed by her bedside, was soon lying in the semi-gloom of a big bedroom, with her will bent upon slumber. But sleep she could not, though two hours went by. One of her jalousie-windows lying open, through this she could perceive trees, mountains, and in the sky a moon moving in and out among mounds of cloud, now drowning the countryside in shine, and now shrouding it in shadow; until this growing into a grievance and a weariness, at last she got up, swathed all that elongation of her form in a great drapery, got her violin and bow, and in an arm-chair by the jalousie played. So that she might not be heard, she had first shut the shutter and fixed the bar, though, as her apartments were in a rather remote part of the château, this was hardly very necessary, since it was Mendelssohn’s Andante which she chose to utter in a low tone; and there during many minutes she remained in a mood of drooping, moving the air of the room with the mazes of the music, roaming over and over anew through the same old moon-realms of melancholy, feeling even sleepy now, her ear wearied out with sweetness; until on a sudden she had sprung upon her feet, her cheeks struck white like a sheet, and her eyes wide with affright.

“Who is it?” she hoarsely hissed, for outside the shutter a tap had sounded.

“I! Open!” some chest panted to her, and she knew him, yet anew she hissed with all her wild heart in her windpipe, “Who is it? What is it?”

“The staple to which I hang is giving to my weight,” the chest gasped: “forty seconds and I fall a corpse.”

In ten Lepsius had leapt within the window....

And now were boundless breaths! and the rough sirocco broken free, flights for life, puffs, pantings, runnings to and fro, momentary manias, aimless aims! “Help!” hissed her hoarse heart’s breath, “this wardrobe, help!” whereat he, quite carried away by her rage of agitation, hardly knowing why, caught hold of one side of a wardrobe, while she bent and laboured at the other side, bearing it somewhither. But it was a huge mass Henri Quatre, which, being moved, naturally made some hubbub, so he threw the whisper across to her, “It makes a racket!” whereto her pant replied “Never mind, help!” and finally by tugs and effort they got one narrow side of it against a wall, one broad side against the bed-foot; and now anew she flew, with “This couch, help!” and he helped her to place the couch against the wall and against the bed-head; and now it was “Now, this chair!” and he helped her to heap an easy-chair upon the couch, feet up: which done, she scrambled quick across the bed’s breadth, and now stood in the place betwixt bed and wall, barricaded now from him in front by the bed, to the left by the wardrobe, to the right by the couch and the chair. And then immediately all that to-do was seen to be needless when her hand happened to hit upon a key in the wall behind her, for there was a door there in the wall, and a small window also by it above, and behind the door some steps leading up to another chamber a little above the bed-chamber; so immediately she scuttled through the door, locked it within, skipped up the four steps, appeared at the window, threw the key from her down upon the bed before him, and now succumbed to the floor, panting, safe at any rate from herself.

He, looking up to the window, threw out to her the whisper, "You are wise! You are witty!" upon which she sprang up to throw out to him the whisper, "Do not come across the bed!" for he stood now with one knee on it, and she could see him in a ray of the moon as she had first beheld him at The Towers in a red shirt loose about the neck and belt, without any jacket or hat; and he, too, could see her in shadow at the window.

"Did I not help you to escape?" he asked her; and then disjointedly, "Do you wear the half-coin which I sent you?"

Miss Eve gave no reply, getting by degrees her breath again in silence.

"Did you know in your heart," he asked her, "that I would come to-night? You were waiting up for me, playing the fiddle; it was that Andante of Mendelssohn; you played it four times over."

"Lepsius, you must go," Miss Eve said.

"I will go near the peep of day, and you with me!"

"No, now; and without me, I think."

"Oh, you are cold," he replied, "and I hate your stone's heart: cold by nature, and colder by hypocrisy that penetrates your texture to the core of you. Oh, I know and foreknow you to my agony, negative, null, enigmatic, like a watch which won't go, though one goads it, and finally one crushes it under a rock; as frigid as that water of a mortal quality which drips from a rock in the territory of Nonacris; or like that bag—"

But she stopped him with, "Lepsius, you should go!" whereat he leaned keenly across to whisper her, "Cold! I am told that your mother was a patrician of a most ancient race, so from her you have that faintness of air, your rarity of blood, which makes you resemble lilies too super-cultivated and rare to transparency, or resemble that aroma that you exhale, or hoary old ages of Asia gone that give no answer to the historian's gaze. No, the mortal heart can't hold you all, you are far too large for me.... That superciliousness, all but Chinese somehow, in the heave of your eyebrow's arch, that rather-too-much of the eye-whites shown below the irises... though I admire, mind, the faintness of it, the faint disdain, the die-away disdain, so confirmed and hoary, reposed and at home in the universe, with which you look out askance upon the world; and now dark circles will be under them, for I vow you shan't sleep, and that will please me to be conscious that you are marked with dark underlids because of me."

"I did not think," Miss Eve rejoined, leaning both her elbows on the window's sill, "that you were such a silly boy."

He during some seconds did not answer this, drew back a bit from the bed with a bent head, reflecting, and then said, "Well, it is silly, it is self-sacrifice; and yet — curious! while I fought against you, since it is silly, I thought it sillier than after I gave into you. Silly, indeed, I still see it, for these feelings of love make the blood to flow from the front of the brain to other caves of the frame — ruinously! so that loving is a reverting to lower-animal natures whose brains are less largely furnished with blood, the sense of romance and poetry in loving being due to some umbra of remembrance in us of old brutes, moons, and moods, of the geologic ooze, the deluge, the roll in the Jurassic morass, the rufous Vesuvius, the gloomy lagoon, when the moon glowed more big and close to this globe. Love is thus a fall and relapse; and yet — curiously—"

When he paused, she asked, “Well?” upon which he said, “My consciousness has been enlarged by it. I see, in fact, that though it is a fall toward the past, and silly, it is the one silliness that one may partly pardon oneself in view of its use to the future, because man will not always be man, and ages forward I see the sons’ sons of you and me a multitude, shining like stars in ‘the sky, vaunting John to George in voices of joy. No other children instead of ours, if ours are preordained to be born, will do for this evolution: for, since we observe that the perfection which is purposed by the earth can never be accomplished but by a preordained marshalling of atoms, we know that, if this or that atom fails of its place, nothing can be done: far less if this or that baby fated to be born fails anon to be born.”

Miss Eve, her face half concealed with her palm, asked, “But what is fated? that is the question. We imagine that what we wish is fated.”

“Love is apparently an instinct of fate,” Lepsius replied: “the lover prophesies in a kind of trance of triumphs to come. True, he is silly, since he sacrifices his time and life, but when he succumbs in his fight with the world-typhoon which whirls him to the moon, he can excuse his infirmity with a sense that this time it is worth while. I find that I have a tendency to reflect upon you in reveries extravagant to grotesqueness, comparing you with galaxies, fragrances, graces, fairies, lilies, with Dewildé, and Helen of Troy, and the boy Crobylus of Corinth, and that purple of Hermione whose wool was combed with poison-honey and oil of lotus; and though this is not strictly a truth at present of you, it is strictly a true instinct and prophecy of princes to spring through you. The line of your profile has a hint of hollowness to the eye, owing only to a most slight jutting of your chin’s point, a nothing which has overjoyed me with emotions the most poignant, with a sense of brotherhood for you, with a sense of the earth from her furnace-birth to her furthest sunsets, when the sun shall shine much nigher her, and the moon loom hugely: and I have compared you with ages, and with the Lady in the Chair of Cassiopeia. Or, looking sideways at you with your legs crossed, I have been struck by the great prolongation of your thighbones — so great that you could hardly run on your toes and palms, as I and apes may, since your kneecaps would doubtless graze the ground — so evolved, patrician: and I have cried extravagantly that, at their greatest stretch, the very galaxy would find space and to spare ‘twixt their gaping gateway — an extravagance merely in appearance, since it is in a trance-dream of graces great even to infinity in types fated to grow from you that I thus exclaim; it is my subconsciousness, nay, my consciousness somewhat, all bewildered with a blaze of the world-wonder, and how, darling, but in boundless words may the mortal heart blurt out a little that burden of the Eternal? Or when I think of my love’s upper-shape, so élancé, like the racer’s stretch of waist and neck, like one escaping, dodging, eluding upward — dodging, eluding the ape-shape — the very revelation of evolution—”

Here Miss Eve smiled, remarking dryly, “Lepsius, you are full of apes.”

“Aren’t you? Isn’t the world?” he asked; upon which she said, “Yes, I know your low view of men — and of women, I suppose, still more; but beside my élancé upper-shape, my thigh-bone, my chin, my faded old air and hoary disdain of iris, I have a mind, which is jealous of your omission to mention it.”

“I meant to mention it!”

“Oh?” says she, “that was too sweet of you. Last but not least?”

“By no means least!” he answered earnestly: — a mind, I am certain, better than mine.”

“Ah, now you are insincere,” she said.

“I to you? As if I could be!” Lepsius replied with reproach; “I only, of course, mean a mind better than mine in possibility, since yours is uneducated, and mine more or less educated.”

“Mine un — ! But what, then, is ‘education’ in your view?” she wished to know, “Education,” he told her, “is a waking of one’s subconsciousness to consciousness. I, for instance, know nothing that you do not — or not much; but I am much more conscious of what we both know. Tell me, now — whereabouts were you twenty-four hours since?”

“Where?” repeated Miss Eve: “I was — here,” whereto he replied, “You see, that answer and its tone shows that your education was never initiated. You know, no doubt — are subconscious — that you were a thousand thousand, and half a thousand thousand, miles from here, flying at the speed of fifteen times a rifle-bullet’s rabies: subconscious, but not conscious of it. I, now, could never say ‘here’ in that fashion, without compunction, as though a million miles or two were of no account, Eve, since now and at each instant I can hardly but be conscious of this horse that jaunts us, and his ardour... Oh, this race of man suppurates in dullness, you know, and I am sometimes most — lonely: I mention this to you that you may compassionate and come to me. I ride a star, inhabiting the unbounded as my house, and the rest, more drowsing than the dormouse, Tortoni’s; their glance of a morning darts no surprise of gladness at this romance of time, space and game of balls, the Grand Boulevard their galaxy, pigmies grey, phlegmatic, unflushed, unconscious of their contemporaries in a myriad realms of the creation, among whom are at this moment taking place great crises, hegiras, revolutions, doomsdays, moonfalls, vast marches, everlasting partings; they little know that Venus is uneven and severe in scenery, nor does the thundering of even the nearest sun stun their eardrum; uneducated; not polite citizens of time and space.”

“But you remember—” Miss Eve started to say, but now, startled by some sound, breathed eagerly to him, “did you hear something?”

“It is a mouse going down the right sound-hole of your violin,” he replied; and now Miss Eve anew leaned her elbow on her window-sill to continue saying, “But you remember that all this you started to utter of me, then continued with ‘they,’ ‘they’; since then, as ‘they’ are so I, why are you there by my bed?”

“But are you not in all things far above me?” he asked,” save in this of a wakeful consciousness?”

“But this of a wakeful consciousness,” said she, “is everything, is it not? It is this which makes the difference between a genius and an ape, a god and a dog, you believe, do you not? And you have it, and not I. Only a thigh-bone I own, let me be thrown to a dog.”

Upon this Lepsius bent well across the bed to throw to her the whisper, “Hypocrite! Colder than the coldest Kydnus! It is your mind that I esteem, and in speaking of your thigh, implied it.... You should shun the mood of the modern woman of the West, ever touchy as to her footing, as to the spirit of the marriage-law, and men’s estimate of her mentality. Men must admire the mind of woman, for since we know that we all get our wit from our mother, as our grit from our father, therefore I, having my mind from a female, must needs love the female mind with home-longing, as you, having your grit from a male, must love the male grit with home-longing; so it is not for my wit that you love me, but because you are instinctive that I am gritty and good; nor is it for your grit that I love you, but because I am instinctive that, if educated, you would be witty, and will make witty babies. Give up, then, I beg you, for ever, the idea that I despise your mind, since I do so idolise it; and believe, too, that, for each one of these reasons which I can discover for my love of you, myriads of other reasons exist, ineffable, unknowable to us, but in some manner known to that Man to whose behests men may at no moment but submit.”

“What Man is that?” Miss Eve asked, frowning, her wits rather winded now and flustered at the speed of her speaker’s thoughts.

“I mean, do I not,” said he, “the genius of our species? In every crowd of a thousand there are present, are there not? not a thousand, but a thousand and One, which One we can speak of as the ‘genius of the crowd,’ since it leads each of the thousand by the nose, making him behave in a totally different way than when alone — especially in such crowds as French crowds, which rush into action like one individual, as in ‘92. So in séances where those gathered believe that a ghost tilts their table, there is indeed a species of ghost-Man there, an eighth in a meeting of seven, a ‘genius of the crowd,’ compounded, no doubt, of the brain-rays radiated out from the seven. So, too, of the crowd who make up our human race: a Genius-of-the-species, his escutcheon and escheats mentioned on no census-sheet, leads us at each moment, teaching me to know and adore you, and none below the sun but you: to know you well: the very mood of the tune which, if you could be turned into a rhapsody of music, you would produce, a tune with some alto undertone, more old-eternal than the world. Beloved. But I fail to utter half, beloved, my heart faints....”

“Do you love me? M Miss Eve asked him in a whisper, leaning now far out of her window to him, who leaned near to her.

“Beloved,” Lepsius groaned, and again, “beloved.... When I came home from the Quai d’Orsay last night, I dropped down in a drowse, and, with the feast of your kiss still warm in my mouth, I thought in my dream that your feet walked with mine athwart fields of asphodel in future far, far off under a forlorn and morphia moon — I could not tell you. Then in the dark of the morning I awaked, and you were not there in my arms. I passed my palm thrice across my bed of straws, but you were nowhere there; so I had the thought that my darling might be in the garden, among the lilies by the lake, gazing up at my casement, a thought half-crazy, half-drowsy; but up I bounded and raced all round the palace-walls, gazing down into the garden's in order to spy you out and call you up, and you were nowhere there. If one of the spokes of the kite-contrivance on which I fly had not been broken, I should have flown to you. But I ran down, got out, and began to run to you; and the sergents de ville must have asked themselves where Lepsius Was rushing to under the morning stars, with half a thought, perhaps, in their heart's heart of a coup d'état."

"You didn't come," Miss Eve observed.

"No," he answered, "I turned back; four leagues to Versailles, and I had already lost a good deal of time on your account... Eve, I have lost hours."

This he avowed with a bowed brow, and "Dear me," breathed Miss Eve with irony; then, suddenly, like one whose will arises and triumphs, added, "It would have been so fruitless, too,... Lepsius, you should, perhaps, be given to know — can you see? this one is the ring; I am engaged."

"Bomb of poudre Rachel," Lepsius mumbled with a chuckle; "so you came to an arrangement with de Courcy this evening?"

"Yes, then," Miss Eve said, her left shoulder, too, shaken a second by a chuckle.

"And the same night you admit another lover to your bed-chamber!" he said, chuckling.

"Oh, well," she muttered with lowered lids, chuckling within one shoulder, and they chuckled one with the other.

"Are ladies, then, restrained by no scruples as to justice?" Lepsius asked. "Delighter in lies! enigma! through what abstruse movement of your bosom did you get yourself into this embroglio? Not that it matters; but you will inflict a sense of injury upon this man, who has done you no injury,” a speech at which in one instant Miss Eve flew into a passion, and, leaning forth, thrice struck the window-sill imperiously, crying through a gruff throat, “As God is my witness—”

“Sh-h-h,” Lepsius went.

“Let me speak!” she imperiously hissed: “I mean to marry him, do you hear it? Heaven be my witness!” and up she threw her eyes, trembling as she held them bent on high.

“Eve, no,” said Lepsius gently: “you do not mean to do that; you believe that you do, but meantime in your subconsciousness you firmly confide in me never to permit such an absurdity, and so can afford to boast and be wayward.... Dear, would it not certainly kill us both?”

“If it kills a host I will do it!” Miss Eve heatedly replied; “never through life have I broken a promise, nor now shall begin with a vow; given and pledged is my troth; God be my witness in this.”

“But why did you give it and pledge it? I can’t guess!”

“Because I chose!”

“Cogent waste of three words!”

“I shall never have you, anyway!” she said with a nod and threat of the head.

“And why?” he asked in a bewilderment. “Because you despise my mind!” she sharply replied.

“I have already explained why that is quite impossible,” he made answer.

“Oh, woman knows her own secret, and people’s explanations make no impression upon her intuitions. You despise my mind; and there’s this still deeper reason against any getting together of you and me, that I despise yours.”

“I despise it, too; yet I endure it.”

“Oh!” she sighed, “that untrue humility of yours, it irritates me to the soul, till I hate!... doubly untrue because insincere, and because, if it were sincere, it would be true to facts: for whereas you regard yourself as far greater than all, all as as far greater than you as you fancy them smaller, since your greatness is bedraggled rags that prevents you from being good. Oh, why are you not some ordinary wight, a young workman, Lepsius, a mason, a sailor, who has never learned to spell? Then some girl would so gleefully desert all her father’s — But now, ah, il désir vive e la speranza è mortal... Do you, by the way, still believe it fine to steal?”

“Successfully, you mean?” he said quickly; “stealing seldom needs much show of wit, but swindling is very frequently fine. You, I know, do not appreciate its fineness, but to me it is evident; it is lying in deed as you frequently do in speech.”

That this would give the profoundest offence Lepsius had no grounds to think, lying being to his philosophy no crime; but with that chastity of the swan, which, being but brushed in her array of whiteness, frills and ruffles awhile, then with majesty swims away, so she ruffled.

“Not ‘frequently,’ I think,” Miss Eve repeated; “if I ‘lie,’ it is to myself, unwittingly; and in every event differ from you in fancying it ‘fine.’ Anyhow, now you can see how what you have wanted is out of the question.”

At this Lepsius, looking at her under his eyes, said, “Eve, be sincere with me!”

“I mean to be sincere,” Miss Eve told him; “I do hope I am; yes, I am. We hate each other, Lepsius, shockingly, like cat and dog, oh, we do, do not gainsay it. I lack a culture you have, you lack a culture I have — in my very marrow. Oh, I know that you are awfully clever and all that, and you fancy that because you can deck me with queenship I shall be dashing myself feverish and shivering upon your breast, little dreaming that the more thrones you throw before my feet, the more bitterly I'll spurn and keep you groaning in purgatory eternally. They say that just before the Exhibition you will be shooting into the sky a kind of sun infused with stored-up moonlight, which will make private lights at night useless through Europe, and France the richest of the nations; and that then, during the business of the Exhibition, you mean in a coup d'état to seize the throne, so as to sweep France off to overrun Providence knows what. It sounds mighty grand — I don't know if it is true; I only know — forgive my outspokenness — that it is howlingly vulgar, that it is not Christian, and that I should have far greater joy of a young mason or sailor-boy who behaves graciously to his father — one with a belt, may be, and your figure — that is—”

She stopped, and he said, “I listen,” but as she added nothing, he then said, “‘Vulgar,’

‘not Christian’; your criticism, of course, interests one, though it is curious.”

“Tell me,” Miss Eve said, “for whose weal do you purpose all that slaughter and upheaval — for the world’s?”

“For my own,” he said: “the weal of the world is in the management of the Genius-of-the-world, Who ceaselessly sees to it. I personally am not concerned in it.”

“Then,” replied Miss Eve, “that is what I mean by ‘vulgar’ and ‘not Christian.’”

“One idea or two?” he asked.

“No, one.”

Lepsius sat slowly aside on the bed, puzzling to understand her mind; and he said that he should have called Japan a far less ‘vulgar’ land than England, to which Miss Eve replied that if Japan was really the less vulgar, that could only signify that Japan was the more Christian.

“Clearly, then,” said Lepsius, “‘Christian’ bears in your mind some meaning of which I am not yet aware, since Japan does not pretend to be Christian. I will see one day in the month following the Exhibition just what Christianity is; but, as I knew that religions have all so far been infant fancies, and as the religion of Europe is so slightly in the minds of the peoples whom I mean to govern, I have never given myself the pains to investigate it. And you do not say for what reason I ought to cease from my schemes because they are ‘vulgar’ and ‘not Christian.’ Vulgar they are, since I am a man, and man is a temporary and trumpery little race, ingrained, whatsoever it attempts, with vulgarity. But put yourself, beloved, in my place: what can I find to do with my life? I am sequestered in the world; and it has occurred to me that that would entertain me to make a world-state. True, I might have turned my life to the delights of research, with the idea of laying the foundations of knowledge in the world: it is, however, such a work! since I should have to begin quite at the beginning, and I shirked it. You may have no idea what a mess your little knowledge or ‘science,’ as you say, is in! Without foundation, top-heavy, like the education of a child who has been made to learn the Babylonish Talmud by rote, but can write not one word of his own tongue. The so-called ‘scientists’ know the stars of the night, and talk in millions of millions; but as to the elements of knowledge, as to, say, the nature of gravitation, and what is the ground-reason why their candle-grease dribbles downward instead of bounding skyward, or why it is that the atoms in a twig or anything cling together, though when one breaks the twig, and then again puts the broken ends together, the atoms won’t any longer cling, they possess no more notion than the chimpanzee. Knowledge without foundation; vague, then, foggy, gappy: so that one may say, man knows nothing, and of that little which he knows he is but subconscious, hardly at all conscious. However, when these schemes of mine which you have called ‘vulgar’ are accomplished, I mean to turn almost the whole vigour of the world toward research and the gaining of some little ground-knowledge of the nature of things: for undoubtedly the want of this knowledge is what is now chiefly unwell with our species. But I mustn’t say to you, beloved, that men’s good is my aim, my only aim being to bustle and bluff a little as the governor of a globe in space.”

“But if a million men are killed by it?” Miss Eve remarked.

“Dear, it will not matter,” Lepsius replied.

“Will it matter if you are killed?”

“It will to you, to no one else, since everyone dislikes me.”

“But one will clamour and cry out, you think? One will bleat and beat the breast?”

“Dear, it will not happen; I am so easily the king of men.”

“Better, may be, if it did.... No, it is all awfully low, Lepsius, I say, even lower than Cæsar, as low as Napoleon, and proves how many a thousand miles divide you from me and from men: for far at fault, I can see, is what you said just now that Christ’s religion is but ‘slightly in the mind’ of the crowd! Deeply the world has breathed of its atmosphere, yes, and the murderer Burke, guillotined in the week gone, deep in its stream was immersed, everywhere save at his heel. One sees that, when one hears you speak. Do you know those words of Julian as to that Jew workman, ‘thou hast conquered, O Galilean’? — so scarcely true then, how greatly true now! You who can see, don’t you notice how pity prevails like the flood, and how charity roars like an ocean? Christs on the ‘bus, at the ball, martyrs that saunter in clubs? Firemen, nurses, the Red Cross; the blind boy pampered and spoiled; the sweater and swindler inwardly worked with a qualm for the world's weal; the moon on her throne still ruling, seducing the rudeness which roars in the tides with her mild smile, still by the touch of a Robe virtue disbursed through the world; and with that hem of his vesture encrimsoned, treading the wine-press of history, the white Christ travels, or, riding his triumph, rides on the foal of an ass over dominions and thrones. When you said, Lepsius, that self-sacrifice is silly—”

But here Lepsius stopped her with the whisper, “someone is coming!” on which the lips of Miss Eve, going at once quite sheet-white, breathed, “God! it must be my sister! Lepsius! go!”

“Why should I?” Lepsius said.

“Lepsius!” — she was beside herself—” would you compromise me? Lepsius? For ever? Would you?” for she herself could now catch the sound of something, a door moving open in an outer room.

“If I go,” Lepsius whispered, “may I come every night?”

“Every—” Even in that storm of her eagerness for his going Miss Eve paused; but she breathed, “Yes, every night — the key!”

In an instant the key was handed her, and he out of the outer window: on which she, too, in some seconds was down, was across the bed and at the outer window, all her breath breathing down to him fifteen feet below, “Every night! But I shan’t ever be here!”

She could just catch his ejaculation of “Wretch!” and as she snatched her fiddle, dashed herself into the chair at the casement, and arranged her drapery, soft footfalls came on the carpet, the elder sister breathing, “Eve! not in bed. Oh, Eve!”

“Dear,” said Miss Eve with langour, “I couldn’t get to sleep; I was playing the fiddle...”

“Well, I knew it.... I had a feeling that you were not asleep, so I got up and came to you, and here you are. Poor Evie! Cast your care upon God, will you, Eve?... But playing at this hour! And — where’s the bow?”

“I put the bow over there... Oh, Ruth, put your hand on my brow, I have a headache,” upon which, her head now lying back on the chair-back, she shut down her eyelids, and Miss Ruth, stooping, held her hand over the brow of trouble, groaning now and again a little in her soul, her cheek pressed against ‘Miss Eve’s cheek, till presently she breathed,” That better now?”

“Yes, sweet, that’s sweet,” Miss Eve breathed.... “Sweet, Lepsius was here.”

“Eve, here?”

And now, under the compulsion of that touch upon her brow, Miss Eve breathed out the whole story.

The sandals of Lepsius, meanwhile, were speeding away, till they arrived at his phaeton awaiting him beneath trees at Viroflay by the forest of Meudon, where, throwing himself in, under the setting moon he went tearing by way of Sèvres, Boulogne, Passy, to the palace. There, at the top of a stair, he was awaited by a man in robes of the Orient with a scraggy grey beard, hollow cheeks, and a nose mostly nostrils which gaped, who, with ever a wagging and nodding of his head, stood gossiping and gassing to Shan Healy: his name, Nundcumar. And these two, Shan Healy and Nundcumar, when Lepsius had mounted the stair, hastened without speech after their master’s speed.

It was when they three were in the midst of a corridor whose two rows of cressets seemed to meet at its remoter end, that Lepsius suddenly peered ahead, stopped, and murmured very low in Urdu to Nundcumar, “Anyone new in the palace to-day?”

Perhaps a second lapsed before Nundcumar answered, "One: a person who can spangle silk-muslin with gold of Dacca for the women-folk."

"Tell! Man or woman?"

"It was a woman. She—"

"Name."

"I cannot at this moment remember her—"

"Tell! European?"

"Yes. She—"

Lepsius walked on; but after some steps, without stopping, went slower, and now beckoning Nundcumar to him, said low, "You walk before."

Nundcumar's eyes opened with some apprehension as he began to walk on ahead, and immediately Lepsius brought forth from the bag of his shirt a species of pigmy weapon which one fired off by pressure upon a button.

The walls here had hangings of tinsel at intervals, between these being daubs on the walls themselves by Hindoo artists in hues as warmly gaudy to the eye as water flooded with the sun's after-glow. And it was when Nundcumar, having reached the middle of the corridor, was at the extremity of a hanging, that on a sudden he cast up his arms, all shivering, with shrieks which pierced the ear, vitriol eating now that doughy nose-tip, streaming down his beard. Meantime, Lepsius had swung forth by the elbow a woman who had been hidden behind the hanging, and in the quickest demisemiquavers fired two pairs of bullets, one into her right wrist, one into the left, one into her right foot, one into the left. Then during a few seconds he peered with a curiosity of disgust into the disfigurement of the squealing Hindoo, and was gone, throwing behind him to Shan Healy, who was kneeling over Jeanne Auvache, the order, "Call in the police."

He then made his way to the place where he slept: an apartment as broad as the palace in that part, resembling a barn, but possessing no walls on three of its faces, only processions of columns of marble which bore up three architraves. Within this chamber a hound — a mastiff all but as large as Lepsius himself — was pacing about; and when Lepsius had well bolted four doors, had again loaded his weapon, had placed it on some straw strewn over one angle of the plain of floor, had let his gaze muse some moments upon the moon going down within a couch of clouds which she flushed, and now had thrown himself down upon the bed of straw, the hound moved to lie down by his side, and both soon dozed.

CHAPTER XII.

THE WEDDING-PLACE.

THE DAY OF the opening of the Exhibition was coming near, so was the day of the nuptials of Miss Eve and Monsieur de Courcy, which had first been fixed for the 23rd of July, and then, by the nerves and eagerness of the bride's groom and friends, fixed for the 5th; and now orders for the gâteau de noce and other articles had already gone out, and already the lady and her guardians were at Gronland, a seat of the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard near to Orléans, where it was arranged that the marriage should take place.

In these circumstances Shan Healy observed truly to the Hindoo Nundcumar, "There be things brewing in his brain, as you'll see before too Jong — at work like six whirlwinds! And there's a little smile about'n somehow, and a something somewhere in his eye that spells pestilence to somebody, I haven't a doubt." Healy was seated in the evening dusk by the Hindoo's side, who, still luxuriating in bed with his nose sore in cotton-wools, lay silent awhile, but then lifting himself to hug his meagre knees, said with that wagging of his head, "Let him run, let him go along; but one day the whirlpools of destiny will decapitulate his head."

"Oh, you go to hell," Healy muttered; "learn to speak Christian English first, and then turn prophet." The Hindoo's loose tongue, in these weeks unusually quiet, was anew silent, his silences as well as his speech filled with that movement of his head which was as continuous as the neck-movement of Chinese playthings, and as full of meaning and meditation; and presently he observed, "And when he is done for, whirled up and filibustered for all he is worth, I know who will be the doer of it."

"Who's that, then?" Healy demanded, and the Hindoo's bony little face became animated a moment as he made answer, "The woman who threw the vitriol in my face!"

"Oh, she," said the other, "safe enough in chokey for four years any way — 'travaux' they d' name it here; and serves her jolly well right, too." Nundcumar, with his eyes shut and a head that wagged, said, "If she stops there!"

"Who's to get her out?" demanded Healy aggressively.

"I — do not know," remarked the Oriental innocently, with opening palms.

"Look here, you're a nice one to be speaking in this kind of way," Healy suddenly said; "appears to me as if you'd like to see it done!"

"Me?" said Nundcumar; "na, na, not me, my sonnies. What! me? Why, what was I when he ascended me out of the gutter? A dog, a hungry wretch in rags, just ready for the hangman to garrot by the throat" — he rushed his forefinger across his scraggy throat—"and now, what has he made of me? A king with slaves to ceremony my bathing, and everybody bowing himself down to make me the how-d'-you-do. And why this? Because he liked while at his work to listen with one ear to Nundcumar retailing wholesale his anecdotes of past doings, times, 'histories, befallings, happenings and epochs, and to hear Nundcumar speak his ingenious English; he wanted me for his gas-bag, his gabbling ape! and he gave me garments of shawl-goat wool, and dancing-girls of Persia with gold bells on their ankles to play the kitar before my godhood, all because he couldn't do without his Nundcumar's tongue. Na, na, not me. And then he made the villain woman vituperate her vitriol upon the nose and mouth of his good old hound-dog."

“Serves you right,” observed Healy: “what earthly right had you to admit the woman into the palace without proper inquiries? And who was to have the vitriol in the chops, you or he, I should like to know?”

“He might have chosen you to have it,” the Oriental quietly replied, throwing an underlook at Healy, upon which Healy chuckled within himself, saying, “Ey, but he didn’t choose, you seel.”

“No,” said the Hindoo, “he chose his Nundcumar instead. But never mind, it’s nothing, this. Only that’s bad, Healy, my friend, when the evil eye is thrown upon a man, for there’s not a god sitting on his throne of gold can escape—”

“And who’s thrown this evil eye upon him?”

“That woman — that villain woman.”

“Safe, thank God, under lock and key.”

“May be; safe, thank God, under lock and key, may be: but did I never tell and expostulate you the history and anecdote of the time and epoch when I and my brother were in the service of the Maharajah of—”

“Oh, I’m ill of your lies,” said the other; “you never had a brother, nor he nor you never were in the service of any Maharajah in this world. So help me God, I never heard tell of a nigger the like of you: other men lie with a view to deceiving people, but you lie like a lying-machine, just because you needs must, without the least bit expecting that anybody will be believing you.”

“Do they believe you?” the Hindoo demanded; “may be I know one that doesn’t, since he has had every step of yours spied, vigilised, and super-inspected ever since his sire has been over.”

At this Healy, eyeing the floor, heaved a sigh, and then getting up from his seat, said with the dignity of grief, “Well, you are right there, no doubt,” and walked out.

At that hour Lepsius himself, in an apartment without walls on a lower floor, was speaking with Mr. E. Reader Meade, who reposed on a couch at his ease, handing a moustache that rolled down like a weir, while Lepsius himself, in a sudeyree and trousers of nankeen, stood close to a telephone hung on one of the columns. In the midst a punkah, somehow worked, fanned the face; a fountain which span showered whirls of spray round flowers and ferns; two girls a good way off in corners continually caused their typewriters to prattle, peering nigh their work in the dusk; while here and there other species of machines competed in making their workings heard.

“Well,” Mr. Reader Meade was saying in English, “their scheme of getting hold of your person, of course, seems to me, too, a bit absurd — and you say you knew of it?”

“Well?” said Lepsius to someone at the telephone, throwing immediately to Meade the reply, “Yes, I knew,” and to the telephone-speaker the words, “Where, then, is Monsieur le Due de Rey-Drouilhet at present?” and to Meade again, “Go on.”

“I’ll wait,” said Meade.

“I listen,” said Lepsius.

“Let us take it, then,” said Meade, “that you will scarcely fail to elude that plot: for that’s the sick spot of your Frenchman, he lacks humour, is so preoccupied with ideas, that he lacks nice adjustment to facts, often fails to measure his new man or thing, and so comes a cropper in practice—”

“Precisely,” said Lepsius, “you are very shrewd — as usual. Say then,” he added to his telephone-speaker, “that I can receive Monsieur le Duc de Rey-Drouilhet for seven minutes.”

“The castle to which you are to be inveigled,” said Meade, “is called Château Egmond, on the Brittany coast, a league from St. Brieuc, and fourteen from your own Serapis. It is the property of Madame la Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard, has been leased from her by the League, I hear, and de Courcy, it is said, means to make it his residence immediately after his marriage, which takes place at Grønland, near Orléans, on the 5th — or am I giving you all stale news?”

“I knew,” Lepsius said, as he now flew through the room to drop some words at the ear of one of the girls, who in turn eagerly spurted out and now, returning, he said to Meade, seating himself on the floor with clasped knees, “Only I don’t quite understand by what means they hope to get me to go to this Château Egmond.”

“I am not too sure,” said the other, “but Saïd Pasha, who is always at the bottom of the dessous de la politique, asked me at the Palais-Bourbon last night to tell you that Nuncio ad interim Montijo will be of the company at the château, and as you are believed to be eager to gain the Church-party, this may be intended to motive you to accept their invitation.

Then also Marshal Rémy will be there, and your right hand, Schuré.”

Lepsius was up, speeding off to peer into a little machine hitched on to the telephone which fretted and roared in fits, saying as he ran, “But do they imagine that one cannot negotiate with Rémy, Schuré and Montijo without going down to Brittany? It is conspiracy of — let us say of Bismarcks, all born on the first of April!” at which word “Bismarcks” he chuckled maliciously within himself.

“But a conspiracy having this peril,” remarked Meade, “that Isabeau Thiéry seems to be more or less in it.”

“Oh, Thiéry is a shadow,” said Lepsius, throwing himself flat on a table, his hands under his head;” his characteristic is that he does not exist.”

“I should rather say,” said Meade, “that his characteristic is that he is the half-brother of Fanny Schuré, who is the wife of Schuré, who is the engineer-in-chief of the moon-machine.”

“And that matters in your judgment, I see,” said Lepsius.

“Much in my judgment,” the other answered very impressively; “you don’t, I think, know the Thiérys well; they are one of those French families who regard each of their members as something between a god, a genius, and a pet-dog to be pampered; and Isabeau Thiéry in particular, with his three volumes of Victor Hugo verse, is to Fanny dear no less than Hermes Trismegistus. I tell you so, Lepsius. He is a ghost, you say, and I say ditto; but his influence with this grande dame of a Fanny must be great enough: if he is against you, Fanny is against you. And you won’t undervalue this woman’s sway? A bit Brantômesque in tone as the girl may be, with her ambition to say things worthy of Esther Guimont, if not of Ninon de l’Endos, she has quite earnestly this further ambition, to revive the alcove, and, by pulling the wires in the political drama, to be called a Chateauroux or a Genlis. As to Schuré himself, you know him: au fond he is a viveur living in the odor di femina; his guts is his God, and his ‘fafemme’ is his Devil. If she tempts, he attempts; she says go, and he goeth. And I say that, if Isabeau Thiéry goes against you, then, through Fanny, Schuré would agree to yield to the immense pressure of your enemies to tamper with the moon-construction; and if there’s the smallest failure as to the moon — ah! well, you know the consequence of that.”

“You are always very shrewd,” said Lepsius, lying on his back with shut eyes, “and but for your judgment I should surely miscarry in everything that I attempt. All this that you say is quite true, and I have always intended to bribe Isabeau Thiéry at the right moment.”

“With money? Isabeau Thiéry?”

“Why the surprise?”

The Englishman got his limbs together, and sitting now on his couch-edge, stared, saying, "You cannot do that, you know.... Bribe any of them, the brokers, popes, emperors; but you cannot bribe a poet, man! Don't you know that for a fact, Lepsius? Frankly, you occasionally bring your friends' admiration of your brain to some sudden cropper...! You, too, having that French fixity of idea and lack of humour, knowing the human clock so minutely in everything, except just its divine trick, its 'eccentricity,' as mechanics say. You couldn't bribe Thiéry!"

"Abundantly, I meant," observed Lepsius.

"But that's worse! If you send him five hundred francs, there's just the millionth fraction of a chance that it might influence him, since he is so jolly poor; but if you send him five millions, don't you know, really, what will happen? He'll throw up the melodramatic right-hand that crumples the cheque, cry 'Cato!' and rush off to Sister Fanny to crush you. It's the 'eccentricity 'in the earth's yearly journey: you count ill if you leave it out.'"

At this Lepsius, springing up, looked at the other in the way of one who is struck by what has been said, and he had begun to say, "What grounds, now, have you—" when a negro, coming in between two of the columns, announced, "Monsieur le Duc de Rey-Drouilhet," and now Meade said, "Well, I'll be away," adding, "you can bribe him, Lepsius."

"And all of you," thought Lepsius within himself with a somewhat sullen eye askance on his friend.

The friendly Englishman and Lepsius, looking rather like cow and calf together, now exchanged a hand-shake, and in soon stepped the aged little duke, diffusing smells of perfumery, showing a youthful streak of teeth which shook, to seat himself finically on the couch which Meade had left, while anew Lepsius flew hither and thither, for some time paying no heed to the fop's presence, who meantime secretly touched his teeth, lips, cheeks, and sucked a cachou; till at last Lepsius, casting a look at one of a quartette of clocks, cheque-book in hand, dashed to sit by his side, remarking, "Six minutes and a half, Monsieur le Duc, and my admirable friend: tell."

"Why, it was you who sent for me," the duke said, tittering in his fluttering and fussy manner, "it is you, Monsieur Lepsius, whose rôle it is to tell!"

To this Lepsius made no answer, but stamping a cheque with a number of francs, furiously wrote the duke's name on it, and now threw the cheque askew to the duke's knees, without looking at him; upon which the duke sprang up somewhat pallid under his rouge, muttering in a protesting manner, "No, Monsieur Lepsius — your manner — I cannot accept — you forget, monsieur—"

Lepsius groaned. "We are such old cronies! And surely time is ever a thing of some value. Can you not see it? Tell, tell."

"I am aware that your time is valuable—"

"Yes, of course: tell."

"But—"

"No, tell."

"But are there to be no preliminaries? No pourparlers? You have handed me a cheque, monsieur — I know not for what amount, since positively I decline to inspect it—"

"Twenty thousand, that being the first of several, the others to be written out as you proceed in amounts proportioned to the worth of your words."

"The figures will be big in that event!"

"They shall be; you know that I am immense in generosity."

"But it is a bribe! — if you consider it. I was never, however, to be bribed! You forget, monsieur, that I bear a name which I never have, nor ever shall, stain by any real meanness; nor, if I have accepted money of you in the past—”

“It was not a bribe, it was a gratuity; a meanness, but not a ‘real’ meanness, because of your secret ardour for my person and service. I know it all, nor should ever dream of insulting that name you bear with a ‘real’ bribe: tell.”

“Well, provided we do thoroughly understand each other’s tone, monsieur...” the duke now said, sitting down anew with a twitching up of his trousers’ knees, “though in the present instance I absolutely do not feel that I could touch your cheque with honour, since, really, if you consider it, monsieur, it is a betrayal of comrades, this, in which I am engaged — you cannot get rid of the fact by any sophistry! — it — is — a — betrayal; nothing less!”

“Not a betrayal, only an exposure,” said Lepsius drearily, “nor need you actually touch the cheque,” and picking it up, he put it into the peer’s pocket.

“Well, say an ‘exposure,’ since everything, after all, depends on the tone of an act, and everything is right that is done by the right-minded.... At any rate, let me tell you, monsieur, that you stand in a situation of even the extremist danger!”

“I know; and Isabeau Thiéry is in it.”

“Why, yes.”

“Tell — deeply?”

“Deeply enough, although not whole-heartedly, I know. Moreover, he hasn’t a sou, so can at any moment be opened to you by the golden key.”

“And Dr. Lepsius?”

“He also... I am in the dark, by the way, as to whether the doctor is a relative of yours, although the question is being asked—”

“No relative. But that man is actually in the inside of the inner plot to kidnap and imprison me? Yes?”

“Why, yes. He has attended each of the recent councils in the house of Monseigneur Piscari, has even made suggestions as to the means of your capture.” The left cheek of Lepsius went ashen a second or two, and all at once he was up to fly with an eye on fire to a speaking-tube some distance off, through which, when he had whistled, he murmured low, “33, you?”

The answer was, “Yes.”

“Telephone to P.,” said Lepsius, “asking if all is ready on his side, in which case let him now wire to B13 to burn within an hour.” At the same time, without looking round, he cried out to the duke, “You see the amount is as I stated it, Monsieur le Duc!” for the duke was taking the chance to scrutinise his cheque narrowly in the twilight.

“I will see to it,” was the answer of the speaking-tube to Lepsius, who then sped back to the duke, saying, “Two minutes more, monsieur; tell details.”

The old fop laid one forefinger on the other, and with much animation of manner gave the details. Lepsius was to be got to Château Egmond, a league from St. Brieuc, by means of an accumulation of inducements, the chief being that Schuré, the engineer, without speaking with whom it was assumed that Lepsius could not exist a week, would be present: for Schuré, though not of the conspiracy — at all events not formally, so far — had, however, promised to be of the house-party for two or three days; and it was proposed that Schuré should fall more or less indisposed while there through unwholesomeness in his wine for, at any rate, eight or nine days, until Lepsius should be impelled to hie to his bedside. Then Lepsius was to be shut up in the château some days, until he could be taken to the bastille on the Ile de Bas, named Château Labême, which, too, the League had got on lease; and it was moreover hoped to reduce Lepsius to penury by seizing a minute key which Lepsius was believed to carry continually on his body.

Lepsius threw a new cheque when this had been said, saying, “Their names,” on which the duke, taking a leaf of paper out of his pocket, and speaking now eagerly with a mean secrecy of voice, galloped out a string of names, “Thiéry you know, Dr. Lepsius you know, and, of course, Sauriau, de Courcy, Leflô, Piscari, General-of-Brigade Rabot, Grand-Almoner Persigny; then there is Maspéro and Gustave Ghéon; the big bresseur d’affaires Briickner, Aly of gas, and Huguette of electricity; Captain Pertius; Pichot of Justice and Public Worship; Léonce Pettit; Director of Fine Arts Rémy-Rehaut; and Maître Sorel — with some provincials.”

“Their names,” said Lepsius, smiling a little, toying under his vest with that half a coin whose sister-half he had sent to Miss Eve Vickery two years previously.

“The provincials,” said the duke, “are obscure rich persons, not worth your resentment, monsieur; there is a Monsieur Louis Jammes of Lyons, a chocolate-maker, then a Monsieur Flammarion of Tours, a Monsieur Brisson of Rouen — who, by the way, is booked to go to the conference at Château Egmond.”

“I do not know these people,” remarked Lepsius with no little alertness of thought in his eyes which stirred fleetly from side to side like sheet-lightning. He then asked if the provincials had attended the Paris conferences, to which the other replied that they had not, being but “associates “ by correspondence with Sauriau, their secretary.

Lepsius stamped yet a cheque, saying, “ Make it your work to-morrow, Monsieur le Duc, to discover whether this Monsieur Brisson of Rouen, who is to go to the Egmond conference, is known by sight to any of the Paris conspirators, and you become affluent for six months, as already you are for three,” in saying which he threw the new cheque to the duke, and dashed away to peer steadily at the picture of a château colouring itself as by miracle in one of the electric machines. The duke’s arm had half started out for a hand-shake of farewell, but drew back without it; and now, after waiting some time, at last with a raising of the shoulders in a shrug which lingered long, he first with a grimace murmured to the four winds, “Is the interview, then, at an end?” and now, doing a very exquisite bow to Lepsius’ back, withdrew with bows.

As he departed, Lepsius threw half a look at one of four clocks, their staring faces of a largeness so exaggerated that they concealed, each of them, four of the columns’ mass, and afflicted the air with the click of their tick-tack; and with one tap of impatience on a chair he went muttering, “Come, Sauriau.”

Some seconds afterwards the name of the Abbé Sauriau was called.

“Admit him!” called Lepsius in reply, at the same time darting behind a screen, whence in scarce more than forty seconds he came out “dressed” in clothes made for quickness, without any buttons about them, and a second before the abbé came in had caught up, and was casting his eye over, a page of a book of the abbé’s just published.

“Monsieur l’Abbé Sauriau,” he murmured, shaking hands, “I was at this moment deep in Hellenic Idylls.... But what are you, then, Monsieur l’Abbé Sauriau. A re-incarnation of Plato? For surely, only a Greek could so utterly know the soul of Greece!”

Monsieur l’Abbé Sauriau had shy eyelids. “I am glad.... Oh! you have seen Hellenic.”

“Seen and devoured... and what charm! How airy! What daintiness of manner! Oh, truly, those gross fingers of the Abbé Sauriau know how to en’grave with a fairy’s grace.”

“Why, this is well,” said the abbé; “have you, by chance — finished the book?”

“Not quite, yet, monsieur: I am now at the myth of Leda.”

“It is the end that is the best,” breathed the abbé with downbent lids.

“Let us sit here, monsieur, and speak about it,” and now he led to the couch a spirit so bludgeoned and kidnapped by the scoop of this typhoon of flattery, that Lepsius might possibly then and there have made the abbé his slave for ever. This, may be, was actually his aim: for the Abbé Sauriau, owing to his amiable personality, his learning, and his well-deserved celebrity through the whole world of letters, was an individual of no slight influence in the under-currents of the life of the Paris of his time, both within and without the sound of the Palais-Bourbon bell; and not only was his brother, Louis Sauriau, a general-of-division, but the engineer Schuré himself was believed to be deeply under the influence of the abbé’s fascination. This being so, Lepsius, in his gross way, continued with a smile of amusement to eulogise to the skies the volume of which he had perused only one page, nor found any praise too gross for the poet to gulp down, while the poet eyed his right red sock which continually shook up, and struck the crossed leg with his glove. Unfortunately, Lepsius never knew more than forty-nine of the fifty parts of man, and as for man’s vanity, he was himself so exempt from any iota of it — his tone being that of a broker, wholly pre-occupied with the facts of things — that he little recognised to what a degree vanity, in its government of the soul, may famish such grosser passions as avarice. Hence, not content with praising the abbé’s book, he went on to mention his intention of buying an immense number of copies, and at once was aware of change in the abbé’s air, for at once the abbé was offended, reflecting within himself, “It is a bribe; and since he has a desire to bribe, perhaps what he has said as to the worth of the ‘Idylls’ is just humbug with a purpose?” and his bush began to burn.

Lepsius, who did not much care, leapt up just then to answer the telephone, and before he came back to the abbé peered into the machine in which a château was slowly painting its shape on a pane of paper: upon which his visitor called to him, “What a fuss of mechanism you have squalling in this hall!”

“Come, I’ll let you see them,” said Lepsius in a humour of devilry, to humiliate the spirit that he had lately praised; and he led the priest from little machine to little machine, teaching him something of the meaning of each — things of steel acting in the manner of rational and ingenious creatures — into which those bushy eyes of the Abbé Sauriau peered near-sightedly, and though he uttered hardly a word, from time to time a “humph!” would start from him. When, however, they came to the one where the château was coming out in colours, Lepsius nonchalantly said, “This one you could not comprehend, however much I explained it,” and dropped a handkerchief on it.

In this manner, half by carelessness, half in malice, he made for himself many enemies, by contempt; and in the abbé’s eyes came a flame.

“However, to come to details, monsieur,” he said as he sat down anew.... “I have bound myself to sound you in advance on behalf of Monseigneur Piscari, who met me last night in the Salle des Pas Perdus, as to whether you would be likely to feel inclined to make one of a party, mainly political, to meet in the country in a fortnight’s time.”

Lepsius span round to the abbé, saying, I wonder?... Whereabouts?”

“The name is Château Egmond—”

“I didn’t know that the prelate had a palace of that name.”

“He has lately taken it on a—”

“Where is it?”

“In Brittany, not twenty leagues from your own Palace Serapis, and a league from—”

“Ah, too far. Time, Monsieur l’Abbé,” and off Lepsius dashed anew to the machine of the château-picture, snatched the handkerchief from it, peered, and now beheld midget people rushing about it, and the château at four places wrapt in flames; upon which he flew back to the abbé, who was observing, “Well, certainly, it is a long way off, but then everywhere is near to Dædalus; moreover, everybody will be there — Schuré, Monti jo — many charming dames—”

“Ah! Who, for instance?”

“Madame Schuré for one,” replied the abbé with a flash of the eye.

“Unfortunately, monsieur,” remarked Lepsius very rashly, “I can’t be expected to make love to a rat d’opéra like Fanny Schuré when it is well known that I am already in love, and with a sovereign lady. If, now, you had informed me that the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard and her charming relatives would be there, that to a great extent would have abolished the distance.”

The abbé sat up at this, staring like one who is struck by a new idea, then muttered with some spite, “I was wondering if that could be managed, just to please you. It seems, however, to be out of the question, since one of those relatives of the countess is to be married on the 5th to Monsieur de Courcy at Gronland, in the centre.”

“And Monsieur de Courcy has not asked me to be a guest!” crowed Lepsius with gross sarcasm, adding, “Forgive me — forty seconds,” and anew he flew to the machine of the château-picture, a “living” picture, in which could be seen the leaping of flames that now surrounded all the place, and crowds rushing all about, and fire-engines spouting out waters in the night, all such mites as are the images which walk tiny in the eye of an ox. Lepsius gazed at it through a magnifying-glass, and when in a group of eight moving down a terrace in disarray from the house of flame he could make out the faces and shapes of the Misses Vickery, back he rushed to the abbé, saying, "That, then, must be my answer, Monsieur l'Abbé, to Monseigneur Piscari, with my thanks; nor will anything earthly alter my decision — unless, perhaps, it be some temptation in the shape of the eternal feminine.... You see, Monsieur l'Abbé, I become dissipated in mind like the rest, and oh, believe me, it is a relaxing thing to live among men.... What's the time?"

The abbé stood smartly up at the hint, and, as always after being with Lepsius, hobbled away brisker than he came, braced in spirit and pricked to be a man of the same height and stride as that model that he yet disliked; and with that baggy skin of his brow twitching with cogitation, gazing at the ground, he went quick of gait, galvanic-young again, making sounds with his great stick, down to a carriage, where he gave an address in the Rue Jean Gougeon.

It was the home of the Count de Courcy. The count, however, was out, but might be found, the abbé was told, at the Ministère, or else at a house in the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré.

To the Ministère drove the abbé; no de Courcy was there; so thence he drove to the Faubourg, where the Comte de Courcy rose from dinner to go to him at the head of a stair, and there the abbé said, with a scantness of breath, "I have been chasing you — am fresh from the individual whom — that is, from the young Lepsius, and shall be surprised from his mood at present if anything which we can devise will get him to step into the Egmond trap.... Would you believe? he is love-struck with Hellenic Idylls; it appears, my friend, that the young man dreams of it at night!"

“C’est vrai?” said Monsieur de Courcy (i.e., “By Jove,” touched with irony).

“Yes, you will find him turning author before long in order to vie with us others! But, believe me, monsieur, he is destined to discover that it needs a deeper brain to create a true and poetical book than to imagine machines of steel.”

“As Phoebus beats Hephaestus; but — you see — I am being awaited—”

“Yes, forgive me — only to tell you that it will be most difficult, as I can already see, to get him to go to Egmond, unless — may I express myself? it is delicate...”

“I even pray you to do so.”

“Unless Madame de Pichegru-Picard and her — nieces are of the party, in which event he will agree—”

The Comte de Courcy’s neck stiffened. “My friend, the suggestion would be ingenious, if it were not impossible.”

“I see that,” breathed the Abbé Sauriau, “especially its ingeniousness.”

“To me its impossibility is no less obvious, monsieur,” said Monsieur de Courcy.

But now steps were mounting the stair, and a man bearing a document and a telegram came up to give them to the count, who, having read the telegram, grew pale, and every second paler, and presently observed to the abbé, “My God! Grønland house burned to the ground!”

“Burned!” exclaimed the abbé; “why, accept my sym — But where, then, monsieur, will your wedding take place?”

“It may now have to be at Egmond,” the count said slowly, with meditation dwelling in his undertook.

“Why, then, this may be a Providence in view of the individual whom we have in our mind!” cried out the Abbé Sauriau.

“We will see how Heaven works it,” the count observed, now suddenly holding out his hand to bid bon soir.

CHAPTER XIII.

AT EGMOND.

WITHIN TEN DAYS everything was settled: the Comtesse de Pichegru-Picard, burnt out of Château Grønland, came to an arrangement with Monseigneur Piscari (who had already got from her the lease of Egmond in Brittany on behalf of the League), to go down there for the wedding of Miss Eve without interfering with the prelate's house-party; and Lepsius, for his part, on hearing now that Miss Eve would be at Egmond, agreed to go down, too, to meet the other political intriguers.

By the last day of June all the party were there, except a Monsieur Brisson of Rouen, and Lepsius, who had arranged to come on the 2nd of July for two days, the date of the wedding remaining fixed for the 5th of July.

As for this Monsieur Brisson, who lived not far from Brittany, why he did not appear was not very clear, for though he had been written to by Monseigneur Piscari, he had sent no reply.

However, about an hour after dinner on the 1st of July, Monsieur Brisson was announced just as a council which met to consider last details as to Lepsius had sat round a table in a chamber in a tower. The door was already locked when the card of Monsieur Brisson was brought, who, on being admitted, was seen to be the embodiment of the bourgeois in glasses, one of his legs bowed and booted with a sole inches deep, on which he steeply limped. As he was unknown by sight to the others, he had to produce some of his notes from the League before being given leave to assume his seat; and the conference then began in a gloaming still unlighted by any lamp, present being Monsieur de Courcy, the Abbé Sauriau, Monsieur Leflô, the Due de Rey-Drouilhet; the bent back of Dr. Lepsius sat sideways to the table, dumb; Monseigneur Piscari, a lank and stark inquisitor, presided; Isabeau Thiéry was absent; but there were some ten more, men of wit or weight.

The difficulty was to get Lepsius into Egmond without scandal: for if he once came in as a guest, and was seen, his disappearance would naturally excite comment and unrest; but after much discussion one Captain Pertius, a spark of the beau sabreur type, who had five pioupious (privates) at command in the château, proposed that as “Lepsius came, his capture should take place outside a summer-house in a south avenue, and Lepsius there kept till everybody was abed; and this was carried.

But now Monsieur Brisson of Rouen, with a rasping throat of the nouveau riche, at last gave a croak, saying, “It will be a great risk to keep him idling there for hours in that summer-house.”

And now, too, for the first time, Dr. Lepsius breathed a weary word, “I agree.”

However, their votes were overborne on the authority of Pertius, who, having thoroughly examined the summer-house, had found it strong and sound.

Then, till it was almost dark, many details were discussed, many proposals put to the vote, everybody knew what his own duty was to be, and the council was now about to be broken up when anew the throat of Monsieur Brisson of Rouen was croaking, “But I feel uneasy.... Who chose the chamber in which Lepsius is to be kept?”

“It was Captain Pertius,” said Monseigneur Piscari.

“And you have all inspected it?” asked Monsieur Brisson.

“Most of us,” remarked Monsieur de Courcy; “it is a good, good place, monsieur.”

“It may be good,” said Monsieur Brisson,” but is it the best? Oh, believe me, messieurs, in everything there is a bad, a good, a better, and a best, the best ever more grievous than the rest, but so greatly better than the better.”

“True,” murmured the Abbé Sauriau: “is it the best?”

“I propose that we search the château in a body first,” suggested Monsieur Brisson.

“I agree,” murmured Dr. Lepsius, and after some talk this was done. Monsieur le Duc de Rey-Drouilhet took with alacrity a blue candle from a candelabrum of ormolu, and with it led the procession, first up the tower’s stair to the chamber prepared for the prisoner’s sojourn, and then down and through almost the whole building, down to the vaults, up other towers, through crowds of halls and corridors, now with sounding footsteps, now with muffled, everyone chattering with some other in sets nonchalantly, Monsieur de Courcy and Monseigneur with their heads together before, and, behind, the Abbé Sauriau with the good bonhomme Brisson, whose right side, as along he stumped, stooped at every step of his right bow-leg.

He was giving the abbé a reason why he must needs leave Egmond that very evening, having come merely to attend the committee-meeting, when for the twentieth time he stopped to stare at a painting; and since he had already explained that he was then buying, he was left to pursue his hobby by the abbé, who did not observe that behind each of the pictures that Monsieur Brisson peered at he left a certain little object resembling a night-light; and behind one picture he left a vial and his handkerchief.

After all, it was found that the tower-chamber which Captain Pertius had chosen was the most eligible; and, everything at last arranged, the committee separated to come among the ladies.

At this hour, with the moon in the clouds, and groups of ladies and their gallants moving round the grounds, and sounds of music in the salons and galleries, Egmond looked a stately and picturesque place. The Misses Vickery were strolling with Monsieur de Courcy along the brink of an oblong of water that stretched far-slumbering in bosage from the bottom of the terraces to a mosque of marble at its far end, when there came up to them Dr. Lepsius to take part in their walk; but presently a messenger from Monseigneur Piscari came to call Monsieur de Courcy, who with his lips just touched a finger-tip of his future-one with a great parade of grace, and went away; soon after which Miss Ruth, too, was called by another party of promenaders — a Schuré group, Fanny Schuré burnished in coloured fires like mother-of-pearl, with whom Miss Ruth stopped to gossip, the innocent with the guilty, Dr. Lepsius and Miss Eve meantime going on to the mosque.

And there, sitting alone in a casement, they two spoke some time in low tones, while more and more the moon imbued the night with the mood of her beauty and her quietude, and communed sleepily the lily-leaves of the pool. It was when they were getting up to go away that Dr. Lepsius said, “But I mustn’t trouble a bride with an old man’s sorrows — in three days’ time you will be a bride, and I rejoice in your choice, which I think a wise one.”

Miss Eve had risen, seeming in her white evening-dress, with whitest cheeks, even weird in that sheen, and she replied with a chuckle, “It was prophesied me that I should not be a bride for some time to come!”

“By my son?... Well, he has no little might in this lower world,” the old man murmured, “but have no fear, he is by no means omnipotent, and, as I have hinted, he is at this moment in extreme peril for his own skin.”

Sharply at this, with a haughty heave-up of her chin, Miss Eve asked, “Who could touch him?”

“Ah! it is dubious,” the old man said musingly, bending over his oak stick; “still — I believe — by many eyes, and by many hands, and by the agreement of many wits and wills of men and God, it shall be achieved!” and now he struck the stick sharply upon the perron of steps down which they were now passing to the path, Miss Eve laughing a little with a meaning that was hardly understood, saying, “And his father, if I am rightly informed, is with his enemies?”

“That is so,” said Dr. Lepsius with an inclination of his head, whereat she stopped walking to face him, asking, “With your eyes quite open, Dr. Lepsius?”

“Well, I hope so,” the doctor answered.

“You have thought, then, of what will certainly happen, if — after — I am married on Friday?”

Dr. Lepsius glanced up at her, having noted her tones go shaky, and on beholding her face bony with agitation, said with some astonishment, “No, what will happen?”

“Your son will kill himself.”

And while the doctor with an eye of Scare stared at her, she with a certain roistering and hilarity added, “And since royalty should have servants rejoicing to join in its voyages, two you may see, if not more, go to attend on his ghost.”

“Two — I do not quite—” the doctor stammered.

“I meant my poor father for one,” she sighed, continuing to walk.

But since her “kill himself” the doctor had but absently heard what was said, and “kill himself!” he cried suddenly, crimson with anger, “let him! let him! I will go to his funeral! For I’d sooner follow him to the tomb—”

“Now, Dr. Lepsius, a father ought not to be down on a son,” Miss Eve said, “though I know that he has been beastly to you.”

At this tears gushed to the old man’s eyes.” Oh, it isn’t that, dear Eve — it isn’t the bitter ingratitude, the bruise, the gash in here: but how shall I not be against him in what he undoubtedly aims to bring about, when the mouth of every gash which he gives our race will shout out in rage against me? You see, do you not — ?”

But now the old man, touched on the shoulder, looked about, and saw Monsieur Leflô, who had come down an allée in the leafage as a messenger of the Count de Courcy, seeking the doctor; so the doctor went off with Monsieur Leflô, while Miss Eve, spying Miss Ruth in a group ahead, moved to go to her; but suddenly became aware of a stump, stump, of one limping in an allée, and in some seconds was accosted with a murmur of the word, “Mademoiselle.”

It was Monsieur Brisson of Rouen.

And when Miss Eve looked at him without seeming to know him, he, though undoubtedly agitated, said with a coarse chuckle that she and he had been shoulder to shoulder at the Quai d’Orsay that evening when a particular individual had dared to take a liberty with her lips: at which thing Miss Eve stood like a queen who stands astonished at so much insolence under the sun, then silently went on her way.

But this Monsieur Brisson was not one who could be banished with a chin; he followed to breathe near Miss Eve’s ear, “I wish to speak to you of him, he may be here to-morrow, and I have a message...”

“Here?”

“Let us go down that allée.”

She hesitated, and he glanced like lightning at his watch. “ Only three minutes to be with you — come.”

Now she walked with him into the dark of the allée, looking down at the ground, like one magnetised, drawn with a cord.

“For what reason will he be here?” she breathed.

“On business.”

“You are to inform your master, monsieur,” she then said in a haughty manner, “if Monsieur Lepsius happens to be your master, that I know him to be in much danger, so that he should have a care.”

“Oh, trust in him!” said Monsieur Brisson imploringly, stumping along by her side with dippings of his right shoulder; “do you imagine that, loving you, he can miscarry? He feels that the breath of his love is vibrant enough by itself to heave mountains out of their beds, and bear them as bubbles to the sea.

Nor is his danger so much; it will be nothing, if you will consent to fly with me this instant.”

“This instant?” she whispered furtively: “to fly? Away? With you?... But what, then, am I? A beast, with a beast’s soul? Evil to the core? Reckless, furious, moon-struck? Is there no Christ for me on high, I wonder? No right? No wrong?”

“If you came,” said her companion with some bitterness, though touched by her trouble, “it would save much time; and you would come, if hypocrisy was not your breath and bread,” upon which she rushed into an irritation not to be restrained, crying, “That is monstrously untrue and unkind! I mean well !”

“Well,” he said, “I did not expect you to come with me, for I know you. But you have to show me the windows of your bed-chamber.”

Now she stopped walking, standing tall, gaunt, her heart galloping up in her gorge, asking, “Why my windows?”

“Oh, nothing: just show,” he muttered; and when she had stared a little while at him, she paced on in silence.

Presently she went down another allée which led them to the terraces at the front and south of the house, and hence went on to the brink of a lake which laved with its waters a platform of marble at the château-back. Not a soul was thereabouts, no sound, only the spirit of the moon brooding upon the face of the lake and down the solitude of avenues of yews; and here immediately Monsieur Brisson stooped to whip off that thick-soled boot of his, whipped off his frock-coat, wrapped his two boots, with his top-hat, his spectacles, and his waist-coat in the coat, and cast all into the water, where they sank; in doing which very hurriedly, he asked, M Well, which are your windows?”

She, with her back toward the house and toward him, her brow bent downward, replied to the ground in a proud guttural that trembled, “I am sure I do not know why such a question should be asked of me.

... My windows happen to be those two on the first floor immediately over the balcony-end near by the statue — since it seems that the knowledge is desired,”

The plash of the coat with its weight sounded now in the lake, and “Monsieur Brisson,” that bow of his right leg quite gone, stood now limber on his bare feet, his elbow suddenly about Miss Eve’s waist: whereat she, feeling his lips stealing near her face, went fearfully pale; nearer, and she shivered with sickness; nearer, and she sucked in her breath as at luscious juice and shooting pangs, sighed “By heaven,” and had his lips.

He put her to lie on a bench of marble by the waterside, whence she through her half-shut eyelids watched him run away with a deer’s ease up an avenue of the park, and disappear in darkness.

Some way down that avenue was a summer-house in a bower, and there the runner stopped his career some seconds to conceal beneath the seat some sheets of paper, a piece of pencil, and two tiny tools of steel like keys, then shot on. And it was there that at 6 p.m. the next day' as Lepsius was driving from St. Briec station to the château in a carriage of Monseigneur Piscari, the carriage stopped, and was at once surrounded by a crowd of pioupious and others. When he demanded of them what was the matter, they answered that he was a captive, and Captain Pertius, who was with them, then proceeded, with a perfectly ashen visage and hands which shivered like leaves, to search each nook of Lepsius' costume, even his shoes, searching especially for a certain little key, which, however, was not to be found. Lepsius' trunk was sent on to the house, and everything taken from him. "Oh, let one have his watch," he protested, but without effect. However, by an act one might say infinite in deftness, he contrived as he was being hustled down out of the carriage to snatch behind him the watch of Shan Healy who attended him, and was not seen. He was then imprisoned in the summer-house with a sentry of some ten mounted upon him; and in there, having taken the paper and pencil from their place of concealment beneath the seat, he threw himself, face down, on the seat, and in a brown light began to draw diagrams.

On the day commencing to dim, he took out his collar-stud, touched it, and it shed round his sheets an electric sheen.

Soon after two in the morning he was removed to the room fitted out for him in the tower; the same hour the members of the League being met in council to congratulate each other and resolve on the next measures.

But early the next day their joys suffered much alloy through the turning up at the château of a certain Monsieur Brisson of Rouen, who had no resemblance to that first Monsieur Brisson of the conference! this new Brisson having the story to tell that, on going to a bogus business interview in Rouen, he had been imprisoned in a room by a gang of men, his papers grabbed, and he made to write a letter to his family saying that he was safe, and in Amiens on affairs. Only after four and forty hours had he been set free. So now the problem arose — who could have been that Brisson-of-the-limp who had attended the conference?

Lepsius, however, was there in the tower, safe enough, which was everything.... It was an eight-cornered chamber where he was, arranged with some little luxury, and large; but he suffered, being unaccustomed to be between walls, and here was but one window, with bars in it, while, as to the lush carpet, the eye of his consciousness was at every moment open to the microbic hordes that must be at barracks within it, nor could he bathe with ease, he who bathed frequently each day, nor was the food such as was usual with him, being much too luscious.

This was first served to him by a person who had a beard and appeared to be a man, but was not so loosely costumed but that certain curves of the womanly could be observed in him — or her. On seeing her when she bore in his breakfast, Lepsius moaned, and flew to the other extremity of the chamber, where he held a chair-back, ready if she attacked; but when she had put down the breakfast without glancing at him, and had gone, his brow reddened, and having begged one of four guards for pen and ink, he wrote to Monseigneur Piscari, asking whether monseigneur was privy to the fact that one Jeanne Auvache, a convict with a mania, who had been aided by his, Lepsius', enemies, to evade prison, had been sent to attend upon him. He received no answer to this, but the woman ceased to appear at meals.

It was a superb day — the third of July — and by springing up to his little window-ledge, and hanging on, as he twice did, he could see groups of elegant folk moving remotely over the terraces or gossiping in retreats of greenery, appearing pigmy far down below all that half-globe of sky and tabernacle-hall of cloud, like spirits idling in paradise; and once he was able to make out the face of Mr. Vickery, and once knew Miss Ruth, but of that form that his eyes sought saw no sign.

Most of the day he spent on his face on his table over plans of buildings and machines, which he concealed when the meals came in at one o'clock and at seven in the evening — for it was not suspected that he had any pencil and paper; and when the meals — none of which he touched — had been cleared away, he bathed at a basin of delf ware that stood on a tripod of iron under the window. This window looked toward the west, though the tower itself formed the south-east corner of the château, which looked eastward. So as the afternoon's heat waxed fierce in the room, he drew down his blind of dimity, and now continued his labour cooler in a cave of shade which the blind's maroon colour imbrued with a blush of ruby; but when the sun had well declined, he anew drew up the blind, sprang up to the window, and, like a monkey peering keenly into something never previously seen among its trees, clung on long to peer into the scene of the sunset — a sight rather high and tragic really for the heart of a man, the sun going down all among bars of crimson, the brow of God drooped, disgroried, His arms far outcast in gory crucifixion. Then the door opened and the meal of the evening came in, to be immediately taken away untasted; and now with feet of impatience, frowning, the prisoner paced about the chamber. No light was brought him when it became dark, for his jailers, having an apprehension that he might turn objects to unusual uses, took care that as few objects as might be should be in the chamber, not even a knife having been taken him with the meals. But by the aid of an electric stud, he spent some time in prying into the make of the lock of the door, though he had already looked into it two nights before, after the conference, in his rôle of “Monsieur Brisson”: which done, near eight o’clock, shunning the bed with its bed-clothes, he chose a part of the floor where no carpet was, cast a look at Shan Healy’s watch, and went to sleep there.

He knew (having been at the council), that at the hour of two he was to be roused to go on board a brig, bound for the bastille on the Ile de Bas; so he had commanded Shan Healy to conceal himself in the château and come to the prison-door exactly at 1.50, so as to help Lepsius to carry a load which Lepsius conceived that he would have need to carry. Ten minutes, then, before that 1.50, at a moment when preparations were being made in the château below to take him to the ship, Lepsius awoke to act. He was still at the lock of the door with the two little tools that he had hidden in the summer-house before his capture, when howls of “Help! help!” broke out without the door, and he was made aware that Shan Healy must be engaged in a struggle with the greenhorn pioupiou on guard out there; but the pioupiou’s howls were at once drowned in the sound of a disturbance resembling the bursting of some tremendous drum somewhere, which just then made the château to tremble through its breadth and length; and before that roaring was well over, Shan, who had felled the pioupiou with the pioupiou’s lantern, broke blithely with the lantern-light into the room, the lock of whose door had at that moment opened to the key of Lepsius.

But the poor fellow’s blitheness had no long life. He did not enter the chamber alone — at least, scarcely less closely than a shadow follows did the feet of a female follow him in. No word had yet been uttered between Shan Healy and Lepsius, and Lepsius was just going to call out “Come!” (in a din now as dreadful as all the guns of Armageddon mouthing, the house racking its frame to fragments, the ground quaking) when he changed his “Come” into a shout of “Out with the light!” at the same moment bolting to the other side of the chamber. But either Healy did not hear, or stood in a condition of mind too flurried for sprightly action (for he, too, had spied the woman as she had slammed the door after her); at all events, nothing was done as to the light, and Lepsius, as he pelted, moaned, the ogress after him, staring, her hair cut close, ugly, ghostly, grim as the very grave. “Shoot!” shrieked the fugitive to Healy, who, too, was in hot pursuit; but, even assuming that Healy was able to hear in the blare of that tumult, he must have perceived that he lacked the time to fire — unless, indeed, he was quite wondrously quick — because at that moment the woman’s arm was drawn back to throw her liquid; he saw it; did not see that by this time Lepsius was safe, having a chair with which to hide his face; and as the fluid was starting from the vial, wildly Healy flew between, receiving the bath of vitriol all over his right cheek and throat.

He could not help shrieking...!

“Idiot!” hissed Lepsius, who, as he now darted away, caught a weapon out of Shan’s pocket, sent with one glance backward and a nervous gurgle of chuckling a bullet into the woman’s bosom, which, however, chanced not to end her, and was out and away.

Right through the howling hell of the house from east to west he had now to hie: and fleet were his feet and alight his eye. Twice only he stopped a moment, once when, in pelting up a stair, he met flying down in a nightgown a girl whom with his lowered head he felled by butting her, knowing that if she descended she would be butchered; and a second time he stopped in a corridor to take the vial and handkerchief which as “Monsieur Brisson” he had placed there behind a painting. No want of light anywhere: for at various places the building was already in flames, which flames, serving as flambeaux, reddened the chambers where no flame burned; but as he spurted onward with his vial, the flooring violently sprang beneath his feet, and he was thrown against a wall, where he remained rather aghast some moments, until smoke in his throat caused him to cough, and anew he flew, though at one point forced to win his way with toil and patience over floorless joists. And afresh every forty seconds or so all the house started at a sound which opened its mouth to appal the heart and astound the darkness with the message of its solemnity, after each of which deepmouthed sounds count one second's pause and waiting, and now came downfalls crackling, like the brittle outbreaks of arrays of rifles prattling: for the bombs resembling night-lights that "Monsieur Brisson" had left behind statues, etc., had been timed to fuse, not in a mass, but one by one; and though he had so placed them in the below-stairs as not much to imperil the lives of the château slumberers, they were many, and were meant by him thoroughly to wreck the structure wherein men in their vanity had ventured to hem him. Anon he was aware of fugitives, single or in groups, staring, conscious of sin and of doomsday come: the Due de Rey-Drouilhet, all toothless now, his nightshirt aflaunt, flying down a curving stair, calling out upon the rocks and hills to cover him; then the stout Abbé Sauriau clambering over a mound of débris, his trousers unbraced; then through the fumes that rolled all round a courtyard Miss Ruth Vickery in a dressing-gown on a gallery, dragging her father faster than he could go, Monsieur de Courcy, too, with them, Lepsius himself then flying along a lower gallery on the opposite side of the court; and as they were going west — to see to Miss Eve, he guessed — and were well ahead of him, never did his feet so fleetly speed. The delay of some seconds occasioned by the invasion of his chamber by Jeanne Auvache had disturbed the course of events as forecasted by him, and he had hardly burst into his darling's apartments and turned the outer key, when her father's poundings were sounding at the panels without.

Erect on her bare soles in an alcove, robed in a bedroom-robe of lace, a stone stone-still, her hair a rope plaited to a bow of ribbon at her knees, Miss Eve stood, waiting, aware of his tumults, but beauteously dead, as one who has interviewed the stare of Medusa; and all in a tick, like a cat fawning, Lepsius was cast at her feet, kissing them, pleading, “Dear, will you come with me?”

Her friends were pressingly clamouring at the entrance; they screamed, “Eve!”

She took no notice of them, if she heard; as to Lepsius, she hurled up her right hand to Strike him dead, crying, “You brute!”

“Oh, do — for us two — beloved—”

“I bitterly hate and abhor the pair of us!”

“But you will get us both killed—”

“Thank God!”

Now he started up, an arm about her. “I have to make you faint,” his handkerchief at her face; and like fate she took it, did not fight, or very slightly, resigned herself, smiled, sighed, closed her eyes... and in some moments, by means of a sheet, he had reached the platform of marble thirty feet beneath, heard through the turmoil in his rear the noise of guns booming before — a signal from his yacht in the bay — leapt the balusters with his burden into the lake-waters, waded, swam a bit, obliquely north-westward, reached the lake’s bank, and there among reeds and bulrushes sat down to breathe and rest, her brow on his breast.

Southward, a smoke that soared to the clouds was being poured out steadily from the château, which ever throed inwardly with loud-bursting noises and sounds of rumbling like poisoned bowels and Etna boiling; and that plume of fume-and-fire slanted continually from point to point of the compass, for a wind boisterously blew, drizzle sprayed the face, and the moon, while suffusing the night wildly with the whiteness of her light, was herself quite hidden away out of sight in cloud.

Lepsius was soon up and gone again with his load, knowing that pursuit would not be slow: but it was a great labour; the country there is rugged; Miss Eve, drugged, could not, or would not, keep on her feet; Healy, with whose help the load would have been easy, moaned in his agonies somewhere; and the bay lay nearly a league away.

However, half-way to the shore he found waiting in a gorge where the gloom was gross under crags the Hindoo Nundcumar, together with four of his mariners, their eyes raised to the inflamed sky; nor was it long before a little half-harbour snoring in sleep between the arms of beetling crags, a brig's green and crimson beams, a steam-yacht's three beams, lay before them, and near a little pier of stone the men of two boats who lay on their oars for him, one a boat of his foes, one his own; and flushing the vault of heaven, even here, a false dawn flung far abroad from the château, and over the shore the breakers making their snoring, Miss Eve's feet bleeding, and streamlets of drizzle-spray in haste on her face.

They lodged her, still unconscious (as it seemed), among cushions, and plied to the ship, which, lying with steam at a moment's notice, immediately steamed away, turning toward the west: and rushing she went, urgently churning the sea — a long boat burnished with Tobin-bronze, burning the eye like a strip of the sun; and as the dawn worked and began gradually to overspread all the world of waters and of coast, Lepsius, prying apert on the stern, spied like pearl the pinnacles of Serapis.

CHAPTER XIV.

AT SERAPIS.

LEPSIUS, TO THE amazement of men, remained at Serapis for weeks, to the very eve of the Exhibition, though he quickly established a system of posts and telephones with Monsieur Schuré and other men of importance: as to which the Hindoo, Nundcumar, remarked to Shan Healy, "It is a piece of slackness, this; once he would not have done this: but when a woman comes in, great minds begin to go rotten, and look a little ahead, my sonnies, and you will see their catastrophe head-over-heels."

It was then the turn of the Hindoo with his burned nose to drone by the bedside of Healy; and Healy, who had conceived a fever from his vitriol-dose, said with a moan, "Won't she let him see her yet?" Nundcumar wagged his head meaningly-meaninglessly, going, "Not she: true-blue British and Ai, a queen of queens I keeps him dewrithing in the deepest depths of hell! That morning when she landed, he thought he had her, my sonnies; but, if he is artful, she is a bit artfuller still: peeped through the rose-curtains of her palankeen, smiling with him like any dancing-girl, gabbing and gossiping with him about Serapis, and how he built it; then when she was in and saw Serapis, and what it is, her nostrils spread a bit, her breath stops a bit; but by the time he had got her into the west ivory seraglio, and gave her to know that that was to be her special palace, she had come to herself again, looking as compleased as Sir Punch himself, smiling with him, and he with her, and she with him, all very fine and large; so she halts before one of the bashi-bazouks guarding a hall, gaping at his get-up, his thises and his thats, his whys and his wherefores, makes him draw his sword to show her, all marquetry of little gems and gold, his dagger, all marquetry of little seed-gems, a real pleasure, delight and comfort to man's ophthalmoscotics; and, says she, 'How pretty, Lepsius!' she says, drawing the dagger out of the guard's paws; 'oh, I mean to keep this; may I?' So Mr. High and Mr. Mighty he looks at her quick, then lowers his eyes, and at last he mutters, 'Yes,' reluctantly. Then she begs him to go, as she has a migraine-ache, so he hands her over to her ladies, and goes; and the moment he is gone she squats to pen him a note: and what do you suppose was in it?"

Shan Healy tossed for ease, moaning. "Anybody can easy enough guess out what was in it; but how the deuce do you know?"

"I know and I know," said the Hindoo with a moving head, "and what I do not know is what man knoweth not, for that which is is shown unto me. And in the note, word for word, she says, 'Lepsius, I admit myself your prisoner here in Serapis. You understand though, I think, knowing me armed, that I instantly die if yon venture to enter anew any part of my palace; test me, I woo you, to see whether I mean it or not. — EVE.' That was her scribble, my sonnies, and the wording and reverbosity of her constructing."

Healy opened and closed anew his sick eyes to reply, "If it's true."

"What, don't you suppose I ever let slip something that's true, for form's sake, in the hey-day and prime of life?" prated the utterly senseless ape-tongue of the Hindoo that ambled blandly in a monotone along, with the obscurest meanings anon, if meaning it had. "So he ain't seen her since?" Healy asked.

“He has seen her every day, though she little thinks it! for she is artful, but he is artfuller still—”

“Old gas-bag,” Healy moaned,” you said just now that he is artful, but she is artfuller still.”

“Both are artfuller than each one, my chum Healy,” Nundcumar said: “he is artfuller than she because he is of the guiley ones and artful dodges, the beguilers and the wilers, and she is artfuller than he because she is a woman, and the guilt of womanhood is in the juice of her gall-bladder. But he sees her when she little believes it: his eyes have their peep-holes and their spy-places to weigh her and dwell upon her when she’s wantoning on the water with her poet and her ladies, or when she is walking under the arcade of the courtyard gazing at the gauderies and the graces of her Persian and Delhi girls dancing with their carcanets of pearl in the moonshine: for she grows every day more luxuriatingous, which is the curse of Serapis for everyone who enters it, from the lord of all to the low-cast coolie who polishes the porphyries; and in these three weeks she has grown into a regular begum-queen, true-blue old England as she is, and if he only waits a bit, he will get and win her, be certain — that is, if she does not flirt off abscond and run away first with the young poet Pershorez—”

At this the sick man looked at Nundcumar to sigh,” Oh, you scandalous tongue — if I only had the Strength —

“Why, my friend Healy,” said Nundcumar, “have your ears not heard how she pets her little Pershorez? Cannot stir without him near her! Feeds him with sweetmeats, conserve of roses, orange-honey of Kauzeroon, and all delights, almond-patés, and amusements! her eyes musing on his eyes all an afternoon in that small hall of red andem-wood, while he recites to her from Hafez and Ferdousi, sir-poets of Persia whom she cannot understand a word, though she can well understand the face of Pershorez, my sonnies, which is only made of cream of gazelle-milk and rose-leaves fading, and his little figure more perfect in grace, symmetry, curves, and very hungriness of perfecting than Thammuz, the love-god that Syrian girls go thin for fancy of, and sigh for very hungriness of delight, and die of. And that other one, the lord of all, he knows, he knows, of this, because Barova, the little Arab slave-maid, who is thin, faint and gaunt for love of lord Lepsius, she pushed her way one night right into his private hall in the north palace, and told out of her mistress, how the grossness of the sap of womanly hungriness grows wanton in the arteries of her gall for Pershorez; and first he could not grasp what the girl wished to say to him, but then for very anguish of jealousy he cast back his head-piece and laughed wild—”

“Laughed for fun,” sighed Healy— “if any of it is true.”

“For fun, may be, and may be not for fun,” the Hindoo said with a moving head: “though not much fun in Serapis going on these days. Wait, wait: for that’s bad, Healy, when the evil eye is cast upon a man, and the villain woman with the vitriol is not yet dead, for first it was poor old-boy Nundcumar on his oil-factory nose, and then it was you, poor boy, and the third time it will be — another one of the ones. That’s bad, that’s had. And the seeds of disease spring and spread in Serapis; he loses hours now in peeping and dreaming and brooding about her — loose! looser every day; and when the woman comes in greatness goes out and out, for the race of man would be a crowd of gods, but the presence of woman relaxes his screw and corrupts his entrails. Peeping, dreaming, like any Pershorez poet! and his Exhibition that is all the talk coming so near! Several times he has passed hours hanging about her: once stood guard disguised as a mamaluke under that cupola of enamels of her outer hall to see her pass close; and he has fanned her face disguised as a slave-girl, where she sat listening among her cushions to her Persian girls singing to the vina, with the zels clashing aloud, and the kanoon-lutes making music and all sorts of sounds, alarms, loudness and howdedo of melody; and he has come to embalm her musk-baths, attended her bathing, painted her nails with henna, and she with her weapon none the wiser—”

The sick fellow whined at this, sighing, “Pity you’re quite so vile an old liar, after all.”

“Who — me?” said the Hindoo, a finger at his breast: “why, some of it is true, my friend Healy, as the four and fourteen gospels! And how about the letters that go between them, have you not heard of this? For every day he writes her three-four times, and every morning that dawns she writes him a line, though for two weeks she would not, but when he raged, prayed, raved, consought and implored her with so much squalling, pain, despair and foaming, she said at last that she would write him one line every morning, giving him a puzzle-problem to solve, since he is so witty, wise and witful in all wiles and witticisms, and if ever once he failed wittily to answer her, he must agree to let her go from her prison in Serapis to her parent, who is sick to death for lack of her, though Sir Lepsius sends her daily the report that her parent is in health and roarious spirits. So every morning that dawns her note goes as regular as the milk-carts and the market-gardeners all the way through from the west to the north of Serapis, wrapt in satin in her poet’s hand; and one day the lady has written, ‘Lepsius, tell me to-day if the spirits of men live ever and ever. — EVE ‘; and one day she has written ‘Lepsius, write me to-day (with a why) which wild-rose is sweeter and wilder: those all white on the weald, or those which are washed as with shame. — EVE’; and one day she has written, ‘Lepsius, tell me to-day how the heavens and star-dust were formed out of nothing. — EVE’; and he to her writes the most fantasticalest, whimsiest, witticismest answers, replies and respondencies, as she has shown them to her old Nundcumar when she sits listening with delight to my tales, faries, frivols, and other lip-froth; and as to that of the forming of the heavens and star-dust, he wrote her that, once upon a time of the times, One Who Is, wishing to compose an oratorio of music, brewed oceans of ink in a bowl of gold, and, holding in hand a pen of gold, began to compose and throw off the notes of his oratorio; but soon, when the beauty of the music stressed and throed in his soul, so that he pressed well upon the pen, the pen splintered, and the ink spattered, blotching with spots and splashes all the blackness of the vault: so One Who Is roamed more remotely into the womb of gloom to compose some more glorious oratorio. So they toy and coy, and bill and coo together, my sonnies; but wait — let him go on: the seeds of disease spring and spread in Serapis, say I; he gets slacker and taxer with his idol-lady; wantonness and riot is growing among some of the scum of the domestics; many of the men, and their commanders, too, are grumbling with discontent because of regulatings and strictness; that villain woman—”

Here, however, the entrance of a sister-of-mercy, Healy’s nurse, whose frown the Hindoo knew, interrupted and drove him out; immediately whereupon Healy begged to be permitted to pen a note, and on gaining the battle, wrote as follows: “Master Hanni, I beg to be forgiven for writing to you, but as I do not much fancy now that I shall ever be getting up out of this again, that’s why I take this liberty, which is to say that I wish to God, Master Hanni, you would get that dog of a Hindoo Nundcumar from being near about you, for he means you no good, I doubt, and under the ridiculousness of a parrot this man hides ten times the craftiness of a fox. Dear Master Hanni, you may not be aware that thirteen years since Nundcumar was two years in Wormwood Scrubbs Prison, near by London, for stealing two bicycles. And, Master Hanni, that you may never cease to remember with any breath you breathe that Jeanne Auvache remains alive is the dying prayer of yours till death, Shan Healy. I'd give fifteen years, if I had fifteen days, to lay my eyes on your face once again for one moment on this side, but that may be a bit more than I can expect of you: and, if not, good-bye to you."

A little slave of Healy's was at once sent out with this letter, which two hours later reached the hand of Lepsius in the north-east regions of Serapis, where he lay in a diwan-i-am, or hall of audience; and his glance having lassoed in one swoop the significance of the note, he threw it among other notes into an alcove of the throne in which he lay, saying to a gentleman (a commissaire) who sat with him, "No, Monsieur Hugonnet, you have my assurance: she is not in Serapis; she perished in the collapse of Egmond."

"Not so, monsieur, I think," said Monsieur Hugonnet, a big bureaucrat, who ever struck the wind with his eye-glass in his fingers: "that theory is no longer tenable, for it is now established that some shreds of her body must have been found. Moreover, you do not forget the crew of the brig's boat who saw a lady carried into your boat?"

"It was another lady," replied Lepsius, smiling, "as ten days ago I gave myself the pains to prove to Monsieur Leflô and Lord Rawlinson."

"Monsieur, I admit it," the commissary replied: "you have conclusively proved that Miss Vickery is made of air; this, nevertheless, seems a matter in which frankness, reasonableness and right feeling might well be invoked on both sides. Think, monsieur — the lady's father lies half dead of it; and the English Government, I give you my word, monsieur, grows every day more earnest, more urgent—" at which Lepsius, jumping up with a rather reddened brow, went walking about a hall all pillars of marble, between which stretched screens of perforated marble and filigrees of gold, screens low enough for one to overgaze, away below, the crags of the Brittany coast, and, away beyond these, a streak of sea, indigo corruscated with snow-glints under the sun's glare.

“Let the English Government grow urgent,” Lepsius, returning to Monsieur Hugonnet, suddenly said: “what then? What would you and it have? Have I not allowed your troops to enter and ransack every crack of Serapis? Have you found Miss Vickery? No. So, then, she is not here? Nor is she made of air, monsieur, believe me, but of flesh and blood, and her palms, if you palpate them, will be warmer to you than the bark of the maple. So, why have you not found her? And how much more of my time shall I have to lavish on this matter?”

“Serapis is not so much a palace as a town—” the commissary commenced to say.

“Still, you have searched it throughout!”

“Let us search it again, monsieur, for certainty's sake!”

“Again? And when?”

“Say to-morrow, will you?”

“Well, it is ridiculous; still—”

“Scribble me a pass, monsieur!”

Lepsius scribbled a pass for the following day, and the commissary went away.

As for Lepsius, he had no fear of the legal visit, since his reason for giving Miss Eve her (west) palace was that in it were rooms so curiously and astutely concealed, that no keenest wit could suspect them; and on the previous visit of the police Miss Eve was easily induced on some excuse to step, unsuspecting, into one of these. So Lepsius smiled, as he once more stepped up to recline in his kind of throne, little thinking that that commissary was more cunning than he looked.

He was about to sound for the following interview, but instead put out his hand to Healy's letter: did not, however, lift it; but, his hand on it, reflected a little; then sprang up, and ran out, down the length of three corridors, across a hanging gallery, guards making him salaam, down a stair, along a lake, south-westward always, knowing his way without fail, slaves and dignitaries, going on their various duties, standing agape, saluting his tunic's glare, his turban's egret of heron's feathers aburn with seed-pearl, and up a curved stairway to a certain curtain: and Healy's Ursuline nurse stood up amazed to see him peer in, and wished to wake Healy, who lay breathing strangely in sleep; but Lepsius restrained her.

Lepsius stood about two minutes, looking down at that rash on the sick brow, the bandages on the breached cheek; took up, looked at, smelled two of the medicine bottles; took up and held the sick hand; and, holding it, gazed out with a brow of trouble through a great window which was hollowed out in Moorish ogives, out into a court where the whiteness of a minaret in the midst of a lake was reflected far down in the water, with zephyrs flirting along the water's surface: an afternoon in July in which all that Brittany country slumbrously basked, and bumblebees, as air-boats trading, tromboned a moment, as through steamboat throttles, their boom of music across the ear-drum dreamily, and cruised to some other ear. Somehow Lepsius sighed. And whispering the sister, "Tell him that I came," he went away in haste.

But he had hardly passed beyond the door's hanging, when a French functionary with a wild and white face, wringing his hands together, raced to him with the hiss, "My God, monsieur, all is lost! Monsieur Hugonnet has gained admission with a squad of gendarmes, and is now searching Miss Vickery's house!"

Quickly Lepsius' eyes stirred from side to side. What had happened he saw: Hugonnet, aiming to take Lepsius by surprise (as he did!) had adventured to present to the guards at the great gates the pass intended for the morrow, and they had not noticed the date; nor was there any possibility of inducing Miss Eve at a moment's notice to move into one of the secret rooms, nor any possibility of checking the officers in their search, nor any possibility of keeping her a prisoner in Serapis, if she was once seen, nor any possibility of living without keeping her....

Lepsius flew....

Not toward the west palace, but back toward his own north, and not the way he had come, but as the bird flies, one eye on the watch on his palm, one on the way he went, once swinging over a wall, once swimming an oval of water, trampling flower-beds, routing men, making one bound of stairs, while the fowls of the air cried out their affright at his flight; and now like whirlwind his fingers were scattering among masses of trinkets and things in a certain mahogany, he groaning in his soul; got what he wanted; and now was gone again, going straight as the bird goes, west and south, swinging, swimming, bounding, and now at last was in the south-west house.

Standing within a doorway under a dome, he heard above-stairs the sound of the troop; and stealing in a tick up sixty steps on the belly, his wet streaming on the alabaster, he spied the troop, who, he saw with spite, were just moving from one of his secret rooms, proving treachery in Serapis. And on they went, Monsieur Hugonnet and ten gallants in gaudy garments with swords, walking with a swagger between two white walls with lines of doorways in them that seemed without any end, he hiding behind, wriggling with eagerness as a tigress wriggles about to spring, hearing now a sound as of the harp far off (which, however, the gendarmes seemed not to hear), and aware now where Miss Eve was. So the moment that the commissaire, examining a plan in his hand, went into a doorway with his men, Lepsius sped on to slip ahead of them, but before he could get to the door heard the sound of the searchers coming out again, a glance having shown them that no one was in there: and he had to shy into a side-corridor on the right. And now on a sudden the sound of the strings of an instrument struck to the ears of the seekers, too; they looked alive; “Come on!” cried the commissaire, and on they stepped. Now Lepsius sped ten-footed to the right down the length of his side-corridor, turned at its end down a second corridor, turned left down a third, and in this last spurted through door-curtains into a room, before ever the troop had attained the bottom of their corridor — a room of monstrous circumference, domed with moresque-work in gold, and, though looking a ghost of marble, cool, too, and balmy, its circle of rose-curtains being all closed, embarring a grotto of umbrage within, which was pregnant with fragrances of frankincense burning in urns and cassolets. Two fountains wheeled about its centre, between these in the wilderness of floor being one flush of colour and odour of woman, cushions, stuffs, rugs, for snugly grouped there lay an oasis of ladies making music, Miss Eve seated in their midst, cuddling a gazelle which lay chewing the sugar of its cud with lids of indolence. All at once she was up, tall! a weapon started out of her breast, yes, and was brought down, and would have been driven to her heart, if the feet of Lepsius had been by one whisp less fleet, or his eye less wise. He had her in his arms, the ataghan-dagger cast far, she struggling against a handkerchief which he held on her face, with stifled cries of “Let me go! Lepsius, let me go!” He, however, clearly hearing now the near-coming of the steps in the corridor, pressed heavily, had her senseless, laid her down on the yatag (ground-bed) where she had been sitting, and drew to her chin a coverlet over her. At that moment the troop stood at the door, and, had the music not ceased on his entrance, Lepsius, however speedy-handed, could not have succeeded; he had counted, however, upon the music ceasing: and during the seconds that the troop remained out there in a state of hesitation as to which was the chamber of the music, his raging hands had her face brown with some ulmin or umber-stain, had his turban bound about her brows, her mouth, cheeks, submerged beneath a snow of beard. “Say ‘sh-h-h’ if one enters,” he whispered, “fan her,” and he vanished.

Some seconds later Monsieur Hugonnet and his troop rapped, came in, inspected the group of Oriental maids, the poet (lone male among women) with his lute, the gazelle, and the old Ulema, Imam or Cadi taking siesta on the yatag in his turban, softly fanned by his girls. The gendarmes cast glances at the group of girls — could hardly be got to move on; but presently searched through the hall, and spent the rest of the day in searching Serapis in vain.

Nor did Monsieur Hugonnet go out as he came in. In passing down a stair in the north palace, he and several of his men slipped down it, three spraining their legs; in one place he got an electric stroke; and in his going out of Serapis a grate gave way under him — a grate that had sustained all his men — nor was it without difficulty that he was raised up, half-drowned in filth, out of a drain.

Thus ended the final attempt of the two Governments to find the prisoner in Serapis. But no sooner did the Governments begin to give up than her sister, Miss Ruth, said, “I will find her”: and two days after that failure of the police, late in the evening, Lepsius received a request to admit Miss Vickery, for no one was admitted into Serapis unless permitted; and he at once sent for her.

“Alone?” said he, with his elbows laid on a table to stare at her paled face upon which a lamp shone, she seated with her luggage (a hand-bag) at her feet, a pretty sprig in her hat, for she liked little fineries and vanities, provided they were very cheap.

“Yes,” she replied to him, “quite alone.”

“You have come to see — Serapis?”

“Why, what a question — for Eve!”

“If I had Eve, do you imagine that I should give her to you?”

“I am even sure that you will, if I beg you.”

“Beg me, and see.”

“You admit, then, that you have her.... Tell me whether she is well!”

“No, she is not in Serapis. I fancy I know where she might be traced, but she is not in Serapis.”

“Oh, fie, you tell lies; why, I have seen her here.”

“You?”

“Yes, three afternoons ago, in a dream. I hardly ever go to sleep in the day-time, but somehow that afternoon about two sleep overpowered me, and Eve lay before my feet. She lay asleep, and she was an old man with a beard somehow, and yet she was Eve, and a goat with its forelegs doubled underneath it fed by her feet, and it was here in Serapis, I knew very well, in a room with a dome over it.”

Lepsius, staring at her, remained dumb.

“So you see,” she remarked with an underlook, “there are more kingdoms than you have visited.”

“Myriads more,” he mumbled.

Now all of a sudden she brought down her fist masterfully upon the table, bending forward. “Let me take her back to her poor papa!” whereat he laughed with a sort of wrath, crying, “I! I have her for ever and ever!”

“Have you married her, may I ask?”

He, his gaze on the table, mumbled, “If I even go near her, she raises a dagger to pierce her bosom.”

“Good old Eve,” breathed Miss Ruth, staring in surprise; but added immediately with veiled eyes, to soothe the agonies which she guessed, “that is not because she loves anyone less, but because she loves God more.”

“You are an unintelligible family,” he remarked with half a shrug.

“Oh, but well-meaning, I think, well-wishing,” she said. “Anyway, if — since — she may not come with me, I will stay with her.”

“No; if you stay, you stay a captive; and, if I allow you to, I thereby avow that Eve is here.”

“No one will know but my papa, who promises you, if you will let me be with her, never to tell anyone.”

“So, then,” asked Lepsius, “you imagine me sufficiently childish to rely upon your father’s promise?”

“You do not? Really? How curious! Well, I undertake, then—”

“Your undertaking is without weight. Moreover, you once before broke a promise that you made me.”

“When?”

“At The Towers, as to betraying my presence to Dr. Lepsius....”

“Oh, but if one meant well! Look, now, into one’s eyes....”

She looked into his, and he into hers, which had water and all her heart in them — ten seconds, twenty, thirty — until his dropped at her purity, with a murmur of the word “sweet” on his lips.

Then he said, “But you are all against me; you would be speaking against me to Eve.”

“Well, then, I will undertake never again to do that.”

“That is not enough; I say no, unless you will undertake to woo her in my favour.”

“Now, how can I? Is she not affianced to — ?”

“How laughable!” shouted Lepsius: “she shrieks with laughter at the mere thought of such a farce! De Courcy is a gnat, a limpet in a hag of peat-water! And since you, meaning well, could break your promise made to me, why may not Eve, meaning well, break her promise made to this ape-man?”

“Oh, I,” Miss Ruth replied with her touch of flippancy, “I’d crash through a promise like piecrust any day, if I saw fit, for I think that a Christian is set free from rules, and in the pure every crime is pure. My sister, however, regards herself as more bound by laws and modes, and as to departing from a promise once given, it has always been her way, I know, to regard that as rather a ghastly business. But suppose that somehow the fact of her espousal could be overcome, how can I ever possibly cry back to your cause, knowing that you are not a Christian?” Lepsius smiled. “If that be all, regard the knot of Gordium as cut: I become a Christian this night.”

“How will you—’ this night’?”

“Isn’t there something about being plunged into holy water?”

“To be plunged into holy water is hardly to be a Christian, I think.”

“What, then, is?”

“To wish well to the world, I think; to live to serve it; to stand piously alert to suffer and die for it” — with down-turned lids she uttered this, and, as he heard it, his brow twitched once; then bringing his mouth down to the table, he mumbled, as it seemed, to nobody, “A lady here to be led away west,” and as a guard in gauds appeared, he remarked to Miss Ruth, “You will hardly be able to persuade me that you are a thinker, you know; but I am persuaded that you are in some way the sweetest of sisters and girls, and a prisoner whom Serapis will not readily let go.”

“Have I won, then? Am I about to see her?” — Miss Ruth bounded upright— “oh, but you are pretty good, after all, and I shall never, never forget you whenever I lift my eyes to the hills of God.... How is she? How far is it? May I go now?”... Lepsius was whispering to the guard, who soon afterwards turned to Miss Ruth, and it was in quite a gush of girlish flutter and flightiness of glee that she went with her guide’s steps, inclined to prattle, crying anon, “Why, Serapis is all like a white metropolis swimming on water!” — for all the lights of Serapis had by this time been lit, and beamed star-wise far and near in myriads, as it seemed — white, crimson, green — streaming on negro waters that gleamed like steel, so that it all seemed of the drama of some teeming dream. But when at last they came to the west-end, it was only to be told that the lady of the place was away on the west lake with her playmates; and making their way to this with haste and impatience through alleys and courts, an increasing roar now sounding in their ears, the pair of seekers stood on the lake’s shore and shouted. During some moments, however, Miss Ruth screamed “Eve!” without result, inasmuch as the gondola of gold-moresque in which Miss Eve rowed was close under the gross roar of a cataract that rolled with a hoary angriness, Niagara-like, over crags near a hundred feet deep at one end of the parallelogram of water that made the lake — a lake surrounded with towering house-walls and crags. But soon Miss Ruth was seen from the boat, Miss Eve screamed, and before many moments the sisters were breast to breast, uttering breathless syllables, broken with kisses.

“But — let one look at you!” — and when Miss Eve exhibited herself, “Is this Eve?” the other asked, for Miss Eve was in a garb all of flimsies of the Orient as gaudy as rainbows — silk-muslins, gauzes — her ears gross with ear-rings of coral-rock and gold, a kefie-cloth draping her face, with her gazelle, her maids, her boy-poet wearing his embroidered sandals and strings of little pearls....

“Well, this is Eve,” breathed Miss Ruth, musing upon the other with her bambino eyes, a smile of happiness chronic on her lips; “and whatever can that be on your nails?”

“Henna.”

“Eve!”

Miss Eve snapped her thumb and finger gaily up in the air saying, “Oh, well, never say die, and in Rome let’s row with the Romans; once I was queen of the Greeks, hundreds of eras ago. Come, sweet, to see the seraglio,” and thither they hurried.

CHAPTER XV.

TO SHUNTER.

LEPSIUS, THE EXHIBITION being now about to begin, should have been in Paris, but was at Serapis: and that was a true word of the gossip Nundcumar that woman works a relaxation in the screw of greatness, and taints its vein. Paris was strange; and the weather there “treacherous,” as they say. Frequently each day Lepsius was in communication with Monsieur Fautras, his broker, and with Schuré, his chief engineer. A rumour was abroad that the last of the Moon Debenture Bills (asking the sanction of the Chamber to the issue of yet new stock to the tune of a milliard and a half) would hardly be carried, because of another rumour that the moon-structure itself was fated to failure: an event that must ruin very many investors. So the croakers and screamers arose and mouthed: the scheme, they screamed, was never sound; down all at once one day from par to 97 fell the stock; speeches breathing rage were everywhere being made, in the streets, on 'Change, in the Chamber; newspapers furious with froths of abuse — true Paris-babies, created to live three days — saw the light, cried, and died; pamphlets, pamphlets, flooded the cafés; Lepsius, men said, had fled.

During all which a kind of riot one afternoon (the seventh of July) sprang up in Serapis itself. As the old Nundcumar told it with a moving head to Miss Ruth Vickery at the bedside of Healy that evening, “Sir Lepsius was at the telephone when Captain Bréhat broke into his presence with a face like volcano-ashes mixed with fire-flashes, to bring him the message news and betidings that some two hundred and fifty of the private troops had broken loose, and had wrecked two of the barrack-rooms. So Sir Lepsius finished his talk and chit-chat at the telephone, and then, starting off with a malign light in his eyes, though smiling ever his smile of the smiles, caught up a weapon of queer and dark appearances, and ran away to a square in the northeast, where the crew of them stood — all picturesque rascals of Spahis, mixed with Turcos, Mamalukes, Zouaves, Uhlans, Don Cossacks, some of them on horse-back, but most on foot in their half-dress, all under arms, so that the heart, missie, paused under the bosom-bone to see it through. Three-four of them said ‘Bravo,’ on beholding Sir Lepsius come, but the brows of the rest only scowled blackly at him, and one big Spahi spurred out to him with his grievance-list. Never a word breathed Sir Lepsius from first to last, but as the grievance-list was going to be presented, all at once he sprang like a flea of the fleas to the ringleader’s horse-back — a great Hungarian horse, all rings and piebalds — and he began to stick the horse with his penknife like a pig, here and there, till the creature in its raging, plunging, prancing, and very arrogance of arrogances dashed down the ringleader on the ground. Then Sir Lepsius shot his gun-shot up in the clouds, and down upon the crowd of them a shower of shot dropped back broadcast and hard-hitting; at the same moment he aimed the gun at them, drove the Hungarian mare at a gallop round about, pressing them, and on a sudden they were gone in a rout with bowed backs, as a crowd rushes out of a shower suddenly. Then he came again to the north palace, and later in the afternoon got the news that all was well, as the troops had resumed their duties. But wait, wait, it is not done with yet—” He stopped, Miss Ruth rising to wipe the lips of the dying man in silence....

But it was, in truth, not “done with”: for the very next forenoon the troops anew broke into mutiny, and Lepsius was told that one part of the soldiers’ quarters was being burnt. He had already observed the redness of it in the sky, spent twenty seconds in dire reflecting, and then sped away, intending this time to be terrible. It was a morning of storm that spat dribble and brine, the strip of sea seen from the higher parts of Serapis had an appearance of wrath, a league to the east a brigantine had been wrecked in the night, the sky was all grey and hurried like a current, and all pools of water darted darkling continuously under the swoops and pursuits of the squalls. Lepsius was making headway in the teeth of it eastward to the scene of the émeute, when, to his amazement, a maid came pelting to meet and present him a line scribbled on the fly-leaf of a Bible, “Pray, sir, do not come to the men. It will be well. — RUTH VICKERY.” Nevertheless, he ran on; and presently, peering through a wicket, saw Miss Ruth with the mutineers in a court, moving to and fro before them, her hair blown loose over an old cloak of faded blue that enfolded her, flapping, on her head a forage-cap of the men, she haranguing them loudly in French against the sounding of the gale. Lepsius stood too far off to know what was being said, but saw Miss Ruth laughing anon, the troop laughing also, soon became aware of a rumour of voices raving “Bravo!” then of Miss Ruth pointing at the flame, as if enjoining the troop to hasten to help in its suppression, then saw them press pell-mell through a gate and go, taking her in the current of their haste.

In truth, Miss Ruth was at present no more a prisoner in Serapis, but roamed whithersoever she chose in and out of it, visiting the Breton peasants round about, the sick in Serapis, and corresponding whenever she chose with her parent, to whom she wrote that the angel of the Lord had broken the bars of her prison. On the whole, she was so well known, and with so much respect, to everyone in Serapis, that it may have been beyond the wit of Lepsius, had he willed it, to keep her strictly a prisoner. At any rate, the émeute thus suppressed did not recur; and Lepsius pondered this anon.

Little enough time had he for pondering, however. That forenoon of wet and wind the slump in moon-stock continued from 97 to 95, and at nine that night a crowd that had waited for hours outside the Palais-Bourbon in the storm, unharnessed the horses from Monsieur de Courcy's brougham, and brought the Minister home with hurrahs, because his thunder at the Debenture Bill had resulted in its overthrow.

"Thrice on the eighth," writes Said Pasha in his Notes, "I raced across to the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, on each occasion getting wetted to the skin, in order to talk with Lepsius through Monsieur Schuré's private telephone. On each occasion I had to wait, since others were before me. The first time I saw Colonel Doumic, Monsieur Leflô and Cardinal Damp-martin talking together, standing in a corner of the drawing-room; and two hours later when I returned they still stood in the same place, talking. The house, in fact, was much frequented throughout the day, people coming, lingering, going, and coming again; but no sign of either host or hostess. The Abbé Sauriau, who for some time sat alone on a sofa with his legs crossed, perusing with quite evident surprise and delight an old book of his own — it was his Pindar — told me that Monsieur Schuré 'was supposed' to be at home, but abed, in a condition of alcoholism; while as to Madame, Colonel Doumic, who had a cold in the head, and trumpeted persistently through the nose, told me that the lady was spending three days with her sister at Meudon. To Monsieur Favre, the Procurator-General, and to me the colonel also made this remark, 'My friends, let the politicians do their worst, but what can tas de pékins do to the individual in question when the name of Lepsius still raises a cheer in each company of pioupious through France?’ I wished that I could share in his confidence, but to me who knew the under-currents and each secret wire which each of the puppets obeyed, it appeared quite beyond the ingenuity of a Nestor and a Richelieu in one to save the situation. ‘Nothing has happened!’ exclaimed General Le Goffic, the Prefect’s aide-de-camp, to me at Bignon’s near eight in the evening, ‘and yet what a revolution in public opinion within these two little weeks!’

‘Mon ami,’ added the old Orléaniste, who was a descendant of the mulatto Dues de Dornis, and still at seventy a gallant figure, ‘the individual in question thought to inaugurate an empire on the race-course at Longchamp, as the Prince de Condé is said to have begun the battle of Lérída to the cry-cry of a dozen violins: but the fantastic soon ceases to amuse at a cost of three milliards. As to “La Lune,” since the word means also the part of the human person on which children are spanked, it was always certain that this fact, by itself, would doom the scheme to failure. At the actual moment, what hope remains, monsieur? since we know that when Belleville, St. Antoine and Ménilmontant have pricked the ear, le plis est pris, and Heaven itself is helpless. In passing down the Boulevard Majenta just now, I encountered a crowd bounding south, to the Palais-Bourbon, no doubt, singing “Conspuez Lepste, conspuez Lepsie, conspuez” — the grave sound on the last syllable of “Lepsie” — a truly gross and terrible growl.’

“Well, at half after eight a messenger hastened to tell me that Isabeau Thiéry was about to mount the tribune, and to the Palais-Bourbon Pierre Huré and I set off in a fiacre, seeing on the way streams of people who were speeding to join the crowd that loitered round the House, without seeming to heed the showers and the noise of the wind. Having reasons of my own for not desiring to be seen within the Chambre des Députés itself, I strolled in the Salle des Pas Perdus, while Thiéry, ever the enfant terrible of the Députés, rolled his periods in the interior. Among us outside in the Pas Perdue the question was, 'Is Thiéry speaking for or in opposition to the Debenture Bill?' and managing to seize upon the old Major-General Dauriac, one of the three Quaestors, who came rushing in, I put to him the question. He shrugged both his shoulders on high, giving me the reply, 'Who knows, my friend? In the former half of his oration Thiéry has denounced the Bill, but now is no less loudly sounding its praises. C'est un homme nul, ce monsieur-là' — and he hastened on his way.

"I did not remain during the oration of Monsieur de Courcy, who followed Isabeau Thiéry in the tribune, but hurried back northward in order to have direct speech with Lepsius himself. I now found the salon, the stairs, the passages of Schurés house actually crowded — I am unable to state why, since Schuré himself remained invisible — men of the Bourse, newspaper-men, men-of-state, besides a number of mere well-dressed badauds and désœuvrés. Monsieur Fautras, the broker of Lepsius, was speaking with General Figuiet, the Military Governor of Paris, and with Graf Bobertag of the German Embassy, which last arrested me thirteen minutes with conversation of a secret nature. To Lepsius I then spoke of the tone of Paris up to the present, and was surprised that, though I had come at full speed, he already knew the gist of Thiéry's speech. It was said, indeed, that he had mysterious instruments by means of which he could see and hear that which takes place at a distance, though I myself have never seen any such with him: at any rate, I now freely revealed my fears, reading to him some headlines from the evening papers, and even venturing to say that the air of Paris was believed to be bearable even in September! He took it coldly. But did he ever know his friends? Was Lepsius ever capable of appreciating the nature of friendship? Yet how he was loved by a few! and how he was abhorred by all, even by the few who loved him! 'I knew,' he replied to everything of mine. ‘The Debenture Bill will undoubtedly now be thrown out,’ I told him. ‘I knew,’ he answered, adding, ‘it is of no importance, if Schuré be kept staunch: I rely upon you to keep him staunch.’ This astonished me. ‘How can I?’ I asked. ‘Keep close to Thiéry to-night and to-morrow,’ he replied, ‘influence him, and you will find out how I can repay.’

‘Monsieur,’ was my answer, ‘I will do this with much pleasure without the prospect of any such discovery.’ ‘Many thanks,’ said he. ‘I have,’ I then said, suddenly remembering it, ‘to deliver to you this message from Mr. E. Reader Meade, that it might be most inadvisable at the actual moment to try to tempt Thiéry in a monetary sense’ — a suggestion which (unless I was mistaken) had the effect of strangely irritating Lepsius, for he made me the amazing reply, ‘Monsieur, the oak is hardly the highest form of life,’ and closed the interview.

“I at once set out on the quest of Thiéry, wondering within myself how it was that Lepsius was not that night in Paris! Was it because of the very hardship of combating the storm from the place in which he happened to find himself that he decided to remain in it? Some stiffness of neck? Some arrogance? For he was arrogant. Nothing was greater than the grossness of his arrogance, save the glory of his lowliness. Seeing men, he felt himself a deity; but he was saved from even the least taint or vein of vanity, because his consciousness was so quick and large, that no less nearly and clearly than he saw men he saw stars, and felt himself a flea. At any rate, he could never be induced to take the human race quite au sérieux; he abided in his Brittany.

“Thiéry I did not light upon until nigh on eleven in the night, and then in the unexpected quarter of his own tiny apartment in the Rue de Rome — a two-roomed den, with a cuisine and a vestibule; and it was necessary for me to sit waiting in the vestibule, since the Abbé Sauriau was there in the salon, engaged in talk which it was altogether impossible for me to escape hearing, since nothing separated us save an aged green drapery, which the gale, penetrating between the beams, waved in my face. Thiéry was going up and down wrapped in a greasy dressing-gown, a fez on his head, the abbé being seated, speaking ceaselessly; nor was it long before I knew that it was a question of offering Thiéry the portfolio of Justice as from Monsieur de Courcy, who that day could have foreseen for himself nothing less than the Chief Magistracy of France. Thiéry did not accept, did not reject it. The abbé coaxed, quoted, fawned, exhorted, flattered. ‘The destinies of France rest this night on your shoulders ‘; ‘it is for you to-night, my friend, in rocking the tocsin of enfranchisement, to toll once and no more for ever the death-knell of despots.’

‘But the Army,’ said Thiéry, ‘the Army.’

‘Can the Army rescue a ruined man?’ asked the abbé; and he added, ‘Listen, my friend, you are not a financier, but you know that the company started with a capital of three milliards in 1,200,000 shares of 2,500 francs each; you know, too, that 800,000 ordinary shares were offered at par to the public at the first issue, as to which the individual in question not only gave his guarantee to pay four per cent, interest during construction, but to repay every ordinary shareholder at par, if the venture should prove a failure. And if it does! — as it is in your power to make it! Could revenues so countless really come out of any private fund and not leave it dry? And how in the day of his failure may the Army avail to save him from the wrath of France?’ But numbers always dropped like water on a duck’s back upon the skull of Isabeau Thiéry: and the breezes penetrating beneath the door chilled my shins, and still he remained in his indecision of mind. Finally he undertook to deliver his reply as to the portfolio before twelve the next day, and the Abbé Sauriau then went away.

“It was then my turn to convert the poet, and certainly I worked with no little fervour, throwing off reserve. I blessed with my hands upon its head the bust of Cæsar on the mantel-piece; I spoke of the offer of the portfolio as a bribe, and as unpatriotic in spirit; I said ‘as in 1814,’ and ‘the destinies of France’; I spoke of the crowd of crowned heads then in Paris to be present at the opening of the Exhibition, and of their exultation to behold the overthrow of that being who was the hope of France; and, sitting on his table’s edge, his face glowed gallantly when in glaring hues I sketched the glories of the future. Lepsius, I saw, occupied a place in his heart. Unfortunately, just as 12.45 struck, in came Monsieur Josef, formerly a mouchard of the Rue de Jerusalem, then a man who to Lepsius was ‘P.2.’ The moment I beheld him I had a boding of trouble; and, certain that the envelope that he delivered to Thiéry derived from Lepsius, I kept my eyes fixed upon Thiéry while he read. Thiéry at once turned quite worm-white; one could observe how his fingers quivered; and, getting down from the table, he began to move about the room in an absent manner, with a bosom somewhat breathless, and a visage at once flushed and blanched in patches. I muttered to myself, ‘Lepsius must have tempted him with some momentous money-offer.’ He walked presently near to me, and with his arms quivering and somewhat spread appealed rather piteously to me with a ‘Mon ami!’ He then began to walk about again; till now again he halted to frown piercingly into the bust of Cæsar on the mantel-piece; and now, beating his palm with his finger, he breathed, ‘But no, but no, the Eagle does not blink’; and all at once he was scarlet, cast up his head, letting slip a little ‘Ha!’ and suddenly all in a hurry and flurry, muttering to himself, ‘Stop, he is going to see,’ he was gone away.

“He very soon hurried in again from his bedroom, dressed, drawing on a glove, begging me to forgive him, since he must necessarily go. I ventured to ask him whither, and his answer, ‘Ah! to Meudon,’ convinced me that all was lost....

“When I flew to tell Lepsius of it, he during two seconds or so stood mute, then very hurriedly said, ‘Thanks. I’ll look to it’...”

What Lepsius did on learning of the disaster was urgently to telephone a certain course of conduct to an agent in Chantilly; he then at once summoned to his presence the Due de Rey-Drouilhet, who during two days had been staying at Serapis; and he took two pilules out of a cabinet and put them in a pill-box.

As soon as the duke came in he was struck staggering a step or two against one of the pillars, for the hall, all open to the four winds, was all vocal and haunted with the storm, and half its area of floor was as washed with rain-water as a ship’s quarterdeck. Lepsius seated the old man near him in the middle, and speaking as low as the sound of the winds allowed, said, “I wish to pray you to set off for Paris for me by my next special at 1.6; for if you wish to prove useful to me, and at the same time to make yourself affluent for life, this is your chance of chances. I may tell you that Thiéry has just taken train from Paris to Meudon to see his sister, Fanny Schuré, with a design unfriendly to me. Well, he will not see her to-night: for an agent of mine in Chantilly, where Schuré is, is at this moment telephoning her the false news that her husband is dying, and either fifteen or four minutes before Thiéry reaches Meudon she will have left it for Chantilly; nor will he be able, I see, to follow her thither to-night for want of a train. But to-morrow he will see her, unless I prevent him; hence I ask you to assist at his premier dîner in the morning, and deftly to drop these two pilules into his coffee or chocolate. You are his friend — What is it?”

He turned to a servant by his elbow who bore him a leaf of ivory scribbled with these words: "Healy can live only a few minutes more. — RUTH."

Lepsius sprang up, pestered at this the third missive of the kind received that day, he having been too busy to pay any heed to them, though Healy was at this time, by his orders, near him in the north palace. He walked away to the columns, and cast a look out: no stars out there, no vault of heaven, only darkness mixed all with water and winds wawling; and back he bolted to the duke, saying, "Excuse me two minutes," and hastened away.

His own motive in going he hardly knew, since that was hardly very rational that he should go: but something that is in the breast brought him. However, he did not enter, only stole nigh, and, standing outside a door-hanging, listened, spied.

The two windows looked toward the coast, and though these were well closed, everything movable in the room moved to a breeze that ever breathed through it — the bed-curtains, the skirt of an Ursuline who kneeled near the bottom of the bed, telling her beads, the skirt of Miss Ruth who kneeled at the bed's head, reading, the beard of the old Nundcumar who sat leaning forward on a sofa between these two.

Miss Vickery held under her eyes on the bed's edge a Greek Bible from which with a poignancy and grieving in her voice she was translating, the gale battering anon great breaches in her speech in the ear of Lepsius.

"Nor be called masters... but he that is greatest among you will be your servant... and he that humbles himself is high."

The bed was low and small, in the north-west corner of the chamber under a window — the window which was opposite the door where Lepsius waited, there being two doors in the length of the room (which was longish and narrow), and two great windows, under a groined roof; and though an Arabian boy, crouching on a rug in the south-west corner of the marble floor, made a fourth watcher in the chamber, there was an air of loneliness in there, an odour of death. This little Arab, indeed, but increased this feeling: for, though kneeling, he was so doubled on himself, so stone-still, that he seemed to be dead, and a greenish sheen gloating on his cheek from the lamp-globe just above his head increased his appearance of death.

“And they came to a place named Gethsemane, and he said to his disciples, ‘You wait here, while I go to pray.’”

The light of the only lamp was somehow a local halo about itself, throwing the remainder of the room in some obscurity, so that the clicks of the nun’s rosary arose from shadows in which she was herself no more than a shadow; nor could Healy be seen, nothing but his toes sticking up beneath the clothes, though anon that keen ear of Lepsius could hear his throat croaking the death-ruckle, pouring it low, hurried, like a purring rolling; and, still more pressed with haste, rain-water outside struggling darkly down spouts, with gulps and sobs and goblin sounds; and again that poignancy and break in Miss Vickery’s voice....

“And he went a little onward, and dropped down upon the ground, and prayed, saying, ‘Abba (papa), take away this cup from me; still, not what I want, papa, but what thou.’”

Loudly from across the sea came the sound of the gale, flapping with the sound of a navy of argosies going down in some archipelago of gloom, with all their great sails whooping loose, and all their sailors wailing.

“And again he went away, and dropped down on the ground, and prayed, saying, ‘If it be possible, let this draught pass away from me; still, not what I want, papa, but what thou.’”

The hand of Lepsius tightened on the box that held the two pilules designed for Isabeau Thiéry's breakfast; at the same time the death-ruckle on the bed came on a sudden to an end; the happy saint raised herself from the bedside with a smile and a light in her eyes; and during some moments nobody moved in the room, until now the crony Nundcumar rose to move to the bed's head, and, bowed over the dead with a moving brow and body-, crooning, he said, "He is dead. But his head is not yet thoroughly dead and done, and he lies reflecting dimly in himself, thinking: 'I am dead: no more to view the sight of the sun, nor any light of the moon at night, nor all the stars: for I am dead, and this is death; and what I long saw falling upon others; and was long in awe of for myself, is fallen at last this day upon me, me, also: for I lie dead, and this is my day.'"

As for Lepsius, he was gone; not so swiftly as he had come.

When he got back to the hall where the duke awaited him, he halted two seconds betwixt two of the columns, struck with hesitancy: until, suddenly running, he muttered, "Forgive me for being longer than I meant; and now, to catch the train, you should be in haste" — he held out the pill-box.

The old man was very tremulous; his hand that rose to take the box hesitated midway. "I assume, monsieur, that the dose is not — is innocuous...." Lepsius' lip of disdain deigned no reply.

"I know it, of course," remarked the old fop piteously in a flurry, "and asked only for form's sake.... On those terms I am entirely at your service."

"Rey-Drouilhet, be certain and deft," said Lepsius impressively; and within eight minutes Rey-Drouilhet was on the way to the railway. Before 7.40 the following morning he sat, in the Rue de Rome, at Isabeau Thiéry's bed's head.

He pretended that pressing Serapis-gossip had thus brought him at the matin-gun; but he had hardly any need to invent the gossip, since by this time Thiéry could speak of nothing but Lepsius' bribe.

"My friend, what was the amount?" the duke questioned with a screwed countenance.

"It was two millions, monsieur."

"De Dieu de Dieu!... I who am no more a youth would undoubtedly have refused it without difficulty, but how could you, a young man?"

"Ah, mon cher ami, noblesse oblige," remarked Isabeau Thiéry in an absent mutter.

He was now about to get out of bed to get on his clothes, when his gouvernante bore him in his coffee and little loaf; and during the minutes that he took to fling on his things, the coffee stood cooling on a commode close to the duke. The flesh of the duke's face during this became very blanched and aged, his manners nervous and fluttered; but, though he had the two pills in his hand, and had many opportunities of dropping them into the coffee during Thiéry's dressing, he did not. He now thought to himself, "No, Thiéry must be out of the room," and presently he passed the remark that he had not breakfasted.

"My friend, pardon me!" cried out Thiéry, and darted out half-dressed to order another cup of coffee.

Now was the duke's opportunity. Yet he did not drop the pills into Thiéry's coffee. He started! First athwart the whirl of his thoughts flushed Isabeau Thiéry's words, "noblesse oblige," the example of that generous blood: and away he rushed, bent, from the coffee; and then back to it he rushed, fleet and thievish, to dash in the pills; and away from it afresh, without having dashed them in. And now he was casting his arms on high, his rickety eyes, distracted; and now he was creeping on his knees, sneakingly, to drop the two pills into a pot beneath the bed; and now he was at Thiéry's bread, sneakingly kneading two pills out of the pith; and these he dropped into Thiéry's coffee....

Later that forenoon he misquoted Shakespeare, despatching to Lepsius, in English, the telegram, "The deed is done."

Nor did Lepsius need the coming of this telegram to be perfectly certain that the deed was done, though he could scarcely still have been ignorant that very many threads congregate to make the mental texture of modern men. Anyway, till late in the day he was securely acting upon the fact that the duke could not fail; and then, suddenly, he knew — too late....

The next night, the second of the Exhibition, was the night on which men had been given to hope that a strange glory would change the look of the skies: but no such glory arose upon the eyes.

And now more in number than the messengers of Job crowded upon Lepsius the recorders of his downfall; French laws and procedures were tortured in order to reach him swiftly; during the midnight of the ninth the offices of the moon in the Rue St. Honoré, as well as the offices of several newspapers in his pay, were wrecked; on the 11th the troops of the 67th, posted to protect his palace in the Elysées, could not prevent it from being sacked and burned; by the 13th he had been accused, and had been convicted by the Sixth Tribunal, of fermenting civil strife; by the 15th the decree of his banishment from French land, posted in every commune, had been gaped at as old and usual, and glared from the gates of Serapis.

Lepsius smiled, but bitterly. He was lying on his belly on a bed of straw, reading the life of Jesus of Nazareth in the book of Matthew when the news of the destruction of the moon-offices reached him; and at once, throwing away the book to run out with a reddened brow, he said within himself, "I will blot out this name of France." During the rage and deluge of the few days following, he yet more hardened his heart. To Miss Ruth Vickery he refused an interview, and to Miss Eve Vickery, who wrote "I am sorry for you," and entreated him to be meek, to cease from scheming, and to bend his head before the tempest, he condescended to send no answer.

Indeed, he was now too busy to heed anything but what he was now about to do. In his resentment he had resolved to stretch out his arm in terror, of each and all of his enemies to make a clean sweep in one heap, and immediately to leap into a throne, some months before he had previously proposed. Of the Army, which regarded him as its hope of glory, he was still certain; and on the morning of the 15th the first of his thunderbolts bewildered the world, when from his rostrum at the Bourse, Monsieur Fautras roundly denounced the downfall of the moon-structure as due to the schemings of paltry politicians, and to the treachery of the engineer Schuré. He was authorised, said, by Monsieur Lepsius, to present as a loan to the company a sum of a milliard and a half of francs, not to be repaid till ordinary shares should be earning a dividend of 8 per cent.; and, further, he was authorised by Monsieur Lepsius, who was prepared to finance the concern entirely from his private purse, to purchase back, if desired, every ordinary share at par from that morning; and, further, he had to say that by midday of the 17th instant Monsieur Lepsius proposed to be in Paris....

Never did Lepsius loom so hugely upon the universal world, luminous as some angel of the welkin, as that afternoon, France, for her part, casting upon her head the ashes of contrition. As for the foes of Lepsius, they saw only instant loss of place and power, only ruin, degradation, disgrace, knowing that now the decree of banishment against him was nothing but a dead letter. Hence the Count de Courcy took a hurried trip down into Brittany that day, and contrived to talk a little with the prattler Nundcumar outside the walls of Serapis....

At five on the morning of the 17th all was in order for the departure for Paris, and Lepsius, not having slept through the night, went to lie a little in his bath, his big dog, Argo, and the old Nundcumar, going also with him. As he locked the door, he noticed that the dog, going up to a coffer of cedar-wood, in which it was usual to keep towels, etc., sniffed at it; the dog, however, did not growl, and, as his head was now crowded with cares, he gave it no heed. It was an apartment of marble with a row of round windows in one wall up near the ceiling, and in the centre of it a sort of well or cistern, with a tower of marble about it as light and beautiful as a flower, whose whiteness bloomed again down in the water's gloom, and it had a bell in it; otherwise the apartment was without any ornament, except for the coffer in one corner, and the bath in the corner opposite, this being a mass of augite and gold, so big that one might swim a little, with lumps of ice floating in the water that almost filled it. Lepsius' pieces of raiment dropped from him, he was in immediately, dived, and remained under a long while. Argo, the dog, was walking uneasily to and fro, but if one had looked narrowly at him, the dog might have been seen to be not quite himself, to be drunk or drugged. Nundcumar, for his part, stood by the side of the bath, his knees weak beneath him, but with no sign of this to be seen in his lean looks; and the air in there seemed to wait for somewhat, and to wait, a dusk air, for though it was now fully day outside, in there the light was scarce.

At the moment when Lepsius went under the water for the second time, Nundcumar, suddenly grabbing the dog by the collar, coughed twice: and the next moment the dog broke roaring from his grasp to drag down a woman who rose out of the coffer and flew through the room.... Lepsius, hearing the row, reared up his head, and even as the woman went down under the hound, received vitriol about his brows....

He at once dived....

Later in the day he discovered that one of his sandals, in a chamber of which he kept a little key, was missing. It was the Abbé Sauriau who told him so, kneeling over Lepsius on his bed of straw, as the gloaming began to grow deep. "It is intended that your hoards shall be distributed among charitable institutions," the abbé said; and he cried accusingly, his body convulsed with sobs, "Lepsius, you are blind! and it is I who have been the cause of this."

Lepsius lay with a band covering his eyes, his limbs cast all asprawl at random, tossing for ease; and presently he bleated, "I am blind!"

And now Isabeau Thiéry, waiting for hours at the far end of the chamber, dashed both his palms to his ears to shut out the sound of that bleat, which each three minutes was repeated, and rushed with the stare of a maniac away.

Lepsius could get no rest, for though the ravage of the vitriol (thanks to the rush of the dog and to the bath-water) was local about the brows, and he was hardly at all disfigured in his face, yet the agony was great, and the heat of the atmosphere every moment growing greater, since a reign of licence and riot had kept carnival during all the afternoon, and at several places Serapis was flaring.

"You must not stay here much longer," blubbed the Abbé Sauriau, with two big tears streaming on his cheeks.... "I have a little cottage in Chantilly, and thither you will come to abide until my death by my side. You are poor, you are many millions in debt, you are utterly destitute, naught can be more utter, more boundless, than your downfall. So you will come, my friend, to my breast, and in the cottage we shall be, we two, dwelling in a shaded leisure and seclusion of literature, for I shall be reading my books to you, and you will be dictating books to me, which I shall write for you."

“I am blind!” bleated the blind boy to his obscurity, neither heeding nor hearing him.

It was at this point that the blind boy’s father arrived after a voyage from London; and, lying on the straws, the old man rubbed his cheek on his son’s cheek silently, a sob in his throat keeping him from speaking; whereat the Abbé Sauriau and some others who were there stole away; and presently, when he had wept plenteously, Dr. Lepsius said to his son, who kept shrinking from his touch, “You have yet your yacht at anchor yonder in the bay; let’s cut back to Shunter I you and me; only no Shan any more, no Shan: back out of the dirty world, to listen to the waups whistling, what? Don’t you remember the old castle? And the old coble-boat on the north coast? And the long, low old shed, centuries old, all encrusted with peat-smoke, which we could see from the east castle-turret far off in the heugh of the crags? And all the gulls, and the bog, and the hags of water with the buckies in ’em, can’t you recall it all, and the sea? Say that you are coming...

“I shall never run again!” complained Lepsius to his gloom.

“You may! You do not know yet! God may will to give you back your eyes, or one of them! But say that you will come this night with me.”

“Are you not still against me?” asked Lepsius in pain.

“What, against my own? Was I ever really against you, do you dream? Oh, fie, hard heart, to let yourself utter those words!”

Lepsius now turned a little to put his arm about the old man’s shoulder, and water washed with a whey of blood wound all down one side of his nose, while the old man moaned.

“So, then,” the old man said, “you will come, for I feel that it will do you good, and I’ll go at once to see to it.”

He stood up; and he had scarcely gone away when with eager feet Miss Eve Vickery came in, and fifteen feet from Lepsius stood looking at him, her father halting far off near the pillars, his eyes all alight with excitement. Having come for his daughters, he had ordered them both into a brougham, and they had started to roll away in it through the ruelles and courts of Serapis, lurid at this time with conflagrations glaring in the gloomy night, where groups of distinguished men from Paris and elsewhere stood to watch the flames and fumes, and, like devils in fire, troops of luxurious ‘rioters roved with uproars to and fro. But when about to pass out of this scene, Miss Eve had seen a wing of the north palace in passing near it, and had leapt up. Nor could anything stay her. “I will see him once,” she had said over her shoulder: whereon her father, ordering his other daughter to remain where she was, had followed Miss Eve’s speeding feet; and Miss Eve came, and stood, and looked at Lepsius.

“Eve, I am blind!” bleated Lepsius aloud, perhaps having caught and known the Sound of her walk, or probably invoking her without any knowledge that she was present; and what pen of poet or seer of the soul can disclose the olio of her whole emotion then, sketching with what fiendishness of hell-spite her whitened lip touched her lower teeth, as she flung at him, “You should have been good!” and then again how the bowels of her woman’s ruth moved and rued, beholding him so low, when he rose on his elbow, but tumbled back, calling, “Eve! you are here!”

“Lepsius, I am going for good from you!”

“Eve, do not leave me!”

“Eve!” her father now called out in a sort of whisper.

She crammed her mouth with her handkerchief to bite on, and letting fall her arm behind her toward the bed of straws, wafting it a good-bye, tried to get away toward her father, but half-way gave up, smiling, her knees going feeble beneath her, and lapsed, seated, upon the floor; whereat Mr. Vickery came, raised, and carried her away to their carriage.

The carriage then went on its way toward the station two miles distant through a dark night unlighted by one star in the sky, with wild winds blowing. But they had not advanced half a mile when the driver suddenly halted, having noticed lying right athwart the road a woman whom, but for the light radiating from the blazing of Serapis, he must have driven over. Mr. Vickery, getting out, gave a hand to raising her up: and now, to his consternation, she turned out to be his old servant, Jeanne Auvache. The woman, her life-work now performed, was now all maudlin, and desired to die — hence had thrown herself on the road. She instantly dashed into chattering (against the grain of her hearers) as to the various phases of the day, on her face a rain of tears, Miss Ruth and her father induced to hear, Miss Eve, for her part, reclining in swoon with her lips parted like the dying, not appearing to hear. One piece of the chatter, however, appeared to pierce to her consciousness; and now her eyes unclosed, she sat up. It was when Jeanne Auvache was recounting how she had been arrested at St. Brieuc, and how at about 3 p.m. she had been brought back to Serapis in order to be presented to, and identified by, Lepsius, the officers not then knowing that Lepsius was entirely sightless. “He is good, he is very good,” the hag groaned, “so that I regret at the actual moment to have done it, and have a desire to die. He lay there on his bed of straws, all solitary, calling to nobody ‘I am blind ‘; and when the two officers asked him if he was able to say whether I was the woman, he answered them, ‘Let her say something ‘; so I said, ‘Monsieur Lepsius!’ and I said again, ‘Monsieur Lepsius!’ and he gave no answer to the two men for some time, but lay still, frowning, passing his palm over his brow and his bandage; and he then said gently, 'No, it was not she; it was not a woman who did it,' and then—"

Now, however, a crazy stare was gazing out of the carriage window, Miss Eve leaning out, saying, "Do you say, woman, that he forgave you? Oh, tell me the God's truth!"

"Why, yes, since you see me here—" the hag began to say: but now Miss Eve was gone.

"Eve!" howled her father after her, "remember your vow to — ?"

Miss Eve threw her hand backward without looking round, and went fluttering on her way, her frocks quarrelling with the winds; nor was it possible to pursue her with the brougham, since she took a shortcut path through a meadow; and though her father and Miss Ruth ran after her, calling, her youth and long legs soon got them pretty far behind, she slipping back to Serapis like a spring which, pressed the wrong way, is of a sudden sprung free. In some fifteen minutes she lay on her love's bed, shuddering on his breast, her teeth chattering feverishly into his ear "for ever," and anew "for ever."

"Eve, you are here!" he called to her in that voice of the blind which has lost its way like a lambkin bleating in the void of the night; and she in the fever of her joy said to him, "Here, you can feel it, the half coin: where should I be but in you, but interned in your heart, my eternal? I who eternities since yearned at the altar with you."

But now Dr. Lepsius walked actively in to announce that everything was ready as to the vessel; and about half an hour after this, a small crowd consisting of Dr. Lepsius, Lepsius, Miss Eve, Miss Ruth, Mr. Vickery, a Dr. Proudhomme of Serapis, the Abbé Sauriau, Isabeau Thiéry, Saïd Pasha, and Mr. E. Reader Meade, paced to the quay of the little bay named Petit Bazaine. Yonder on the sea the yacht's three lights glared tiny in a darkness made rather Tartarian by the conflagration of Serapis, the glows from which, glaring on the slopes of the billows' blackness in dabblements, gave to the bay the goriness of Aceldama. A boat lay at the end of the quay; but as the sea was very rough, and trouble was looked for in embarking Lepsius, all the party went forward to see the boat, leaving him seated alone on a block of stone. The boatmen, who lay on their oars, called that they would wait for a calmer moment; so it was some minutes ere Miss Eve ran back to bring Lepsius, and then to her amazement, met him on his knees — the roar of the breakers and of the gale in his ears, the sprays raining on his face, or his engrossment, may be, in his prayer, preventing him from hearing her approach. She with an uplifted hand, stood hushed a little, listening, catching some words, the bursting of his sobs.... “Who hearest, but dost not heed, the bleatings of brutes... yet if just one human wish for once may move thee... let no speck of grit ever prick her eyes to agonise her; oh, I was sick and she visited me pelt her; I am reft, despoiled, and she makes choice of me... chase, infest her every hour with fresh showers and astonishments of joy—”

She touched him, saying, “Come.”

The Dragon (1913)

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I
CHAPTER II
CHAPTER III
CHAPTER IV
CHAPTER V
CHAPTER VI
CHAPTER VII
CHAPTER VIII
CHAPTER IX
CHAPTER X
CHAPTER XI
CHAPTER XII
CHAPTER XIII
CHAPTER XIV
CHAFFER XV
CHAPTER XVI
CHAPTER XVII
CHAPTER XVIII
CHAPTER XIX
CHAPTER XX
CHAPTER XXI
CHAPTER XXII
CHAPTER XXIII

CHAPTER XXIV

CHAPTER XXV

CHAPTER I

PRINCE EDWARD

IT IS THE eye that begets and conceives: suddenly by the hap and fecundity of glances which meet a child is summoned from the place of dumbness, and hears, and quickens, and arises to come among men.

Never a conception of Prince “Teddy,” who contended with Li Ku Yu, had entered a human head to the moment when Prince John, his father-to-be (whom the French have called Jean l’Entêté, or “the Stubborn”) landed from the Dominion at Scarboro’ to attend a dance one February night.

He, having just got his “executive curl” as a sub., was sitting among his new wardroom messmates, looking at the dancing, when he made the remark: “Set of frights! — not a pretty girl among the lot.”

But just then three passed before his eyes — sisters — all tall, dark, but the middle one, who was the youngest, the tallest of all; and she came upon his eyes surprisingly, like some being superior to men.

Before long he was waltzing with her, his eyes tied to her eyes whose dark-blue anon looked black.

She was Minna Simmons, a doctor’s daughter, already at nineteen a Bachelor of Science, now “swotting” to get a degree in medicine.

His Royal Highness was amazed at her “cleverness”; and queens suddenly appeared to him mean in the presence of this imperial creature and more reigning thing than queens, a lady.

But with that sea-dog bluntness on which he prided himself, he said to her within a den of Union Jacks and smilax: “You are the very nicest girl I ever dreamt of!”

On which she shook her head slowly at him, murmuring with an indulgent smile: “I am not to be commandeered.”

His answer was: “I don’t believe you are: what I should rather choose would be to offer you my hand in marriage.”

“Ah! the vast paw,” she breathed, her eyes turned white to heaven.

He said: “Suppose I did so, what would you say to it?”

“I am sorry, Sir,” she answered: “I should say no.”

“We will see about that,” muttered John l’Entêté.

And before midnight he had got from her a promise of correspondence in six months’ time — on general topics.

Within two he began to write frequently; within three he appeared suddenly at The Priory (her house), vowing that he would go mad; he kept telephoning across Britain; and after six months she began to answer his letters, as promised.

He had got his second stripe when he received from her at Shotley this:

“My sisters, whose judgment is considered good, urge it upon me that that may well turn to the public advantage, if I am given the honour to unite my mother’s blood with your Royal Highness’; and though I pity you, Sir, for the quite hot water which this business must bring you into, I will now profess myself ready to act as your Royal Highness directs.... Your Royal Highness divines that I could not long be Kept a back-stairs consort.... If centuries of custom attempt to suppress me, I think it is the custom that will see itself suppressed.... God only grant that I may be some good, ii it is to be so...”

Count three months thence, England is under snow — it is seven days before Christmas — when from him at Balmoral comes to her: “I am now taking car to come....”

She locked herself into her room then, to stare....

Afterwards she opened a steel casket by knobs that revolved to cypher-numbers, to get from it the photograph of a young man in flannels, with which she sat again; and, gazing at it, presently said to it: “Dear, it is no good, it can’t be helped — unless I turn tail, and don’t play the game. I was to be one of the mother-women, you see, not one of the wife-women — God’s will be done.”

Now tears filled her lids, her lip quivered: she held the photograph tenderly pressed to her face, her eyes closed; but then with a gasp of anger and anguish dashed it off her into the fire.

Six months later she was the Queen of the Britains and Empress of India; and her “bowing-manner” was considered good.

But from the first her reign was a troubled reign.

Here at home she was not universally adored. That wit of her tongue was too swift and withering. Her talk, if always distinguished, was always vigorously vernacular, dashed anon with a sort of slang, and anon, for all her moral severity, with the risqué — that which came to her tongue’s tip out it flew, like new knives flying. Then, too, no daughter of a hundred kings was ever so jealous a stickler for the intricacies of ritual. She pestered the Cabinet. The anger of her glance became a social apprehension, and her censorship of morals extended to males. Lords, grooms, equerries, had to be Bayards! and, like Victoria, she looked coldly upon widows who remarried.

As to the foreign Royalties, the home aristocracy, who, for a fortnight, had a thought of patronising her, they were taught in torrents of lava-torments that she was twice the sovereign of subjects, and once the sovereign of sovereigns. If a dowager was proud of monkey-ancestry, be sure her sin would find her out, and a tongue like the Avenging Angel's edge would singe her. Some day Her Majesty would manage to put to her some simple question in biology or physics, and then was lost in horror at the Hottentot ignorance of European women with coronets on their foreheads. But if all this caused her domineering forehead, her tongue, and the play of her eyes to become a terror in the land, it did not tend to make her idolised.

But nothing much troubled her but her son, she truly a "mother-woman," every day finding time to be with him; and to him the privilege of her presence was ever more fascinating than his toy-submarine.

Seldom a day but she spoke to him of Germany growing, of China changing. "The Chinese are pretty shrewd, Teddy," she said in showing him a lump of white jade, sent her by the Dowager Empress, one day at Windsor: "the only man who can outwit a Jew in business is a Chinaman — don't forget. And, then, there are so many of them! How many?"

"Four hundred and ten millions, mother," the Prince promptly responded.

"Just think — more than all Europe. God wanted them to be so many: and there they are. But nobody quite knows why!"

"Teddy" meditated the matter; and he said: "Mother, why don't all the countries make themselves into one under one King? Save such a mass of energy! How absurd for Berks to set up as a separate kingdom, and Bucks as another—"

"But of what nation would that one King be?"

"English, I suppose."

"His name 'Teddy'?"

"Teddy" blushed under her roguish ogle, and she, seeing him in distress, came to his rescue, saying, "Dear, you will deserve to be such a King: your mind is large enough. And don't think that I disagree, for I quite see that all sorrow is due to that folly of nations and men in calling bits of an earth their 'own.' When nations do it, the result is wars, and all this cost of armaments; when individuals do it, the result is all the failure and perplexity and bread of tears that we see men eat. But if one King owned it all for everybody, and hired out bits, then we might see some fun, and soon would be flying to the moon! That what you meant?" The boy was gazing into her great flamboyant eyes with such adoration, that it made her laugh, and dip a kiss inside his sailor collar.

But her plans for him were beset by obstacles. There was King John l'Entêté, for one, to be reckoned with; as one morning when she exclaimed: "I am his mother!" pacing a room of the Winter Palace at Petersburg; to which His Majesty answered: "Your Majesty speaks as if a father was of no account!"

"Oh, of course, a father, too," she said—"though fathers are only a modern development, mind! Formerly there were no fathers, only mothers."

The King fingered his beard, saying with his touch of pompousness: "Indeed! But Your Majesty fails to mention at what precise period of the world's history this innocent condition of things prevailed."

"It prevails still! — among bees, for instance."

"This is strange," said the King.

"Ah!" said the Queen.

"But what have bees to do with the matter?" asked His Majesty: "the point is, that Your Majesty wishes to deprive the Prince of learning what all gentlemen learn—"

"Oh, I do! since a decent boy hasn't the time to: and if the point of that boy's intellect be soppyfied and softened by learning six hundred words of Greek — if he becomes the least bit like any of them — I shall go mad, I think, I couldn't stand it. What I want him to learn is that about bees — God's facts — infinitely Divine, awful, lovely, romantic, religious, significant, educating. But, if a boy learns that it pleases some people to call a boy a 'pais,' or a 'garçon,' does that give him to think and adore? Oh, Your Majesty knows very little Greek, and I know lots — through no fault of my own, God knows — and some other things, too — can't you listen to me?"

"But everyone differs from Your Majesty!"

"Except thinkers," she said, almost crying, "and, oh, isn't that hard that the brightness of the wise should be for ever overborne by the dullness of the stupid?"

That break of tears in her voice, her throbbing throat, touched His Majesty. Her figure, moreover, as she roamed the room, with that glory of her gallant grand eyes aglow, was very magnetic, so that the King lowered his lids a little, let slip a look at her hips, lowered them, stole a look, then said: "Well, I only hope Your Majesty's plans won't compromise the Throne's popularity."

"No" — in a gentler tone, touching his shoulder—" people will understand."

"But will they?" he asked: "I pride myself upon my knowledge of the people — or does Your Majesty imagine yourself so popular a monarch as I am?"

She smiled down now upon him. "No, I don't dispute that with you. You have the popularity, but, oh, let me have Teddy."

And in the end she managed: the Prince went to Brockweir.

Now, already at Brockweir was Li Ku, called "Sky-Blue" (since he was a Celestial!) son of a member of the Min Cheng Pu (Home Office); and nine days after the Prince's arrival, he slapped Li Ku across the face. Whereupon a formal fight.

It was toward the end of lunch-time, and a small boy, flying with tidings toward the Lower School, panted, "Prince and Sky-Blue — fight!" to one Richard Chinnery, sitting on the Fourth Form steps, intent upon winding primary wire round a bobbin; and Chinnery called after: "What's the row?"

"Caught Sky-Blue trephining cat not properly anæsthetised!" — he was gone.

Whereupon Chinnery dashed off to the shed down in the hollow, and made his way through a throng that already had no little respect for him, to see the champions already stripped — like David and Goliath, Sky-Blue being a tall strip of yellow, six months the elder.

But there was little fun; and after the third lead-off Chinnery, muttering, "It's a butchery," dashed back to his induction coil. The Royal combatant, in fact, had all the art, and presently muttering, "Oh, well, doesn't matter," put on Ins jacket.

It was over, then? Li Ku Yu sat on the shed-bench, his legs under him — impossible to guess if he was humbled, if he was ratty inside, he smiling as ever his insolent smile, chin up — huge-headed, tough as orange-skin, breezy, brazen, a cool blade, looking ready to wink.

He smiled ever; but seldom laughed, except on Saturdays — when he was younger — when he would stand in the town's electric shed watching the commutators spinning asleep, six revolutions a second; and a moment would come when that depth of insolence would be riven by a little giggle — a giggle of glee and victory at the trickiness of man and the admission of God; and he laughed one Tuesday when a crusher was crushing up the old school-chapel bricks, when, after gazing many minutes at the engine jiggling, the glee digged him, and he giggled.

“But there’s something wrong about that orange lately,” said Chinnery after six months: “he has changed his Saturday-habits.”

The Prince was “doing arsenic” — a Wednesday afternoon when he did the metals; and Chinnery, whose drawer was next to his, was under instructions to show him his way about in analysis — Chinnery two years the elder, and already his young head was a garden of consciousness — tall — hollow-chested... gentle...

“Know that man they call Spider?” he asked—” retired poacher and gaol-bird — cottage back of the Chasewood. I go up there to get rock-specimens, and twice I’ve spied Sky-Blue and Spider in the dell there. Deighton wouldn’t like it, though Sky-Blue’s a Steer.”

(“Steers” were town-boys, and Dr Deighton the Head-Master — a bearded Sea-King, blushing rich with brandy, his gown dropping down his right shoulder, the howl of a cow in him, heart-harrowing, memorable, a wrangler— “mathematics” — not perhaps “learned,” but the very best of earth’s teachers.)

“What would Sky-Blue be doing at Spider’s?” the Prince asked.

“Not sure, but you look out: for if you two meet in serious battle, you kill each other. My idea is that Sky-Blue is taking lessons in boxing from Spider.”

“Free country — Or the attraction may be Spider’s gal.”

“Ah, don’t underestimate my Sky-Blue,” Chinnery said: “that’s no ordinary orange. I’ll swear that he hasn’t wasted five minutes since he was nine — I know him, for I have some attraction for him apparently, and he comes to watch me messing about up in that library alcove. Dumb as a mummy! But one afternoon he began to gas, and, Ted-of -the-Throne, I never knew speech so fascinating. The things that saffron sack of thoughts vomited out of his chasm! you’d hardly believe.”

“Oh, aye, I guess,” muttered the Prince, holding up a precipitate to squint at.

“Said that white people are a freak! ‘like white mice,’ not a permanent type; hence we produce a shudder in the yellow breast. And you know that old sixpenny atlas which is his Bible — he produced that to show me that Europe and Asia are just like twins in structure; and he calls the two islands, England and Japan, the negative and positive terminals of a cell, the continents being the plates, Europe the white zinc, Asia the yellow copper.”

“Scott, that’s gas,”

“Teddy” said.

“Anyway, an intellect above Spider’s gal.”

“Oh, aye, I think I know.”

“Yes, and above gals diviner far than Spider’s! Look here — don’t tell anybody—” Chinnery produced from his drawer a curious document, a folio of silk-paper on a stick of ivory round which the folio rolled, sending an aroma of roses into that sulphuretted stench of the room.

“This must have dropped out of Sky-Blue’s pocket when he snatched out Asia to show me, and I confiscated it as contraband. Passion, my boy.... Ever seen one Oyone motoring in the town? Not? Then you never beheld human beauty. Visits at my cousins, the Santleys — oh, Oyone, would that I had never beheld the phiz and evil peeper of thee! A half-caste — her father a P. & O. ship’s-surgeon — Irish — mother a geisha-girl of Nagasaki. How Oyone ever got into a Wesleyan mission-school at Tientsin I can’t say, but she did, then fell in with Sky-Blue’s present guardian, A-lu-te. — Surely you have seen A-lu-te somewhere? Little old woman like a monkey?”

Teddy said no.

“But you know where Sky-Blue lives?”

“Isn’t it that mansion with gables up on the hill?”

“That’s it. But A-lu-te and Oyone are mostly at Regent’s Park, where they have to be for the intrigues. Talk of intrigues! A-lu-te, it seems, was a conspirator, and was banished with Oyone to ‘the post-roads’; and now for Oyone and A-lu-te the puzzle is, so to intrigue as to get back again to the whisperings and peepings of Court-life. As to Oyone — pretty. Blessed are your eyes that have not seen her: some day you may, and then over goes the blooming Throne. Her age, though, is rather in advance of the Heir-apparent’s: seventeen! — twenty-seven she will never see — assassinated, beheaded perhaps, long ere then: tragedy sleeps in those ravishing peepers. But see Sky-Blue’s height above Spider’s ‘gal’: he disdains Venus. Here’s her scroll to him; unroll. Observe the neat, crude, school-girl writing.”

“Li Ku Yu, Her Excellency asks about your health, and wishes you well.

“It is now five weeks since she or I have seen you; and your writing is like a miser’s kindnesses.

“Li Ku Yu, persons are born and flung up into the sun’s light not when or where they choose. From China round to America and back, life in its tossings, like a fish which is caught and tosses, flings this one up in one generation, and that one up in another, and the rubbings together of persons is as was ordained. Each is sent to his own generation, to rub with it, so that everything may be as was ordained with life; and when one generation is buried, the sun shines brightly on another. You, Li Ku Yu, and I, Oyone Umé, have been flung up in the same generation, and been flung together, to rub.

“It is a sin in life that you are ice and iron to me! Others tend to me, but not I to them; I to you, but not you to me? You are ice, but I will make you bubble; and iron, but I will make you flow.

“I have the leprosy for you, Li Ku Yu. I think you are like Indian pansupari of areca-nut, and like chunam with spices rolled up in a betel leaf.

“Li Ku Yu, when someone speaks of the end of your college-term, this makes me pale, but afterwards in my chamber my little body dances at this.

“I have the hope that you are in health, and not troubling your brow always about studies.

“My prayer is that you write to me separately and comfortingly, for my tongue suffers thirst in this furnace. “When I think of you, Li Ku Yu, I stretch myself and kiss the wind. Sayonara!

“OYONE.”

“Oh, the miserable...!” muttered Teddy, with a little flush.

“Yes,” said Chinnery, “but the point is, that Sky-Blue is ‘ice and iron’ to her — the nymph of nymphs, earth’s thickest thimbleful of intense liqueur — compared with whom Spider’s han’some gal is a gross frog squatted, a goggling gecko of the rocks. Sky-Blue has other business with Spider.”

But Chinnery’s warning came too soon, and was forgotten in a month. In eighteen nothing had happened.

Meantime, the Prince did well with his eyes and fingers. On the football field, moreover, everything scattered before his passionate impetuosity: for which alone, and then for his decent way, he was well loved. If a boy new to that most anxiously élite “schoolboy spot.”

“Highnessed” him, he’d say, “My name’s Teddy Reeks to you, kid”: and only one boy, who never forgot, saw his chin lift with a chilling hauteur. It was an amusing thing at Brockweir that after a year many were to be found imitating his nimble way of lifting his toes in stepping, his brisk and restless little roll, his trick of saying “Scott!”

He had no resemblance to the men of the House of Hanover — his face open as a summer’s day, quite English in expression, fair like a face of milk-and-pink in a picture, his eyes light like a Norfolk sky: no weak line, from whatever angle one glanced. Taller than his father: shorter than his mother; slightly bow-legged.

He had been at Brockweir eighteen months when one day — as if the Star Venus should descend to earth — the Queen descended upon Brockweir. It was well with “Teddy” that day, and well with all: holiday! throats hoarse with hurrahs! a Teddy carried shoulder high.

Using that day as a date, we count six months to the date when Li Ku Yu received an order to return to China. That was on a Thursday in the Autumn term.

The next Saturday afternoon being fine, the Prince was permitted to take part in a paper-chase — Brockweir being great on running; several of its lads could range a country-side like stags; and none surpassed the Prince in this.

He was in a solitary spot on an estate named Penryth, rather separated from “the hounds,” running down a steep field through sheep toward the river tow-path’ when he heard a calling: “Ho! Hi! Help!” — seeming to proceed from a chapel-of-ease which stands half-way down the field — a little ruin no bigger than a room — roofless — just four walls, two with gable-ends, and some Gothic window-slits.

A wall of loose stones runs round it, enclosing a bit of ground crammed with bracken (in the summer); so the Prince vaulted the wall, and ran to see what the matter was.

He looked in; and there within stood Li Ku Yu.

But he did not at once recognise Sky-Blue! — a Sky-Blue arrayed in Oriental raiment, as for a ceremony! The Prince wondered whether the pigtail had grown in a day; but it was a silken queue platted on, as many upper-class Chinese wear them.

And the significance was this: that it was China there to interview Europe.

“Well?” said the Prince.

Li Ku Yu made no reply.

“Did you call out ‘help’?”

Li Ku Yu was mute. They looked at each other — well-grown lads now, the Prince in the Upper Fifth, Li Ku Yu the head of the Sixth, but for Chinnery, who lingered on several terms after Brockweir ceased to have anything to teach him.

All at once Li Ku Yu, with a moan, threw his arm round the Prince’s neck, and began to rub his cheek on the Prince’s cheek, up and down, moaning, like a lover moaning for love.

The other, very astonished, tried to draw back, saying: “I say, what’s all this?” But even as he asked, he knew: knew that he would never forget that day.

The Prince wrenched himself spinning from that venomous affection; and he said sharply: “Hurry up! What’s it all about?”

Li Ku Yu was smiling: but in the expression of his eyes was something very terribly tense and strained, atrociously cruel and ferocious; the eye-whites looking bloodshot.

Now at last he spoke, in that strange voice of his — foreign as an animal’s from another planet.

“You were unwise to strike me, Prince.”

“Who? When? Years ago? Got that in you still, have you?”

“Cluck! a minute ago to me.”

“So it’s a fight, is it? But stay — let me warn you; the boys and men of this land can’t be conquered. You may kill and mince them, but you won’t see them strike their flag. Are you prepared for all that? In for bloodshed, and a fight to the finish?”

He was now eyeing the Chinese loweringly under the eyes, his tones, as he spoke, more and more trilling with emotion: in the back of his head a question as to his mother — how she would wish him to act now.

Li Ku Yu, with one finger out, commenced to lecture: ““The boys and men of this land’? Cluck! poor stuff. Done nothing great. The steam-engines they use? Papin! Electricity? the Voltas of Italy! Explosion motors? the French! Guns, navigation? the Chinese! Chemistry? a French science! The Saxon a gross dog — obedient! a slave: as you English aristocrats know with secret glee. William the Conqueror conquered them by one single battle. It took his sons three hundred years to conquer the Scotch, the Welsh. Not conquered the Irish yet. Gross dogs. But for the Celts around who have mixed blood, England still a fifth-rate state. As it is, great in nothing! only big. Half-discovered Uranus; invented boxing, roast beef: and I now about to teach their King’s son the secrets of boxing, and of raw beef. Even their robbing-career done now: now their turn to be robbed from. See if Japan doesn’t have Australia — Canada! and be not surprised if before you die you catch sight of the saffron Dragon-flag of the Manchus flapping from the staff atop of your Parliament-house. I say this because I happen — —”

“Make haste finish!” said the Prince, harsh and sharp.

“Yes, proud, I know! — though not of what—”

“Of being a white boy!”

“I proud of my head! though I should not wish the skin over it to be sickly, faded. White? the colour of decay! — old hair — the louse—”

“And yellow of death, of corruption, cholera, and tropical rottenness” — each speaking now with a bitterness that hissed, their faces leaning toward each other.

“Hence English hair yellow!” said Li Ku Yu: “I have seen old Manchu women’s hair turn yellow, too, like other plants in Autumn, their skins bleach. Yet the fair races not like that through age — freak of nature! You are proud of your ancestry: but your father’s line? a fly’s lifetime to mine! As to your mother, she is only — “Slave!” — Lucifer said it, and instantaneously with that lightning of his eye broke the bolt of his knuckles upon the other’s nose.

Li Ku Yu staggered, licking his blood.

He fell upon an altar-step near the east end that divided the stone floor into an upper and lower level; and, sitting there, he very deliberately took off slippers, hat, bluse — threw them into grass and bracken that grew thicker along the rims than in the middle, the Prince, too, throwing away cap and jacket; and he stood waiting with his fists tight, high-strung, smiling, white.

All at once Li Ku Yu, with a slight cry, was up; and without another syllable the battle began.

The Prince’s aim was mainly the eye; the Chinese aim mainly the heart.

Whenever the Prince led off with the left, Li Ku Yu would parry, and spin the Prince round by pressure on the Prince’s left; then cross-counter with a sounding pound in the unprotected right ribs — he having at this time more science than the other; but perhaps less art.

With every blow that he planted — with every blow that he received — Li Ku Yu let out a slight cry, a little scream of laughter.

But the floor was uneven, slippery — made mainly of grave-slabs, grass-grown and dislocated — and thrice Li Ku Yu, though in his socks, flew staggering; the Prince’s feet, on the contrary, were his strong point, his two legs advancing and retreating like one, at a constant angle; and, in attacking, he advanced as if taller grown, with quite a light and dominant step, impending upon his enemy.

But both had pretty soon enough of it to please them, the flush and fun of the thing finished; and now they found themselves with the burden of its earnest on their backs, Li Ku's nose now a rotten apple, the Prince in considerable distress for breath, trickling blue blood under the right eye, both fists of both all swollen and deformed. And now the consciousness fell heavily upon their young hearts that this was only the beginning, the grimness of the game yet to come; nor was there any hope of rescue in that lonely place.

Li Ku Yu sent such a left-hander into the right side of the Prince's neck, that the Prince was driven to stand inactive several seconds, his back against the west wall, his mouth gaping, Li Ku, meantime, stooping before him in a species of crouch, just able to get out the gasp: "You done now?"

At this question, an attempt at laughter distorted the Prince's lips an instant, as he lifted his foot and kicked the Chinese fiercely on the shin.

Whereupon Li Ku Yu lost temper and form; and from that second the battle degenerated wretchedly into a horror of random rancours.

Like a cat Li Ku Yu was in the air with a cry, abandoning now the restraints of the art taught him by "Spider," and backsliding to the simple instincts of nature.

He got all his ten claws riveted on the Prince's neck, and pressed; but at the same time the Prince contrived to get the pigtail round Li Ku's throat, and pulled: a sound like a creaking proceeding out of both their crowded throats; and their faces went sombre, as under the shade of the cloud of death.

And when presently the pigtail came away from the other's head, the Prince realised that it was an ill case now with him. The face before him had grown bony somehow, ugly to indelicacy in the nakedness of its lust; no chance of compassion there.

But the outstanding fact of the battle to a looker-on would have been this — that in every extremity the young Prince did not fail to find a way out, contriving every time to skip nimbly out of his fix, his knee in this case saving him, he kicking up with it so lucky a blow, that Li Ku Yu fell away convulsed, and fled, looking backward, as he fled, with an expression of fright in his eyes.

The Prince stumbled after, lashing feebly at him with the pigtail, laughing with distorted lips — feeble, but still dominant; and when Li Ku, flying east, came to the altar-step, he was too far gone to lift his foot enough, and, stumbling, tumbled in a lump. The Prince lashed him once with the pigtail, gasping at him: “Had enough?”

There was no answer; and he dropped back to the west wall, upon which he propped his back, thankful enough for the respite and space to draw his breath in, wondering if it was ended, or when it would end, or if no rescue would spring up out of those grassy graves to deliver two poor lads entangled there in the trap of their natures and fate.

And during some moments only the rasping drone of the two throats broke the stillness, and the prattle of a wren tripping on the west window-sill, and distant bleatings of sheep feeding in the field. Till, all at once, with a little cry of laughter Li Ku Yu was up from the step to dash himself desperately afresh upon the adversary.

After three blows only, they closed to a wrestle, the Oriental hugging in a strangling grasp of his right arm, while his left fingers got into the Prince’s shirt-collar, which he first dragged to rags, and then the vest. Meantime, though, he was being severely kicked and beaten, and suddenly experienced a cuff so deep in the left ear, as set his cranium breaking out into cricket-song.

Again he fell away; again in an impulse of panic he ran; and again the Prince followed laughing. Past the step they pelted, on to the east wall, where Li Ku made a leap to catch the sill of the chancel-window, as if to escape that way — though the window was obviously far too narrow for a body to pass through. His first try failed, but by his second he contrived to catch the sill; and there hung stretched. Instantly, though, the Prince was dragging at a leg, gasping again: “Had enough now?” and when Li Ku Yu kicked, the] Prince grasped at him and dragged him down.

Li Ku Yu dropped...

But the instant he dropped, he again let slip his rollick cry of fight, and attacked with such a cat-o’-mountain franticness, that in the tempest of it the Prince had to retreat rapidly, panting as if to die; and, flying backward, his face to the foe, he stumbled on coming to the step, and slapped down flat. Li Ku Yu fell over him.

An Oriental grotesque in bronze now glared through that stare of the Orient as it rode its overthrown foe. The Chinese rubbed his cheek on the Prince’s, and kissed him, even as he banged upon the battered face, panting, “You done now?” and he dragged off the last of the rags from the already naked breast, gasping: “Were you wise to strike Li Ku Yu?” and he grabbed a handful of grass and bracken to cram into the other’s throat, panting, as he crammed it: “You done now?” and he spat his foam over the other’s face, and licked the other’s lips, and bit beastially with his teeth, and knocked at the gates of the dead under the grave-slab with the prostrate skull, asking: “Were you wise to strike Li?”

But his undoing was in the twinkling of an eye....

The Prince, with a twist of the wrist, swift as the swift's wing, clapped a sprig of nettle that he had grasped upon those eyeballs over him, and, in the instant of Li Ku Yu's confusion, was free.

He had fallen with one of his heels on the upper level of the step; he put up the other on it; and winning himself swiftly footward, came up with his face between Li Ku Yu's legs, who clapped his legs together, but too late.

And as Li Ku Yu himself was in the act of scrambling upright, he staggered down again upon his palms — the pigtail having been twisted with a dazzling alacrity round and round his ankles.

Long before it had dropped just there, and the Prince, on rising, had spied it. A little push behind sent the entangled Chinaman flat. The Prince sprang at him, and rapidly had the pigtail tied tight.

"Had enough?" he panted, as he himself dropped upon the platform.

"Oh!!" — as he dropped, a little cry was at the door yonder to the west, a young lady's face there.... The Prince rose on his elbow, blushing....

A minute's use of her eyes, and she uttered a sound of compunction, then came with decision to undo the pigtail, glancing daggers at the Prince.

Li Ku Yu, loosed, got up to stagger away against the north wall: and the three looked at one another.

"Oh, how could you!" — to the Prince.

The Prince glanced up to shake at her his abandoned brow, murmuring: "Not my fault."

At this point Li Ku Yu staggered from that wall to the opposite where his slippers and things were, gathered them, leant aside to whisper the Prince, "Not finished, Prince," then bowed, o'jiji, to the girl and staggered away out, his things on his arm.

"But where is he going?" the girl asked: "he can hardly walk."

"He doesn't live far," the Prince mourned despondently.

“And you?”

“I am at the College.”

“College?... Well, it is your own fault if I took you for a plough-boy.”

“It wasn’t my fault. I heard a cry of ‘help!’ and it was he waiting to attack me. I couldn’t give m — forgive me for offending your eyes—”

She seemed to him an angel sent to rescue him and Li Ku Yu.

“I will, then,” she said, “since that was how it was.”

At which sympathy the Prince covered his eyes and began to cry—” swing-of-the-pendulum” to softness after the grimness and tension of the fight.

“Never mind,” she said to him, “it’s over now; and you did get him nicely tied up in the end, didn’t you?”

Now her lips split in a smile, and he, peeping between his fingers, felt that he had never seen anything so neat and nice, like fine white linens.

“Well, better come with me,” she said, “let’s see what can be done”; and he followed her, picking up jacket and cap — through bracken — over a slab-stile — through fifteen yards of scrub to a marshy spot with rocks to step on, and so to the river-brink.

There is a flat spot just there — a break in the lines of cliff thick with timber that rise on both sides of the Wye; and there in the little bay a boat lay, made fast to a bunch of bulrushes.

“It is well that I got out,” she said over her shoulder: “something seemed to say to me: ‘have a look at that little church’ — and I went. Otherwise, how would you have got back to the College — and what will they say to you?”

“I’m afraid poor Dr Deighton will be wishing himself dead,” he said half to himself: “but not his fault, not anyone’s.”

She thought that that would be excessive of Dr Deighton to wish himself dead — for the thought did not happen to crop up in her mind that this might possibly be the Prince: else she might have been saved the pangs of her fate.

When he had sat opposite her, she pulled in the rope, and the tide, just turning, bore them slowly up-stream, while she worked away at wiping his wounds with her wetted handkerchief, the quick female-organs of her fancy immediately conceiving him a warrior-knight of old, victorious, though sore wounded.

He, meantime, kept his eyes on her face. “How is it I never saw you before? belong to Brockweir?”

“Nottingham! — spending three weeks with a school-friend.”

“Brockweir school?”

“No, we’re Cheltenham College girls.”

“Like Brockweir?”

“Anywhere near the sea I love. It is in me, I suppose.”

“How’s that?”

“A sea-faring lot. One of my grandfathers was a Chief Coastguardsman, the other a mercantile-marine captain; and his grandfather — if you can conceive a grandfather’s grandfather — fought at Trafalgar. Irish Paddies. And my father’s a Sergeant-Major of Marines, not to mention a cousin who’s a naval Boy-Telegraphist — so you see.”

His eyes dwelt on her pointed soft face, smooth-rounded like good sculpture, her pointed hat of black velvet half hiding her globe of gold-hair, her ring not costly, her brooch cheap. But with those eyes she had no need of sapphires, eyes that shrank and reproached with a shy and roguish guile. And she soothed his wounds with touches soft as fondness itself. He wished that a compelling impulse would push her to put her lips on them, like a young mother, and make them well.

“Better now?”

“Skull all cracked to atoms apparently,” he answered: “but that’s excellent of you — oh, thanks. Pansy-petal fingers. You — should tell your name.”

“Bayley.”

“That’s the unchristian one.”

“Eulalia, then.”

“Aged sixteen and seven months,” he said.

“Just! You can hit other things beside eyes, can’t you? And yours?”

“Mine’s — Edward Reeks.”

“Like the Prince!... Oh, I should so like to see him before I go, to say that I have! Tell me — do you see him every day?”

“Why, yes.”

“They say that he’s not at all like ordinary princes — lots of brains and character. Is that so? And handsome—”

“Then, I am: for they say I am like him — or was. But I think I could procure you a sight of him — let me see — next Saturday, if you meet me in there by the little church. How would that do?”

His heart sank guiltily, asking it, his voice lowered: for the standard of conduct was high at home; and he had been brought up with two facts constantly hammered into his skull: that his father had married a subject; and that his father’s son never, never must, since human nature could not stand it twice.

He knew that his mother, if there to hear that rendezvous, would have been furious. Yet he could not help saying “Well?” when the girl turned her face toward the cliffs.

“It is getting cold for boating,” Eulalia said, with her begging eyes.

“Still — could you not?”

Maiden meditation.

“I’ll see if I can possibly see my way.”

“Now, decent of you!”

The turrets of the College appeared through trees beyond a bend.

CHAPTER II

OYONE

THREE DAYS AFTER the battle Li Ku Yu departed; for, though the Prince declined to tell how he had got his injuries, the whole thing had been anxiously probed to the bottom. Indeed, Li Ku's absence from the College, and his blotched body, told their own story. There had followed a solemn interview between Dr Deighton and him up at the Chinese mansion on the hill: which was the end of the spot of yellow at Brockweir.

This was no inconvenience to Li Ku Yu, who had taken care to restrain his craving for revenge until his father had summoned him home; but the fact of expulsion rankled. He sent by Chinnery one bitter line of writing to the Prince:

"You will need to wake up early in the mornings." Then he went.

But it was not until after Christmas that he started for the East. Meantime, he lived at the back of the Regent's Park house in an outhouse called the Garden House — a square structure with Norman windows and three steps in a jungle of shrubbery, all shut in by a tall wall.

Here he insolently smiled and toiled: and dining those months passed through a cruel ordeal of self-torture. The self-discipline of Spartans, of Samurai, was child's play to his then: no fire throughout that hard winter, day after - day neither food nor sleep.

When he deigned to eat, his teeth would grind a little raw rice, raw gristle, or grass; when he slept it was out on the snow in the blue cotton dress of peasants.

All which did not please his own Oyone, the Irish-Japanese. "But you must soon be dead!" she would lament.

"If I let you stay with me, Oyone," answered Li Ku Yu, "you must not be a Tu Mu, who constantly spoke at the wrong moment."

On which she tossed her body away — a body entangled in three gold-spotted tree-snakes, seeming as boneless as the snakes; then lay silent on her face, light-looking and lithe as a withe, her eyes dwelling on him where he squatted on the floor, reading Chesney's "Military Prussia."

Anon she shivered at a whistling of wintry winds without; and anon he absently poked his finger at her hair, stuck thick with jewelled kamachis. Clearly, her presence pleased him in some way. In fact. Chinnery's statements about her were hardly an exaggeration, for she was of a strange and ravishing charm.

The gloaming deepened to bleak evening, until the gold god Fo only dimly glimmered on his chair of jade; and presently a head peeped in between the door-hangings, making Oyone wriggle quickly footward from Li Ku — under the head-dress (wide to the shoulders!) being a little woman shimmering in rich silks on Manchu shoe-heels inches high — Li Ku's guardian, an exile of the Yehonala clan, named A-lu-te; and she murmured unconcernedly in Mandarin Manchu: "It is the hour: of the cock; shim the passions, you children" — and vanished.

"No fear of passions," thought the frozen Oyone with a pout. And she put her face sideward with a coaxing smile, saying: "Shall I light the lanterns? You strain the sense of sight."

"To train and test it."

"But why will you kill yourself?"

Li Ku Yu now put down the book, to sit chin up, smiling his smile of triumph, like a yellow rock that sublimely smiles — clean-cut and clear, sleek and keen — hairless but for the clean clear snake of his pigtail, coarsely yellow, looking a ‘cute blade, made for business with men. “Kill? Tra-lar! It is to keep myself and all us yellow folk alive that I am bathed with the rain, and combed with the wind. Or are you not sure that you are doomed, unless a deliverer comes for you?”

“Yes, I have always thought this,” replied Oyone, springing upward like a spring to sit by him: “though I have never understood why the Fan-quei” (foreign devils) “cannot let us be.”

“Can’t help! Nature likes all-of-one-kind! — as the strongest weed in a field either kills or marries the rest. So, in time, one universal world-race — mixed — ruby-coloured — prettier and better than any at present. But, before that, we to eat the flesh of half the whites — or they ours. Be glad if I lie on brambles and eat bitterness” — his speech clean-cut like his skull: short, choppy: no word wasted.

“But you — so young—” she muttered.

“Cluck! the foolishness of people. They think that Li Hung Chang or Gladstone at seventy can be as wise as a child of sixteen. No science. But, even so, can they not guess that when an animal’s knee has stiffened, arteries hardened, nobler stuff of heart and liver become tough with spread of fibrous tissue, the brain cannot remain intact from all that havoc? Fact is, his brain is in the very same state as his hair, his insight as his sight. Only the young of use, Oyone.”

“I know that, too,” said Oyone, “and I intend when I am thirty to commit suicide. And because it is so, therefore the young should love, for they can spend their time in nothing that is so good as love.”

“Cluck! so you pretend to think: but love not nearly so good as a hero’s self-satisfaction. Yet I love you, Oyone: quick-witted — a squirrel! and though you squint — for your left eye is wider—”

Quick like quicksilver she caught his arm, twisting to stare into his eyes with a wily smile. “Do you not like them like that?”

“Maybe: for Nature has turned your very defects into traps to kidnap; still—”

“Oh, I am not vain,” muttered Oyone, kissing one of her snakes: “I know that I am not too ugly: but all we Japanese with barbarian fathers have beauty.”

“Who are barbarian? Your mother! A barbarian nation? one that thinks the thoughts of dead men. A civilised? one that thinks the thoughts of men not born. Russia, England, Spain, yes — more or less barbarian for the moment: not France, Germany much; all infected with Christianity; but none half so barbarian as China. China? land of pundits, bandits, salt-smugglers, pirates, who all spend their pious lives in making quotations from dead apes. Now, a Statesman can do much with a bandit; but a pundit? Cluck! send him down to the Halls of Hades to muse and quote beside the Nine Springs. Which is how I intend to begin in China — decapitations! — one-two-three. Still, the difference in eyes is a defect, Oyone; so, if I love you—”

“Kiss the little one — you may — see if that will open it wide!” — she hissed it leaning over his knees, pouring into his nose a steam of aromas.

But he remained cold as a Buddha of stone. “You won’t catch me kissing it, Oyone. Listen: I wish to speak with you seriously before I leave next week. I mean to make you some day my consort—”

She started! Then, with lowered lids: “I do not hope for that.”

“But I will” — his lids disdainfully lowered—” on one condition.”

“Yes — ?”

“I must know that you hate your father’s people, love your mother’s.”

It was too dark in there now for her to see the cunning meaning in Li Ku Yu’s eyes; and she answered: “But you know already that my mother, who was wronged by my father, brought me up to abhor Fanqueis. If abhorring could slaughter, all whites would die in one night!”

Li Ku Yu hit her shoulder and laughed. “Glad of that, Oyone, so that dining the next few years I may know that I have one like you in Europe: for you have the salt and qualities. You have taken it into your head to be very soft and love-sick to Li Ku Yu: but half of this? due to a luxury in your nature like the concubine Ti Chi’s on her Lake of Wine; the other half? to a crafty pretence, so as to get me to entangle myself with a gutter-sparrow like you — for you are deep-dyed in sin, but I deeper still, I think, and can read you. So throw all that away, enter seriously into business with me — my comrade! For which — not for your squinting eyes — you shall be my Fu Jen (legal wife) some day.”

She moved her shoulder to touch his now; her head hung dumbly.

“And don’t think,” he continued, “that it will be marrying some common Mandarin’s lamb! Truth is, I feel a great force in me, Oyone — since I was so high! — don’t tell anyone. Something spurs me to burst out into the world and tumble with whirlwinds and earthquakes for fun; and a vigour tingles within my fingers that could fly this world like a kite — lightly! It is so — somehow! — some god gallops in me. This to make you zealous. You may become like the Empress Wu, managing a continent with a strong hand, a masculine strategy, riding at my right hand the champing chargers of majesty. For you see that China and Japan are crying aloud for a master to ride them.”

She rubbed her cheek on his blue-cotton shoulder, her eyes wide in silent excitement. She breathed: "What kind of thing will I have to do?"

"You shall be my intelligence-officer, spy! perhaps financial agent, or assassin—"

"In Europe..."

"Will you not do this blindly?"

"Yes, then."

"Do not shrink from assassination for your country's good — Brutus, the Soshi of Japan, Corday! — for, a man's life? tra-lar! an Autumn leaf. The Prince of Wales, for instance — suppose some day I cable you: 'track, destroy X.'?"

Some mutter, but no answer, came from her. A snake hissed soft like a kettle in the stillness. He looked down upon her bowed head in the darkness.

"Speak, Oyone."

"Yes, then," she muttered in low throat-tones, "for my soul is on yours, Li Ku, like one clinging to a reef in the middle of the sea. Only — let one kiss you."

"Kiss me, Oyone, if that comforts you," he said; and within one tick she was fitted to him like all the eight arms of the octopus enlacing him — till he called out with an absurd matter-of-factness: "Enough!"

"Now, don't spoil it," she muttered with hurried reproach in the thick of her business.

"Enough, enough," grumbled the other, thrusting her roughly off; and she sat again by him, ruffled and robbed, her heart throbbing in her, both silent; till she muttered: "But why the Prince of Wales? Do you hate him for what has happened?"

“Hate? Love! And hate, too, for not thinking me more the Prince of Wales than himself. Destined to be a leader! cannot be still — restless! Three eyes! Sees that a wrestle between East and West is ordained — the sooner the better! since the progress of Europe the quicker at present. It should have been two hundred years ago! Before another ten, though.”

“And if the hairy devils beat?” muttered Oyone, holding a joss-stick to her cigarette-end to incense more an air already smothered with sandalwood smoke.

“Yes,” answered Li Ku, “if the struggle is on open ground! But the weakness of the white mind? its gullibility! The gift of the yellow? its guile. Cluck! Asia would not fight Europe square, as things are. First ruin Europe — devastate, exhaust — then overrun, garrotte — chicken and dog.”

“How first ruin?” asked Oyone, languidly smoking, her back relaxed, her throat thrown back.

“You never thought of the ways in which China could drive Europe into war?” asked Li Ku.

“How?”

“Do not repeat to A-lu-te things you hear me say!”

“As if I would.”

“Old trick of China! — to play off one white against another: only she never had the craft and grasp to carry it out grand-style. But suppose China were to pretend to grant a protectorate to Germany, a province-lease? hear the British lion roar! Or suppose that at a moment of Anglo-German strain Japan discovered that she no longer wanted all her navy — weightier now than the United States’ — and offered to sell cheap, on trust, to Germany? Can you see Germany turn from that dish of birds’-nest soup? Germany couldn’t. Then just as the purchased ships pretended to leave the East for Germany, let the secret of the deal leak out sweet as mice-in-honey: and before the Jap ships were off Shanghai, British battleships would be battering the Baltic littoral.”

“Banzai!” broke from Oyone’s lips, as she slapped her sleeve, adding languishingly: “Oh, Li, I like you, a gay devil lives in you.”

“And he is the same, I think, this Ta-A-Ko (Prince of Wales),” said Li Ku, “so, at a time of European war, if I thought his wits might shorten the war, I should wish him down by the Yellow Springs.”

“But to reach a prince — that is not so easy,” breathed Oyone, staring.

“I’ll tell you how,” answered Li Ku with a glance of guile: “Prince has a great friendship with Richard Chinnery. Now, Chinnery? — the greatest of wits! — creative! — the Prince will probably keep near him. But Chinnery? cranky ship! — a chest-weakness affects his character — and I once dropped a letter of yours, to show him that you are not unconquerable. You, Oyone, become Chinnery’s lover.”

At this she shrank, very wounded, sighing: “Ah, how slightly you prize me....”

“Poh — nothing,” said Li Ku; “you shall still be my Fu Jen. Become Chinnery’s lover politically. And learn a little science from now, enough to spy into his inventions, and keep me posted.”

She threw up her eyes to the roof: for she was only nineteen.

Later on she became — older: but the brutality of Li Ku, Yu struck her dumb now. A fugitive eunuch looked in to mutter: “Oyone is called for,” but she did not move, took up her koto, and began to finger its strings, rolling low in her throat the notes of a tune most lugubriously moody, gloomier than the gloom that now brooded in the room, where only little glimmers and glammers were any longer seen, gleaming green or crimson from screen, or lacquer, or god. Outside sounds of wintry winds mouthed round the house; and she was conscious of the Chinese rocking himself as if to spread demon-wings and fly, rocking like the snakes which reared and rocked at the song, he hugging himself as the gale raged, and Oyone's throat gave out its strange melodious moaning.

CHAPTER III

THE COUP D'ÉTAT

THE CARRIAGES THAT rolled to the Buckingham Palace ball about a year later rolled through snow, and snow was falling when, some minutes after Her Majesty had danced the square-dance, a lady came to breathe near her ear: "I understand, Ma'am, that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has arrived, and craves to know if Your Majesty will graciously grant him a ten-minutes' interview where he waits alone in the Picture Gallery."

The Queen's heart went a beat quicker. "I will do so," she gave answer with that gracious smile which distinguished her; and her steps set out slow but grew hurried.

The Prince in a splashed mackintosh, pilot cap in hand, half knelt, and then felt her heart on his.

"So here you are!"

"Here I am, Mother: straight from Paddington with Manning and Sir Martin Raine."

"I had my eyes on my watch!"

"Oh, aye, I thought I'd see if you'd see me straight away."

"Have you succeeded?"

"That's all right."

"So this is the end of Brockweir?"

"So it seems."

"Did I do well to send you to Brockweir?"

He lowered his lids to say: "You are always my lucky star, Mother."

"Sit here: I give you ten minutes, and two more for love — Oh! and I have won about Dartmouth!" — she clapped her finger-tips—" you're to travel first!"

"You always win, Mother, when I'm the stake."

"Haven't I made you a credit to your country? Haven't I? Tell me."

"Well, I think so, though I'm something of a duffer in some things."

"But you never say 'heavy as lead,' lead being rather light? you know where your pancreas is, and some little something of the Divinity of the universe you live in!"

"Oh, aye, that's all to the good."

"And you have been good, too.... Have you been?" The Prince rushed red as a rose. "Well, I hope so."

A little pause now — a rising of alarm in Her Majesty's eyes. She said: "Edward the Red Prince."

"Ha, ha. Really, Mother—"

"A girl?"

Now he looked her straight, saying: "I may have met a girl, mother."

Her eyes shut, she moving her face intolerantly, making a little lip-sound of vexation. The thing that she feared had come upon her. And there was silence.

Then: "Oh, well, Teddy, it won't do."

"Mother, I hope you are not cross. Possibly, if you knew the lady—"

"I? Milk-maid? Frizzy hair?"

"Oh, Mother, we have only a few minutes, and here we are out of step —"

"But stay — is it to be supposed that you are what is called 'in love'?"

"I do seem to think of one—"

“Now, how annoying. And the lady knows this? and who you are?”

“She doesn’t happen to know who I am. I did tell her once that there were immense obstacles to our uni—”

“Union forsooth, Your Royal Highness!” — Her Majesty’s eyes flashing like that Star of South Africa which bathed her brow in its blaze—” pray select your words to me with greater circumspection! There is the Union that concerns you” — she pointed to that huge picture of the first sitting of the Union Convention at Cape Town—” for your so ‘democratic’ colonies want their ‘Royalty’ royal, et me tell you, and Kings are not masters of themselves, but servants of the world. I am astonished that you venture to say such things to me!”

“Mother, I attend to what you say.”

“But stay,” said the Queen; “when you mentioned to the lady that there were immense obstacles — what did the lady say?”

“She said that as I conquered Li Ku, so I should conquer the obstacles.”

The Queen smiled a little now, saying: “I see! Poor little thing, I’ll think of it, and see what can be done to let her down gently. But you should have told her plainly, Teddy. Li Ku was yellow, the obstacles blue. — When, by the way, did all this rapture happen?”

“Year ago. We met just after I had fought Li Ku; then — twice; then — thrice.”

The Queen thought that an odd way of putting it — twice, then thrice: why not ‘five times’? But she only said: “And, Teddy, you never told me.”

“Mother, I longed to. But I knew there would be a frown, and I thought that if I could first manage somehow to get you to see her — then you might — I can’t quite explain — there are natural aristocrats, as you know — cellularly select — essentially precious somehow — strangely rare — gentle—”

This praise afresh alarmed Her Majesty. Her next words were: “And the lady lives — where?”

Now the Prince’s eyes sprang into wide-awakedness. “Had I better tell, Mother?”

“Weill — I think so.”

“Scott, Mother, I don’t want to have the poor girl appalled and thundered upon.”

“Well! — But if I command?”

“Your Majesty is seventy times seven my Queen—”

“And you my little king of kings. Tell.”

“Teddy” moaned. “She lives at Nottingham,”

“And her name?”

“Eulalia.”

“Eulalia what?”

“She told me Bayley.”

“Good old Teddy — hero of all my novels,” the Queen fondly said, hardly noticing the queerness of that “she told me.”

“And don’t think,” she added, “that I am going to thunder upon her. We’ll see how things go: and it is just as well that I should have her name and place. But how could she possibly like you the day you fought Li Ku? You must have been so Chineaten, Manchewed, and Sky-Blued! And, by the way, talking of Li Ku Yu, do you know what he now is? I have a letter from Sir John Pilkinton at Peking.”

“What is Li Ku, Mother?”

“A Sub-Chancellor of the Grand Secretariat. Now, think what that means — that in about a year he has romped through Pundit ‘learning,’ such as it is — has, in fact, got an Optimus in the Peking Chin Shih exam. (Doctor’s Degree) — a stiff physical ordeal, apart from the cram. So you see.”

“Oh, aye, he will do something or other,” said the Prince—” says I must get up early, and I mean to. Perhaps we haven’t seen the last of each other, Mr Chin-chin and I.”

This was to come true only four months later when the Prince got a sight of Li Ku Yu going robed in a green (official) chair through the East Gate Glorious of the Forbidden City — for before his Investiture, or his actual cadetship, “Teddy” had eaten with chop-sticks, had learned buck-jumping and stock-whip cracking in the Australian Bush, had collected uniform-buttons of Cossacks and Redifs, had bagged big game in Somaliland, and been half drowned in a flood of the Great Fish River.

By the time he was leaving Dartmouth, Li Ku Yu was carrying out a bloody reform in the administration of the Yu Chuan Pu (Post-Office); and when the Prince had been six months on the St Vincent, Li Ku wa sa Chargé d’Affaires, making frequent trips between Peking and Tokio.

This man never lost an hour. Steadily, like a rat darkly gnawing a hole through the night-watches, he was gnawing at the old condition of the world, with the plan of a new world ready in his head: and as at an electric shock Asia thrilled at the presence of his vigour.

His first high attempt was a secret treaty, frankly framed against the white races, between the Dragon-flag and the Rising Sun.

But in this he failed. The Anglo-Japanese alliance, though very thin-worn, still existed; and in the eyes of the Japanese Chancellery that very young diplomat, Li Ku Yu, had rather the character of a dreamer. Now, though every great man may be a dreamer, not every dreamer is a great man; and to distinguish between the two sorts of dream is not always easy. But he smiled at all contradiction with his ordinary patience, for no being ever had so unshakeable a faith in his innate kingship, trickiness, and luck.

He was always sure, too, of his Dowager. Tea-room gossip in the Capital persistently said that she was his bonne amie; but, then, Li Ku Yu was little of a lover, though he certainly provoked women by his very aloofness, as the sparrow attracts the cat.

Anyway, Lung Lü from the first saw in him her master; and it is probable that from the first she and he had doomed her son, the young Emperor, to death.

Lung Lü was then about thirty-five, a woman of strong mind, though much under the influence of eunuchs, and not less notorious for her orgies in the dark seclusion of her palaces than the Empresses Wu and Tzu Hsi.

Her powers were again now fairly absolute, for though the Throne had been utterly overthrown by the Constitution of a few years before, the pendulum as usual had swung anew, and the Heavenly Empire was again governed by the "Decrees" and "Edicts" of a woman's moods.

Now, the Emperor, who was sixteen, and nearly ready to take the reins, detested his mother and Li Ku Yu.

He knew well that they had sentenced him to death, if not by drug or dirk, then by the life of riot to which they pushed him, a hated life from which his frail nature was helpless to escape: for they two took care that each of the eunuchs, and even his tutors, should be his teachers in evil.

Besides, the young Emperor, who had some spirit, felt himself a fly in the presence of Li's smile, of Li's bulk of skull, whose lines bulged largely as at the horse-power of some engine pumping within: and in his head on his bed at night he meant no good to Li Ku Yu.

And there were many on his side to plot with him — Censors, Grand Councillors, the Manchu Clansmen, who all abhorred the scholar from Brockweir, the pigtail with opinions more hairy-devil than the hairy devils'.

Accordingly, upon the failure of Li Ku Yu's mission to the Court of Japan, his assassination was determined upon as soon as he should return; and, meantime, Memorial after Memorial was presented to the Throne, urging his cashiering and impeachment before the Board of Punishments.

But he did not return — to Peking. Before he left Tokio, a rebellion had broken out, once more, among “the Turbans” (Turkestan Mohammedans); and an Edict from the Throne — which Li Ku Yu wrote — gave him the Governorship of Shensi, with the command to suppress the rebellion — for he danced from office to office like dancers dashing through “the daisy-chain,” changing hands in an entanglement of arms, with laughter; and, having some instinct of the intrigue against him in the Imperial City, he passed straight on to his Yamên at Sianfu.

There he raised some militia; and with 17,000 raw levies, and one brigade from the Northern Army, started out westward — without the least experience in the handling of masses of troops.

This business occupied him fourteen months.

He had to sit down before garrisoned towns with disgraceful guns and ragged brigades; once he had to grow the millet that gave porridge to his troops; and, meantime, his discipline was so grim and rigid, that very many of his men perished on the way.

During all which, in the Throne-Hall of Exalted Peace, the young Emperor had begun to govern; Lung Lü had retired with her eunuchs and ladies to her lake-picnics, stage-plays and other delights to her I-Ho-Yüanor Summer Palace (five miles out); and at once by a Vermilion Rescript the Emperor dismissed Li Ku Yu, “permitting him to commit suicide,” and despatching another General to take his place.

The body-guard of “Old Style” soldiers, carrying great two-handed swords, who surrounded this General, were pounced upon by the rank and file of Li Ku Yu's soldiers, who adored him, and were killed by the "slicing" process, then dismembered. The heads of the General and of the Commissioner who had come to inspect Li Ku Yu's suicide, were carried for days on the markers' standard-staffs of two rear-guard companies.

Thus Li Ku Yu crossed the Rubicon, and broke with the Throne of his country.

By this time his military advance had grown more rapid — it gradually grew rapid to a ravaging avalanche. He scourged Turkestan as far as Kashgar of man, cattle and plant. Never did regiments leave in their rear so complete a desert. In captured cities his troops ran riot like terriers let loose on rats; they cracked the skulls of the young upon rocks; they hacked off the bosoms of mothers before they stabbed them; for intervals of three hundred miles not a thing was left alive where their withering fire had run.

It was on his return march from Kashgar that he despatched couriers to make the vast order of 125,000 cinematographs through the agency of a German firm at Shanghai.

As his victorious host approached the Capital, crackers spattered in every town, and the Dowager despatched him a poem of congratulation, a Dragon-robe, four rolls of "auspicious" silk, twenty pounds of swallow-nests, and a tablet bearing the inscription: "Backbone of the State."

Now, on the Emperor's seventeenth birthday, his mother had summoned before her the most beautiful of the daughters of noble Manchu families, from whom to select a score of ladies for her son's harem; and among those selected had been a certain Nihulu, a half-sister of Li Ku Yu — Li's own mother being a Chinese woman, though his father was Manchu. And this Nihulu contrived to send him out a message when he was still ninety miles from Peking, saying that his death was a settled thing, if he once entered the city.

The next morning at the Hour of the Hare (six) Li Ku Yu entered the city by the Shih Che (N.W.) Gate — apparently alone — in peasant's dress: he had come flying through the night, as the vulture stoops: and he proceeded southward toward the Imperial City.

At that early hour the Supernal Countenance was granting audience to the Grand Councillors, Princes, and Ministers of the Presence in the Pavilion of Ceremonial Phoenixes in the Lake Palace; and there they were kneeling, looking pigmy in a room most gloomily grand, grouped round the Dragon Throne, on which sat the Glorious One, his face to the south.

Li Ku Yu was still felt to be at a safe distance away, and they were discussing the disposing of the troops at their command in the Capital, when suddenly Li Ku Yu, two pistols in his hands, was among them like the typhoon's swoop — darted in howling, astounding the heart, a sort of laugh distorting his bawling mouth, as he howled: "I am here to save Your Majesty from your enemies!" in shouting which he half-knelt — without kow-towing, and instantly was up again.

Now, one may not enter unsummoned, nor stand up. So, pallid as death, the boy-Emperor sprang to his feet, frantically pointing, screaming out: "Why, that man has designs upon my life! You see him there, that man? My Guards! My Guards!"

In flocked a mob of guards and eunuchs; but at the same time revolvers were crackling outside; and almost at once a half company of infantry in civilian garb darted into the hall.

A few shots were exchanged, a few corpses dropped, while Li Ku Yu, grasping the Emperor, held him behind his body, as if to protect him; and then Guards, Ministers, eunuchs, fled pell-mell. But only to be everywhere captured outside by the battalion in mufti which now surrounded the Imperial and Forbidden Cities. They were Li Ku Yu's veterans.

At the same time Lung Lü was reclining on the lofty deck of a large barge-of-state carved with dragons and phoenixes, coming along the canal that leads from Summer Palace to Imperial City: for she was duly in the secret of the coup d'état; and she issued an Edict that day in her son's name:—" ill-health had moved him to implore his Most Holy Mother to resume the onerous duties of a ruler for him."

Four months later the poor boy robed himself in the Ceremonial Robes of Long-life, turned his face to the south, mounted the Dragon, and was carried rotten to the stars.

He had been put into semi-imprisonment in the South lake Palace, surrounded by a foul crew of eunuchs and scoundrels, and died of many things.

CHAPTER IV

AUSTRALIAN GOLD

LI KU YU, for his part, put on the Double-eyed Peacock's Feather, with a Marquisate of the First Rank, and other honours; and his government began.

Those of his enemies who had been captured were set free unpunished; those who had fled in all directions one by one crept back, and, to their utter astonishment, were left unpunished — Li Ku Yu too big and busy to think of punishing them.

It is true that under his rule very many fell; but the lingering death and dismemberment fell into disuse.

The men upon whom he meditated with a malign and silent eye were men of the harmless "scholar" sort, who thought that they knew a lot, but knew nothing — the official who chanced to quote from Confucius, or Mencius, or Jesus, or Buddha, from the Philosopher Chu or Chou, from Wang Hou's "Admonitions to ms Sons," or "The Book of Ceremonies" of the Chou Dynasty: sooner or later that scholar's neck would skip off him beyond the city walls; flashing was the falchion that slashed him; crude and ruthless the dawn of the morning of his execution: that afternoon he quoted no more.

One other man, too, stood in more ticklish danger than ever — the millionaire, whose wealth, when his head fell, could be confiscated. From this source alone the Empress was said to have accumulated in two years eighty million taels in the vaults of the Palace of Celestial Purity, where she was accustomed to govern behind the curtain of yellow silk that veiled her and her chief eunuch from the view of men.

Meantime, the cargo of ordered cinematographs had arrived — Li Ku Yu's first open act of war against the Christian races.

He himself was head-master of one of the schools which he instituted to teach the use of the machines; he himself invented many of the “plots”—”plots” which had only one subject in infinite variety — a combat between white men and yellow, white women and yellow. And ever the yellow ended best man, disembowelling the colourless mouse, cutting out his or her tongue, bamboozling him in business, hacking out his heart, dancing on his carcass.

These films went out to districts of China and Japan where it was not even known that there were such things as white men; and, the entrance fee being only a few li, they soon proved popular apostles of atrocity, became a dissipation, an all-day orgy of fun to hundreds of millions — for Li Ku Yu intimately knew the mood and instincts of his countryman.

When the Embassies protested against these shows, and against the multitude of new “Government Gazettes” which had begun to promulgate the same two gospels of greed and cruelty, Li Ku Yu constantly promised that “the evil should be checked”; and advised them, meantime, to get permission to increase the strength of the Legation Guards!

About this time, when Count Markino, the Japanese Ambassador, said to him: “China must wake from four thousand years of sleep, Your Excellency,” Li Ku Yu answered: “Different degrees of wakefulness! China is awake! You know what woke her.”

“Tell me again,” the Count said, smiling.

“It was the gonging of the English guns that captured the hill forts above Canton in 1841: she stretched then. They thought themselves very big and godlike, capturing the poor Tartar General — and they ‘catching a tartar,’ as they say. It was the gonging of the guns in 1857 when the French and British bombarded the south coast; she rubbed her eyes then. It was the gonging of the French guns which shelled the junks in the Sun River in 1884, and of the guns of all the globe which bombarded Peking in 1900: tra-lar! she stood up then, and looked around. Beware who touches her! She is the Dragon and grand Anti-Christ: she stands awake.”

“Dreadful: if only the dragon had teeth in her gums,” said the other.

“Wait four months,” muttered Li Ku Yu.

Within those four months a beginning of Conscription on the Swiss model was made throughout China — a thing at which imagination fails.

It chanced that just then Germany and England were at loggerheads over an African tract; also, just then, Persia was afresh in some trouble with Russia; and some Russian squadrons at Resht were afresh ready to rush upon Teheran.

Now, since the Russo-Japanese war, the Persian fancy had rather been aburn at Japan’s Pan-Asian dream; and several secret Persian (as well as Indian!) missions had gone in pious pilgrimage to Tokio and Peking.

So Persia, in her adversity, now turned to Japan: for England, with Germany on the nerves, had been flirting with Russia ever since the Convention of 1907, and afresh shirked meddling in the Persian mess. Persia turned to Japan, asking “How long?” and Li Ku Yu flew to Tokio.

He had now more than all the weight and authority that he needed; being recognised, even in Europe, as the very greatest force in the Orient.

He was “Adviser to the Throne”; Viceroy of the Metropolitan Province.

He had dared to display apricot yellow in the hangings of his palanquin — a piece of cheek that caused him to be the idol of all Southern China.

Indeed, he had already assumed not a few of the airs of Royalty. To the amazement of men his name had “doubleelevation” in documents. He pompously accompanied the Empress to the Eastern and Western Tombs, and dared to take a principal part in her sacrifices to river, or ancestor, or deity.

Moreover, the man pretended to magic, the rapt eye, Divine inspiration, and gift of miracles — a pretence made pretty easy for him to maintain by his intimacy with scientific things.

The Chinese believe that a Divine Saviour periodically arises for China: Li Ku Yu said: “Look into my brazen eyes, and see Him.”

On reaching Tokio, he now afresh proposed his “secret treaty”; and he proposed, in addition, the following plot:

(1) That China should apply for a German loan, offering as security a protectorate of Shantung — this to electrify the Anglo-German atmosphere.

(2) That the Persian Megliss, meantime, should be urged to knuckle under to Russia; and the Persian incident be used to bring about a (sham) rapprochement between Petersburg and Tokio.

(3) That Japan should now openly declare that she really no longer needed all her warships, now that she lay happy on the breast of the Bear.

And (4) that she should then secretly offer to sell to Germany — which should end in Anglo-German war.

But again the international juggler failed.

The Japs, indeed, now agreed to the secret treaty: but as regards the sweeter part of the intrigue, although they grinned with greedy interest, they shook sagacious beads. There were dangers — and no hurry. Some other time.

Li Ku Yu said: “Wise men think in the future, but fools live in it.” He was very bitter in those days; called the Japanese by his bitterest word—” pedants”; and prepared to return to Peking.

He had still one rendezvous at the Foreign Office to keep, when one evening there came to him at the Embassy a cypher-cable from London — from Oyone, his Irish-Japanese — which said: “England gone wild to-night. Wonderful discovery gold Australia.”

Li Ku Yu slapped his sleeve; and he cried: “Tra-lar! the tricky are even luckier than they are tricky.”

He did not keep his rendezvous at the Foreign Office the next day — was “ailing”; and he ailed eight days, - until the still-coming news of the new Eldorado had well saturated the Japanese head.

Gold in “back-of-beyond country” of North-Western Australia on No Man’s Land! And no grudging Palmer’s Diggings, apparently, or niggard Coolgardie, granting a wage to the digger’s sweat, but, by all accounts, a Golconda, grounds rugged with nuggets, crags of gold, a coast of gold, with glancing sands!

Already within eight days of the first bursting out of the tidings, the world’s eyes were turned that way, the world purchasing kit-bags for the journey....

And Japan was padlocked out: her nationals had to write fifty words of English dictation, nicely spelled, before landing; captains were fined a hundred pounds for allowing a yellow man to escape to land.

“The fate of men and nations who delay!” said Li Ku Yu: “God, Marquis, will pardon every sin, except the unpardonable sin — the waste of time. Cluck! let a man be bold to-day, and to-night all the stars will clap their hands at him, calling to him: ‘You are one of us!’ Really, I can’t think of a reason why this field of riches is not in Japanese territory to-day.”

The Chinaman now had the negotiation all his own way, as if he was dealing with dazed men: for the gold-find in Australia appears to have deeply digged at the greed of the little people of Nippon.

Among the high there were searchings of heart; to delight the low the Ju Ju newspaper used the withering word “cranes” against the governors of its country.

Li Ku Yu flew back to China, chin up, smiling at the horizon — with pledges in his portfolio.

CHAPTER V

THUNDERY WEATHER

TWO MONTHS LATER the rapprochement of Russia and Japan was a fait accompli; and at the same time a new 18,000,000 Chinese loan was on the counters of the Deutsche-Asiatische Bank.

At this thing England, as it were, started! The Banque de l'Indo-Chine had some under-part in the handling of the loan — but no British, no American, syndicate. And immediately a feeling of unease ran through our land.

It was as when wild-fowl in flight foreknow tempests from the puffy fuffs and the scent of thunder, and ten thousand outcries of fright are drowned within the row of rising winds.

Queer things seemed at work in the world, purposes, symptoms, like thieves' feet creaking in corridors at midnight, causing one to finger one's trigger. But as to their meaning, the scheme had been too subtly plotted for any mind to construct the pieces in the right sequence. The Prince of Wales wrote to the Queen from Queensferry: "Things seem singular to me, though I don't quite see what's what. Why should the Mikado wish to rush like this into Russia's arms?"

It was on the morning of the 11th of October that a Peking telegram of Reuter's Special Service asserted that Germany had been offered the lease of the Shantung Peninsula as guarantee, on similar terms as Kiao-Chow, Port Arthur, Wei-hai-Wei, and Mirs Bay.

“Never,” said Manchester and the City.

“But yes,” said Potsdam through the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung.

So it was true? In an apparently inspired article The Times declared that if China was going to be partitioned in this fashion, then the Yangtse Valley was due to England. Upon which Russia, France, clapped hand to dirk against Germany, against England, against vague Fate. The heads of men commenced to dizzy in the chaos and uncertainty of contradictory interests, the whirl of forces working of themselves. A Polar Ocean was breaking up: but as to how the masses might range themselves in the crash the Creator alone knew.

The world had as yet no Government. Each nation had: but the planet was an Anarchy, a rabble of nations without arrangement or police, where each might murder, cheat, or steal at its own sweet will.

For fifty years Germany had conceived the idea that she needed “colonies”: she did not need any “colonies”: but the fact that she passionately imagined that she did was an urgent fact which a world-Government would have looked to.

Everywhere in her frenzy for “colonies” she had been blocked. Did she look toward Brazil? — there was the Monroe Doctrine. Did she dream of cotton-fields waving over Asia Minor? — eight million Magyars, chattering an Asiatic language, ranged themselves against her peaceful penetration of the Near East.

When she aimed at the Germanisation of Trieste and Fiume as “outlets,” a handful of Croatian Slavs under Hungarian and Italian influence waxed angry. When she wished to win the goodwill of Galicia and the Austrian Poles by soft-soaping the Poles of Posen, Petersburg impeded the eastward eagle of Teutonic ideas and capital by going one better in benevolence to her own Poles.

Her “Drang Nach Osten” toward Constantinople, Syria, Mesopotamia was blocked by the Balkan States. Her vision of an Austro-German Empire washed by the North-Sea was a vision still — the “Balance of Power” blocked her.

What, then; was the good of that mass of army toeing the globe with challenging eye, chin up, of that weight of navy big with child, whose expense kept the spectre of bankruptcy ever at her elbow?

Whether her own fault or Fate’s, it could not last! She was poor for nothing! Her red-hot energies raged like men fighting in a fire in a nightmare, — and for nothing! she was bewitched, she was stung with the tarantula, she danced frantically, and no locomotion, she swelled monstrously, and not with porridge, but with dropsy.

It could not last — she was too ‘cute, and not wise enough, too strong, and not great enough.

In these very days of the Russo-Japanese rapprochement, of the loan, and of the question of Shantung, hot rancour was in her heart at the withdrawals of capital by Paris and London, large selling orders, and drop in securities. She was poor still!

But Shantung seemed luscious to her — a piece of luck to be seized; and the Kaiser made a dinner-speech. He was a neurotic character, who ranted, and had Anglophobia — and the Heir-Apparent still more! though our Queen had fixed upon his sister, the Princess Elizabeth, to be the wife of our “Teddy.” He was said to have some ability — was then a ship’s-commodore.

The German High Seas Fleet was thereupon recalled from Autumn Manoeuvres on the Norway coast; our First and Fourth Destroyer Flotillas were operating with specific orders about the Orkneys and North Sea; submarines were on the watch at Lamlash; the First and Second Battle and Cruiser Squadrons were mobilised about Queensferry and Cromarty. There was a rumour that they were being cleared for action. Twice in five days there were meetings of the Cabinet. Bread had gone up a penny a quartern.

The French First Line of Defence was mobilising in Toulon Harbour; three brigades of Zouaves from North Africa had landed at Marseilles.

In the midst of which world-turmoil, how perplexing the news, flashed by a New York Herald correspondent, that the new Kotohito Ministry had promised the Diet enormous economies in the Naval Estimates — a drop of two hundred and fifty million yen (25,000,000'sterling)!

The Chancellor's speech had dwelt upon the cordial relations of Japan with all nations, upon her poverty, upon the immorality of the monstrous armaments of modern man...!

Did Japan, then, no longer need a navy? Was the outlandish yellow ally of England failing her in the hour of need?

Wire on wire! like lightnings winking here, there, here, when the weather is weird, and peewits wheel and wail....

But on the afternoon of the 22nd the Under-Secretary, Sir B. S. Gilbert, stated in the Commons that the situation was still not beyond the skill of diplomats; for if Germany would but leave unfettered the land-taxes and Custom-dues of Shantung, which furnished part of the source of repayment of the last British loan, a modus vivendi might yet be discovered. And that night London went to bed with a quieter mind. Many gales had gathered, and had passed again.

But three terrible days of strain followed, in which Whitehall waited for a reply from Wilhelm-Strasse, and none arrived....

And on the fourth day an intense interest took hold upon Englishmen at the rumour of a most singular meeting — at Kônigsberg — between the Tsar, the Kaiser, their two Foreign Ministers, and Mons. Cambertin of the Quai d'Orsay.

When England gathered that France was there in the conference, she said: "And you, too...?"

The old "Entente Cordiale" was a phrase of the earlier years of the century; but its spirit, one hoped, lived. France stood for Light, England for Good-will: if they two fought, then the Kingdom of God was divided against itself.

And, if they fought — with Morocco now "a second France" — Gibraltar was useless, Suez blocked, Malta gone — especially if Spain was with the Continentals. For, with Tarifa fortified on one side of the Straits, and on the other Tangier, the heights of Gibel Musa, and the low-lying dunes by Ceuta bristling with batteries, then the Mediterranean Fleet was in prison.

How would France go, if it was war, in truth, at last? That was the question now. Would her larger light fail her, her world-instinct, and temptation prevail with her? Rumours, rumours, flew from agitated lip to agitated lip. The Daily Mail had information that Germany, in her urgency to attract the alliance of France, was lavishing the wildest offers — Alsace-Lorraine! a whole North-African Empire! The Telegraph gave it that the Persian Gulf, India, Manchuria, Mongolia were to go to Russia. It was reported that crowds were daily ranging about Berlin singing old Schneckenger's Wacht am Rhein; that in the bureaux of the British Ambassadors at Berlin, at Petersburg, were already declarations of war.

And if Russia was going, must not France, too, go with the powers of darkness? The Franco-Russian Alliance, indeed, had lapsed; but its habit and leaning persisted. In which case, England stood alone to sink or swim with America? who might have enough to handle west and south? For all saw that, if it was war at last, then it was war world-wide and final, to terminate in a new earth, and a new look of the skies.

CHAPTER VI

THE GIRL IN THE CROWD

ENGLAND, MEANWHILE, REMAINED careless of face, with faith in the old luck; and men did their business, saying little of the knell in their inwards. There were distrains for rent, a ballet at the Alhambra, and marriages, and preachings in streets.

But on the night of the 29th the nation gave way to a gush of emotion. It was a misty night, starless, with horses lying wrecked in the slime of streets — about ten-thirty; when suddenly through Bloomsbury, Tooting, newsboys ran clamouring in twos, startling the darkness as with news of doomsday.

They were selling a special ten-o'clock edition of Evening News, which had in it five wild lines of pica. It had come from Paris roundabout by Mackay-Bennett cable: and it stated that 860,000 tons of Super Dreadnoughts had been sold by Japan to Germany — were under weigh, with coal-ships, store-ships.

Whereupon it was a question of postage-stamps that night, for at once the men of London were flying with fire in their eyes to pen and paper, writing to the papers, writing to Whitehall. To Arms! To Arms! — no talk, no nonsense. “To Arms!” re-echoed every paper the next day; and white lips in Whitehall whispered “War!” For no one knew one atom which way God’s arm was dragging France: the Home Fleet might be hopelessly outweighed...!

Only one dissentient letter appeared — in The Times. The writer advised calm: he, for his part, did not believe that those Japanese ships would even reach European seas, since, by putting two and two together, he could now see that the whole scare was a piece of Chinese chicane.

But this attracted no attention: it was not divined that the writer was the Prince of Wales, who the previous day had hastened south to town, to speak with the Queen.

All that day the Government gave no sign, though panic was in the City, and traffic stopped within a mile of Westminster. It was known that the Brighton and South-Coast Railway were under Government Orders, that the War Office, Foreign Office and Admiralty were feverishly in intercommunication; but the people had to go borne unsatisfied at midnight: no Cabinet Minister had been present at Questions in the Commons.

That evening, however, something was said at a house in Grosvenor Place where the Queen was in a set of ten.

After dinner one of three men told a story of a mission-teacher in China, who was pointing with pride to the British reds on the map, when his crowd of boys with one voice drowned him in the shout: “You robbed them!” This anecdote had the effect of making Her Majesty’s eyes flash fire; and she cried:

“Robbed them from whom? No part of a planet in space can possibly be robbed, since the man or tribe that it is robbed from cannot possibly have any special right to it. But let’s call it robbery, since our own barbarous old laws call it robbery: then I say, may someone so rob from me, robbing my coppers, and dropping sovereigns into my pocket! Is it not cruel, ladies, how the mood of this country has been everywhere misunderstood? The oceans and shores were made roomy for roaming in, and her sons have gone out, looking the sun gallantly in the face — not all-unconscious of the stars,

I think — with harmless high hearts that meant well to men. Is someone somewhere the worse for it? Who is not the better? Every port on the globe would be thrown open, if England could throw it! and we have called to all, ‘these our conquests are yours, too: come, buy wine without money.’ What wind that blows is of a mood more boundless than this bounty? Is the ocean, our home, larger than our hearts? Aren’t we the fatherland of the outcast, and the ally of the cowering and downtrodden? Why, ladies, I think that somewhere in the universe there must surely be some Tribunal or Jury where such action is passionately approved, and officially stamped ‘In Tune.’ And are we to be plotted at, and potted at, and tinned off the earth? Oh, I am no Chauviniste or hiccuping Jingo: we here know that the French are more intelligent and mentally liberated than we, the Germans more organising and orderly: yes, but there are certain world-ideals of conscience, of generosity, of moral pride, which are special to us, and are very precious — we are the salt in the ham! and deserve to live. Our friends, the French, we reckoned mightily ‘polite’ and warm, because they bow low: they may be so; and we pretty rigid and chill: but what I assert I know, that there’s more murmuring mercy breaking and blessing bread in one good English breast than in any ten roods of Continental territory. We have that: yes, and we have another quality that’s of some value — luck! — favouritism with the Soul of Things — luck: a quality innate in personality, I think — a mental trait: we have it. And so, on the whole, I say, ladies, Bravo, John Bull! you’re a bit stodgy on your stumps, but you are something of a credit, and much of a blessing to your planet; and I say, ladies, let them all come, the whole concerted world, and this little mole of earth is of a temper and mettle that’ll hurl their hosts superbly off her in the name of the Eternal Purposer, as she spurns the surfs of the oceans that chum on her shores.”

Her Majesty spoke with so gallant and angry an arrogance glancing in her eyes, that some of the more high-strung shrank abashed and thrilled, for Her Majesty seemed queen enough to lift her arm and order the stars on their orbits, or bid storms submit. And at once among the men the word went: “Oh, well, war is certain, or she wouldn’t have spoken like that— ‘let them all come.’ ...”

Gossip of this incident got into all the clubs that night, and thence into the newspaper offices. The next morning — that last day of October — war was taken for granted: war of one slight David against a gang of Goliaths-of-Gath.

But there was no certainty, till an early eleven-o’clock fourth edition of The Star confirmed it.

This was bought up like hot cakes in the streaming streets: and it was with a thrilling solemnity that those three little lines of print fell upon men’s minds: “The Stock Exchange has suddenly closed. The Government is appointing private brokers to transact necessary business.”

This news could not reach the region of Westminster, which was already one mass of humanity; but a medical student, who had got a copy, gored his way like a bull to one of the lion-bases in Trafalgar Square, dragged himself up on it, and read out the momentous thing. Which done, he roared red-throated: “This means that you are in for it, you beggars, are you downhearted?”

“No!!” howled a thousand mouths at him.

“Are you still English?”

“Yes!”

“That’s all right,” he muttered, and jumped down.

“Absurd person,” murmured Richard Chinnery to his own Oyone, who stood pressed sandwichlike to his breast. She smiled up at him, and a wild kind of light lit her eyes an instant, and died out. But Chinnery did not like this. He had been pulled from his house in the Horseferry Road by Oyono to see the ado; but the fate of nations very little interested Chinnery; and now he stood there pressed and in prison: for like a passionate ocean lashing a shore London was dashing her multitudes, mass on mass, toward her middle; and those who occupied the windows saw hats that day, and caps.

This million of men, wetted all day by a steady little mizzling, would have been pitiable in its lack of knowledge; but whoever had telephone, tape-machine, or wireless turned themselves into newsagents; and squares of paper in many façades told the latest, or uttered some thought that was in all hearts.

For passion had banished for the moment the national habit of stoic mumness. “Alone Against Europe” stood some time at The Christian World,” and “No Ally But Our Own Arm,” at a picture-shop at Charing Cross.

And ever and anon regions of the throng would be seized with song: yonder, then yonder, the Rule Britannia would be droning, like the bumble-bee that becomes dumb here, but then hums out there, all a summer’s day.

“Look,” said Eulalia Bayley at about two o’clock, she being then jammed with a married sister not far from the Admiralty; and she pointed to a square of paper at the Cockspur Street corner, on which had just been written up:

“German, Austrian, Italian, and Russian Ambassadors have left Victoria.”

“Which means war with the lot of them,” said Eulalia’s sister, Alice.

A dew lay in Eulalia’s eyes, like dew in blue-bells, her bosom moved. She was silent; but then said: “But not the French.”

“No, that’s true,” muttered Alice: “I wonder!”

The bells of St Martin's-in-the-Fields broke out, slowly telling the notes of "Lead, kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom."

But now mounted police drove the crowd round the sisters into still closer pressure, clearing a way down Whitehall: for the crisis had taken the police by surprise; and Members had to pass somewhere, since it was nearly three — a Thursday.

Before long shouts were greeting them, as they moved one by one in cabs toward the House, with cries of "give it 'em hot!" as one or the other was recognised. But it was hours before any certain news came out of the House. As night fell, the Junior United Club's paper-square had it: "Invincible and Inflexible have left Lamlash westward: possibly to convoy Mauretania" — making Chinnery sigh with utter ennui: a night dark and thick with drizzle-spray, unlit in some places by street-lamps, which no lamplighter's effort could reach. There was a paper-square statement at Haxell's Hotel that "A Paris crowd round the Chamber of Deputies is now singing 'God Save the King,'" but in the darkness there hardly anyone saw it. By that time those who had brought no provisions had grown hungry and faint.

At seven Eulalia and her sister had been drifted in the currents and eddies of that sea all down Birdcage Walk: and it was thus that, for the first time, Eulalia came to see the Queen, who soon after seven appeared with the King and Prince on the East Balcony of the palace.

A comet's tail of luminosity, whose hazy glare shot a longish way into the foggy gloom, illumined the group: and the sisters got a good view. The Queen was smiling down, almost laughing, it seemed, at that ocean whose drone of cheering rolled more and more remotely away from her feet, and then in fresh waves rose once more, and droned, and rolled repeatedly: and her eyes that night shone bright as with some sublime joy, some wondrous triumph.

At her left hand stood the King dressed amiral, and on his left the Prince, looking sullen or shy, en lieutenant; and, vaguely suggested behind them, a group of the royal family — among them the German Princess Elizabeth (“Teddy’s intended”), who had been visiting the English Court, and been caught here in the storm.

Eulalia’s eyes were nailed to the Queen. And presently she breathed: “Isn’t she a wonderful woman!” And presently again: “One could die for her.”

Then, as her eyes shifted to the Prince, she threw them on high, with the sigh: “Ah, Heaven, how like!” — as she always sighed on seeing a photograph of the Prince.

She resolved to greet her “Edward Reeks” on the morrow morning with the words: “My Prince!” — for she had a rendezvous with him at Chinnery’s at ten A.M.

But her attention was drawn away from the balcony by an extraordinary yell of many thousands of mouths that now broke out — up Piccadilly way, it seemed — and came roaring and roaring toward her, accompanied by an agitation of hats shaking in the air, like agitated aspen-tops twinkling in a wind.

“What can it be?” murmured Alice on tiptoe, with stretched chin.

“Whatever it is, the Queen knows,” said Eulalia: “look! she is laughing!”

But the cause of this noise will be better seen before the National Liberal Club, whither Chinnery in his chest-wrappings and his Oyone, had now been drifted.

Chinnery by this time was in a rather pitiable way. He had brought in his pockets two quartern bottles, one containing water, one wine; and some moments before the tumult of that yell that Eulalia wondered at, he had given a flying wild glance round, and drunk the last of the water — that glance not being due to the presence of others, since he glanced like that fifty times a day whenever he drank, though quite alone.

At twenty-seven he was a dipsomaniac — not meaning a drunkard, for he drank water oftener than wine; but he must ever be drinking a gulp, and from a bottle; and before each gulp a thievish glance round!

And now both water and wine had failed him, and he was very weary and uninterested.

Usually he was the essence of patience and sweetness; everyone said of Chinnery: “he is such a gentleman!” — and “gentle” he was: for, though recognised by critics of intellect as being by far the greatest brain on the face of the globe, his goodness of heart made him such that he could be fooled by any woman, or led by any child.

But now he was in such a mess there, that he let a peevish word escape him. With a wrinkled forehead, he said: “This is a terrible thing! Am I to die here among these idle people?”

Oyone, as brisk and fresh as at noon, answered: “But it amuses!”

“In that case there is nothing to be said,” said Chinnery. “But, as for me, I doubt whether I shall get any sleep after this day. And at nine in the morning the Prince of Wales is coming to visit me....”

She made no answer — stood there suddenly blanched, half-fainting, pressing on his arm.

“I did not know that,” she remarked presently in a low tone.

“I had a letter this morning. He has seen something in a paper about the air-boat, guesses that it is due to me, and wants to see it, I suppose.”

During many moments now Oyone stood mute, meditating.

Two days before this, she had telegraphed to China part of that letter of the Prince in The Times, which tried to expose the Chinese political plot; and Li Ku Yu had recognised in the letter the “Brockweir style”; had said: “The Prince”; had taken fright; and had wired to Oyone a certain most sinister code-word.

Hence her faintness when she heard that the Prince was coming, of his own accord, into her power the next morning.

After ten minutes she said: “I find that I must go.”

“But, dear, how?” asked Chinnery.

“Somehow. You come behind me.”

“Oyone, it would kill me!”

“Stay, then. See you to-morrow afternoon.”

She turned, begged her way, attacked, battled, begged her way, gained a yard, hot, envenomed, her hand against every man, yard after yard, ragged, streaming, unwearied — resistless.

When she had gained Tottenham Court Road, she could run here and there; and she ran till she was in her own room in the Regent’s Park house.

There she put match to a lantern, in whose opal glamour she looked a lovely hag in her bedraggled dress and redhotness; and she got from a cabinet a kokotana dagger, a god, and incense-sticks, her object being to fumigate the dagger through the night, and thus curry favour with gods in whom she did not believe.

And she lay writhing, wringing her hands, moaning for awe and dismay of what lay before her, pitiably in travail with a thousand terrors: for she was the greatest coward! — and yet one of the bravest of beings, desperately brave at the decisive instant in spite of clammy hands and dying heart. And even as she lay there heaving up white eyes of appeal, grovelling, groaning, she was planning the deed she had to do. Then, like a witch, she set to making spells and incantations over the' weapon.

Meantime, Chinnery, left by himself, had been pricked into interest in his country, when that yell that amazed Eulalia Bayley farther west broke out here also, as it broke out here and there all over Central London. The National Liberal Club put up on its illuminated paper-square the words: "France! Hurrah! our Ally!"

Up Parliament Street another facade had: "France our Ally! Hurrah!"

Even as men cheered, they looked about them for hands to wring. Before the National Gallery steps a little Swiss barber (mistaken for French!) was snatched to men's shoulders and passionately exhibited amid cheering which reached to the night's dim sky. Men sang and danced. In clubs men, lifting their glasses to clink, looked into one another's eyes, and muttered "France"; in public-houses; in hotels; or they grasped one another's hands, and with eyes not dry, said: "France." The Light had not failed....

CHAPTER VII

THE “MAURETANIA”

THE MORNING AFTER dawned bleak, with an easterly sea running wet, and convulsive wind.

When the night began to lift a little at five bells in the morning watch, the Mauretania was in longitude $10^{\circ} 37'$, and, in the centre a hall all vault and water, was vaulting her eastward way like a foxhound in the teeth of the swell — making haste! as when the cockchafer is conscious of the hawk not far.

She was deeply laden — with wheat; for twelve days previously, when skies had darkened, she had been taken by Government from bearing globe-trotters, and despatched to Canada for food-stuffs — she, like her Lusitania sister, having been built by Government subvention to Government specification; and at the same time the Inflexible group of cruisers, too, had been laid down, with the same contract speed — 25 knots: the idea being that, in war, the two globe-trotters, with their cargocarrying dead-weight of 80,000 tons, convoyed by the cruisers, might maintain between them a food-supply of some 20,000 tons a week.

Hence she ran there pressed, pregnant, a rat in a tract of cats, three of her four black-and-red funnels puffing breath, her crowd of cowls showing steam, spray reaching to that four-storied street of top-hamper that ran and sprang, three lines of lights still twinkling along her length, like watchlights within some mansion of romance, which show strange and garish in the glare of day. And the winds of that daybreak sang weird snatches of sea-songs within her funnels' throats, like banshee-dirges and birds of boding, moaning omens.

For the sea is deep, and the 70,000 haughty horses that hauled her had still far to snort and haul.

But at six minutes to seven by the ship's chronometers she understood that she was not alone, and felt safer.

Her captain, raw-eyed for lack of sleep, was drinking black coffee among the trees of the verandah-café, when a message from the wireless-room came in — bidding him report his whereabouts and course to the Inflexible; and ten minutes later came another: "Prick your course three points to port."

The captain sprang up with a light in his eyes. "Which means hawks about," he said to his first officer: "the British must have a destroyer or something out scouting."

"And hawks about," answered the other, "means hawks sent out beforehand — the treacherous wretches: for war doesn't seem to have been declared till yesterday."

They spoke, as it were, secretly, hoarsely, like conspirators.

"Prick her off," said Captain Arthur, "and try her with another half-knot: let her rip."

And she went ripping, until the crow's-nest was suddenly telephoning, an agitated watchkeeper was pointing toward the clouds, and a surgeon who had been idly eyeing the winds winnowing within his beard at the lounge-door, glanced at the sky, and pitched with tidings toward the bridge, employing his pipe as a pointer.

Up there in the air was a monoplane flying north-west, the size of a swallow; and within two minutes her engine's singing was with them.

“They’ve got me,” muttered the captain glass-gazing: “it’s a fight.”

“Or she may be British,” suggested the surgeon.

“British to the north,” the captain said, “she from the south. Be ready for some red to-day.”

No voice there quivered; only, the eyes of the little knot of men spat sparks of fire.

The monoplane was now nearly overhead, fifteen hundred feet up; but before reaching the ship she swiftly wheeled on the winds, and was winging south once more.

At the same time the surgeon exclaimed: “Look! another!” — pointing out northward a speck greyer than the grey air; and the captain, having fixed the glass on it, said, “Yes, a biplane — British — out scouting.”

But as he spoke the speck vanished.

For she had sighted the German and turned tail, as the German had sighted her and turned tail.

But this movement of mutual horror was only momentary: for the biplane had to stop the reconnaissance of the Mauretania’s whereabouts from being carried to the Germans; and the monoplane had to stop the fact of that reconnaissance from being carried to the British; so both wheeled to meet, climbing for life, the monoplane flying right overhead, so that the Mauretania group could clearly hear the roar of her flurry droning, and see the little hydro-boots under her chassis by which she had been launched down bow-rails from her parent-ship.

Ten seconds later the biplane, too, flew anew into sight, and anew vanished skywards; and then the monoplane vanished skywards, trying to outclimb her climbing adversary, while the men of the Mauretania pored sternward upward at nothing, their nerves in a hell of expectation of that murder in heaven, they murmuring words which were unheard, but which served the purpose of concealing their wish to shriek.

And before any more was seen of the planes, the added distraction of “Ship Ahoy!” was upon them; and before they could look to see the sighted ship, once more the planes were upon them — not behind, but before now — hardly a league off, it seemed, on the starboard beam: for thither they had now dashed their anguished wings, ranging the air in a rage of flights, like fighting angels that fill space with wings: and though nothing could be observed of them, a sound within the clouds was distinctly heard — the pop of a pod bursting, a bomb; then the patter of a packet of pins spilling somewhere; then six ticks, and now the clouds parted with a crowd of particles — débris and instruments dribbling — and racing after to catch them two men raining, two men in caps and padded wrappings, who passionately span in partnership or competition, as at the starting-call of One, Two — Away! and slightly behind the men a biplane diving, divided into two bits.

It seemed an age ere those men reached the sea, so that a shriek rent the outraged breast — an age of over thirty-seven seconds. Ahead of the Mauretania when they set out earthward, they were somewhat astern when, neck-and-neck, like tumblers racing, they span with a passion which had waxed to the rapture of catherine-wheels into the splash that they trashed up in vanishing.

Almost at the same moment the monoplane was again heard buzzing, a blood-guilty thing, southward to regain her parent-ship.

That parent-ship already lay a little oblong of black, blocking the continuity of the southern horizon; and four cables behind her stood another oblong of black, stuck in the sea, heading north-eastward.

The Mauretania men were like rats in a trap. In vain the glasses investigated the north for any sign of the English, though far south-westward there stood a third oblong of black — no one knew of what flag.

“God, I’ll run for it,” Captain Arthur muttered to himself; and an officer was flying from him with the order to bolt northward, when he got the wireless: “Do not try flight, if sighted: the enemy are the Von der Tann and Schamhorst” — on which the captain threw up his hands, for the Von der Tann had three knots more than the Mauretania — was at one time the fleetest capital-ship on the sea.

And she grew rapidly big, swaggering like a bully, rolling through four degrees, her starboard beam beaten by swell which she wedged like flesh in her heavy haste, anon giving a view of all her eight deck-guns, like eight notes-of-exclamation, waiting to exclaim, and dot themselves.

And she came in her colours — just saluted — with extra colours on stays and masts, which the keen east wind was spitting on and whipping into kettle-drums — kettle-drums which accompanied strains of band-music floating from her over the ocean.

At her common-code signal to slacken speed to forty-two revolutions, a redness of angry arrogance sprang to the Mauretania captain’s face... “Foreigners on the sea giving orders...”

But there was no way out. Still no English on the sea — though that third warship from the south-west had now grown so much bigger astern, that the glasses made her out to be Yankee; and the first officer made the remark: “Looks to me like the Arkansas.”

At the-same time the Mauretania’s speed died away to 6 knots; the two Germans, too, slowed down — one two miles south, the other hardly a thousand yards off; and now clouds of steam were wheeling about the sea with the winds; a smell of heat reeked from the embed turbines; and at the engines' venom of hissing the ships shivered.

So for some time they forged ahead, while the Von der Tann signalled to the Scharnhorst; the Scharnhorst sent out a pinnace full of men to the Von der Tann; and the Von der Tann, making preparations to send a prize-crew to the Mauretania, lowered a launch.

On the Mauretania, meantime, there was so much agitation and preoccupation with the enemy, that little heed had been paid to the ship in the rear; till now a sound screaming out of a stream of steam reached the ear — a sound of band-music— “Yankee Doodle Doo” on the breeze.

And all at once the Arkansas, a rear-admiral's flag at her foremast, was at the Mauretania's quarter, fifty yards off her, between her and the Von der Tann, keeping the same speed.

Her flag-captain, a lank Yankee, could be seen with three staff-officers in frock-coats perambulating his bridge with a brisk and devil-may-care fling; then was seen looking down at a school blackboard which some marines held up for him to see; then a laying of heads together; and then the blackboard was being held up apart for the Mauretania's glasses to read what was chalked large on it: “Do A BOLT.”

And now was Captain Arthur a distracted man, he being under British orders not to fly, and no time to wireless — Germans just coming. After ten different impulses, he flew on an eleventh impulse to his communications to order Full Ahead.

And as she spurted to the spur, the Arkansas, too, all her boilers lighted up, her engines running full even while her screws had run slow under a transformer, ordered Full Ahead.

The two were off together about N.E. by E, the battleship getting left a little, with her only 20 knots, but bowbutting like a bounding bull, ramming her monstrous mass at the rollers, crushing the ocean to a rush of rubbish-stuff round her — streaming creams — like crushers crushing rubble.

The two Germans, meanwhile, kept their crawl, lost in astonishment at this sudden outcome, at their wits' end: for to try to stop the Mauretania with a twelve-pounder or so meant a risk of striking the Arkansas — an Arkansas obviously battle-ready, her control and gun-houses manned, torpedo-nets handy — the German combined weight being only three thousand tons greater than her monstrous twenty-six.

As to what the Arkansas was doing there, all alone, and with what motive — this was a disturbing question for the Germans.

So it was only when the Arkansas was quite a mile away that the Von der Tann at last signalled her; and something like the following conversation took place between the Chief-signalmen of the two ships:

The Von der Tann: We are not combatants?

The Arkansas: Surely not.

The Von der Tann: Then, get out of the way!

The Arkansas: All right. But what's your hurry?

The Von der Tann: I am about to fire!

The Arkansas: Try not to strike me.

A wild silence of five minutes followed this thing — the Germans not giving chase, since they did not wish to separate, and since the Scharnhorst had not speed to steam with the Mauretania. So the Scharnhorst, at a distance of three miles, beautifully aimed a 3.4-inch shell from her superstructure at the Mauretania's screws: and the boom of a voice moved over the waters.

By a tragic chance the shell dropped upon the centre of the Arkansas fore-turret, broke, blew away her aeroplane rails, dented the trellis-work of her foremast, and lay dead the sons of four American mothers.

Whereupon hell and frenzy broke up through the ocean that morning, and Germany and America were at war: for it is not good to play with volcanoes; but the war-fever and let's-all-be-jolly was all on the breeze and in the brain like a brandy and a wedding-breakfast, and they wanted yankee-doodle, and they got it, and they hankered after thunder, and were thunder-struck. In that second the Arkansas left the Mauretania to take care of herself, knocked forty revolutions off her screws, and the Mauretania trembled to her bottom, and her men were boxed doddering and staring by the back-blast and brawl of the broadside that the Arkansas vomited upon the Von der Tann.

War, then: and let the best-padded ear see afterwards what the ear-specialist can do.

They were at pretty close quarters to begin a fight! — not three miles, though the mist that the wind had in it made that far enough for effective smashing.

Anyway, the Von der Tann instantly answered with five of her 5'9-inch, and five of her eight 11-inch — one of these eight having been struck on the chase. Some moments more, and the Scharnhorst was in it; and the three British who just then climbed above the north-east horizon, and were struck in the ear by blustering airwaves, questioned Heaven as to who was fighting whom.

However, a Mauretania dope soon told them; and, concluding that the Arkansas had left her battle-squadron with the objective of seeing the Mauretania through, agile Jack dashed off his jacket, and was in it.

They were the Inflexible, the Invincible, and a destroyer, the Swift — say 86,000 tons: and, after steaming south three minutes so as to dear the — Arkansas' bows, the Inflexible got six twelve-inchers trained upon the Scharnhorst, and from the horizon's edge parted with 5100 lb. of blasting bad language in idiomatic Saxon.

At the same time the Invincible engaged the Von der Tann, who, having her broadside to the American, was raked fore-and-aft by the British shells; and though not one quarter from that distance touched her, her control platform with all its contents of gunnery-officer, switchboard and crew flew like rooks, its mast collapsed, and her two forward primary-guns torqued like candles at a fire.

However, most German ships (very wisely) had a second control amidships between decks, where a series of tubes with total-reflection prisms formed images on reflectors — like the periscopes of submarines — enabling the ship's fighter to see round the sea. And the Von der Tann's answer to the Invincible was in broken English — broken English armour above-belt, where two shells of her starboard échelon struck — long-capped shells of low trajectory that flew straight like a cuff, their fuses arranged to explode after penetration; and these, piercing three armour-inches and some eight feet of coal in the upper portion of her bunkers, bounded exultantly into the redoubt, where, in the space between the main and protective decks, the pair of them danced the serpentine-dance in purple amid a clatter like dapping and applause of diabolic horse-laughter bawling, down among turbines and furnaces.

The fore-bulkhead of the Scharnhorst, meantime, was full of sea-water, she listed to starboard, and the Mauretania, who had made paces like a scared hen to tuck her head below the horizon, was standing motionless, steadily trembling like a mare among cobras, her rudder and two starboard screws broken off her.

And every second the combat was closing up: for the hand that touched the range-finder shook, gun-layers stood astonished and stung with vapours, so that big guns that should have been firing two rounds a minute were firing only one in three, and hits were leagues below all target-practice averages.

To this result the mistiness and the ships' rolling contributed; and, in the case of the Arkansas, a swaying of her trellis-masts in her rocking deranged the rangefinding, while, in the case of the Germans, the large number of their anti-mosquito guns, which they were using as primary-armament guns, thickened the air with heated vapours, which refracted the sunlight, with the effect of bewildering the sightings.

So they closed: for the horseflesh-eaters, having mettle from their diet, would not strike their colours; and flight from the first had been impossible for them owing to the Scharnhorst's want of speed: so they closed and closed: six thunderclouds of smoke: the Invincible a creeping cloud; the Swift a sweeping; the Germans to perish dearly; the rest to have it finished quickly and sit and think of it.

And they were all in this position:

.Mau

.Ark

.Invin

.Swi

.Von

.Sch

.Inflex

the Arkansas hardly any longer a mile from the Scharnhorst, her bow now to the west, when all that war paused in awe at a thing that happened: for the great battleship was in the very act of overwhelming the wreck of the Scharnhorst with the sharp wrath of all a broadside, — jabbering quick-firers winking, and the bale of her bellowing barbettes — when a Scharnhorst 8.2-inch entered her well under the water-line for'ard, and apparently burst in a magazine.

Whereupon a flame seems to have run through and through her; and she set to stuttering such tons of thundering, like Etna rhetoric, as no tongue can tell: took the ocean and shook it, as dreader and still dreader she roared and roared in that redness of her death-throes, while what was left of her 800 men were seen through a volcano of reek leaping from her in every direction like sprats spattering from a trap-net; then, like an old lion which, after roaring, gruffly guns from his guts a humph of venom, and again a humph, and a humph, and is done, and grunts, his eruption hushed, his say said; or like a pump which, after pouring, chucks a gush, and a gush, and a gush, and is done, and grunts, its eruption hushed; so the Arkansas, after thundering, thumped a humph, and a humph, and a humph from her drum to the sun, and was done, her death-anthem chanted, her death-passion passioned, and was a skeleton before her burial, leaving over the sea a mausoleum of smoke.

She had within her 290 tons of big-gun projectiles alone: so far over the ocean her tragedy darkened the day with the shadows of night, and many men on the Scharnhorst were laid low under the sharp shower of the lavas which she spouted.

Some moments more and a roller rolled foaming over the mastless hull of the Scharnhorst; and she rose no more.

At the same moment the Von Tann, sinking fast, started sharply north-eastward to put a sure hole in the Mauretania while she could — heedless of the Swift, which was now tearing near to sting and fly, pouring as she tore a rain of twenty-eight 4-inch shells a minute — heedless of the Inflexible, which also was speeding near to launch a torpedo — for little heed was left in any head on that sea, each ship now a shrieking lazaretto: and, as the Von der Tann, now within two thousand yards, sent out a needle at the stationary Mauretania, the Swift was ready to send needles from her two tubes, and the Inflexible to send.

But just then tragedy overwhelmed the Swift: for a shell from the Invincible, still creeping well to eastward — a 12-inch shell shot out of rent rifling — fell far short of the Von der Tann into the engine-room of the Swift, which stopped.

Upon which that low length of the Inflexible, with its tripod-masts amidships, and topmasts like bayonets, went ranging on ahead of the Swift, not far from her; and when the Swift's torpedo-crews had recovered their feet, and two 18-inch needles flew out of her under water at fifty miles an hour, the one to port appears to have been led astray into the Inflexible's wake.

This hulled her; crumpled her screws; ruined her rudder; and she, rudderless, steered askew by her port wing-screw, went her own way, rushing perniciously for the Von der Tann, which with shattered steering-gear was rushing her way, both bellowing at those terribly close quarters with all their cannon still battle-worthy, billows already breaking over the Inflexible's poop, over the Von der Tann's beam.

And as they got near, entangled in some magnet-plight, as the bicycle of the beginner heads straight for the lamp-post, and can't be drawn off, they were shut from each other by a column of water, which gushed with a dogged gong-sound two hundred feet aloft from under the Von der Tann — a torpedo from the Swift.

When this dropped backbroad-showering, with it dropped showering a rain of wreckage upon the Inflexible's deck.

And before it was over, every soul on both vessels dropped flat, as the cracking ram of the Inflexible went with a racket like Distraction itself through the Von der Tann's six inches of armour; nor did it stop; but walked on and on into the other ship, splitting the tympanum with shrillness in a sombre dusk.

This probably preserved the German above water a minute longer; and within that minute, while they so stood two-in-one, a Whitehead burst beneath both beams — a Whitehead fired by the Inflexible, which had missed, but had been whirled into the German's wake.

Whereupon the twain started a little apart; a pillar of smoke that mixed with the clouds rose round them, and remained steady in the air like a temple, mucking their dusk into midnight: in which gloom, under which tomb, the two settled down together, unseen, and still.

Some of their men escaped by leaping: for immediately upon the Arkansas tragedy the fleet of the Mauretania's boats had gone out, save two whose bottoms had dropped out in sympathy with the tragedy; and now, too, those of the Invincible's boats that could still float were out, picking up swimmers.

And all were quickly filled, some trailing from their wales men whose heads the waves swept over.

But the wind had lulled; the sun was now bright, the battle having lasted forty minutes; the air hazy with gun-vapours; and yonder, still lingering, the mound of smoke that the Arkansas had left, and crumbling yonder the pillar of cloud within which the Inflexible and Von der Tann had foundered.

The Swift, though abandoned, was still visible, standing there bowed, steep in the bows, like the camel that kneels and waits; and still visible was the Mauretania, waiting large and tragic, listed to starboard, showing all her deck-shape like a leaf, the sea like troops of multitudinous wolves trooping upon her to have her.

She lingered there a long time: until with a sudden flurry, as of resolve to make the plunge and try the new state under-sea, she skipped ahead and left the sea, sucking after her Captain Arthur and some forty of her men.

The loaded boats, meantime, made as best they could in the swell for the Invincible, a stare of scare and amazement on those sailors' faces, as of men who have passed through what the heart can't fancy, those within the boats gripping at the gunwales or seats, for the sea seemed to reel fiercely round their ears.

In one boat sat Captain Stickney of the Arkansas and the captain of the Scharnhorst side by side, the latter — a large German whose name was Bergmann — having a gash across his freckled red neck.

This was visible, for his upper clothes had apparently been singed off him, save his vest, which his buxom breasts bulged; and he kept stanching the gash with a canvas rag, already wet through with red, for the scratch ran like a tap.

The two captains uttered no word to each other for a long time; but presently the American, producing a handkerchief sideways with his face averted, murmured: "Handkerchief?"

Up sprang Bergmann half-way in a surprise of politeness, and after searching a second for expression, blurted in his big and vigorous voice:

"Beautiful thank, my sir!"

"That's it," muttered the Yankee, gazing pensively over the sea.

Soon afterwards the boats were at the Invincible. But she was very sick and feeble; and it was not until three nights later that tidings of the fight arrived in Britain.

It arrived the same night in Peking, where Li Ku Yu, hearing that result, clucked his tongue, with “As I thought! Man has learned to destroy better than to build.”

CHAPTER VIII

THE TREASURE

AT THAT MORNING hour of the sea-fight the half-caste Oyone and her dagger were already at Chinnery's in the Horseferry Road — a common old house, whose door was as often open as shut, but was shut now; so the girl lurked about till "Monty" came — an old soul rather shaky in her gait and being, who "did" for Chinnery (Chinnery for some reason called her his "laundress," though few were the things that Monty washed). And when Monty went in, leaving the door "on the jar," Oyone slipped into the closet under the stairs.

The dash from closet-door to front-door would hardly occupy a second; and she had an alibi and everything planned in case of mishap.

But let us not watch her horrors while she waits there in darkness with wet hands, groaning again and again, "I can't do it! gods, I can't!" her will still fixed like nickel — needless agitations, for a cypher was even then on the wires for her from Li Ku Yu, countermanding that sinister cypher of his respecting the Prince before the declaration of war — but let us watch instead a young man away up in the Whitechapel Road in the dress of a private of Marines, a cloak hanging over one arm, he walking briskly to and fro a little, his palm anon on his brow, feeling seedy and fretful, having spent the night in a vile den on a fourpenny bed — in a doss-house in Dorset Street near.

And presently he stepped into a “Cocoa Rooms,” up into a “First Class Room,” paid threepence at a counter, and carried his fare to a table nailed to the floor — no one up there but him.

But when he tasted the coffee it did not please him — it was not really coffee; the bread-and-butter — it was not really butter. And the cup displeased him deeply, the saucer, the saw-dust — everything there.

And he tapped with his nail, saying: “It’s bad, it’s wrong, it’s beneath the dignity of modern man: so, if foreigners surpass and smash us, here will be the reason — feudalism in the twentieth century — the monstrous tommy-rot! And if I haven’t gun-fire and gumption enough in me to worry it to rags, then, I’ll go with my girl to Samoa, and smoke under a cocoa-nut tree.”

Now he rose, picked up a little poker, and, smiling with his lips, but not with his eyes, he smashed his cup and saucer, muttering, “not good enough,” he brought down the shop-mirror in a shower of sherds, murmuring, “not good enough,” he spurted past an agitated man in an apron who ran up staring, and he hurled the urns of tea, coffee, cocoa, one after the other, into a flood over the floor, muttering “not good enough,” and now the poker was scattering crackling crockery from shelves, until wreckage was the condition of that first-class room.

By this time the attendant had afresh rushed below, keenly seeking a policeman; but now the young man was with him at the door, muttering: “Don’t make a fuss — only letting off steam a little. What’s the damage? Twenty pounds? With five for yourself” — and, tossing some banknotes, he was gone with a brisk and busy sailor-gait that waggled his jack-trousers round his legs, leaving behind him a thing that said: “Well, I’m — !”

But the more he advanced westward, the more he found his way impeded with people, and in Leadenhall Street had to stop and wait long: for a crowd had surrounded all that Bank-region to hear the Sergeant-at-Arms, attended by a throng of City dignitaries, read out the Declarations of War from the steps of the Stock Exchange.

When at last he could move to procure a cab, the cab had to creep, and near Charing-Cross was blocked by a rattle of limbers and the showering hoofs of a 15th Hussars battalion bound for Dover: for already England was pouring into France, troops debarking at up and down platforms alike, and at sidings. So, at the stoppage, the young man, who had given an address in the Horseferry Road, called to his cabman: “Do get me out of this! Drive round to Buckingham Palace” — and now he threw round him a roomy cloak which covered his costume.

At the palace-gate he asked a sentry if the Queen had come in, was told no, and went on to stroll about the grounds, praising God for the air of heaven after his night of pain.

But, as he went, he caught a glimpse of the Princess Elizabeth with three ladies near the Lake; and it may almost be said that he hid — stood behind laurel, and cut an eye at space: for the Queen was in love with the Princess for him, and the Princess in love with him for herself.

Soon, however, a sound of cheering reached him from without, and the Queen, who had set the fashion of early Park-drives, dashed into the courtyard, the damask of her colour still comely as a damsel’s, she habited in royal simplicity, but for the boisterous sea of her immoderate hat.

The royal horses drew up, as the cloaked figure came bare-headed to speak at the carriage, from which the Princess Alexandra and a Maid of Honour got out after some talk; and the Queen then said: “Again?” nodding toward the costume which she knew that the military cloak covered.

“Yes, Mother,” he answered.

“Why is it necessary? I don’t see.”

“I have imposed it upon myself, Mother: once a month, if ashore, I sleep there, if it kills me.”

Is it very bad?”

“You wouldn’t believe — headache, sickness. The men — sigh. And these people feed me, cushion me, love me in a way — for nothing: I’ll taste their cup just once in a month to show good-will.”

“Do it, do it, I don’t want to stop you.”

“I see that I should, till it’s ended. A good race, mother: but, oh, we do need a dictator for one week.”

“Yes, but that word is too often on your lips of late, Teddy! Drop it, mind you. Your place is to influence men, not yourself to take upon you the cure of your country.”

“I hear you, Mother. But what news? I couldn’t sleep till five, then overslept, and couldn’t get one paper to buy.”

“Well — do you know that the House three times read last night a Bill granting eighty millions for the war? and reducing Government Stock interest by one and a quarter?”

“Yes, I knew that. But about the Mauretania? She reported?”

“I — don’t think so,” the Queen answered; “I haven’t seen or heard anything.”

“I have had her on the brain all night! Suppose the Germans have snapped her up? That would be rather sharp practice — so soon — don’t you think? And shouldn’t I revenge myself for it, if I can manage something.”

“Manage what?” — the Queen leaned keenly toward him; for what she called “manfulness” in the Prince of Wales was now her liquor and secret meat: and her doubt whether all men saw in him the Drake which she saw, her care that they should, had become rather common and morbid. He and hats were her vanities.

The possibility that some day he might turn out to be “manful” beyond her liking, “manful” enough to scare her to death, had not yet occurred to her.

He put his foot on the step to tell her: “You saw the paragraph on Tuesday about a strange object having been seen in the air — standing still, mind — a most momentous thing in history, Mother, if it is true. Well, I assume that it is Chinnery’s doing, and, if so, I have a thought of going to Spandau in it, blowing up the Tower, and grabbing what the Tower contains. What do you think? — if I find it practicable.”

The Queen shrank sharply, but said nothing; considered it with lowered lids; flushed a little; paled a little; and suddenly bringing her eyes close to his, let her lips breathe: “You might try it on.”

The Prince laughed, saying: “Mother, I think you’re the most audacious She that ever buckled on stays.”

“And you?” she said, smiling at him with her forehead raised; but then, touched with sudden gravity: “You are aware that ladies buckle on such armour.”

“Scott, Mother,” said the Prince with lowered lids: “aren’t I a sailor? and ships feminine? and often in stays?”

“Not very brilliant,” the Queen’s lips just muttered: “ships are in stays when coming round, but ladies when standing off” — adding aloud: “But have you spoken with the Princess Elizabeth? There she is over yonder, thinking of you, I declare! Let the footman run and request Her Imperial Highness to join us a minute.”

“Mother,” said the Prince ruefully— “if you could forgive me: I have to go to Chinnery’s, and am late.”

“Oh, you are going now to Mr Chinnery’s? You didn’t say. My goodness, how I should love to be there!” — with the levity of a schoolgirl hankering after a spree—” to hear you two chit-chatting about chucks, and jockeys, and washers, and rockers, and ‘H’ and ‘B’ — the holiest, highest, Divinest babble yet babbled on this planet — Divine because true, Divinest because truest. I love that young man! — don’t tell your exalted father.”

“Then — come, Mother.”

The Queen reflected. “I’m afraid it can’t be contrived — though it might! — No, I think not” — and when the Prince had left her side, she half-rose to say that she might after all, but sat again.

He, not seeing a cab beyond the gates, started to walk fast, heated himself, and threw off the cloak, having little fear that the streets would see the Prince of Wales in a marine.

Meantime, in the closet at Chinnery’s Oyone waited — the Prince over an hour late; and her growing doubt whether he would come, and the long tension of her nervous system, had proved very enervating, for each carriage-wheel drew from her the hiss “this is he!” and at the last she was on the floor, prostrated, vaguely wretched.

But suddenly a brisk step — the door pushed open — and she was up afresh, tense and ready.

However, she was so sure of a carnage, and his appearance on entering was so different from the image of him in her expectation, that her sub-conscious conclusion was that this was a sailor sent to make an excuse. She had never seen the Prince, and it was only when a voice pelting up the stairs called “Richard!” that the thought stabbed her heart: “that — was — he!” whereupon she collapsed again, weeping at her defeat and her relief, and when her weeping ceased, the catches of her breath still reached the rats’ ears in there, going on like gutter-sobs gushing on nights of rain long after the rain has dried its tears.

Her chance for that day was gone, since Chinnery would be sure to accompany the Prince down, so she stole upstairs, washed her face with the right decoctions, and went to listen at the workroom keyhole.

Chinnery by this time had told the Prince that the Mauretania had been waylaid, for he had instruments of great delicacy, and Oyone could hear the Prince stepping restively about, talking hotly, saying: “Germany, eh? — touch the old coffee-pot with the oxy-hydrogen, Richard — to see Germany grow and grow like this, and sit still! Thirty years ago — ten — why didn’t we blast every German battleship out of the sea, as we could, and then say ‘Shake hands, but no more German ships eternally’? Or if we must let Germany, why didn’t we say to Germany: ‘Here’s India — Australia — call them German, if they’ll let you, you leaving them as open to us as we to you, and let’s abolish navies and educate mankind.’ Would England have been a penny the worse, Germany the better? They think so: but, then, the heads of tire mass of men are infested with such a fog of feckless, fantastical fixed-ideas got from their grandmothers, that when they think that they are thinking, they are only remembering — remembering what some dead Swazi thought that he thought. Whenever they do think straight, it is only due to their mother-wit, not to any training in mentation that they are given! Nor have their governors any! By whom is the world still handled? Not by young scientists trained in facts, but by old lawyers trained in opinions — quoting ignoramuses — pundits — scott, what can you expect? The Queen tells me, Richard, that within two years Sky-Blue has cut off 370 pundits’ heads — crass rascal: but! can quite understand why he is doing it. Pundits! Fantastic catchwords!— ‘colonies,’

‘Empire,’ — as though such a thing as a modern Empire was the least bit possible outside China; ‘slow evolution’ — as if ‘slowness’ improved evolution; ‘hasty legislation’ — as if every scientific experiment ought not to be as ‘hasty’ as life is short. Fantastic fads! The contribution of the colonies to us is £667,000 — just think: they cost tens of millions; this war will cost hundreds of millions, because some English and German lawyers have heard someone say ‘colonies,’

‘Empire’ — little rages and delusions of Crusaders! Considering that £87,000,000 of British capital has been invested in Argentina within five years, could Argentina be more profitable to Britain if a British colony? What is wanted is not colonies! but the recognition that the whole globe, and each inch of it, is the private property of each man, as in Law the whole of a business, or ship, and each inch of it, is the private property of each partner. But think of France shutting in Madagascar against’ trade without paying one penny of rent to the rest of men, and all the nations not instantly declaring war against France! Well, the French are our good friends. I don’t want — but — scott — was it the arm of some mannikin at the Quai d’Orsay that dragged up Madagascar out of the main, and granted her mangoes, and gross groves, and grace of face? Oh, my earth, my mother, my own, my poem, my Altar, my heirloom — I am not a Martian, but of her dark marl — and is not this thing an intolerable wrong to me that some impossibly crude little duke, or some ‘cute fool at the Quai d’Orsay should say to me ‘this bit of her is somehow more mine than yours,’ and rob me of her roundness? Forgive - me, Richard, I can’t always talk calmly of the insolence of these little slaves, my blood boils—”

“And now the coffee, too, Ted,” Oyono heard Chinnery say, “and now for Monty and the kidneys!”

A button was pressed: and the Prince was next heard to say: “Not that the Germans are so lawyer-ridden — I see that in 1897 the French navy was thrice stronger than the German; in 1909 the German was 40,000 tons the stronger; and in those twelve years had spent £86,000,000 less on her navy than France — just think. France? — no go at sea. What’s the French for ‘Stand by!’

‘ — !’

— with a nasal singing of the ‘aim.’ That’s no good. ‘Fred, dear, please try’ — attonsiaun! — scott. On land, yes; but England on the sea. Not that I believe one bit in English, or any, sea-power as represented in Dreadnoughts — as you know. ‘Dreadnoughts’ is one of the fixed ideas! — nothing weaker — not a clock. I calculate, Richard, that one German capital-ship is a match for any four English, and one English for any four-and-a-half-German — meaning that they’ll all sink: and where’s your sea-power then? We shall soon see.”

“And your Asahel will be put ‘to the test of thunder, Ted,” Chinnery said. “Don’t get killed.”

“Scott, not I. Too busy to stop to die. I shouldn’t wonder if, for one thing, I shall have Mr Chin-Chin to -stamp on before I’m done, for I had a dream of it one night. Do you know I believe he’s at the bottom of this war?”

“It sounds quite likely” — from Chinnery. “The day he left Brockweir, guess what he said: ‘I go, but will come back in multitudes’ — amusing person. And I dare say he will, since he says so — good luck to him.”

“To Sky-Blue? I say, don’t you care at all for your country, my friend?”

“I wonder?” said Chinnery: “not much, I think, Ted. His ‘multitudes’ will certainly never come into the Horseferry Road, for I should stop them at the corner. But, for the rest, if we know that blessedness is the destiny of Life, isn’t it a little irreligious to fret about the road — Here’s my Mont!” as Monty, smart in cap and apron that morning, entered with a tray: and for about a minute Oyone heard no sound — Chinnery seeing to the coffee, which he always cooked himself: but all at once an outcry — a howl as of horror — was heard to burst from Chinnery: “For God’s sake! Teddy! Don’t touch!” — mixed with a clatter of the dropped coffee-pot.

- Then silence: and Oyone knew that Chinnery had dropped into a chair, panting — his heart not strong.

The Prince was now heard to say: “You mean that cubical box?”

Then Chinnery: “Oh, Teddy, you startled — forgive me. It is my Redlike Ray of which I wrote you — just finished — and I meant to cap it yesterday, but was dragged out to see the crowd; and now the coffee’s done for. It would have struck us blind, not to mention Monty and half Horseferry Road, if you had chanced to touch the little spider-hub just inside the hole. As to the coffee — Run, Mont! — a jugful at Marzucco’s — .”

On which Monty trotted tottery, exchanging a smile with Oyone outside; and Oyone knew that the Prince was now eating and discussing the Redlike Ray with Chinnery in a jargon of which she understood nothing: for, with all her nimbleness, science remained a rocky and foreign thing to her forehead.

In fact, Chinnery was telling of a method of changing five of the waves of white light into an X-wave resembling the red, yet not the red — shorter — which irritated to hyperpyrexia, and then instantly atrophied, the optic nerve, striking a dog blind in five seconds. But the Prince seemed bewildered, and Chinnery said: “when you’ve finished you’ll see the mechanism.”

The Prince presently remarked: “Which seems to mean that you may become the king of any country any day you please.”

“Quite so — I never thought of that,” answered Chinnery smiling: “but oh, Ted, the bore.”

In fact, so far from wishing to be a King, Chinnery lived on just two hundred pounds a year, for from the list of his inventions he had made not a penny. Many of them were not even known to have been made! for he forgot last year’s inventions like last year’s socks, no more seeking reward from science than the sweet-tooth seeks reward for eating sweets. Some little men whose fives like flies were in his hand had offered him — a knighthood! But he had forgotten to post his reply.

“But about the boat,” Ozone heard the Prince say next: “no engine, you say?”

“No,” answered Chinnery; “you’ll see her presently.”

“Then, how on earth — Tut, how magical!”

“Not really, Teddy, I think,” said Chinnery. “You must remember that the problem of flying has not hitherto been tackled by thinkers: for the aeroplane, of course, is not a product of thought, but of the gallantry of some nobodies who dared to go into the air on a kite with an engine for string — grand lads! but, of course, not great. You, I know, are a famous ‘flyer’; but ah, Teddy, the risk! I should die of heart-failure the instant the engine started with me! Its absurdity consists in its imitation of the bird! When we want to run faster than the deer, we don’t imitate the deer’s legs, we get into a train; to swim faster than the shark, we don’t imitate fins, as canoe-savages do, we use sails and screws. And the problem of flight, even beyond the atmosphere, is not really difficult. I know of four ways of making an apple fall up instead of down; and there must be eight ways: for I haven’t given the matter any systematic thought.”

“But what is it takes this boat up — something new in the way of force?”

“Oh, Lord, no: just a trick with the old forces.”

“Electricity?”

“No, magnetism. A little electricity, of course, to get the magnetism — a few amps, out of a toy dynamo-and-oil-engine. A battery would do. It is quite simple, as you will say presently.”

“And quite safe, you say?”

“Safe five times over — since I, the chief of cowards, went over London in it on Tuesday, with a young lady, who steered and managed it. Several times safer, even in a storm, than riding a bicycle in a lane — barring lightning. Even if this particular one fell a thousand feet, one wouldn’t be hurt, though one would if she fell five hundred.”

“But how does magnetism — By the way, does this young lady know the secrets of your inventions?”

“It’s Oyone Umé — which signifies ‘Plum-blossom,’ Ted.... Yes, as far as I can tell her, she knows the ‘secrets’; but that’s not far, I’m afraid.”

“A good thing perhaps, Richard. But what weight would this boat carry?”

“This particular one! — half-a-ton: but any desired weight — according to the size of the electro-magnets, their ampere-turns, and the mu of the iron specimen.”

“I see. And her speed?”

“Seventy-five miles, this one. But any speed, according to the stern magnet, or magnets.”

“And how long did she take you to make?”

“Five hours. She is just rough boards nailed together.”

“So in three days you could get me ten of her to carry five tons at 120 miles?”

“If I can get some carpenters to work on Sunday. But why?”

“Let’s blow up the Julius Tower at Spandau and grab the lucre! — six millions sterling in gold bars. I’ll send you a cheque — What do the boats cost?”

“About £25. But what is this Julius Tower?”

“Where the Germans keep the French war-indemnity of ‘71. I know it well; and I’ll get ten of my best Asahel fellows, and pilot the expedition myself. This treasure, which comes out of the woollen stocking of many a poor French peasant, has been set aside by the Germans for their next-war war-chest; nor have they touched it yet, I know, for it can only be touched by a joint order of the Bundesrat and the Reichstag. We’ll show them Mauretania.... And you, Richard, will come with us.”

“J, Teddy, throw bombs?” Oyone heard Chinnery say with a break of laughter in his voice: and the girl was pallid at those words “six millions,” — which is a lot in China.

“You come,” she heard the Prince say: “you need not throw anything; but you will thank me for dragging you out of this hole. You have got to grovel here over your gold; though I praise you, Richard, with bent head, priest of God, because your delight is in the laws of your Lord, and in His laws you meditate day and night; and when you have entered into your closet and shut your door, you draw near to your Father who is in secret, and your Father who walks in secret rewards you publicly” — extracts from the so-called “Brockweir Praise-book” which “Teddy” uttered in a low, slow recitative with no little unction and relish, during which Oyone’s prying eye saw Chinnery’s eyes fly skywards once, and drop: for all Brockweir boys were very profoundly devout — Li Ku Yu, too, though he disliked quotations.

“Still, one needn’t fester in one’s closet,” the Prince added: “you come for the spree. As for the coffee, doesn’t matter: I’ll see the boat now, and then the redlike ray, for my girl will soon be due, and then I must go.”

But in that moment Monty had arrived outside the door, Oyone was taking the coffee from her, and the half-caste rapped, and entered.

There, smiling, looking under her eyes, she stood like a show at the end of the long litter that lay under two frosted skylights — the Prince’s breakfast-table a brass coffer near the lathe in the centre, the linoleum holey, the bookcase shaky, and there were chemical shelves, dusty old motors, ammeters, microscopes, with tools, tools, invading the electric furnace, the brazing-hearth, and, ah, how many different kinds of iron! Swedish, mild steel, cast dynamo-steel, alloys of tungsten, titanium, tantallum — without any end. The girl stood in it like a bird-of-paradise in a stable, dressed in Kyoto silk — crimson with large splashes of pansy — but à la Européenne, a toque cocked on her top.

The Prince started at that sight!

“Well, I did not know that you had come,” Chinnery said.

“Here is your coffee.”

“This is — Mr Edward Reeks; Mademoiselle Oyone, Teddy — Plum-blossom.”

Hands were shaken amid smiles.

Then—” conversation”! Was Mr Reeks a sailor? in the Navy? How terrible a thing was war! Why could not nations contrive — ? So she had been up in the air?

Had she not been afraid? She but still had gone. And how did it feel? It felt sweet: like sitting on a throne with one’s feet on the throat of the world; and the wild flight: ah! the wild wine rioting through one’s arteries. Some delights only a woman could fully taste; men were a little stolid, were they not?

Chinnery, proud of her, kept glancing at “Teddy,” glad to see “Teddy’s” glances rest on her, and drop. A cup of coffee had been poured, but was never drunk.

The formality of “conversation” was broken by the exhibition to Mr Reeks of a Taoist amulet-ring on Oyone’s finger, whereupon Chinnery tickled the finger with a copper commutator-brush, Oyone slapped Chinnery, and Chinnery chased Oyone round the lathe. Thereafter Oyone stood crucified, her two arms stretched against the wall, chatty and kittenish, letting her eyes rest kindly upon the pretty milk-and-pinkiness of the Prince — eyes into which some kind of fire would wildly fly up an instant, and die out.

Then Chinnery, putting hand to pocket, flung a flying glance round, drank a gulp — the Prince and Oyone pretending not to see — and now suggested a geisha-dance: on which Oyone ran, got her long-handled gaita, and her dagger, and first geishaed like a bird-girl through the intricate litter, bringing a brightness into the boys’ eyes, and then began a dagger-dance, in which she lassoed the Prince with her stole, dragged him to act as foil, and having him in bondage with one hand, with the other kept stabbing with the dagger at his neck, his side, smiling with an undertook, as she danced.

And this gaiety was at its height, when a fourth person was suddenly in the room — a girl in nurse’s uniform — Eulalia.

Monty had rapped unheard, and had let her in.

Eulalia remained standing within the door, taking it in: and the first fact that registered itself in her chronicles was the half-caste’s loveliness, then the fact of “Teddy” foolishly lassoed with Oyone’s stole, while the halfcaste brandished the kokotana with a dancing arm. In another instant Chinnery noticed the new-corner; Oyone and the Prince started apart, he rather red and vexed.

Chinnery flew to Eulalia — she had met her “Teddy” here before — then proceeded to present the two ladies, and their hands were half out to meet, when “Teddy,” by a very deft and tactful piece of acting, took both of Eulalia’s hands to swing them a little in welcome — not wishing her to shake hands with Plum-blossom: and the ladies exchanged a bow instead.

But Oyone understood: and for a moment a most ferocious expression of rancour marred her face.

The Prince, meantime, was whispering Chinnery that he must go, and, without having seen either the boat or the Redlike Ray after all, he was soon in the taxicab which had brought Eulalia.

In it Eulalia sat with her lids pensively lowered; and for some time not much speech was between them.

“It is two months, three days, and three hours since we have been together,” he said.

She did not answer this, but presently asked: “Why are you dressed like a marine?”

“Just a masquerade!” he answered with a laugh.

“Just a masquerade” was not very understandable. But she had become accustomed to obscure replies from him, and had learned not to pursue inquiry.

They were silent. Then he, shaking her little Anger: “Cross about anything?”

“Why, no.”

“What’s your name?”

It was with the same pensiveness that she said: “My name’s Eulalia.”

“Whose girl are you?”

“I am Teddy Reeks’ girl.”

“All of you?”

“Yes, all.”

And with the same pensiveness and lowered lids she asked: “What’s your name?”

“My name,” said he, “is Teddy.”

“Whose boy are you?”

“I am Eulalia’s boy.”

“All of you?”

“Yes, all.”

With this he quickly kissed her fingers — they were passing out of the crowd of Victoria Street into Buckingham Palace Road — and the Queen and the Princess Elizabeth both saw that kiss.

These two were on the way to Chinnery’s in a motor brougham to meet the Prince! for Her Majesty had, after all, managed, and, having to keep the Princess interested, had considered that a visit to Chinnery’s den would be a piquant little experience for her, so had brought her, always eager for the Princess to meet the Prince: and they got a glimpse of that finger-kiss.

When the Princess next looked at Her Majesty, it was to see her with her lids shut down, her countenance blanched and rigid; and she said: “Your Majesty!” but Her Majesty did not answer.

Quickly the Princess — a palish, plainish Gretchen, thin, very German in expression, spectacled, with a spiteful little pressure of her lip — quickly she bid the coachman “turn back”; and while she held ottar under Her Majesty’s nostrils, kept the taxicab in view. When it turned into Grosvenor Place, she told the coachman “up here.”

She saw the pair enter a mansion with blinded windows, to which the Prince had a key: and she marked the house-number.

Her Majesty, meantime, was not unconscious, more or less saw, but was too overwhelmed for speech or motion. All at once her Kingdom was departed from her, on her white knight's scutcheon — a tache.

Of course, all her sorrow was for the male, all her hatred, rage and red revenge for the hussy, whose face she had distinctly seen.

CHAPTER IX

FATE OF THE SIX MILLIONS

LATE IN THE day of the Prince's visit to Chinnery, London was again agaze at the boat in the air: for Oyone had forced the ever-pliant Chinnery to take her over Harrow, and this time made herself fully mistress of the two or three little tricks of its working.

To be the Fu Jen of Li Ku Yu one day! — this had become her mania — to ride at his side — to attain to that. Alone of the men whose eyes fell upon her Li Ku Yu had pooh-poohed her: and for this thing, apart from her audacious ambition, she had made the man her famine, her madness, her star.

And he had promised “though she squinted.” Had he forgotten? Why did he not recall A-lu-te and her from banishment? She could never bring herself to remind and pray him, but waited, hoping: and as the years passed a fury of rancour grew in her heart.

So, when she had heard the Prince utter those words, “six millions,” she had paled, it was such a lot in China, could buy her much favour there. And she got from Chinnery all that would probably happen in the expedition.

During the next three days Chinnery was much in the yard, helping with the building; and she with a busy brain watched him from a workroom-window — no one else in the house, Monty being a morning phenomenon.

At about two on the Monday a load of different kinds of bombs and shells arrived, and she watched Chinnery and three bluejackets pack them into the boat's holds, with some rifles, some that were left over being put into Chinnery's own boat: for Chinnery, unable to disobey any bidding, was going, though with secret bitterness, and had increased the speed of his boat to keep pace; and Oyone ran down, handled a shell, tried its weight — a mass that had marked across it "4-inch Shell, Special Type, Firth, 5 Calibres," and, as she laid it down tenderly, threw her eyes mutely to the skies.

At four Chinnery was again in the yard, showing to seven bluejackets the boats' working; and two of them, getting into boats, rose into the air, as one rises in a lift: whereupon Chinnery, while the rest were gazing upward, took flask from pocket, and showed it, emptied, to Oyone at the workroom window — with a wink; on which Oyone ran down for the flask, ran with it to a sitting-room cabinet, filled it with Chianti, then dropped into the Chianti three drops of liquid out of a pigmy flagonette of greyish jade from her pocket; and ran to Chinnery.

Till four-thirty the men were up and down in twos and threes in the boats; then arrived the Prince and two lieutenants together, and Chinnery, in hurrying to the front-door, whispered Oyone at the closet-door: "I am feeling beastly bad! I can't go!"

"Oh, you must," she said.

When the three entered she peeped from within the closet; and when they had hurried through to the yard, she stood within the back-door, hearkening.

When the officers had been saluted by the men, Chinnery first showed them' the boats' working, and then commenced to explain their scientific principle; but the Prince, who was all business and briskness, cut him short, saying: "Another time, Richard: we are late, let's start."

"I was just going to give the fellows some whisky," said Chinnery.

"Then, do be quick.... Long trip.... Show them Mauretania...."

The men now trooped inwards after Chinnery, who, as he passed by Oyone, anew whispered: “Dear, it is impossible, I can’t go.”

‘What’s the matter?’ she whispered: “you must try.”

The Prince, meanwhile, and the two lieutenants went from boat to boat, prying into the mechanism; and said one: “Does your Royal Highness understand the principle of this thing?”

“Not a bit so far,” answered the Prince: “it seems to me an impossibility. Here are electro-magnets, keepers, wire-ropes connecting the keepers with the deck: and it seems clear that it is tension in the ropes that lifts the boats. But a magnet’s attraction of a keeper is equalled by the keeper’s attraction of the magnet: so that the downward pull on each magnet-support should be equal to the tension in the rope, and the boat should not rise — so far as I can see. The secret of it probably lies under this tin thing here, which he seems to intend to protect what’s under it from rain.... He says it’s simple; I’ll find out to-morrow; and may let you into it. I wish he’d come....”

There lay the eleven boats in a row, very roughly knocked together — long six-sided things, 20 feet long, 5 high, their decks narrow and short in comparison with their bottoms, which broad bottoms were slightly hollow to act as parachutes in case of mishap from lightning; and each bottom had on it two levers, one lever-end to press upon a spring near the bow-point, the other upon a spring near the stern-point, and they were of an angelic ingenuity to prevent the boat from dipping bowwards or sternwards in the greatest gale; nor could she rock much, for with these two levers were associated two heavy masses of lead, one for’ard, one aft, so that the centre of gravity was very low, and equilibrium so stable, that one could move freely about; the deck, moreover, was supported on powerful coil-springs.

When Chinnery and the men returned, the Prince was already in his seat, and now everyone was buttoning greatcoats and gloves, it was the moment of departure, and no one had eyes to notice how ghastly bad one of them was looking.

The Prince now again mentioned to the men the signification of the variegated pistol-lights to be fired as signals; a lieutenant reminded them where the grub had been put; and at nine minutes to five the Prince started a little oil-engine, depressed a lever connected with a ratchet-wheel, and went up.

And swiftly the swarm of ten was aloft, and gone.

Chinnery alone remained, Oyone now standing with him by his boat at the shed-door; and, "Something is wrong," he sighed, his palm on his forehead, "I can't—"

"Try," she said, tilting to his a face as wan as wax, as wan as his: "drink a little of this."

She produced the same flagonette from which she had poured three drops into his wine.

"What is it?" he asked.

"Ginseng," said she.

He knew that ginseng was her cure for all human woes, and, to humour her, took the flagonette, having long got into the habit of doing her bidding mechanically; and then — anything for a drink.

He glanced guiltily round, drank a gulp, and at once staggered against the door-post, where with his forehead dropped forward, he stood ten, fifteen seconds; then sighed, staggered backwards, staring, death-struck, into the shed, fell among boards and shavings, and lay still.

On which she with her wild white face went flying into the house, flew out again under a load of furs, a spade, a saw, hurled them into the boat, clambered in, started the little engine, depressed the lever; and her planet sank and sailed away from under her, and left her in space.

Two miles away eastward she saw the swarm of boats: she depressed a lever behind her, and followed.

The wind was almost ahead, rather raw, and, though not strong, it soon harangued the ear to weariness with its wrangling and ceaseless tongue at the boat's irruption and rush through it.

But, though heard, it was hardly felt, for the gunwale for'ard was higher than the steerer's head, so that she had to lean a little aside to see the boats ahead.

She sat at a square hole in the deck, her feet on one of two ladder-steps that led to the bottom, tiller-ropes in hand: and after the first two minutes a sense of perfect security warmed and welled in her.

Passing over Chelmsford, she buried herself within fur on fur, drank some ginseng, lit a cigar, and throwing back her throat, began to sing loud, to howl a song, blasphemously above the thundering of the blast.

Meantime, she took care to keep her distance behind — the speed like the elevation being regulated by a ratchet-wheel; and the swarm in front thought that in her boat was Chinnery.

As they left Colchester on the left, and took the sea at Clacton, she shrieked to heaven like a fury: "Come, Li KuYu!"

Down there below appeared a little fleet of seven submersibles with their mother-ship, making apparently for Harwich; and here or there a sail that looked stuck in the centre of immensity.

Soon, however, as she went on and on over the sea without any sense of motion or progress — for one wave was twin-brother to every other — a first fear occurred to her when she began, in a reaction to feel sleepy — sleep meaning, she knew, that the petrol might exhaust itself, and the boat would go down, perhaps into the sea. She began to sing again, but lugubriously low in her throat, moaning gloomy things to the sea-gulls and the gust.

As the sun went down from its clouds and glories, now ahead appeared a crowd of glow-flies — the boats' green starboard, scarlet port, and white lantern-lights, some above her, some below, scattered, yet forming something of a bunch.

Now darkness reigned awfully, and with it a little drizzling of something; no moon to be seen; but between cloud-masses brand-new stars were crackling in crowds, not lying round any sky, but profoundly back in the bowels of the boundless black.

They were over the glow that The Hague made when a pink pistol-light from the foremost boat cut the night.

This meant "Assemble "; and presently a blue shine shooting meant "Stop"; whereupon one of their number dropped to earth at a village to make sure of their whereabouts, though, as the wind was nearly ahead, little leeway was to be feared.

Meantime, the Prince and the rest, very perplexed and worried as to Chinnery, were thinking: "He must have turned back!" — for the half-caste, hiding in the night, had not lighted any of her lights.

Then when the investigator had mounted again and howled out "Hague!" a green glow streamed out, and the voyage was resumed; nor did it stop again, save once over a hamlet three miles from Brandenburg, whence they made a straight fly for Berlin.

Over the western suburbs the pilot signalled "Lights out," and flying as low as 1000 feet so as to be just visible to each other in the off-shine of the city, they went on eastward: the hour then 10.45.

Moving slow over the parts of Berlin eastward of the Thiergarten, they found the town in a state of the greatest uproar and eruption — hurrahs that rang and reigned in the air like echoes of cataracts — for no people on earth can cheer and blow off steam like Germans — national songs sung by multitudes, houses gala with flags, crowds careering through some streets, or standing blocked before some balcony or façade.

At the Austrian Embassy opposite that old home of M. Benedetti, so full of memories of '71, the boat's glasses saw a throng so thick, that a cigar-end remained on the back where it had dropped from a boat; and, even as the unseen boats moved over them, a roar broke out like a clap at the sight of the Ambassador standing, all smiles, on the balcony.

The fact was, that tidings of the Mauretania fight had not long arrived, to be at once hailed as a great German victory: for the two Germans, though sunk, had sunk a far greater weight of metal, and had achieved their objective — the destruction or capture of the Mauretania. Whereupon — Hoch! reeling beer-gardens, gush, flushed foreheads, flags, promiscuous dancing, hot heads, hats on high, hurrahs, special late editions — the tumult of the newsboys' hootings through the Unter den Linden soaring distinctly above the other tumults to the boats. England's day was done — call it to the stars ! — another sun dawning.

At the Schloss the Emperor and Crown-Prince had but now presented themselves, when the crowd of ten boats cruised that road, for the roaring remained present in the air like an evaporation exhaling. What was moving in the gloom above their glee they little knew; as those above them little knew what was above them.

Meantime, a fresh scheme had entered the Prince's head, his eyes now sparkling in spiteful thought'; he turned, and after following the boulevard westward, bent six points northward toward Bismark Strasse, and the Spree.

He came to rest over a block of building by the river, twice blew a whistle, and slowly descended upon the building's top.

Now he ran soft a little to stretch his limbs; and, as the next boat, Lieutenant Pilcher's, touched the roof, he ran to whisper: "Palace of the General Staff — documents!"

And by the time the others had alighted, these two had discovered an iron trap-door between two slate-roofs separated by areas of lead; and the whisper went forth: "Bring rifles and a lantern."

Lying flat, the ten got the trap-door up, and then, the lantern first, the Prince next, they stole down an iron ladder into a vast low place full of dust and darkness, save for one square of light in the centre of its floor. To this with thieves feet they went, lay down, and peered beneath.

Here some wooden ladder-steps led down into a room: and they saw there a man in spectacles reading a paper at a table that had two stoups of beer on it, he in undress uniform, his cap on; and by a bed a woman undressing, abusing the man, who read and took no notice; and a redness of coke roared in a stove.

All in a wink the man was on his back under the Prince, a handkerchief in his throat; the woman was in strange arms, her mouth stuffed up; and Pilcher, who knew languages, was saying: "Don't struggle! or we brain you!"

They then tore the bedclothes into strips, tied up the two, and taking the remainder of the strips, went out.

The place appeared not less vast in its darkness than a deserted city, and they had treaded a journey of interminable corridors and noble stairs, searching for some open door, before they came upon any sign of life — an off-shine of light afar at a corridor-end. They crept that way.

On prying round the corner, they saw the next corridor lit, and a sentinel stalking in the German toe-first way — a strapping "tapferer Krieger" of the 17th (West Prussian), who had heard talk of English beef, but never yet tasted.

“Eyes front!” — too late. See the Prince sprinting like a spirit in his socks! and like a cat he sprang and had him, Pilcher next. And from first to last not a sound from the man in the hands of handy Jack, but the crash of his tumbling musket.

The fellow lay writhing and grinding at his fetters, gurgling at his gag, his eyes gloating out of his head upon the ten rough ghosts grouped over him.

And now the Prince turned to the guarded door, which had “Ratstube” in gold letters over it; and he very slowly moved the handle, and looked in.

In there, seated all round a long table in solemn conclave, he saw the leaders of Germany.

A large hall with walls of pallid apple-green; the table all a medley of plans, maps, documents, books, charts; and they sat on large chairs that gleamed.

Most of them the Prince knew well — Count von Athem at the far head, Chief of the Army General Staff, and near at the foot Prince Radziwill of Prussia, Inspector-General of the Navy: for it was a General Conference of both branches of the Imperial Forces; and there in the centre was Grand-Admiral von Brâckner, Chief of the Admiral Staff, near Field-Marshal Prince Albrecht of Prussia; and yonder that bald skull and walrus moustache of Graf von Grossmann, Chief of the Reichs-Marine-Amt, and that piercing peeper in a pig’s face of Naval Secretary of State Herr Ohom-Hartmann — and many other stars, orders, epaulettes.

The Prince muttered to himself, “Mauretania” flew to put on his boots, and get his rifle, then, returning to the door, said quite loudly, “Come, Pilcher, come, Burke,” turned the handle, and was in.

See them now at that table — their faces I if one can call them faces.
There is a bewilderment that is ineffable!

The Prince bowed, grounding his rifle.

“Gentlemen, you are my prisoners,” he said in English.

Each German looked into some other German face to see what German expression was printed there!

“No doubt you admit yourselves my prisoners,” said the Prince—“considerable force at hand. Tell them, Pilcher, in French.”

Pilcher bowed, and told them.

Now, it was impossible for them to doubt this: for down in the courtyard were six sub-sections of a grenadier company on guard, and their natural assumption, since these spectres stood before their eyesight, was that those subsections had been overpowered.

But prisoners! — in the middle of military Berlin, with Berlin shouting in victory about them! And if they were prisoners, why, then, the war was at an end, Germany conquered.

All at once, as if the astonishment had just come upon them, they sprang unanimously to their feet; and Count von Athem called out: “How — came you here?”

“Sorry, gentlemen, no time for explanations,” said the Prince: “you submit to superior force” — and glancing out, he cried: “Let seven of you come in, and take possession of these papers.”

Whereupon the seven blue-jackets trooped in in their great-coats, saluted and set briskly to gather up plans, charts, maps, books, papers, like waiters clearing away.

Meantime, the whisper was running: “It seems to be the Prince of Wales!” and Graf von Grossmann leant his palms on the table to say: “May we demand to know — ?”

But the Prince interrupted. "I see that you have water and fire, gentlemen, so I shall lock you temporarily in here. Good-night." He went out, locked the door, pocketed the key.

"Pity we aren't twenty instead of ten," he remarked, as they went up, leaving the sentinel in his bonds; but they released the man and woman above, after locking them in.

The war documents the Prince stowed into his own boat; and soon the swarm was on the wing north-westward for Spandau.

They arrived in five minutes, Spandau now deep in sleep, when a sound of great guns roused it — one, two, booms; and 60,000 human beings had sat up in darkness to hearken at that thing, when a sudden sense of destruction overwhelmed them all, a foreknowledge of overthrow, as a thundering broke out among them, and in some moments more the city was lit with a dusky dawn, as the arsenal darted and took the sky.

This town, besides, was crowded with military establishments, of which the Prince had well conned the map: so that the Small Arms Factory, the Gun Foundry, the Military School, the great Horse-market, the Barracks, the railway, all in turn came under the rain of shells: for thoroughness is not a quality confined to Germans; and those of the people who survived that night's experiences lived through them again in nightmares to their dying day, and had a stock recurring dream of screaming streets that ran, like men calling upon the rocks and hills to cover them.

In the town were some Garde-Grenadiere, No. 4 regiment and half of No. 3, and a battalion of Guard-foot-artillery: but sections of these could only be mobilised for moments when floods of Tophet burst among them, and the nerves of men shirked it, they having no idea whence the fire came, simply found it spouting it in their midst, and supposed Spandau to be surrounded by two hundred thousand troops.

It was an hour before it entered a dying colonel's head that this curse of fire might be coming out of the sky.

And then a 9-pounder balloon-gun, mounted on an armoured motor-car that had arrangements to resist the recoil of high-angle firing, was brought out of the Citadel, followed by what was left of the foot-artillery: for the night-glass of one gallant captain standing out on the glacis seemed to detect certain specks in the height beyond the night-mists — though it baffled understanding that aeroplanes could drop bombs with the precision with which these bombs dropped.

Anyway, the balloon-gun was produced and aimed; but before any shot was discharged, it and forty-men were shattered in a splash of shrapnel, and the rest fled through the carnage and darkness of the shrieking and reeking city.

Within fifty minutes Spandau was a conquered city, every trace of resistance at an end, and yonder within the Citadel's vast wall — a townlet within a town — the Julius Tower was half down.

Berlin, meantime, warned by telephone, was preparing to pour forth troops; but before these could be moved, the Ratstube door in the Palace of the General Staff had to be broken open; nor did any troops enter Spandau that night: for when the Tower was all down, and nine of the boats were engaged in getting in the gold, a tenth was always watching the Berlin-road, to throw back any advance.

They found the gold piled in a square vault lined with steel, the mass occupying some three cubic yards in bars 10 inches long, some of the bars much broken and battered by the bombardment, inscribed, each of them, across its middle with "Reichs-Kriegs-Schatz, 54 Kg." (120 lb.); and after half-an-hour's toil in clearing away stone débris, they disposed the boats as conveniently as they could for the loading, threw out remaining bombs, and set to it, looking like ghouls grovelling there amid their gleams of green and crimson.

At twelve-thirty the workers heard musketry and balloon-gun booming going on in the direction of Berlin, but did not stop toiling; and presently the boat that had been up came down with the report of the enemy scattered, on which a loaded boat rose to keep guard.

At one-fifty the last bar of gold was dropped into Lieutenant Burke's boat, and the blue-jackets were then given leave to gather up the shattered fragments for themselves, which they did very shamefacedly and loth, tongue in cheek; everyone now wet with the sweat of the labour, worn out; and but slightly disposed for the dark flight back.

However, the Prince, who was a tough and merciless worker, would suggest no rest, for night was their friend; and at three minutes to two, rising with their three beams burning, they started to return home, loaded with this portion of France's war-indemnity to Germany, which the Prince purposed to return to France.

But, as their lights appeared in the air, the half-caste, who had been asleep for two hours in the hold of her boat in a field near by, started her little engine, and darkly followed, flying now well higher than the swarm.

At this hour the wind was much stronger, had changed several points to northward, was blowing now on the boats' starboard quarter, and causing far more lee-way than the leader seems to have realised.

Consequently, after failing to sight several landmarks, and after looking out in vain for the lights of Arnhem when they had been in the air two hours and a half, he became anxious, and shot oft pistol-lights to signify "Assemble" and "Stop."

It was that dark hour before any sign of dawn, though now Orion away down by the horizon was brighter and better than the Queen's Necklace, and there was one sphere in the sky that seemed a beetle of diamond beaming, with feet and feelers trembling round it, and very richly the shivering Fishes were shimmering.

And one of the boats was about to drop for inquiries at a solitary light in forested country which they could descry south of them, when a shower of eleven shells in pelting succession tumbled out of heaven upon the ten boats, as they stood bunched two thousand feet up.

One shell only missed, but was instantly followed by another.

Three did not explode; but still wrecked the mechanism, and laid low the men.

And the ten boats fell.

CHAPTER X

THE “ASAHEL”

THE HALF-CASTE DESCENDED upon a path between two coppices on hill-sides, and rushing about the bush of one with a lantern, discovered the boats and bodies all within an area of forty yards.

One boat was standing bow-downward, its stem on a fir-tree; another had hurtled into the ruins of a church buried in the bush, beside this boat being the butchered and burned body of Lieutenant Burke; and all were much broken, for the boats' bottoms were not perfect parachutes for such a burden as they carried; and, in the case of seven, what the earth had not smashed the explosions had shattered, one foot being found in a boat to whose occupant it did not belong.

Three of the men, at the shock of falling, had been tossed aloft by the deck-springs, and then had dropped back upon the boats, two dropping back within the boats — the Prince, Pilcher, and a blue-jacket.

Her first business was to remove these out of her way: so, climbing by the bits of timber nailed on as steps, she dragged and rolled them over the sides, a heat and vehemence in her, a gasping, her teeth-edges pecking together with spite at sight of the Prince's gashes, whose sweetheart's hand she might not shake, her raging heart revelling in all this death and rout and sense of power.

But the lifting of the bodies winded her, and presently she was propped, panting, in the midst of the three men: and now her heat fast turned to cold.

For there were drippings amid the underwood; there were droppings of pine-cones that tolled and echoed; dead leaves reeled at the breathing of the breezes through the timber; the blue-jacket kept his neck sideward, interested in her with one eye, with that steady indelicacy of the dead: and, standing with her lonesome lantern-glow in the gloom of that unknown wood, with ghosts and all that load of gold and gallows-work on her hands, she threw her eyes reproachfully skyward, then suddenly, “Oh, I am afraid,” she breathed, and gave way to weeping.

But no time for weakness — she stood straight.

And first she dragged the blue-jacket out of her sight ten yards to a summit, rolling him over into bracken on the other slope; did the same to the Prince and Pilcher; and now ran out to her boat, rose, and lowered it within the wood, to have it hidden.

She then sat to ponder the problem of the treasure.

She had imagined that it would be a simple matter to bury it, but this now appeared to her in a different light. The ruins within the wood, however, quickly occurred to her alert wit, and on penetrating the mass of bracken and bramble which buried it, she discovered a slab with a ring behind the site of the sacrarium, and went prying down five steps into a damp apartment, whence a badger dashed out by her, whitening her with fright.

Here, she was sure, no human foot ever came, fixed upon it as her treasure-house, and during the hour that remained before daybreak was labouring at taking some of the bars fallen within the ruins down into the vault — ever afresh astonished, with every fresh bar, that anything so small could possibly be so ponderous.

But suddenly, as she was in the act of stepping with petty steps, loaded with a bar, the bar tumbled singing, and she stood a thing of marble, blanched: for about a stone's throw from her a throat had outraged the night's silence with the howl: "Fire!" — in English.

The next instant she felt herself drowned in a thousand deaths, as a racket of musketry seemed to crack her eardrum, and she dropped shot-through with fear, for she thought that all the guns of the globe had discharged their bullets through her heart, and at an odour of smoke that floated to her nose she moaned.

And from far to the northward followed a rumbling of musketry, and a mortar barking; and then, not far, a voice calling "Charge!" then a medley of voices crying: "Retire! Retire!" then a cry: "Who said Retire?" then a roar of a hundred throats: "Charge! Charge!" and a rush of boots brushing through scrub — and in some minutes distant musketry — and a bugle going fluty — and stillness.

It was a skirmish of German and English outpost-garrisons going on — which meant that, so far from being in Holland, as she reckoned, she was somewhere near the Belgian frontier; and the night-operation had been occasioned by the air-boats' lights, descried by the night-glasses of both garrisons, who were facing each other at a distance of eight kilometres. And though aeroplanes with coloured lights was a thing unknown, each captain had taken them to be enemy aeroplanes sent up to reconnoitre his gun-emplacements or drop bombs — a suspicion which the sudden vanishing of the bunch of lights had established: so both sides had sallied to attack, this affair ending in twenty-seven dead.

As for the half-caste, this eruption of musketry shocked all effort out of her, and stock-still she lay on the steps, listening to a cricket screaming, hiding her eyes, leering like little mice that leer in fear; nor was it until the sun was high that she ventured out of the wood, walked four miles, and took a room at a tavern.

But by three in the afternoon she was back within the wood. And now her first work was to bury away every trace of blood or flesh. She had a spade, a saw.

But great was her trouble, on going to the spot where she had dragged and rolled three of the bodies, — not to see them.

She stepped down a steep piece of ground, very gloomy with bush, looking for them; and had made perhaps twenty steps when her left foot stepped upon nothing, and down with an outcry she fell ten feet.

There was cliff here, a road at its bottom; and when she picked herself up, it was with a horrible pang that she understood that the bodies must have rolled down here — and been removed.

When she climbed back she sat wringing her hands, lamenting, thinking that all would be discovered now.

But she set afresh to business, and after burying every blood-stained bush in one shallow trench with the bodies, a work of hours, and after covering well with dead leaves, she began the vast task of sawing the unbroken parts of the boats into bits of a bigness which she could lift and bury.

In this labour of Hercules she spent two days; and only when every trace of the ten boats, the guns, the German documents, were gone from the surface, did she go on with the work of carrying down the bars into the church-vault — a navvy's travail that harassed her soul four days, and made her groan at gold.

Meantime, her eyes were on the newspapers — on the tumult that was in Europe at the raid upon the Teuton treasure, the destruction of Spandau, the disappearance of the Prince of Wales.

That it was the Prince who had led the raid Europe soon knew. But where now was either Prince or treasure, companions or boats?

Even in that turmoil of the world — commercial upheaval, tears of defeat, movements of fleets and troops, dearness of food, frenzies of triumph — men's minds were centred upon this thing, and a thousand thousand eyes were busied about the route between Berlin and London, seeking, seeking.

But the boats seemed to have been caught to the stars like the Argonauts' boat! and as many fantastic guesses as there were men were made to explain the fantastic catastrophe that had caused them all to fall into the sea! — for after a time only the Queen any longer refused to believe that they had fallen into the sea.

She had revealed that the boats were an invention of Mr Chinnery, and that Chinnery himself had gone with the expedition — the Prince having told her that Chinnery would be going. So that no one had approached Chinnery for inquiries; though during two days a crowd stood vaguely gazing at his house, little divining what lay in the shed behind.

It was only on the morning of the fourth day after the raid that a captain of Hussars happened to visit, at the street-end of the village of Plessy, one of the two field-hospitals of his division, which was following his company; and he, entering his company ambulance-waggon to cast an eye at his sick, suddenly, as he stood over one of the spring-beds, stretched his finger at it, and said to a dresser: "But that's the Prince! that's he!"

That night the King and Queen were at Plessy, listening over that spring-bed to the Prince wandering a little, his left elbow broken, his forehead cut open.

How he had got there was soon investigated.

Three rustics, trudging in the daybreak of the night-operation, had noticed three bodies lying by the road in the bush at a cliff's bottom, and had borne them to some company stretcher-bearers seeking their wounded with red-crossed arms in a field some way off.

Whereupon the stretcher-bearers, assuming them to be civilians wounded in the skirmish — for they were en pékin — had borne the two living to a first-aid dressing-station, whence they had passed through a main station to the field-hospital.

So, then, the expedition had not, after all, fallen into the sea? Where, then, were the six million pounds, the boats? Tidy for a private fortune, six millions! and the world set itself to search an area of some thirty miles round that church in which it lay.

Within three weeks this thing had become a crazer of men's brains, hundreds of imbeciles in the rage and mania throwing up their daily occupations to become discoverers — seeking, not the treasure, but the boats! which were the clue to the treasure; and many may have entered in vain that very wood in which boats and treasure were.

This was one of the Prince's first questions on the seventh midnight when he came to himself at Windsor: "But the treasure?"

"No sign of it so far," answered Engineer Vice-Admiral Sir Robert Barrington, K.C.B., who was a friend of the Prince, and had been much at his bedside.

"And Pilcher?"

"Doing well. Broken humerus."

"Others all gone?"

"All."

"But what made us fall?"

"That is quite unknown."

"Chinnery — what does he say?"

"But Chinnery perished, too."

“Chinnery did? No! Chinnery didn’t come with us! He started, but turned back.”

“Then — I am in a maze.”

“But the treasure — it is somewhere near where Pilcher and I were found, of course.”

“No doubt: but where that is cannot be discovered, for the rustics who found and bore you to the stretcher-bearers cannot be discovered — owing, no doubt, to the fact that many of the villages in that war-area have been destroyed or abandoned, and the population in a fluid and migratory state.”

The Prince stared at the battle painted on the ceiling; and he murmured presently: “Well, this is how it was to turn out. I can’t understand — see Chinnery to-morrow. But — the Queen?”

Sir Robert Barrington’s eyes softened and smiled. “The Queen is said to have been as brave as usual all through.” [Has it not been mentioned that shortly before her marriage the young girl Minna Simmons pressed to her face, before throwing into a grate, the photograph of a young man? — which young man was now Engineer Vice-Admiral Sir Robert Barrington; and it may be mentioned that it was into Sir Robert Barrington’s house in Grosvenor Place that the Queen and the Princess Elizabeth had seen the Prince let himself in with a key — with his Eulalia.]

Some minutes afterwards Her Majesty herself stole into the chamber, while Sir Robert and the nurses retired to its farthest shades; and the Prince, sitting up to receive Her Majesty, saw tears spring to her lids and her lip quiver, as she stood pressing his hand: but he noticed with some wonder that she did not kiss him, nor was long with him.

When day came a gentleman of the Prince thrice tried to telephone to Chinnery — without reply.

And that afternoon Chinnery's house was entered by the police by means of Monty's key — for a neighbour's servant knew Monty's abode.

Monty's statement was, that she had known that Mr Chinnery was going away through the air, and she had not gone to the house the day after the expedition, but had looked in several times since to feed the cat, etc. And had she then seen nothing of Mr Chinnery? She had seen nothing.

So now the place was searched throughout: but no sign anywhere of Chinnery.

And now a pernicious suspicion as to Chinnery crept into the public head: that Chinnery had wanted six million pounds! that he had not really turned back, as the Prince imagined, but had tracked the expedition in the dark, and destroyed it — for Lieutenant Pilcher, when he could speak, declared that he had had a distinct impression of shells being thrown upon the boats an instant before he lost consciousness.

And if Chinnery had really turned back — if Chinnery had not now the treasure — where, then, was the treasure, and why was Chinnery now in hiding?

The truth, of course, was, that, though Chinnery was in hiding, it was not he who was hiding himself, but the half-caste hiding him.

On the sixth midnight she had risen out of that brake in Lorraine, her six-days' labours ended, and, flying high, had wantonly dropped her last three bombs upon a German position outside Bouillon, as who should say: "I spit loud on you"; then, striking England near Deal, had left her boat in a field, had found out her whereabouts, had discovered London about 3 A.M., passed over it high, and come down into the Chinese house grounds at Regent's Park, unseen by any eye.

But even now she did not rest: one more labour; and then sweet sleep.

She had gathered from the papers that Chinnery had not yet been discovered in the shed: for, as she had foreseen, Monty had not looked into the shed, believing him away.

But she knew that Chinnery's body must soon be discovered, and then suspicion might fall upon her for his death, and for everything; but, if it was buried away, then suspicion might pitch upon Chinnery for destroying the boats.

She therefore determined to bury it quickly; to get that Redlike Ray of which she had heard to send to China; and be done with Horseferry Road for ever.

So she walked through the Chinese house and the sleeping streets to some mews where A-lu-te's Chinese chauffeur lived; and in twenty minutes was driving for Westminster — with her spade.

She found the house-door shut, but got in by an area-window; and, after sending the car to wait some way off, ran to the yard with a candle which her hand had no need to shade, that morning-hour was so calm and heavy with haze.

A black cat, unfed that day, flew mewing to her human friendship across the yard. She took no notice: stood listening, leering, to a policeman's feet beating up a street.

Then, crushing her reluctance, she entered the shed: and there he lay, just as he had dropped in his fur-coat and chest-wrappings, his cap on his head; and horror hopped in her heart when, as she peered, his head suddenly started up at her with awful eyes, crying harshly: "Water! Water!" and tumbled back with shut eyes.

It bumped in tumbling upon a board, that sage head, never more now to be so sage and knowing, its cheeks concaves of famine and nearness to death; and when, all at once, she perceived that he was living, pity pierced her to tears, compunction, love of him for his gentle love of her, love of him for being with the living, and not with the foreign dead; and, instead of bringing him drink, she lay with him, kissing his fingers, his lips, whimpering pity at his thinness; but then ran and brought him wine.

But, living or dead, he had to be hidden — probably not for long, since he had never been strong, and could hardly outlive all this ill-treatment.

So now the question was to get him into the car; and, since he was too tall to lift, she called in her chauffeur, who bore him to the door, while she with her candle ran up to get the Redlike Ray.

It was a black box, cubical, two feet broad, and she knew exactly where it had been placed, for after the Prince had gone that day of his visit, she had watched Chinnery attach the cap which made it safe to handle, had asked many questions about it, had seen him lay it on the shelf by the lathe, and knew that he had not since removed it, for there it had lain on the day of the raid. But now it was not there...

She ransacked the room, stamping, exasperated — all the rooms: no box.

Fascinated and fretted, she kept on seeking, hissing at the thing, until weariness compelled her to give in; then, getting Chinnery lifted into the motor, she drove away an hour before daybreak to the Regent Park house, from which she intended him never more to come out.

Fourteen years previously a Member of the Peking Board of Civil Appointments had been kidnapped and imprisoned there in a back-room which still had its two windows bricked up: here was to be the future home of Richard Chinnery.

It was not till the next noon that the lady A-lu-te knew that a stranger was in the house, when Oyone told her that her return to Court-life depended upon his captivity — A-lu-te now being old, and well under the sway of Oyone.

That same night of Chinnery's removal the Prince recovered consciousness, and the next day Chinnery's house was searched in vain for him.

Two days later Oyone once more went to Horseferry Road, for it was incredible to her that the Redlike Ray was not there: and first she went to question Monty, and then with Monty on to the house.

A brougham bearing the Prince of Wales' arms stood before the door and two plain-clothes men, who would not let the pair enter, till Oyone explained that she was only going to a top-room to get some knick-knacks of her own; but she spied a little at the workroom keyhole, her teeth-edges pecking with spite at the sight of the Prince sitting alone in there, brooding on the stool, a bandage aslant under his cap, one arm in a sling. He had escaped her — twice: but still had been well peppered.

She guessed that he had come on the same errand as herself — to get the Redlike Ray: and this was true, for, with Chinnery vanished, he had remembered the terrible peril of the ray in the hands of unwitting, wicked, or ambitious people; and he, too, had searched in vain for it, and then had put the hunt in the detectives' hands. But he had come, moreover, to brood in that room over the gloomy enigma of his schoolboy friend, to ask himself there that ever-repeated question: "Where is Richard Chinnery now?" for he did not believe that Chinnery had fallen into the sea.

Anyway, Chinnery was gone, the Redlike Ray gone, all the boats gone — he still ignorant of the secret of their mechanism; though, if he had known that secret, boats like them might have brought the war to a quick end.

However, he was not long lamenting there, having that afternoon to go northward to join his Asahel.

For it was fairly certain that a world-battle on the sea was impending; it was in everyone's mouth that an attempt was about to be made to invade Britain; and the result of the Mauretania battle had loaded men's brains with boding.

Indeed, a thousand evil dreams that week were in everyone's mouth, for suddenly a disease of jumpiness had seized upon the people, and behind each door a ghost was ogling.

A company of soldiers marched up Pall Mall, and men rushed to windows with wildness in their eyes to see if they were Prussians.

Visions of vague things were seen sailing in the air, visions of phantom fleets which vanished seen on the sea.

On a gentleman's aeroplane appearing in the air, the villages of Alvington and Aylburton near Chepstow took fright, and precipitated themselves like one man into bramble and spinney.

Men swore that drums were rumbling and guns booming where it could not be that guns were booming; rich ladies living on scrip stood cool and courageous for days, and suddenly one day, terror-struck, were away, as though hounds were mouthing at their heels, to the mountains of Wales.

Yet, even in the thick of this state of scare, when the nation gathered that the Prince of Wales was being permitted to go to a battle with his arm in a sling, it found time to frown at it.

Everybody felt that he had already abundantly served his country for this war — for the subtraction of those 120 million marks from Germany's rather meagre war-chest was a grievous gash.

Accordingly, when at 2 o'clock he drove toward King's Cross, he was astonished to find the whole route thronged, and the people cheering with so much heart and friendship, that his eyes softened, and, though his forehead was still bandaged, he kept bending toward his brougham window, lifting his cap.

This may have loosened the bandage somehow, for at the corner of Southampton Row Eulalia, on her toes in the crowd, was afresh breathing to herself: “Heavens! how like,” when the bandage and dressing lifted with the lifting cap, and she got a sight of the long gash, her nurse’s eye noticing that it had a hook over the right eye.

She felt a kind of property in him, he was “so like!” wished that he would see her, and clapped loud; but her clapping was drowned in the row, in the shouts of “Teddy!” the eager god-speeds: for it seemed to everybody a needless hardship that he should rise from bed to join his squadron.

“Needless” — since no one (or very few) had any particular faith in his ideas about ships and sea-fighting — though it was well known that he had ideas of his own, that from his cadet-days he had been a rebel in the Service, and that he had got two ships built to his liking — the Asahel, of which he was the “Captain” (a courtesy-title), and the Blunderbus.

But those ships he had only managed to get built with the greatest difficulty; and one memorable night had cried to the Queen: “Oh, Mother, if you don’t believe in me, who will?”

“Teddy,” the Queen had answered, “you have knowledge, but you are not an expert.”

“Expert!” he had cried— “I despise experts. Chinnery is not an ‘expert’ — he is just a thinker: and he agrees with me that the Dreadnought ship is wrong from control-station to keel. Experts? Their intellect gets quite fixed! like putty in a hole — except when it is rushing off into little crazes and scares: as when forty years ago France started torpedo-boats, and the cry was “battleships must be abandoned!” Then happened Tsushima, and ever since it’s been Tsushima, Tsushima, on the brain, and the battleship rage.

But at Tsushima the fighting was all on one side — the Russians did not pretend to be any good, or all the battleships on both sides would certainly have sunk.”

The Queen had asked him how he could be so sure of that; and he had answered: “Mother, it is common-sense. A battleship is a weak thing, because she is a compromise between two efforts — to be heavy, and to be light. But guns have definitely beaten armour, Mother — definitely — such armour as ships of any speed can carry, so what’s the good of their armour? And they can’t run away, their armour so limits their speed, so what’s the good of their speed? Oughtn’t they to have enough armour to be some good, and no speed, or enough speed, and no armour? not a useless little of both?”

In the end the Queen had said: “I will use what influence I have for you”; and Engineer Vice-Admiral Sir Robert Barrington had helped, too.

So the Asahel and Blunderbus had been built.

What was the Asahel? She was not a destroyer: the rôle of the destroyer is to sting and fly; the rôle of the Asahel was to fly and sting.

She was not a Dreadnought: she was smaller than any third-class cruiser. She was not a third-class cruiser: she carried bigger guns than any Dreadnought.

She was the very swiftest thing at whose rage and chase the sea’s face had ever changed colour — her contract-speed forty-eight knots.

As for the Blunderbus, she was a semi-submarine Dreadnought, with a speed of six knots.

CHAPTER XI

GERMANS IN PALL MALL

GERMANY HAD SOME 854,000 tons at Emden — 58 capital ships — which the British sought to blockade and contain, lying in a long curve beyond Borkum (the island that lies before Emden).

The British were the 1st and 2nd Divisions, consisting of all newest battleships with their affiliated cruisers, destroyers, dépôt-ships, and with them half the French 1st battle-squadron, all under the Commander-in-Chief, Admiral Sir Richard Ramsay, borne in the Lion.

But this idea of containing had not lasted three days when it changed into the keenest eagerness to draw to a battle — firstly because it was realised that the Germans were awaiting the to-be-purchased Japanese ships, said to be “coming round the Cape,” and then because of the mobilising of three corps d’armée upon Larrelt, and of an accumulation of troopships and war matériel under the guns of Wilhelmshaven (connected with Emden and Borkum by the Ems-Jahde Canal).

Now, Emden had not always been a naval station — for capital ships; nor Larrelt a garrison-town. The dredging of the Emden fairway, and the establishment of vast barracks at Larrelt had been costly; hence that spot had long been looked to by us as the base of “invasion”; and now “invasion” was bitter in the bread and beer, and dreadful in the dreams, of Britain.

The danger was probably not so acute as was assumed: for, as a matter of fact, trouble was in the German Admiral-Stab in those very days at the message from the East that — the “purchased” fleet seemed to have vanished somehow! for ever since a steamer of the Yusen Kaisha fleet; had sighted it in trouble in a typhoon near the Kiu-Kiu reefs, no report of them! Vanished! — that mass. On which there are indications that doubt and hesitation entered into the counsellors of Germany.

But there had really been an awful Autumn storm in the China Sea; and two days afterwards Europe seemed to have caught it. Then began “the great gale.”

During two days the sun went out, the heavens, as it were, tinted with inks; and the blockading vessels, with seas breaking through casemates and screen-doors, fled from the face of a tempest that fell upon them at eighty-five miles an hour; while chill trembling fell upon Britain with the instinct that now was the German chance while a pitched battle on the sea was an impossibility.

A King’s messenger coming wild with tidings in the Ostend mail-boat was lost within sight of Dover, where the breakwater and Admiralty Pier were under water, large storm-doors were washed down, offices wrecked on the Main Pier, ships fouled and ashore in the Naval Harbour.

It fell upon the Asahel half-way to Emden, and the Prince, after a defiant fight, had to fly S. by W. half a night with the sea on his port quarter. Life-lines rigged for the seamen to secure equipment could not save two bluejackets from being washed overboard, so swung were the feet between deep and steep, and only two of the boats were not torn from their davits.

Meantime, no one in the Asahel was asleep, since tons of water were washing even over engine-room hatchways down into the engine-depths, the seamen’s mess awash, water in the wardroom, in the wireless room, in the Prince's cabin, having plunged down through a broken scuttle and wardroom funnel, so that she seemed as much within the sea as on it.

The Prince, sitting on a narrow end of a lashed trunk, his brow-bandage spotted with blood, his shins bare, was swinging his head about over a concertina, playing "Onward, Christian Soldiers" to the legion of dæmons that seemed careering with shrieks through the rayless air.

This was what he called fine weather, and a delightful night.

But as he rocked and rollicked there in his solitary cabin, things blacker than the night were in the back of his mind, for he understood that doom was hanging over the land of his love.

And the instant he could dare to turn back, on that murky daybreak of the 23rd, he tinned the — bow to the mountains, seeking his fleet.

But the day was only a less dense land of night — no observations to be taken, no certainty even of his position.

He staggered up the outside of his tripod-mast (the tripod-tubes could not be climbed inside, they were so slight and light — but high), and, riding there, he clung on long, one-handed, with a troubled brow, frowning over the sea which swung and flung him, his hair stretched between his head and the wind, and in his bosom a boding that the feet of foreigners were even then en route to violate the pride of that island that had proved herself the rightful ruler of rulers.

Now, he could act in the situation almost as he chose, for he had long been a sort of institution apart in the Service, having come to be looked upon as something of a free-lance, his two ships were so unique, and so due to his pressure upon the Construction Department.

They had cost the country only £2,400,000; and men had said: "Well, to humour him... he is a Prince."

His Asahel was under 2000 tons, without torpedo-tubes, unarmoured, without armoured deck, but of powerful scantling, strongly braced, to carry two 20-6-inch (unarmoured) wire-guns of 50 calibres on turn-tables, one for'ard, one aft — to be fired one at a time! since one took and shook her like a tempestuous stepmother.

Besides, she had four (unarmoured) 4-inch quick-firers in échelon pairs amidships for mosquito-attack, a little balloon gun, and a little Maxim.

Her “captain,” having seen no other ship on the sea, near ten o'clock came to a decision, and wirelessly to the Blunderbus — to learn that the Blunderbus was steering south, practically under water, fifty miles from the English coast, and now somewhere in latitude 55°, opposite Sunderland. The Asahel pricked off eight points to port to seek her.

It was about three minutes afterwards that the Prince said to a boy-servant at his cabin-door: “Here — hist — tell me if you hear anything.” He caught the boy's arm, and they listened, lurching, clinging. But the boy shook his head.

“Now! — hist!” the Prince hissed.

“Is it gun-fire, Sir!”

“You heard?”

“It struck me I did hear something like thunder somewhere.”

“Go through the ship and ask.”

Only 3 of 120 had heard anything, yet gun-fire was actually going on to the north-east, where a German battle-squadron was destroying a flock of ten “Tribal” class destroyers and two scouts, the Adventure and Boadicea — all the twenty-eight warships having found themselves mixed up together on a sudden; and astern of the squadron were discernible in the murk some nine to twelve liners.

The destroyers made no attempt to fly — it was too late; the scouts attempted, but some of a crowd of quick-fire shell (which mostly shot the sky or the sea-bottom) disabled the two little cruisers.

The ten decided to sell their lives dearly; and a fleet of twenty-five torpedoes went piercing the swell, kept tolerably steady by their gyrocope-pull, while an exclamatory racket of pop-guns from the boats and of 4, 6, 8-inch shot from the giants, as the two fleets tore through each other, was shrieked by the winds far over the North Sea.

But there were many more shots than torpedoes, the British all sank, the little Boadicea moving ten seconds on a mountain-summit, her bow perpendicular, two funnels showing, two hidden in the sea; and with her went down into dark water the 27,000 tons of the thundering Aegir, which the billows bounded upon and devoured when her propellers were blown away; and always near her at the sea-bottom will be the Kaiser Karl der Grosse, which graciously raised and exposed her port bottom to a torpedo as it posted near, and was opened beneath her boilers; and down into dark water went two of the troopships with six thousand infantrymen, born without a caul.

It was this brief affray that faintly reached the ear on the Asahel; and an hour later there was another, unheard by her, far south.

